

THE BOOK WAS DRENCHED

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

OU_168109

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

OSMANIA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

Call No. 803/C72 - Accession No. P.G 11687

Author

Title Columbia Dictionary of Modern European Literature

This book should be returned on or before the date last marked below

Columbia Dictionary of Modern European Literature

Columbia Dictionary of Modern European Literature

HORATIO SMITH, General Editor
COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

Columbia University Press, New York 1947

COPYRIGHT 1947, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS, NEW YORK

First Printing, February 1947

Second Printing, June 1947

Copyright under International Copyright Union

All rights reserved

Except for brief passages to be published in a review or as citation of authority, no part of this book may be reproduced in any form without the written permission of the publisher.

MANUFACTURED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Preface

THE INTENTION of this Dictionary is to provide a record and signed evaluations of the chief books of the important literary artists of all continental Europe—in the twentieth century and the immediately preceding and closely related decades. It would have made no sense to bow in mechanical respect to chronology, but 1870 or 1880 proved in many instances to be points of departure corresponding to the realities of literary and cultural and political history. Victor Hugo who died in 1885 is not included because he represents earlier generations and moods; Baudelaire who died in 1867 is treated because much of later European poetry stems from him.

The contributors have read the books in the languages in which these were written, ranging from the vernacular of Albania to that of the Ukraine. Thirty-one literatures are represented because that is how many there are, and 239 specialists have done the work because that is how many were qualified and available for what inevitably became a complicated and patience-taxing group enterprise.

The total number of articles is 1167, but here one cannot say blithely because that is how many there are. When is an author important, and why, and to whom, and for how long? In a recent lively and provocative consideration of the problem, Writers and Their Critics, a Study of Misunderstanding, Henri Peyre notes that dictionaries are among the least revolutionary of human activities and, in their nature, self-perpetuating. We were indeed less likely in the present instance to turn for authoritative selection of leading writers to earlier compilations of the same scope because these are virtually nonexistent, yet editor, consultants, and contributors might have been tempted to go through the numerous current manuals and perpetuate the choices found there. We encouraged each other not to do so. A Dictionary of Received Ideas is not the object. The constant attitude has been experimental. Collaborators were urged from the very beginning to be bold, free, direct, respectful only of the original documents. In given cases, particularly of course with the extensive literatures of the great and so frequently articulate cultural powers, a number of consultants, all with special experience and knowledge, were invited to draw up independently of each other lists of contemporary writers who were in their minds outstanding. Correspondence within each group was carried on until what could fairly be called a consensus was reached. Five appraisers are not necessarily more right than one, and five conjectures, if you wish to call them that, or five hundred, do not make a certainty. At any rate the lists—let us not say final but those we have ended by using—are honestly representative of common views of thoughtful experts of today.

We did not play the game of quotas. Anyone would agree that there are more writers in Russia important to the whole twentieth-century world than there are in the Faeroe Islands, and neither the principals nor any others are likely to be shocked that the general article on Russian literature runs to 10,000 words and the one on the literature of the Faeroe Islands to 350 words. This is how much Professors Simmons and Einarsson wrote on these subjects. But there were no neatly defined initial pre-assignments, and no scholar, no critic, not even any superhistorian or Supreme Court of Cultural Values could have made them. Names multiplied and distribution of space began to take on a certain pattern as the project grew. Cross references made by contributors in one field to authors in another field reminded us sharply of lacunae. It eventually worked out, to give sample statistics in round numbers, that we have included 200 French authors, 150 Germans, 100 Russians, 100 Italians, 100 Spaniards, 50 Poles, 40 Czechs. Some fields have received attention partly in terms of newness, since no book in English had previously made information about them accessible.

Most of the articles were written directly in English, even though certain contributors more recently established in the United States had done their first living, speaking, and writing in another European language. The English of a man of foreign background and culture often has a freshness of flavor not vouchsafed the native, and if the reader is occasionally startled in this volume by an idiom less than orthodox this may have all the interest and value of shock. Our specialists have been aided and abetted not only to give their own opinions but to do this in their own style. The invaluable assistants of the editor, in the offices of Columbia University Press, were understandably inclined to be more respectful of traditional form; there have been occasions where the editor in the presence of gentle and certainly defensible suggestions from the Press has written firmly in the margin the vigorous four letters of the word “stet”—and of course is responsible for the consequences. The editor favors the principle of a foreign colleague who has learned to write an amazingly effective English: try honestly and hard not to be original and then do not greatly mind if you are. Or as another has put it, true originality is the kind you have in spite of yourself.

The individual manner of the contributor has not been resisted, and within limits neither have his enthusiasms. Any specialist easily develops predilections. Had all superlatives been kept they might have started to cancel each other out, and perspective had to be maintained. But the constant policy has been to choose contributors capable of a thrill about their subjects—even at times a thrill of disagreement—and then not to frustrate them. Some of them as they read this will glance towards the editor a little wryly—in terms of the practice about quotations. How many were eager to share with the reader the savor of a beautifully appropriate and revealing passage! The Dictionary could have expanded rapidly into an Anthology. But the very conditions of high concentration in a single volume forbade this, and everybody finally accepted the discipline of the genre.

To have read all the articles in typescript, revised typescript, proof, revised proof, brings one to the well-known state of encyclopedic ignorance, not to say comprehensive bewilderment. What does the whole thing prove, as the geometrician said after hearing one of Racine's plays. Two complementary observations are offered, for whatever they may be worth.

Issues of nationalism kept emerging, especially with certain less conspicuous and by the same token more assertive countries. This local pride can be accepted sympathetically, and also to our own advantage since the fervor throws light on the real import of the local achievement. We have been told that to consider literature as a document is one of the most fallacious heresies of our times, but one may prefer to remain something of a heretic—like Balzac with his ambition to “faire concurrence à l'état civil.” We may still think there is merit in Dorothy Thompson's claim that one gets closer to the truth about American small-town life in Sinclair Lewis's Main Street than in the Lynds' Middletown. The reader eager to understand the ways of a particular European country in our time will find significant leads in what the contributors have assembled in this Dictionary.

On the other hand there are many cases where one returns to human nature in the large. A critic said not long ago that whether we like it or not “this is a world of particulars and the universal is buried under the specific.” After examining details about more than a thousand individual writers and I know not how many thousands of their books, I still doubt the world of particulars. Santayana, who does not like his times, speaks of surrender of essence to miscellany, and a dictionary is surely a miscellany, yet the surrender seems to have been far from total. When we read here, to give only one example, that Unamuno found himself and his Spain in Job and Pascal and Kierkegaard—well, we may remember pleasantly and hopefully that Emerson said that Aristophanes and Hafiz and Rabelais are full of American history. Some of the most authoritative articles reveal such a fusion of the timely and the timeless.

There need be no great objection to being dated, a necessary way of being identified. What is offered here may some day appear a quaint record of contemporary taste; some earnest and painstaking scholar two hundred years from now may make the book the subject of a learned communication to be read before whatever is then the equivalent of a Modern Language Association. We do not know how many of these authors will seem significant then. We have simply done what we could to be faithful to our own values.

Immediately following is a complete list of contributors, with a key to the initials used at the end of each article. Some have written one piece, some twenty, some thirty. I do not know how to select the persons to receive thanks above all others; there is no particular point at which courtesy or justice would permit me to stop. To them all, for industry, punctuality, patience, skill, tolerance of the editorial pencil—and to the staff of Columbia University Press for the same qualities—I offer lasting gratitude.

HORATIO SMITH

Columbia University
June, 1946

Contributors

ARRANGED ALPHABETICALLY ACCORDING TO THE INITIALS WHICH APPEAR AT THE CONCLUSION OF EACH ARTICLE IN THE DICTIONARY

A. B.	Anna Balakian, Syracuse University
A. B. B.	Adolph B. Benson, Yale University
A. Bu.	Adolf Busse, Hunter College
A. C.	Américo Castro, Princeton University
A. C. L.	André C. Lévêque, University of Wisconsin
A. C. R.	Anthony C. Rinaldini, New York City
A. del R.	Angel del Río, Columbia University
A. F.	Albert Feuillerat, Yale University
A. G.	Alrik Gustafson, University of Minnesota
A. I.	Andrés Iduarte, Columbia University
A. J. B.	Adriaan J. Barnouw, Columbia University
A. J. U.	Axel Johan Uppvall, University of Pennsylvania
A. K.	Alexander Kaun,* University of California, Berkeley
A. McV.	Albert McVitty, Falmouth, Mass.
A. M. G.	Anthony M. Gisolfi, New York City
A. P. B.	Angelo Philip Bertocci, Bates College
A. P. C.	Arthur P. Coleman, Columbia University
A. R. F.	Alphonse R. Favreau, University of Michigan
A. S.	Aaron Schaffer, University of Texas
A. Se.	Alfred Senn, University of Pennsylvania
A. Sz.	Albert Schinz,* University of Pennsylvania
A. T. M.	Archibald T. MacAllister, Princeton University
A. V. R.	Alphonse V. Roche, Northwestern University
A. W.	Albin Widén, Minneapolis, Minn.
B. M. W.	Benjamin M. Woodbridge, Reed College
B. P.	Blanche Price, Western College
B. Q. M.	Bayard Q. Morgan, Stanford University
B. R. L.	Bluma Renée Lang, Wells College
C. A. M.	Clarence A. Manning, Columbia University
C. B.	César Barja, University of California, Los Angeles
C. B. C.	Clarissa B. Cooper, New York City
C. E. F.	Charlotte E. Forsyth, College of Notre Dame of Maryland
C. E. W. L. D.	Carl E. W. L. Dahlström, University of Michigan
C. F. W.	Carlo F. Weiss, New York City

* Deceased.

CONTRIBUTORS

x

C. K. B.	Carol K. Bang, Baltimore, Md.
C. L. B.	Claude L. Bourcier, Middlebury College
C. M.	Claire Murray, White Plains, N.Y.
C. S. S.	Charles S. Singleton, The Johns Hopkins University
C. W., Jr.	Charles Weir, Jr., Cornell University
C. W. S.	Charles Wharton Stork, Harcum Junior College
D. F.	Daisy Fornacca, New York City
D. K. A.	Doris King Arjona, John B. Stetson University
D. V.	Domenico Vittorini, University of Pennsylvania
E.	René Etiemble, New York City
E. B. M.	Evelyn Beatrice Macht, New York City
E. C.	Ebe Cagli, Cambridge, Mass.
E. C. S.	E. C. Stillman, New York City
E. F.	Ernst Feise, The Johns Hopkins University
E. Fe.	Esther Fenili, Vassar College
E. F. H.	Edith F. Helman, Simmons College
E. Fl.	Eugenio Florit, New York City
E. G. D.	Ernesto G. Da Cal, New York University
E. G. L.	Emilio González-López, Hunter College
E. H.	Einar Haugen, University of Wisconsin
E. H. H.	E. Herman Hespelt, New York University
E. Hof.	Erich Hofacker, Washington University
E. H. W.	Ernest H. Wilkins, Oberlin College
E. J.	Ernst Jockers, University of Pennsylvania
E. J. S.	Ernest J. Simmons, Columbia University
E. Ju.	Elizabeth Judas, New York City
E. M.	Ernst Morwitz, University of North Carolina
E. M. F.	E. M. Fleissner, Wells College
E. M. G.	Elliott M. Grant, Williams College
E. N.	Eduardo Nicol, University of Mexico
E. R.	Ernst Rose, New York University
E. S.	Eugene Sheffer, Columbia University
E. Z.	Edmund Zawacki, University of Wisconsin
F. B.	Fernand Baldensperger, University of California, Los Angeles
F. Br.	Friedrich Bruns, University of Wisconsin
F. de O.	Federico de Onís, Columbia University
F. de P.	Ferran de Pol, Mexico, D.F.
F. D. M.	Ferdinand D. Maurino, Triple Cities College of Syracuse University
F. G. L.	Francisco Garcia Lorca, New York City
F. H. M.	Franz H. Mautner, Ohio Wesleyan University
F. J. W.	Francis J. Whitfield, Harvard University
F. K.	Frances Keene, New York City
F. S.	Frank Spiecker,* University of Illinois

* Deceased.

F. S. y E.	F. Sánchez y Escribano, University of Michigan
F. W. J. H.	Frederick W. J. Heuser, Columbia University
G. B.	Gino Bigongiari, Columbia University
G. Bi.	Gladys Bigongiari, New York City
G. de S.	George de Santillana, Massachusetts Institute of Technology
G. G.	Gaston Gille, New York City
G. I. D.	George I. Dale, Cornell University
G. K.	Günther Keil, Hunter College
G. M.	Gilbert Mignacca, Providence, R.I.
G. M. M.	Gerald M. Moser, University of Wisconsin
G. P.	Giuseppe Prezzolini, Columbia University
G. R. J.	Gertrude R. Jasper, Hunter College
G. R. N.	George R. Noyes, University of California, Berkeley
G. S.	Gioconda Savini, New York City
G. Sh.	Glen Shortliffe, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario
G. St.	Georg Strandvold, Decorah, Iowa
H. A. L.	Hanna Astrup Larsen,* The American-Scandinavian Foundation
H. B.	Hermann Boeschstein, University College, Toronto
H. Bf.	Hermann Barnstorff, University of Missouri
H. C.	Halina Chybowska, New York City
H. C. B.	H. Chonon Berkowitz,* University of Wisconsin
H. C. H.	Henry C. Hatfield, Williams College
H. C. R.	Howard C. Rice, Harvard University
H. E. P.	Helen Eitinger Pilla, New York City
H. H.	Hélène Harvitt, Brooklyn College
H. K.	Halvdan Koht, Washington, D.C.
H. M. C.	Haakon M. Chevalier, University of California, Berkeley
H. M. M.	Harold M. March, Swarthmore College
H. P.	Henri Peyre, Yale University
H. R.	Helmut Rehder, University of Wisconsin
H. R. M.	Howard R. Marraro, Columbia University
H. S.	Horatio Smith, Columbia University
H. Sch.	Heinrich Schneider, Cornell University
H. St.	Herbert Steiner, Pennsylvania State College
H. U. F.	H. U. Forest, University of Pennsylvania
H. W. H.-T.	Harvey W. Hewett-Thayer, Princeton University
H. W. L. D.	Henry Wadsworth Longfellow Dana, Cambridge, Mass.
H. W. N.	H. W. Nordmeyer, University of Michigan
H. W. P.	Hugh W. Puckett, Barnard College
I. B.	Irma Brandeis, Bard College
I. C.	Izidor Cankar, Quebec
I. W.	Isabelle de Wyzewa, Barnard College

* Deceased.

J.-A. B.	Jean-Albert Bédé, Columbia University
J.-A. G.	Jan-Albert Goris, New York City
J. B. C. W.	J. B. C. Watkins, The American-Scandinavian Foundation
J. B. O.	John B. Olli, College of the City of New York
J. C.	Joaquín Casalduero, Smith College
J. C. B.	John C. Blankenagel, Wesleyan University
J. C. D. L.	John C. Di Lorenzo, New York City
J. D. Y.	J. David Yarbrow, U.S. Naval Academy
J. E. S.	J. E. Shaw, University of Toronto
J. F.	José Famadas, Columbia University
J. F. De S.	Joseph F. De Simone, Brooklyn College
J. F. G.	Jane F. Goodloe, Goucher College
J. F. J.	Joseph F. Jackson, University of Illinois
J. F. M.	James F. Mason, Cornell University
J. G.	Jan Greshoff, Capetown, South Africa
J. M.	Jackson Mathews, Central Washington College of Education
J. M. C.	Joseph M. Carrière, University of Virginia
J. Me.	John Meyer, Chicago, Ill.
J. M. M. i V.	J. M. Miquel i Vergés, University of Mexico
J. N. C.	J. Norton Cru, Williams College
J. O'B.	Justin O'Brien, Columbia University
J. P.	J. Posin, Stanford University
J. R.	Joseph Remenyi, Western Reserve University
J. S.	Joan Sales, University of Barcelona
J. V.	Jeanne Varney, Columbia University
K. H. M.	Karl H. Menges, Columbia University
K. P.	Kurt Pinthus, Washington, D.C.
K. R. W.	Katherine R. Whitmore, Smith College
K. Z.	Krystyna Zbieranska, Toronto
L. A.	Louis Adamic, Milford, N.J.
L. All.	Louis Allard, Harvard University
L. E. S.	Louis E. Sorieri, New York City
L. E. V. N.	Louis E. Van Norman, San Diego, Calif.
L. F.	Leon Feraru, Long Island University
L. G. M.	L. G. Moffatt, University of Virginia
L. K.	Leon Kochnitzky, New York City
L. S.	Leon Stilman, Cornell University
L. T.	Lon Tinkle, Southern Methodist University
L. V.	Léon Verriest, Dartmouth College
M. B.	Marie Buffa, Brooklyn College
M. C. M.	Marie C. Mengers, New York City
M. D.	Mathurin Dondo, University of California, Berkeley
M. de M.	Margarita de Mayo, Vassar College
M. E. C.	Maurice Edgar Coindreau, Princeton University

M. F.	Max Fischer, New York City
M. G.	Margaret Gilman, Bryn Mawr College
M. H.	Milan Herzog, New York City
M. J. B.	M. J. Benardete, Brooklyn College
M. M.	M. Mespoulet, Barnard College
M. M. C.	Marion M. Coleman, New York City
M. P.	Mario Pei, Columbia University
M. Pi.	Maria Piccirilli, Vassar College
M. S.	Marc Slonim, New York City
M. T. R.	Mary T. Ragno, New York City
M. V. H.	Marion Vaux Hendrickson, New York City
N. B. A.	Nicholson B. Adams, University of North Carolina
N. D.	Nelo Drizari, Columbia University
N. J. T.	N. J. Tremblay, University of Arizona
N. L.	Nancy Lenkeith, New York City
N. L. T.	Norman L. Torrey, Columbia University
N. S.	Nikander Strelsky,* Vassar College
O. M.	Oleg Maslenikov, University of California, Berkeley
O. P. G.	Olav Paus Grunt, New York City
O. S. F.	O. S. Fleissner, Wells College
P. A.	Pauline Albala, New York City
P. A. C.	Pierre A. Clamens, Columbia University
P. A. P.	Peter A. Pertzoff, Cornell University
P. B.	Pierre Brodin, Lycée Français de New York
P. Bo.	Paul Bonnet, University of California, Los Angeles
P. M. R.	Peter M. Riccio, Columbia University
P. P. M.	Peter P. Munisteri, New York City
P. R.	Patrick Romanell, Barnard College
P. R. P.	Paul R. Pope, Cornell University
P. S.	Pedro Salinas, The Johns Hopkins University
R. A.	Richard Alewyn, Queens College, New York City
R. Al.	Rudolph Altrocchi, University of California, Berkeley
R. B.	René Bellé, University of Southern California
R. J. N.	R. J. Niess, U.S. Military Academy
R. K. S.	Robert K. Spaulding, University of California, Berkeley
R. M. L.	Ramón Martínez-López, University of Texas
R. S.	Rudolph Schevill,* University of California, Berkeley
R. S. P. M.	Ruth Shepard Phelps Morand, New York City
R. T.	René Taupin, Hunter College
R. W.	René Wellek, Yale University
S. A. R.	S. A. Rhodes, College of the City of New York
S. A. V.	Sophie A. Vrahnos, New York City
S. B.	Stanley Burnshaw, New York City

CONTRIBUTORS

xiv

S. C. P.	Sheila Cudahy Pellegrini, Barat College
S. E.	Stefán Einarsson, The Johns Hopkins University
S. E. S.	S. Eugene Scalia, Brooklyn College
S. H. C.	Samuel H. Cross, Harvard University
S. L.	Sol Liptzin, College of the City of New York
S. M. S. M.	Sister M. Serafina Mazza, Seton Hill College
S. N.	Samuel Niger, Yiddish Scientific Institute, New York City
S. S.	Sigmund Skard, Washington, D.C.
S. S. W.	Seymour S. Weiner, New York City
S. T.	Signe Toksvig, Bethel, Conn.
T. C.	Teresa Carbonara, Barnard College
T. G. B.	Thomas G. Bergin, Cornell University
T. M.	Thaddeus Mitana, Alliance College
T. M. C.	T. M. Campbell, Northwestern University
V. G.	Vincent Gagliadino, New York City
V. Gu.	Vincent Guilloton, Smith College
V. L.	Victor Lange, Cornell University
W. A. N.	William A. Nitze, University of California, Los Angeles
W. A. R.	Walter A. Reichart, University of Michigan
W. H. B.	W. Hunter Beckwith, Hofstra College
W. H. R.	Winthrop H. Root, Williams College
W. J. E.	William J. Everts, Colgate University
W. J. M.	Walter J. Mueller, New York City
W. J. R.	William J. Rose, University of London
W. K.	Watson Kirkconnell, Hamilton, Ontario
W. K. C.	W. K. Cornell, Yale University
W. K. P.	William K. Pfeiler, University of Nebraska
W. L. F.	William L. Fichter, Brown University
W. L. S.	William L. Schwartz, Stanford University
W. M. F.	Wilbur M. Frohock, Columbia University
W. N.	Werner Neuse, Middlebury College
W. P.	Wolfgang Paulsen, State University of Iowa
W. R. G.	William R. Gaede, New York City

Columbia Dictionary of Modern European Literature

A

Aakjær, Jeppe (1866–1930, Danish novelist and poet), was the son of poor peasants in Jutland. He was hired out as a herd's boy and experienced himself some of the shocking conditions which he afterwards described in Bondens Søn (1899; The Peasant's Son) and Vredens Børn; et Tyendes Saga (1904; Children of Wrath; the Saga of a Servant). The boy had hardly any schooling, but at 18 went to Copenhagen to study and after 10 years, interrupted by absences in order to earn money to go on, managed to pass the entrance examinations to the university. He then returned to his own people and made his living by writing and lecturing on socialistic lines (which cost him a jail sentence). He was first married, in 1893, to the novelist Marie Bregendahl (q.v.), was divorced from her, and later married the artist Nana Krog. About the beginning of the present century he was able to acquire a farm, which he called Jenle (Alone). This he made, a little paradoxically, into a center of folk life and every midsummer held a sort of rustic Chautauqua to which thousands of people came in order to listen to lectures on political and social questions, sing songs, and enjoy a convivial time. Aakjær was not satisfied with the knowledge of the Jutland peasants which he had absorbed from childhood, but applied himself to study of their language, local history, conditions of living, and attitude toward life. He wrote a biography of the leading Jutland writer of an older generation, Steen Steensen Blicher. Aakjær's fiction is strongly agitatorial, though sometimes his short stories are gems of humor and sympathetic understanding. There is no doubt that he contributed to improving the lot of the very poor. At the same time he inspired the common people with a sense of their human worth and with love of the land. He is most nearly classic in his lyrics, which have earned for him the name of the Danish Burns. The best known are Rugens Sange (1906; Songs of the Rye). Written sometimes in a Jutland dialect and dealing with the nature and people of Jutland, they have nevertheless become the property of the whole Danish people and, set to music, are sung wherever Danes gather.

See: Waldemar Westergaard, "Jeppe Aakjær," American-Scandinavian Review, XII (1924), 665–669.

H. A. L.

Aanrud, Hans (1863–, Norwegian writer of short stories and plays), was born of a peasant family in Gausdal in the central region of the country. Since his début in 1887 he has lived his most active years in Oslo as a critic and literary man. He has written harsh modern comedies on the life of the lower middle class of the capital; but his fame rests on short stories and children's books picturing the peasants of his home valley before the coming of industrialism. Aanrud's horizon is that of his farmers. His conception of society is static, his psychology may have a touch of conventionalism. But within his narrow field he is a master: love makes him seeing. His observation is that of the realist, but he approaches his subject with a respectful devotion which links him to the contemporary "home-soil novelists." In his short stories the valley is reborn with intimate preciseness of detail; landscape, climate and atmosphere, work and play, characters and situations, are portrayed with striking clarity. Aanrud has little interest in the somber and complicated aspects of life. His chef-d'œuvre, "En vinternat" (Eng. tr., "A Winter Night," American-Scandinavian Review, Vol. XVI, 1928, pp. 483–491), in En vinternat og andre fortaellinger (1896), is a drama of passion and tragedy compressed into a few pages of terrifying reticence; a few of his other stories give surprising glimpses into the subconscious. But what he mostly loves to bring out are the good, solid qualities of his people, their simple wisdom, their patience and stalwart health, described with mild humor and often through a sun haze of memory. With special tenderness he follows the fate of the weak and humble—the old folks, the children, the poor; his charming children's books are pure idyls, almost without a shadow (e.g., Sidsel Sidsaerk, 1903, Sølve Solfeng, 1910; Eng. tr. of both in Sidsel Longskirt and Solve Suntrap, Two Children of Norway, 1935). His style springs from that of the popular tradition, terse, restrained, and suggestive. It is Aanrud who has set the tone for the short story of Norwegian farm life.

S. S.

Aasen, Ivar (1813–1896, Norwegian linguist and poet), born in Ørsta, Sunnmøre, was the son of a tenant farmer. Self-taught, he became the standard-bearer of the Norwegian countryman's movement towards cultural and linguistic self-expression. When 23 years old he staked out his revolutionary life plan: to create for Norway a truly national standard language, based on the speech of the rural districts, which should take the place of the current Dano-Norwegian. He began his dialect studies in 1838, and out of these grew the first systematic grammars and dictionaries of Norwegian dialects, Det norske folkesprogs grammatik (1848; Grammar of the Norwegian Popular Language) and Ordbog over det norske folkesprog (1850; Dictionary of the Norwegian Popular Language). But Aasen did more than provide the outward structure of the new language which he proposed for his people in 1853 and called Landsmaal (country language). He also proved by eminent example that his language could be a medium of poetry. The cream of his folk lyrics are found in Symra (1863; The Anemone) and in his folk play Ervingen (1855; The Heir). These works have become household treasures in all Norway, particularly the countryside. Their themes are drawn from the homely, everyday feelings and experiences of the countryman, and they emphasize a love of home and the native culture, a bit on the bleak and sober side, but deeply human.

See: H. Koht, "Ivar Aasen, granskar og maalreisar," in Minneskrift (1913); E. Haugen, "The Linguistic Development of Ivar Aasen's New Norse," Publications of the Modern Language Association, XLVIII (1933), 558-597, and "Ivar Aasen as a Writer of Dano-Norwegian," Scandinavian Studies and Notes, XII (1932), 53-59.

E. H.

Abell, Kjeld (1901-, Danish dramatist), born in Ribe, southwest Jutland, is one of the few really arresting Scandinavian dramatists of our day. His early career seems to have been about equally divided between a serious interest in political science and a remarkable flair for stage designing, the latter interest ultimately leading to his dramatic authorship. His first play, Melodien, der blev vaek (1935; Eng. tr., The Melody That Got Lost, 1939), with its delicate lyric touch, its gracious, studied charm, and its remarkably skillful use of modern theatrical "revue" techniques, was an instantaneous success in Denmark, where the half-realistic, half-idyllic folk character found the subtle indirections of form and sentiment in the play exactly to its taste. Five other plays have come in rapid succession from Abell's pen, the most important of which is the serious modern problem-play Anna Sophie Hedvig (1939; Eng. tr. in Scandinavian Plays of the Twentieth Century, Ser. 2, 1944). Here Abell's early penchant for theatrical "modernism" in its most capricious forms gives way to a much more sober, essentially realistic form, and the subtle indirections of dramatic sentiment so characteristic of most of the earlier plays are transformed into certain sharply focused ideas which bear unmistakably upon basic contemporary political problems. The central ethical problem of the play—is it right to commit what society calls "murder" in defense of one's deepest moral sentiments?—is posed specifically with reference to contemporary political developments. Though the main action of the play takes place within the limited confines of a school world in a small Danish provincial town, the obvious "message" of the play (that the individual has the moral right to take a life when his sense of justice has been outraged) is aimed at the political doctrines and practices of European Nazi and Fascist thought. The play contains also a severe arraignment of a modern bourgeois society as such, and the positive position taken is strongly leftist if not actually Communist in its ultimate social and political implications. The Communist thought is not, however, very clearly developed in the play, chiefly perhaps because the play centers its dramatic focus most sharply upon the theme of human protest in its immediate psychological and ethical forms rather than upon the broader concerns of economic, social, and political theory and programs. What the future has in store for Abell as a dramatist is difficult to say. One thing, however, seems clear at present: these six plays bear indubitable witness to the fact that no other living Scandinavian dramatist has such an amazing control of the purely technical resources of the modern stage. And it may be added that such a play as Anna Sophie Hedvig suggests that Abell's genius has in it rich reserves of dramatic material which grow immediately and unafraid out of the blood-soaked soil of a contemporary world with all its brutal challenge to serious modern thought.

See: Alrik Gustafson, "Introduction," in Scandinavian Plays of the Twentieth Century, Ser. 2 (1944).

A. G.

About, Edmond (1828-1885, French novelist, playwright, and journalist), was born at Dieuze in Lorraine. He attended the Lycée Charlemagne in Paris, where he proved himself a brilliant student, then entered the Ecole Normale Supérieure, and in 1851 won a state scholarship and spent the three next years at the Ecole Française d'Athènes. Although very erudite, he was not destined to remain a mere scholar. On his return to Paris he published a volume of bright, witty, and at times satirical reporting, La Grèce contemporaine (1854), which opened to him the doors of the Revue des deux mondes. In 1855, however, the novel Tolla (Eng. tr., 1855; Tolla is apparently an adaptation of Vittoria Savarelli's Storia del secolo XIX, 1841) raised a tempest of indignation among critics, who accused him of plagiarism; and the storm had not yet abated when a three-act comedy of his, Guillery (earlier title, L'Effronté), dismally failed after two performances (1856). In a series of witty and impertinent articles which appeared in the Figaro above the signature Valentin de Quévilly, About cheerfully flayed his detractors. In the meanwhile, by his successful Voyage à travers l'Exposition des Beaux-Arts (1855) and a succession of amusing sketches in the Moniteur, Mariages de Paris, he had fully vindicated himself. His exuberance found another outlet in four novels which to this day are widely read: Le Roi des Montagnes (1856; Eng. trs., The King of the Mountains, 1861, 1897, 1902), an amusing story of Greek bandits, made into an opera in 1913 by Victor Léon, Germaine (1857), Les Echasses de Maître Pierre (1857), and Trente et quarante (1858).

About had also traveled in Italy, sojourning for a while in Rome, and had written a violent satire against the temporal power of the pope, La Question romaine (1859; Eng. tr., The Roman Question, 1859), which was first published in Brussels because permission to publish it in France was for a time withheld. He continued his antipapal campaign through weekly articles in the Opinion nationale, which were then published under the general title Lettres d'un bon jeune homme à sa cousine Madeleine (1861) and of which a new series appeared in 1863. In lighter mood he offered in 1859 a one-act play, Risette, ou les Millions de la mansarde, given at the Gymnase, but at the same time he was writing a great five-act drama containing very bold anti-Roman implications. This piece, Gaetano, was accepted by the Théâtre Français but not produced there; the Odéon staged it in 1862, and a storm of protests caused it to be withdrawn after only four evenings; it was given repeatedly in provincial cities, never without causing an uproar. About's political activity was kept up in articles, pamphlets, and books (e.g., Le Progrès, 1864; L'ABC du travailleur, 1868) which have lost interest today. When the Franco-Prussian War broke out, he went as a reporter to the battlefields. After the armistice he joined the ranks of the Republicans, supported Thiers, and together with Sarcey (q.v.) and a few others founded the Siècle (1871), which was characterized by strong anticlerical and antimonarchistic sentiments. L'Alsace (1872) is a severe indictment of the Bismarckian policy and a warning that Alsace will prove to be a vulture tearing the side of the German Empire. About never ceased writing novels: L'Homme à l'oreille cassée (1861), an amusing and fanciful episode of the Napoleonic Wars, Le Nez d'un notaire (1862), Le Cas de M. Guérin (1862), Madelon (1863). Some of his earlier plays have been republished in a collection called Théâtre impossible. In 1869 appeared Le Fellah: Souvenirs d'Egypte.

About presented himself for election to the French Academy in 1870, but his political and religious writings had deeply offended a majority of the members, who denied him their votes. Fourteen years later, in 1884, he was elected to the seat of Jules Sandeau, but died before the official reception.

See: M. Thiébaud, Edmond About (1936).
A. Sz.

Abromowitz, Sholem Yakob, see Mendele mocher sforim.

Achard, Marcel (1899–, French dramatist), was born at Lyon. His love of the theatre was revealed very early; at the age of seven he told the principal of the school he attended that he would become a dramatist. At the age of 10 a puppet play he wrote was produced. Critics agree that Achard's plays belong to the theatre of fantasy. His first success was Voulez-vous jouer avec moi (Atelier, 1923), in which the characters are clowns and the action takes place in a circus. The dialogue is clever and charming. In La Vie est belle (Théâtre de la Madeleine, 1928) the hero is a character, here named Charlemagne, whom Achard introduces in several later plays—a sort of "beloved vagabond." The author throws together, in improbable situations, characters who in ordinary life would have little opportunity to meet. The joy of living is the dominant note of the play. Jean de la lune (Comédie des Champs-Élysées, 1929) also enjoyed long popularity as a play and as a film. The principal male character is related to the Charlemagne of La Vie est belle. He is an idealist, and although he seems to be a dreamer, he understands human psychology. His faith in the woman he loves, despite her infidelity, triumphs at the end and forces her to accept his philosophy. A more somber note is sounded in La Belle Marinière (Comédie Française, 1929). Domino (Comédie des Champs-Élysées, 1932; Eng. tr., 1932) was played in New York.

In his criticism of Pétrus (Comédie des Champs-Élysées, 1934), Jacques Copeau (q.v.), of the Théâtre du Vieux Colombier, uses the words fantasy, imagination, caprice, grace, enchantment, gayety, wit. Achard's plays combine all these traits.

See: L. Delpit, Paris—Théâtre contemporain, I (1925), 111, II (1938), 127-130; P. R. Morand, "Marcel Achard and the Modern Stage," Romanic Review, XVII (1926), 349-354. H. H.

Adam, Paul (1862-1920, French novelist), was born in Paris. His great-grandfather and his grandfather were officers in Napoleon's army, and to them he is indebted for his interest in men of action and power. In his first novel, Chair molle (1885), Adam shows traces of the naturalistic approach, but he was also closely connected with the symbolists (see French symbolism). He founded several magazines, Carcan (with Jean Ajalbert), Symboliste (with Gustave Kahn and Jean Moréas, qq.v.), Vogue (with Kahn), and the second series of the Revue indépendante. In collaboration with Moréas he wrote Le Thé chez Miranda and Les Demoiselles Joubert (both 1886). In the year 1889 he actively supported the political party of General Boulanger but, promptly discouraged, he turned back to his literary activities.

A prolific writer, Paul Adam conceived his novels in groups. In a series of 16 volumes entitled Le Temps et la vie are found a tale of witchcraft and satanism in the manner of Huysmans (q.v.), Etre, ou les Feux du Sabbat (1888); an autobiographical story, Les Images sentimentales (1893); a powerful tetralogy, La Force (1889), L'Enfant d'Austerlitz (1902), La Ruse (1903), Au soleil de juillet (1903); and also Le Trust (1910) and Le Lion d'Arras (1920). Another group, L'Epoque, consists of 20 novels. Besides these cyclic fictions, Paul Adam published 18 volumes of essays (e.g., Vues d'Amérique, 1906; La Morale de la France, 1908; La Morale de l'éducation, 1908), four volumes inspired by the war of 1914, and four dramas. Compact, sometimes overwritten and confused, these works are impressive manifestations of an unusually powerful creative genius. By his cosmic vision, by his ability to analyze the soul of collectivities, to animate crowds and groups of people, Paul Adam appears as a forerunner of what Jules Romains (q.v.) named unanimism.

See: Marcel Batilliat, Paul Adam (1903); Louis Bertrand, "Le Mystère des foules' et l'œuvre de Paul Adam," Revue hebdomadaire, Année XXX (1921), Tome I, pp. 133-159; Camille Mauclair, Paul Adam (1921); W. Scheifley, "An Epic Genius: Paul Adam," Sewanee Review, XXIX (1921), 76-89.

M. E. C.

Adama van Scheltema, Carel Steven (1877-1924, Dutch poet), was born at Amsterdam. He attended the municipal Gymnasium, studied medicine for a short time, went on the stage, became an art dealer, and finally decided to devote himself entirely to literature and to the interests of the Social Democratic Labor Party. His socialism made him an opponent of the editors of De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide), self-centered adherents of "art for art's sake." He was not of the school that believes art to be a cult for the chosen few. To him there could be no art that was not for the many. In one of his songs he likened the hearts of men to rippling brooks which all come together into one glittering stream, a stream of beauty underneath life's turmoil, which carries the voices of all those hearts to the wide, ocean-like, and infinite dream. The poet, in other words, is not the interpreter of his own self, but must, while giving utterance to his emotions, voice in that utterance the feelings that live inarticulate in the community of men. Adama van Scheltema was, indeed, a singer for the people, and the people listened and gave echo to his song. Each new book that was published was seized upon by the composers, who vied with one another in setting his ditties to music. In a vigorously written prose work entitled Grondslagen eener nieuwe Poezie (1908; Foundations for a New Poetry) he formulated his ideas of what this poetry for the many should be, but his theory was less effective than his practice. His songs will still be living folk art when his prose is forgotten.

A. J. B.

Ady, Endre (1877-1919, Hungarian poet and writer), was born in Érmindszent and died in Budapest. Among Ady's ancestors there were Calvinist ministers and also members of the minor gentry. He went to secondary school in Nagyvárad and Zilah and studied law in Debrecen; he was a journalist in Debrecen and Nagyvárad. In this city he met a highly cultured woman whom he apostrophized as Léda; there was an exultant and pathetic tone in this relationship. In 1915 Ady married Berta Boncza, a woman much younger than he. He traveled a great deal and often visited the Riviera and Paris. His stories and articles sent from Paris to Budapesti Napló (Budapest Ledger), a daily paper, and to Nyugat (West), a progressive literary bimonthly, aroused considerable discussion; conservative politicians and publicists attacked him as a heretic. Ady opposed the Hungarian ruling classes, their complacency, their indifference to social progress. He also criticized their spiritual immobility, their aesthetic insensitiveness, the wide gulf between the literate and the illiterate. Hailing from a family of puritanic integrity and surrounded by a world in which the profit motive in business and callousness in politics prevailed, he drew his inspiration from these contrasts and expressed himself in a poetic vernacular that irritated those who did not possess his linguistic and creative insight. Although his romantic self-centeredness prevented him from touching the problems of Hungary at every point, yet his basic visions embraced many phases of Hungarian life, rural conditions, urban complexities, class struggles, the issues of the day, all found apocalyptic expression in the rhythms of his poetry. He was also aware of the problems of the Danubian Valley; some of his poems show the vastness of these problems and the poet's ability to approach them with tolerance and understanding. In his strongly personal poems he sang about love, voluptuousness, dissipation, materialism, mysticism, nature, death, and God. His was a tormented soul; Baudelaire's (q.v.) battle with the evil spirit of human destiny had its counterpart in Ady's struggle; no wonder that the French poet's art affected him somewhat. Nevertheless his "decadence" was not that of a congenitally sick man but of one whom the world sickened by its wickedness, selfishness, stupidity, and thieving unscrupulousness. By nature he was not a misanthrope; he could love with a childlike warmth, as was shown through his attachment to his mother and to his birthplace. It is reasonable to assume that if the ruling classes of Hungary could have sympathized with his spiritual quest, it would have been easier for him to find a solution for his problems.

Ady's major poems appeared in 11 volumes; his essays, sketches, short stories, articles, in five volumes. After his death, attempts were made to publish his collected works; but the tragic aftermath of the First World War, its desolate accompaniment, a despoiled Hungary, did not favor issuing the collected works of a poet. Adapted editions of Ady's work were published; often political exigencies resulted in an exploitation of Ady's poetry that he would have resented had he been alive. His departure from conventional phrasing was recognized as the prerogative of a poetic genius, and it was also wisely observed that his "modern" idiom echoed the biblical and rural Hungarian language of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries. At present Ady's works, once so unreal to many of his compatriots, appear more authentic than those of any other Hungarian poet of the 20th century; he symbolizes an isolated nation's instinct of self-preservation, the need of change, the courage of convictions, the inadequacy of stale traditions. For some time it was fashionable to praise him without discrimination; recently, however, readers have become more critical, more selective. Some of his poetry sounds rhetorical or trite because Ady was prone to succumb too quickly to lyrical impulses; nevertheless what is genuine in his poetry suggests lasting value. No doubt Ady's poetry is better, more original, more exquisite, than his prose. Vér és arany (1907; Blood and Gold), Szeretném ha szeretnének (1909; I Should Like to Be Loved), Ki látott engem? (1914; Who Has Seen Me?), A halottak élén (1918; Leading the Dead), and the rest of his poetic volumes show the workings of a mind and of a heart extremely sensitive and imaginative. His images are unexpected and varied. Ady's neurotic disgust with unfairness and platitudes, his prophecy of horror and terror, his pursuit of social and individual values are served in their expression by the strength of a skillful versifier who knew just how to blend the visions and fears of his poetic personality. It has proved difficult to translate Ady into foreign tongues; in English, Watson Kirkconnell, the Canadian poet, has been the most successful. Most translations do not reflect the magic of Ady's poetry. Many books and essays were written about Ady; he has a school of followers; however, he is so original that any imitation immediately betrays the imitator's lack of originality.

See: J. Horváth, Ady és a legujabb magyar líra (1909); A. Schöpflin, Magyar írók (1917); H. Horváth, Neue ungarische Lyrik (1918); J. Horváth, Aranytól Adyig (1921); W. Kirkconnell, The Magyar Muse; an Anthology (1933); J. Reményi, "Endre Ady, Hungary's Apocalyptic Poet," Slavonic Review, Vol. XXII (1944), Part I, pp. 84-105.

J. R.

Afinogenov, Alexander Nikolayevich (1904-1941, Russian dramatist), was brought up at Yaroslavl on the Volga and, with a writer as a father and a school teacher as a mother, turned at an early age to literature. At 15 he started writing, at 16 he edited a paper, while still in his teens he published three small books of verse, and at 19 he began having his plays produced at the Proletkult Theatre in Moscow.

In his first three plays he turned for his subject matter to labor struggles in other countries and earlier periods. Robert Tim (1923) dealt with a revolt of the weavers in England in the early 19th century. Po tu storonu shcheli (1926; On the Other Side of the Slot) was based on Jack London's story "South of the Slot," about a strike among the workers across the cable line on Market Street in San Francisco during the early years of the 20th century. Na perelome (1926; At the Breaking Point) dramatized the unrest in Germany at the end of the First World War.

In his next three plays Afinogenov turned to the life that he found about him in the Soviet Union. Glyadi v oba! (1927; Look with Both Eyes!) emphasized the need for the young Communist to keep his eyes open to the snares laid by enemies of the Soviet Union. Malinovoe varene (1927; Raspberry Jam) showed the danger of a Red army leader caring too much for the good things of life. Volchya tropa (1927; The Trail of the Wolf) depicted an engineer of the old regime trying to cover up his tracks.

In the more mature plays which followed, Afinogenov turned from these external conflicts in order to deal, like Chekhov (q.v.), with the inner drama within the characters; but, instead of showing the disintegration of a decaying society, he dealt rather with the birth pangs of a new social order. He had the courage to discuss boldly the problems that were in the minds of his audiences. In Chudak (1929; The Crank) he took as his hero a misunderstood but enthusiastic and hard-working non-Communist. In Strakh (1931; Eng. tr., Fear, 1934) he boldly tackled the theory that the ruling force in the Soviet Union was fear, showing up the fallacy of this belief. Passionately discussed, acted in 390 theatres in the Soviet Union and in those of England and America, this was Afinogenov's greatest success. At this same time he published a book discussing his theories of Soviet drama, called Tvorcheski metod teatra (1931; The Creative Method of the Theatre). Another play, Portret (1934; Portrait), took up sympathetically the efforts of a woman to break with the evil traditions of her past and to advance with the new socialist society.

During the following years Afinogenov pointed out in his plays the growing menace of fascist aggression. In Dalyokoe (1935; Eng.

trs., Remote, 1936, Distant Point, 1941) he showed how important the morale of even a remote Soviet village is to the defense of the motherland. In Salyut Ispaniya! (1936; Salute, Spain!) he championed the struggle of the Spanish Loyalists against the fascists and donated his proceeds from the play to the widows and children of the Loyalists killed in the struggle. Mat svoikh detei (1940; The Mother of Her Children) symbolized Mother Russia and her devotion to her various children. Mashenka (1941; performed by the Harvard Dramatic Club in 1942 and in New York in 1943 under the title Listen, Professor!) showed a 15-year-old girl awakening her grandfather to an interest in the new generation and the new Russia.

With the Nazi attack on the Soviet Union in June, 1941, Afinogenov wrote Nakanune (performed 1942; Eng. tr., On the Eve, in Seven Soviet Plays, 1946), depicting a Russian family on the eve of the invasion and their transformation into active resistance immediately afterwards. On November 5, 1941, less than four and a half months after the beginning of the invasion, Afinogenov, while on duty as a member of the Soviet Information Bureau, was killed on the Ilyinka in the heart of Moscow by the explosion of a bomb dropped in a Nazi air raid. He died, as he himself would have said, "full of life."

See: O "Strakhe" (1931), the opinions of 24 authors about Afinogenov's Fear. H. W. L. Dana, "Afinogenov," Theatre Arts, XXVI (1942), 169-176.

H. W. L. D.

Akhmatova, Anna (pseud. of Anna Andreyevna Gorenko, 1888-, Russian poet), was born near Odessa into the family of a merchant marine officer. While still an infant she was taken to Tsarskoye Selo, whither the family moved, and her education began at the Tsarskoye Selo Gymnasium. Before she had finished the Gymnasium curriculum Akhmatova was transferred first to the Smolny Institute and then to Fundukleyev Gymnasium in Kiev, and here she graduated. Subsequently she enrolled in the Kiev College for Women in the faculty of jurisprudence; she also attended the Rayev historical-literary courses in St. Petersburg, where she was a student of the poet Annenski (q.v.). In 1910 she married N. S. Gumilyov (q.v.), also a poet, and traveled with him in Italy, France, and Germany. In 1918 Akhmatova divorced Gumilyov and married Vladimir Shileyko, an Assyriologist and a poet in his own right. Her home is in Leningrad.

Akhmatova belongs to the "Acmeist" school of Russian poetry and occupies a distinctive place in that group. Akhmatova's genre is lyrical poetry. Its form—with its brittle clarity of description, the direct simplicity of narration, and the musical quality of language—proves an admirable foil for the subject matter, which consists of personal, deeply emotional, pessimistic, and often ironical love lyrics.

Akhmatova began writing poetry before she was 11. Her first published poem appeared in the Russian miscellany Sirius (1907), issued in Paris by Gumilyov. Her first book of verse, Večer (Evening), with a warm introduction by the poet Kuzmin, was published in 1912. Subsequent books of verse include the immensely popular Chyotki (1914; 9th ed., 1923; Prayer Beads), Belaya staya (1917; The White Flock), Podorozhnik (1921; The Buckthorn), and Stikhi (1922; Verses). After 1922 Akhmatova was silent for the better part of two decades, and only since the outbreak of the Second World War has she returned to poetic activity.

See: B. Eikhenbaum, Anna Akhmatova (1923); V. Vinogradov, Poezia Anny Akhmatovoy (1925).

O. M.

Alain, see Chartier, Emile.

Alain-Fournier, see Fournier.

Alarcón, Pedro Antonio de (1833–1891, Spanish novelist), was born in Guadix, Granada, of a noble but impoverished family which claimed a strain of Moorish blood. After receiving his education in the local seminary he chose journalism for his profession. In 1854 with a group of young liberals from Granada, the Cuerda Granadina, he migrated to Madrid, where he became editor of a radical journal, the Látigo. Forced to fight a duel with a champion of Queen Isabella II because of his insults to the crown, he found himself on the field of honor deserted by his radical friends, his life spared only by the generosity of his opponent, who fired into the air. The experience led him to reconsider soberly his political creed and to align himself thereafter with the more conservative forces. When the African war broke out in 1859 he went to the front as the first great modern war correspondent. His Diario de un testigo de la guerra en Africa (1859–1860), a best seller, made him rich and famous. He traveled through France and Italy, becoming converted in Rome to a militant Catholicism.

From 1861 to 1873 he devoted himself to politics as a member of the Unión Liberal, a middle of the road party. Defeated in his campaign for reelection to the Cortes by the ultraconservative candidate, he again took up his pen and during the next 10 years produced all his major works. In 1875 he was elected a member of the Spanish Royal Academy and in his inaugural discourse, Sobre la moral en el arte, defended the thesis that the artist cannot be indifferent to the moral implications of his work. This was heresy to the naturalists, and Alarcón found himself outside the main literary current of his day. His serious works found no favor with the critics. Offended by what he thought was their injustice, he resolved in 1882 never to write another novel. In 1887 he suffered an attack of apoplexy, and the last years of his life were spent in complete seclusion.

Alarcón was an eclectic by temperament. He belonged to no school, but wrote sometimes like a belated romantic, sometimes like a costumbrista, sometimes like a disciple of Balzac. There is no evidence of a consistent development in his work. He had no gift for inventing a plot or creating characters, but he had great narrative talent. He is at his best in the shorter forms of fiction and with traditional plot material. His first novel, El final de Norma (1855), a highly colored tale with an exotic setting, is romantic trash. His later serious novels—El escándalo (1875), which tells of the spiritual redemption of a dissolute youth; El niño de la bola (1880), which demonstrates the power of religious faith over human passions; and La pródiga (1882), which presents an unhappy mixture of love and politics—are unrealistically conceived, often melodramatic and lacking in good taste. Some of his earlier stories, however, especially those set in the background of the Peninsular Wars, such as "El afrancesado" and "El carbonero alcalde" (in Cuentos, artículos y novelas, 1859, later reissued in the first of the three volumes of cuentos, Historietas nacionales, 1881, Cuentos amorios, 1881, and Narraciones inverosímiles, 1882), are models of good storytelling. The unassuming love story of a gruff soldier, El capitán Veneno (1882; Eng. tr., Captain Venom, 1914), is light-hearted and charming. But Alarcón's claim to immortality is based chiefly upon his incomparable tale of the corregidor's love for the miller's wife, El sombrero de tres picos (1874; Eng. trs., The Three-cornered Hat, 1891, 1918, 1927) which has become the best-known work of Spanish fiction since Don Quixote. In this gay and witty story Alarcón perfectly and seemingly without effort fitted style to theme and produced an almost faultless masterpiece.

In addition to his works of fiction, Alarcón wrote a volume of poems, Poesías serias y humorísticas (1870); a drama, El hijo pródigo (produced in 1857); several books of travel, De Madrid a Nápoles (1861), La Alpujarra (1874), Viajes por España (1884); a collection of essays, Juicios literarios y artísticos (1883); and an autobiographical Historia de mis libros (1884).

See: M. Catalina, "Biografía del autor," in Alarcón, Novelas cortas (1884), pp. v-xliii; C. Barja, Literatura española: Libros y autores modernos, revised ed. (1933), pp. 253-258; E. Pardo Bazán, Alarcón; estudio biográfico (n.d.).

E. H. H.

Alas, Leopoldo (pseud. Clarín, 1852-1901, Spanish novelist, essayist, and literary critic), was born at Zamora, but he belongs in every respect to Asturias, where his ancestors came from and where, first as a student, then as a professor of law at the University of Oviedo, he lived most of his life. Asturian also were the basic traits of his literary personality—the cosmopolitan intellectual outlook together with a deep sense of attachment to the regional, the subtle critical analysis, the idealistic aspiration, and the ironic sense of humor.

It was as a literary critic in the field of contemporary literature that Alas, under the pseudonym Clarín, became famous. For this task of literary criticism he was well qualified, adding to his natural gifts of a keen mind and a refined taste the advantages of a broad literary and philosophical background, plus a spirit of wide-awake curiosity that kept him always posted about the most recent cultural developments. His efforts were not always as fruitful as might otherwise have been the case, however, due in part to the exigencies of a daily journalistic task, in part also to what sometimes was an excess of benevolence and other times an excess of passion and of moralistic zeal that caused his criticism to degenerate into a bitter and more or less personal satire. But even with these weaknesses, his criticism is always stimulating, and his influence was among the most powerful in the renovation of the Spanish literary atmosphere at the end of the 19th century. Examples of the author's literary criticism are Solos de Clarín (1881), the eight Folletos literarios (1886-1891), Palique (1893), and Benito Pérez Galdós (1889).

While the reputation of Alas as a critic has suffered somewhat, his reputation as a novelist, in spite of the small amount of fiction that he wrote—two novels, two volumes of short stories, and some three volumes of cuentos—has constantly increased. This novelistic production falls roughly into two groups, corresponding to the two main phases in the author's literary career, first as a naturalist, then as an idealist and a spiritualist. An admirer of Zola (q.v.), Alas was for years not only one of the most enthusiastic exponents in Spain of the naturalistic doctrine but also one of its most faithful practitioners, as evidenced by his long novel La Regenta (2 vols., 1884-1885), one of the best novels produced in Spain in the past century. The provincial life of Oviedo (Vetusta in the novel) is woven around a love story of which the Regenta, a married woman, is the coveted prize, the contenders being an unsuccessful church dignitary and a finally successful local Don Juan. The canvas here presented is broad, objective, and minutely detailed, reminding one in this case even more of Flaubert (q.v.) than of Zola. Traces of the naturalistic influence are also to be found in the author's second full-length novel, Su único hijo (1890), as well as in some of the short stories of the volume Pipá (1886). Side by side with the naturalistic influence, however, an idealistic tendency begins noticeably to affirm itself in these works, which thus appear as a transition between the naturalism of La Regenta and the idealism of the author's last manner. The germs of this idealism were already present in what had always been a romantic and moralistic disposition of the temperament of Alas, and as the years went by, especially under the influence of the idea of death, it tended to assume the form of a religious spiritualism. This idealism became finally the main source of the author's inspiration, and led by it, he wrote some of his most delicate work, short stories such as "Doña Berta" (1892) and, above all, the collections of cuentos in the volumes El Señor y lo demás son cuentos (1892 or 1893), Cuentos morales (1896), and El gallo de Sócrates (1901).

See: Azorín, Clásicos y modernos (1913), pp. 85-96; P. Sáinz Rodríguez, "'Clarín' y su obra," Revista de las Españas, II (1927), 305-311, 441-444, 536-538, 604-613.

C. B.

Albanian literature. Literary works in Albanian, written and published on Albanian soil, became possible only with the rise of a free Albanian state following the Balkan Wars of 1912 and 1913. Up to that time, and throughout the more than four centuries of Ottoman rule which preceded it, writing in the native tongue had been prohibited under stern penalties rigidly enforced by the Turkish gendarmes. Only in Scutari, capital of northern Albania, and there as a result of the special privileges enjoyed by the Roman Catholic clergy, was any exception to this rule permitted.

Yet writing in the Albanian tongue was begun long before 1913, and at first as a consequence of the folk cult which accompanied 19th-century romanticism. The pioneer in this field was Girolamo de Rada (1813–1903), an Italian of Albanian parentage who began his career by collecting the ballads and songs of his countrymen living in Italy and who turned later to writing original verse in which he used the ballad themes as his material. De Rada's principal works are The Song of Seraphina Thopia, Princess of Zadrina (1843), an Albanian Lenore; The Song of Milosaon (1864), a tale of old Scutari; Rapsodie albanesi (1866); and Skanderbeg (1873), a song of Albania's greatest national figure. The heir of De Rada on Italian soil was the scholar and poet Giuseppe Schiró (1865–1927), known in literary history for his Kënga e Mirditës (1919; The Song of Mirdita) and for his research in Albanian language and literature.

A great spur to literary activity among the Albanians was afforded by the Congress of Berlin (1878), with its high-handed partition of the Albanian lands. Scarcely had the decisions of the Congress been promulgated when, in protest, a league was formed for the defense of Albania's political rights and the promotion of her cultural advance. Soon books in Albanian began to appear wherever Albanians were to be found outside the homeland. Religious differences, which cut deep in Albania, dividing the Moslem from the man of Orthodox faith and both alike from the Roman Catholic, were put aside as representatives of the three faiths met to agree on the principles to be observed in the creation of what seemed desirable to all, a truly national Albanian culture.

One of the leaders in this movement was the historian and patriot Sami Bey Frashëri (Šems-ed-Din Sāmī Frāšerī), author of the first Albanian drama, Besa (1901; Pledge of Honor). Another was Pasko Vasa Pasha (pseud. Wassa Effendi, 1827–1892), a Roman Catholic of Scutari who had served under the Porte as governor of Lebanon and the author of Albania's moving hymn of liberation, "Moj Shqypni" (1881; O My Albania). The principal literary figure produced by the movement was Naīm Frashëri (1846–1900), brother of the above-mentioned Sami. Scion of an aristocratic southern Albanian family and a member of the powerful Bektashi (Bektāši) sect, Naīm Frashëri turned from the career of scholar which lay open to him on completion of his studies abroad to dedicate his talents to the Albanian muse. With the pastoral idyl Bagëti e Bujqësija (1886; Shepherds and Plowmen), published in Sofia and smuggled into Albania by friendly caravans, Frashëri won the hearts of his countrymen and made himself their spokesman. Following this with Fletore e Bektashinjet (1896; Book of the Bektashis), Naīm Frashëri turned finally to the theme employed by almost every Albanian writer at one time or another, the story of Skanderbeg, producing a full-length biography in verse—Istoria e Skënderbeut (1898; The Story of Skanderbeg). Naīm Frashëri died abroad in poverty. In 1937, however, when Albania celebrated her first quarter century of independence, his remains were brought to Tirana, the Albanian capital, and a monument was erected to his memory.

The first Albanian verse to be written on Albanian soil was that of Gjergj Fishta (1856–1941), an Albanian of humble Roman Catholic parentage from the Zadrina highland of Scutari. On account of the special conditions, referred to above, which prevailed in the Scutari region, Father Fishta was able to publish his verses, besides his literary review in Albanian (Hylli i Dritës; Star of Light), a whole generation before such a thing was possible anywhere else in the realm. Through the publishing house of the Franciscan Order, to which he belonged, Father Fishta was able to serve the Albanian cause well. His principal work, and probably the most authentic lyric note in Albanian literature thus far, was Lahuta e Malcis (1899–1909; Highland Strings). Taking its inspiration from popular ballads, the poem links the modern knights of the mountains with their prototypes in the Middle Ages and thus makes all Albanian history one in its heroic struggle for freedom and independence. Fishta died in retirement following the Italian invasion of Albania, stubbornly refusing collaboration with the Fascist "new order." With the name of Fishta is linked that of his fellow Franciscan and co-worker, Vinçenc Prenushi, best known for his collection of northern Albanian folk poems, Kângë Popullore (1911; Popular Songs).

Two dramatists to be noted are Mihal Grameno (1878–), an Orthodox Albanian of Korça (Koritza), the principal cultural center of southern Albania, whose patriotic tragedy Vdekja e Piros (1906; The Death of Pyrrhus) immortalizes not only the great warrior himself but his wife Antigone, daughter of Ptolemy, as well; and Kristo Floqi, also of Korça and also of the Orthodox faith, whose drama Fë e Kombësi (1912; Faith and Patriotism) elaborates somewhat melodramatically the popular theme of mixed marriage. A lawyer by profession, Floqi is also a poet. His Anthologjia Shqipëtare (1923; Albanian Anthology), a collection of epic and lyric verse, was used as a textbook in the schools of free Albania.

The two Albanian writers best known abroad are the essayist and critic Faik Konitza (1875-1942), a member of the Bek-tashi sect, long editor of the review Albania (1896-1909) in Brussels and London, and of the newspaper Dielli (Sun), which was published in Boston (1909-); and Fan S. Noli (1881-), bishop of the Albanian Orthodox Church in America. A native of Kyteza, near Adrianople, Bishop Noli received his early education in Turkey and Egypt. Later he came to the United States and was graduated from Harvard University and the New England Conservatory of Music. In 1908 he founded the Albanian Orthodox Church in America. Returning to Albania in the early 20's, Noli served his country as prime minister for six months, only to be forced into exile as a result of the opposition of the feudal lords of the south who objected to his American ideas. Of Bishop Noli's literary works, exclusive of translations, the most important are Istoria e Skënderbeut (1921; The Story of Skanderbeg), a biography; the three-act play Israelite dhe Filistine (1907; Israelite and Philistine); and Byzantin Symphony (1938; The Byzantine Symphony). Probably Noli's greatest contribution to Albanian literature has been his enrichment and expansion of the language itself, through forcing it to express the ideas and sentiments of such world figures as Shakespeare and Ibsen (q.v.) and Blasco Ibañez (q.v.), to mention but a few of those whose works he has translated.

To the present generation of Albanian writers belong Alexander S. Drenova (pseud. Asdrén), a native of Korça, with his Psalmë Murgu (1930; Psalms of a Monk), Rrëzë Dielli (1904; Facing the Sun), and Ëndëra e Lotë (1912; Dreams and Tears; and Ali Asllani with his Hanko Halla (Aunt Jane), a series of poems full of the homely local wit of Valona. Then there are Skëndër Bardhi, an American of Albanian parentage, a journalist, poet, and teacher, whose poems of the Second World War echo the Albanian's age-old cry of liberty; and Andon Zako (pseud. Çajupi), author of Babë Tomori, an anthology of Albanian mountain songs. There is also Midhat Frashëri (pseud. Lumo Skëndo, 1880-), editor of the literary journal Diturija (Education), founded in 1909, and director of the Lumo Skëndo Library in Tirana, whose translation of Schiller's Wilhelm Tell has become well known.

Besides these, there are the poet Louis Gurakuqi; Ramiz Harxhi, who wrote poems, Dëshirat e Zëmërës (1917; Desires of the Heart), in the idiom of Argyrocastra and Kurveleshi of the south; and Hil Mosi, author of Zan' i Atdheut (1913; Voice of the Fatherland). Branko Merxhani, an essayist, was the editor, up to the time of the Italian invasion, of the literary review Përjkekja Shqiptare (The Albanian Endeavor), published in Tirana. Foqion Postoli is remembered for the popular novels Për Mbrojtjen e Atdheut (1921; In Defense of the Fatherland) and Lulja e Kujtimit (1924; The Flower of Reminiscence), as well as for the sentimental play Dëlyra e Mëmës (1925; The Mother's Duty). Ilo-Mitkë Qafëzezi has done much to popularize biography. In Milto Sotir-Gurra, a native of Opari, is seen the influence of Maupassant (q.v.) and of O. Henry, especially in his Plagët e Kurbetit (1938; Wounds of an Exile).

The 30's saw the meteoric rise of a poetic talent in the person of Lasgush Poradeci (1899-), often compared with the Rumanian Mihail Eminescu (q.v.). He has been called "a poet of the future"; opinion is divided as to his worth. Like so much of Albanian writing, a good deal of which has been produced abroad, Poradeci's verse has little contact with the real people of Albania. For the true spirit of the land of the Shqipetare, the land of the eagle, as Albanians call their country, one is obliged to turn to the two pioneers of Albanian literature, Naïm Frashëri and Gjergj Fishta, and, in our own time, to the works of Kristo Floqi.

See: J. Bourcart, "Le Mouvement littéraire en Albanie," Vie des peuples, XV (1925), 341-362; S. Shundi, "Lasgush Poradeci," Balkans, III (1933), 502-504; X. Lefcoparidis, "L'Albanie intellectuelle," Balkans, VI (1934), 79-84; A. Klančar, "Modern Albanian Literature," Books Abroad, XVI (1942), 20-23.

N. D.

Alberti, Rafael (1902-, Spanish poet), was born in Puerto de Santa María, Cádiz, and after studying in the Jesuit academy went to Madrid in 1917. His book Marinero en tierra won the National Prize for Literature in 1924. He has never engaged in any other activity except the writing of poetry. During the Spanish civil war he was a fervent supporter of the republic. He has traveled in Europe and visited Soviet Russia. At the end of the civil war and after living some time in Paris, he went to Buenos Aires, where he is continuing his literary work.

Within the total unity of his production, a unity characterized by spiritual grace and technical dexterity, certain stages in his poetry can be distinguished. His first three books, Marinero en tierra (1925), La amante (1926), and El alba del alhelí (1927), are a renovation of the beauties and refinements of the rhythmic poetry of the cancioneros of the 16th century, with application to modern and personal themes. A refined treatment of folk themes and a natural exquisiteness are their distinguishing characteristics. In Cal y canto (1927) he adds subjects from modern life, represented by the elevator, the telegram, railroad stations, and aviation and presented in a Neo-Gongoristic language of dazzling beauty and novelty of usage. In 1929 his most significant book, Sobre los ángeles, was published. Here he deviates from the traditional elements used previously; his angels personify virtues, vices, places, and materials. Each poem has an independent value, but in their totality they convey an impression of distress, of anguish, that is a product of the fatal intimacy between the most beautiful and the most ugly, the most naïve and the most perverse, in that imaginary world of the angels. From that moment the satisfaction he had found in gracefulness was changed to a concern for amplitude and depth. As Alberti declared in 1934, his poetry ceases to serve purely aesthetic reason and now obeys revolutionary reason. Poesía (1934) gathers all the aforementioned books under one cover and initiates the period of the social themes; Trece bandas y cuarenta y ocho estrellas (Poema del Mar Caribe) (1935) and De un momento a otro (1937) contain his poetry in defense of the proletarian man in general and of the Spaniard in a struggle for his liberty. His books published since he has been living in Buenos Aires, especially Entre el clavel y la espada (1941), seem to temper the immediate aspects of the political theme with a greater insight into its poetical transcription. He has also produced a book in prose, La arboleda perdida (1942), which is a series of fanciful recollections of his childhood.

During the first years of his writing Alberti

combines with unsurpassed cleverness the two imperatives of literature at the beginning of the century—the folk theme, the essential reality of things Spanish, and the refinements of poetic form which were a part of the program of modernista poetry. No one is more skillful in putting into verses of Gongoresque lineage not only the perceptible echo of a historical style, but also the authentic qualities of an entirely contemporary emotion. As he sings of the streetcar ticket, the bullfight, and the football player, all the lyric magic of the baroque period comes to life, vivified in these contemporary themes. From this moment he discards all formal striving for effect based on classic tradition. His poetry is receptive to the torments and incoherences brought to literature by the winds of surrealism. But it is never shapeless or spiritually obscure. On the contrary it is surprising how, even in the depth of his most tortured poetic thought, there still survive the grace and clarity which have characterized his work from the very beginning. Even in his violent and aggressive poems of the modern period, there are continual glimmers of tenderness and delicacy. His crudest moments of expression retain an inevitable verbal charm which constitutes the essence of his poetic personality.

Three of his dramatic works are known: Fermin Galán (1931), which exalts the figure of the lieutenant in rebellion against the monarchy; El hombre deshabitado (1931), an auto of modern thought, descended from the Spanish auto theatre; and La pájara pinta, a lyrico-farcical fantasy.

See: P. Salinas, Literatura española siglo XX (1941), pp. 277–289; E. Prohl, "'Popularismo' and 'Barroquismo' in the Poetry of Rafael Alberti," Bulletin of Spanish Studies, XIX (1942), 59–86.

P. S.

Albert i Paradis, Catalina, see Català, Victor.

Alcover i Maspons, Joan (1854–1926, Catalan poet), was born in the city of Palma de Mallorca, where he grew up and devoted himself to the practice of law. He did not start to write in Catalan until about 1900; then he found in this particular medium exactly what he needed to produce a truly vigorous literary work. Poems such as "La creu" (The Cross), "Mallorca" (Majorca), "La serra" (The Sierra), "Ramon Llull," "Beethoven," and "Canço de la balanguera" (Song of the Spinning Girl) attracted the attention of critics. The solidarity existing among the Catalan-speaking countries was shown when the society Rat Penat of Valencia, devoted to the cultivation of literature in the native tongue, made him an honorary member. A deeply felt personal bereavement resulted in elegies of consummate beauty. Manuel de Montoliu has asserted that Joan Alcover is the most profoundly human poet of the Catalan Renaissance. In 1921 Alcover's poems were collected in a slender volume, Poesies.

Alcover has, like other poets of Majorca, a true gift of form. Indeed it is curious that poets so dissimilar in regard to themes as Alcover, Costa i Llobera, and Alomar (q.v.) should all show an instinctive Parnassianism. This may be explained in part by the beauties of the land of Majorca and also by the fact that the island is at an intersection of cultural highways running from Italy to Valencia and from France to Barcelona. The language of Joan Alcover has within it a melodic quality difficult to define without examples, and the poet's sensibility is extraordinary. In spite of the leisurely and gentle flow of this verse, Joan Alcover was capable of appreciating the literary revolution which Rubén Darío had begun in Hispanic-American literature and saluted him in notable lines. The Il·lustració Catalana has published the complete works of Alcover in three volumes, the first devoted to his poetry, the second to literary-biographical sketches, and the third to his speeches and articles.

See: M. de Montoliu, Estudis de literatura catalana (1912); C. Riba, Escolis (1921); R. Crossmann, Katalanische Lyrik der Gegenwart (1923); A. Schneeberger, Anthologie des poètes catalans contemporains (1923); C. Giardini, Antologia dei poeti catalani contemporanei, 1845-1925 (1926).

F. de P.

Aldanov, Mark Aleksandrovich (pseud. of Mark Aleksandrovich Landau, 1886–, Russian novelist, biographer, and essayist), was born at Kiev, of well-to-do parents, and took degrees in chemistry and law at Kiev University. He left Russia in 1919 and settled in Paris; after the collapse of France he emigrated to the United States (January, 1941). Nearly all of his work has been done abroad.

Aldanov is best known for his historical novels, beginning with the tetralogy, Myslitel (The Thinker), which deals with the events of 1793–1821: Devyatoye termidora (1923; Eng. tr., The Ninth Thermidor, 1926); Chortov most (1925; Eng. tr., The Devil's Bridge, 1928); Zagovor (1927; The Conspiracy); Svyataya Yelena, malenki ostrov (1923; Eng. tr., Saint Helena, Little Island, 1924). Symbolical devices link the Myslitel series to a trilogy centering about the personal problems brought into being by the forces of the Russian Revolution and the attempts of the émigrés to cope with life abroad: Klyuch (1930; Eng. tr., The Key, 1931); Begstvo (1932; The Flight); Peshchera (2 vols., 1934–1936; The Cave). Some of the themes and one of the characters are carried over into Nachalo kontsa (1939; Eng. tr., The Fifth Seal, 1943), an interpretation of the general frustration and disillusionment that preceded the Second World War. Aldanov's interest in individual characters and social movements places him squarely in the great tradition of the Russian novel, but he interprets that tradition after his own manner, blending pessimism with irony, realism with symbolical interpretation. A kinship with the 18th century is manifest in the "symbolical tales": the exquisite Desyataya simfoniya (1931; The Tenth Symphony, which brings to life Beethoven and the Vienna of his time and presents the eternal problem of human unhappiness and unfulfillment, and Mogila voina (1940; Eng. tr., For Thee the Best, 1945), a tale of the last years of Byron, of Castlereagh and other statesmen, with the activities of a minor political spy furnishing the necessary links as well as a fresh perspective. The historical novelist's manner reappears in his biographical sketches of significant political personalities—Sovremenniki (1928; Contemporaries), Portrety (1931; Portraits); there, too, the narrative is leisurely and the canvas large.

See: Charles Ledré, Trois Romanciers russes (1935).

P. A. P.

Aleixandre, Vicente (1900–, Spanish poet), born in Seville of a rich family, spent his childhood in Andalusia. Later he moved to Madrid, where he has remained and where for a time he halfheartedly studied law. He has never engaged in any kind of professional activity.

Aleixandre is intensely a poet, who feels the irrepressible urge to write poetry—though he is far from voluminous. Ambito (1928) gives evidence of a very personal quality which develops into bitter lyricism with Espadas como labios (1932). He belongs to the Spanish generation, rich in good poets, which underwent the literary evolution following the First World War and which learned the lofty poetic discipline and exacting standards of the master, Juan Ramón Jiménez (q.v.). Aleixandre's work is less widely known than that of many of his contemporaries, although he yields to none of them in lyrical fervor. His limited appeal is due perhaps to the fact that Aleixandre represents, to a greater degree than the others, a type of poetry which, evolving by means of unusual poetic associations (probably quite conscious with Aleixandre), affords the reader few means of interpreting the poem by any logical criteria. The process of penetrating to the dolciful essence of this verse is difficult, not because Aleixandre is related to or sympathetic with any esoteric group of poets, but because of his own attitude of caution and circumspection which makes him delight in clothing the dramatic and ultimate meanings of his human grief in the poetically mysterious. All the verse of Aleixandre forms a sort of mighty elegy within the bounds of desperation; the poet himself is not a victim of this desperation but stoically acceptant. The only thing which balances his ardent romanticism is this willingness to fuse himself, to become one with the mystery and grief of the world—from the light of the star to the palpitation of the insect. The opposition between liberation and servitude, between desire and reality, between poetry and life, are indeed felt romantically; here is a struggle to the death which leaves man and the poet without justification. Love and death are basal themes in his poetry and these naturally have been fused. The constant elegiacal character of his work and the recurrence of certain poetic mannerisms impart a sustained and uniform tone to his poetry which may even obscure for the not completely alert reader the richness of the elements in this poetic world.

Aleixandre's dramatic organization of reality is perfectly expressed in his last book, La destrucción o el amor (1935), which won the National Prize for Literature in 1934. If we make allowances for what is merely contemporaneous, certain qualities in this work suggest the great Spanish romantics.

See: P. Salinas, Literatura española siglo XX (1941).

F. G. L.

Aleramo, Sibilla (pseud. of Rina Faccio, 1879–, Italian novelist and poet), was born in the city of Alessandria. Her father, a university professor, was forced because of financial difficulties to take a position as director of a chemical factory in a small town in southern Italy. There she spent her adolescent years and at 16 married one of the factory workers. Nine years later she broke the bonds of her loveless marriage, deserting both husband and child for what she thought would be a freer and fuller life.

Sibilla Aleramo's work is for the most part autobiographical. A gifted and very beautiful woman, she writes with fervor of the vicissitudes of her emotional life. Her first novel, Una Donna (1906; Eng. tr., A Woman at Bay, 1908), was received with much enthusiasm and had great success in Italy and in many other European countries. It has been translated into French, German, Spanish, Swedish, Russian, Polish, and Dutch, as well as English. In this revelation of her youthful life the author touches on various social problems of the time, but is most outstanding in her plea for a forceful assertion of the dignity of womanhood and for woman's right to an existence as a free agent in the social order. This theme is further developed in Il Passaggio (1921), but with less success as the author puts too great an emphasis on her own particular frustrations. Her other prose works—Andando e stando (1921), Trasfigurazione (1922), Il Mio Primo Amore (1924), and Amo, dunque sono (1927)—are confessions of her innumerable amorous experiences and are saturated throughout with her extreme egocentricity and undiluted sensualism.

Sibilla Aleramo's endeavors in the field of poetry, Momenti (1921) and Poesie (1929), are all in free verse. They are brief exultations and lamentations too limited and circumscribed by her personal conceit and sensuality to attain any substantial spiritual quality, except in rare instances when, despondent and weary, she pens verses about the delusion and vanity of transient carnal pleasure. Endimione (1923) is a poetic drama dealing with one of her many adventures. It was presented at the Théâtre de l'Œuvre, Paris, in 1924, but had only an ephemeral success. More recent works are Gioie d'occasione (1930) and the drama Francesca Diamante (not published), but her first novel, Una Donna, is still considered her best product.

See: L. Russo, I Narratori (1923), pp. 140–141; C. Pavolini, "Sibilla Aleramo," Italia che scrive, VIII (1925), 133–134; G. Ravegnani, I Contemporanei (1930), pp. 60–66.

M. T. R.

Alexis, Paul (1847–1901, French journalist, playwright, and novelist), was born at Aix-en-Provence, where he early formed the attachment for Emile Zola (q.v.) which was to dominate his entire life. After attracting attention by passing off some poems of his own as works of Charles Baudelaire (q.v.), he entered the world of Parisian journalism and soon found himself in a position to render effective aid to the naturalists, to the impressionistic painters, and to Antoine's (q.v.) Théâtre Libre. Alexis laid the foundations of his literary reputation with a short story, "Après la bataille," published in the famous Soirées de Médan (1880), an adaptation in the naturalistic manner of the Matron of Ephesus legend. His talent for the short story is, however, better revealed in "La Fin de Lucie Pellegrin" (1880), based on an incident recounted by George Moore, and in such collections as Le Collage (1883), Trente Romans (1894), and La Comtesse (1897). His novels, Madame Meuriot (1891) and Vallobra (1901), and his plays, most of which conform to the naturalistic pattern, have as their milieu the Parisian demi-monde which Alexis, a confirmed noctambulist, knew perhaps better than any man of his time. His devotion to Emile Zola, to whom he later remained faithful in the darkest days of the Dreyfus case, is reflected in his Emile Zola; notes d'un ami (1882). Always serious and sincere, Alexis wrote without the irony of the other naturalists; his pictures of life, all based on the document humain, are rendered in a dry, incisive style which often recalls Stendhal. His famous telegram to Jules Huret, "Naturalisme pas mort!" typifies his life and career: he sincerely believed that the movement led by Zola was to be deathless, and today it may fairly be said of him that he was the only true and constantly faithful naturalist.

See: J. Huret, Enquête sur l'évolution littéraire (1891); R. Dumesnil, La Publication des Soirées de Médan (1933); L. Deffoux and E. Zavie, Le Groupe de Médan, 2d ed. (n.d.).
R. J. N.

Alibert, François Paul (1873–, French poet), was born at Carcassonne, where he has passed nearly all his life, keeping aloof from literary fads and quarrels and pursuing his own way of perfection. Beginning with L'Arbre qui saigne (1907), he has gone on quietly year after year producing distinguished poetry which has never won great popularity but has met with universal respect. His early work was written in melodious free verse, but he soon turned to the classical forms and attitudes that have caused him to be compared to Ronsard, Chénier, and, in more modern times, Moréas (q.v.) and Régnier (q.v.). His poetry in the main alternates between the ample elegiac and the lapidary epigram and in both styles is marked by nobility, majesty, and great technical mastery. Perhaps it is at its best in his work during the early 20's, Odes (1922), Eglogues

(1923), and Elégies romaines (1923). Here, though the classical spirit certainly predominates, it is to a marked degree influenced by symbolism, and the individual line comes very near the density of Mallarmé (q.v.) without falling into unintelligibility. The only reproach that can be, and has been, made concerning Alibert's verse is that it is cold, too deliberate and intellectual, without ecstatic vision. Certainly it is austere and marked by a purity of thought and expression that perhaps will not attract a romantic spirit. Nor can it be denied that for the most part it is lacking in "high spots." In his longer poems Alibert's tone is restrained and even, his effect coming rather from the spacious execution of a noble concept than from the brilliance of an individual line or stanza. Historically, however, his place seems certain as one of the major figures between Moréas and Valéry (q.v.) in the classical renaissance.

See: Yves-Gérard Le Dantec, "Le Mouvement poétique," Revue des deux mondes, November 15, 1937, pp. 450–453; René Lalou, Histoire de la littérature française contemporaine, enlarged ed., Vol. II (1940).

C. W., Jr.

Alomar, Gabriel (1873–1941, Spanish poet and essayist), born in Palma de Mallorca in the Balearic Islands, died in Cairo, where he had remained after service as Spanish minister to Egypt. A poet and essayist, he preferred the Catalan language for his poetry and Spanish for his prose. As a poet, although one of the first and most enthusiastic Spanish proponents of futurism, he represents nevertheless a moment of transition between a quasi-French Parnassianism and modernism; his constant concern is the form and style of his compositions. In his essays he manifests an ideology akin to the critical and renovating spirit of the Generation of '98 (see Spanish literature). Aware of contemporary European currents, he exerted a great influence in the intellectual circles of the eastern regions of the Spanish Mediterranean (Balearic Islands, Catalonia, Valencia), who saw in Alomar the standard-bearer of a new literary and political faith. Although the majority of his essays are scattered in journals and newspapers, some of them were collected in a volume entitled Verba (1917). His book of Catalan poetry is entitled La columna de foc (ca. 1911).

See: J. Mascaró, "Gabriel Alomar," Bulletin of Spanish Studies, XX (1943), 48–54.

E. G. L.

Alonso, Amado (1897–, Spanish philologue and critic), was born in Navarre. He received his training at the Centro de Estudios Históricos in Madrid under Menéndez Pidal and Navarro Tomás (qq.v.). With the latter he specialized in phonetics and continued in this science in Germany, where he was lecturer in Spanish at Hamburg. In 1927 he went to Buenos Aires as director of the Instituto de Filología of the University of Buenos Aires, where he now resides permanently. His early work on phonetics and linguistic geography—noteworthy is the emendation of Meyer-Lübke's La subagrupación románica del catalán (1926)—acquired new scope and originality in America as he confronted in their totality, and in part answered, the complex problems posed by the Spanish language on this continent. Problemas de dialectología hispanoamericana (1930), El problema de la lengua en América (1935), Castellano, español, idioma nacional (1938; 2d ed., 1943), numerous articles on specific questions, together with the work of Alonso's collaborators and students in the Instituto de Filología de Buenos Aires and in the Revista de filología hispánica, of which he is editor, are of fundamental importance, not only for the study of language in America, but for the general history of Spanish. In addition to his study of linguistic history and geography he has devoted himself to problems of style in language, spoken as well as literary. He is the leading exponent in the field of Spanish of the ideas and methods of the new philology and literary criticism which are, in the main, the creation of Karl Vossler. Among his studies in style as a method of literary interpretation, most important by reason of their perfection and depth are his article "Estructura de las sonatas de Valle-Inclán" (in Verbum, Buenos Aires, 1928) and his books Poesía y estilo de Pablo Neruda (1940) and Ensayo sobre la novela histórica: El modernismo en "La gloria de don Ramiro" de Enrique Larreta (1942). He has also published, with Pedro Henríquez Ureña, an excellent Gramática castellana (1938–1939; 2d ed., 1940–1941).

See: K. Vossler, review of El problema de la lengua en América in Boletín de la Academia Argentina de Letras, III (Buenos Aires, 1935), 366–369; L. E. Soto, Crítica y estimación (1938), pp. 65–80.

F. de O.

Alonso, Dámaso (1898–, Spanish philologist, critic, and literary historian), born in Madrid, has devoted his life to the study of Spanish philology and literature. He was trained in the Centro de Estudios Históricos, where later he was both a collaborator and a professor. He has taught in various European and North American universities and colleges, such as Berlin, Cambridge, Oxford, Stanford, and Columbia, and is a professor at the University of Madrid.

In the field of literary history and criticism he is to be considered as the most important commentator and critic of all time of Góngora's poetry. In 1935 was published La lengua poética de Góngora, a masterly study of that poet's poetic system. Already in 1927 he had produced his edition of the Soledades of Góngora, with a modern prose version, a model of illuminating precision. Numerous articles on different aspects of this writer's poetry and style have appeared in periodicals, principally the Revista de filología. His short book, La poesía de San Juan de la Cruz, was published in 1943. In this work he gives a historical, stylistic, and poetical interpretation of the best poems of the 16th-century mystic. His critical work is outstanding for its preparatory and documental solidity, for the rigor and precision of method, and especially for its fine taste and deep literary sensibility.

Dámaso Alonso brought to criticism and literary history the gifts of the delicate and original writer revealed in his Poemas puros: Poemillas de la ciudad (1921) and in verse published in magazines. Certain vivid narratives by Alonso have appeared in literary reviews of a distinctly modernistic tendency. In these the strangeness of theme and a quality of vision combined with a style perfectly organized and of high expressive potentialities provide some of the very best pages of modern Spanish prose.

See: A. Valbuena Prat, La poesía española contemporánea (1930), pp. 105–109.

P. S.

Altamira y Crevea, Rafael (1866–, Spanish critic, historian, jurist, and political scientist), was born in Alicante. He has had a long and distinguished academic career, especially at the University of Madrid. He has been president of the Ibero-American Institute of Comparative Law and of other important international organizations and in 1922 was appointed a judge of the Permanent Court of International Justice. He is recognized as one of the most enlightened citizens of modern Spain. He has faced the problems of his country with a realistic approach coupled with a sense of national and international civic responsibility. Altamira's work is characterized by a sane combination of theory and practice in the fields of history and law and in their multitudinous connections and ramifications. At the university of Oviedo he was instrumental in the establishment of the Extensión Universitaria Española, whose main object was to bring the university to the workers of the surrounding region. His earliest work of importance is the Historia de la propiedad comunal (1880; revised ed., 1929-). The Psicología del pueblo español (1902; 2d ed., 1918) is a notable contribution to the study of the historical events and factors which have made the Spanish people what they are today. Altamira is best known for his solid and trustworthy Historia de la civilización española (3 vols., 1901-1906; 4th ed., 4 vols., 1928). His historical method is based on extreme caution in generalizations and on an objectivity properly limited by the use of documentary evidence. He can be considered one of the foremost historians of the first half of the 20th century for his contributions in the history of Spanish law, Spanish colonial history, and the teaching of history. His name is widely known and respected in international circles, and his lectures have taken him to universities in Europe, the United States, and Latin America. Although living in exile today in Mexico, he continues his researches against all odds, and one of his latest publications is the Técnica de investigación del derecho indiano (Mexico, 1939).

See: Anonymous, "Notas sobre la vida y obras de Rafael Altamira y Crevea," Hispania, XI (1928), 400-406; Havelock Ellis, The Soul of Spain, 1931 ed., pp. 399-401.

F. S. y E.

Altenberg, Peter (pseud. of Richard Engländer, 1859-1919, Austrian writer of prose sketches), was born in Vienna and died there. Widely known as a bizarre character frequenting literary cafés, he was also revered as the friend of frank and free souls in the lower walks of life. In his published works and in his famous table talk alike he was a restless apostle of beauty and health and a brilliant philosophical humorist who adored nature and kindness and nonchalantly unmasked the despicable "bourgeois."

Having, in his own words, fervently loved ladies both noble and very ignoble, loitered in the woods, been a law student and a medical student, but never having actually studied either law or medicine, Altenberg published at the age of 37 his first book, Wie ich es sehe

(1896). "How I see it"—with the stress on see—was to be the approach also in his other writings, the it always being "life itself" (Vita ipsa, 1918), filled with most "real" fairy tales (Märchen des Lebens, 1908) and pictures, beautiful and revealing (Bilderbogen des kleinen Lebens, 1909). Altenberg wanted to give "extracts of life, dehydrated and canned in two or three pages." Whether these extracts be descriptive or narrative, monologue or dialogue, sublime or abusive, his bohemian existence is their background, explicit or implied. His impressions are submerged in the effort to disclose the values he cared for and to win his readers over to his enthusiastic beliefs—that physiological perfection is the basis of moral, intellectual, aesthetic perfection; that mental genius in men has its counterpart in aesthetic perfection in women; that radical "faithfulness to one's self," accompanied by unselfishness, is the highest good. These convictions pervade the witty and melancholic, shocking and delicate aphorisms, idyls, prose poems and manifestoes of Altenberg's remaining books: Was der Tag mir zuträgt (1901), Prödrömös (1906), Neues Altes (1911), Semmering 1912 (1913), Fechsung (1915), Nachfechtung (1916), Mein Lebensabend (1919), Der Nachlass (posthumous, 1925). He attacks all that seems hypocritical in a vapid civilization. He praises, with equal enthusiasm, nobleness of mind and of body, finding these in the socially humblest creature as well as in a famous actress. Animals, children, adolescent girls—creatures nearer to nature than the boring world of man—are the preferred objects of his admiration.

Altenberg has a supreme talent for conveying impressions and implications with a minimum of visible effort in concentrated prose or in a revealing dialogue of a few lines. Outstanding is his gift for making silent things resonant and for muffling the loud ones. His last books are full of bitterness and misanthropy. Alone in his sickroom, he turned his power of observation on himself, reflecting upon his passing life, describing the intermittent approach of death—until a few days before the end.

See: E. Friedell, Ecce Poeta (1912); A. Polgar, Der Nachlass von Peter Altenberg (1925), pp. 149-154.

F. H. M.

Altolaguirre, Manuel (1904?-), Spanish poet), was born in Málaga, Andalusia, where he spent his childhood and part of his youth and where, in 1926, he made a start in literature with his book Las islas invitadas y otros

poemas. With Emilio Prados (q.v.) he edited the journal litoral, which constitutes an important part of the productive effort of the so-called Southern Group. His Ejemplo appeared in 1927 as a supplement to litoral. Later he lived in Madrid, Paris, and London without interrupting his poetic production or losing his connections with the new generation headed by García Lorca (q.v.). Before founding litoral he had founded the journal Ambos, and later he established two others, Poesía and Héroe. These undertakings reveal a great interest in typography, which he made a fine art and which became the favorite occupation of his life. In 1936 the military movement caught him in Madrid. He collaborated with the government, followed it on its odyssey, expressed poetically and with great emotion the feelings of popular heroism, and at the triumph of Franco emigrated to Havana. There he has written many more works and founded the printing establishment "La Verónica."

He has also cultivated lyrical biography (Garcilaso, 1932), criticism, the drama, the essay, and has lectured extensively. According to his own declaration his poetry "reveals as a principal influence that of Juan Ramón Jiménez [q.v.], has been receptive to but not overwhelmed by that of Góngora, and feels itself to be a younger brother to that of Salinas [q.v.]. Moreover, Aleixandre and Cernuda [qq.v.] directly influenced his literary and personal formation." As with all of his group, in Altolaguirre the traditionally Spanish elements are combined with all the independence of his own generation. There is to be found in him, also, a gentle and tender sensibility, a childlike uneasiness in the presence of an immense unnamed grief which result in pages deep and exquisite such as those dedicated to his dead mother.

See: Gerardo Diego, Poesía española (Antología) (1934), pp. 536-552, 589; Laurel: Antología de la poesía moderna en lengua española (1941), pp. 1026-1048, 1133.

A. I.

Alvarez Quintero, Serafín (1871-1938) and Joaquín (1873-1944; Spanish dramatists), were born in Utrera, south of Seville, and were Andalusian to the marrow of their bones, not only in the scenes of most of their plays, but also in their sunshiny humor, their zest for life, and their great fecundity. In the development of the short play, the sainete, they are definitely in the tradition of the 16th-century Lope de Rueda (pasos or curtain raisers), of Cervantes and Quiñones de Benavente (entremeses or interludes), and of the 18th-century Ramón de la Cruz (sainetes). They continue the romantic tradition of insistence on local color, of the costumbristas of the 19th century such as Mesonero Romanos and Estébanez Calderón. The Andalusianism of these attractive brothers can be somewhat more exactly defined by negatives: the alluring region of their birth is not the land of Carmen, not the country of blood, passion, and tragedy described by the poet García Lorca (q.v.), not the home of tired descendants of superrefined Arabs with overdelicate sensibilities, and not merely the land of guitars, castanets, gypsy dances, and bull-fights. Least of all, to the Quinteros, is it a region beset with dreadful and still unsolved economic, social, and political difficulties, of latifundia and oppressed peasantry. Andalusia is all of those things, but Andalusians are also as the Quinteros present them, a gay—or sad—sentimental folk, with a usually satisfactory adjustment of individual to milieu, a truly splendid sense of humor. Not all Andalusian servants are as amusing as they appear in these plays, and not all Andalusia is quite so picturesquely charming, but spectators are not inclined to protest at artistic heightening of scene or character when the essence is true and valid. Nor do they much mind, either, if the superficial is exalted into the realm of dramatic art.

The Quinteros began in their teens to write plays, which were acted in the patio of their own house. They were still in their teens when their farce called Esgrima y amor was acted in the Teatro Cervantes in Seville in 1889. In that year they went to Madrid, where for some time before they became successful they struggled to support themselves with small positions in the Treasury (Hacienda) Department. El ojito derecho and La reja (both 1897), one-act pieces, attracted favorable attention. The musical comedy (zarzuela) La buena sombra (1898) made them well known. By 1900 they declared they had 51 plays in manuscript, and for a long time they produced five or six a year. Los galeotes (1900) is one of their more serious plays. Based on the episode of the galley slaves in Don Quixote (Part I, Ch. XXII), it is a study of ingratitude, with the scene laid in a second-hand bookshop in Madrid. The characters are superior to the plot. El patio (1900) and Las flores (1901) are among the authors' most successful Andalusian genre pictures. The action is slight, the portrayal of types and background masterly. The patio and the flowers acquire real personality of their own. Pépita

Reyes (1903) studies a woman who is torn by the lure of the stage and her love for home. The conflict is left unsolved. El amor que pasa (1904; Eng. tr., Love Passes By, in Four Comedies, 1932) shows the sensitive longings of a romantic woman in a provincial town. Mañana de sol (1905; Eng. tr., A Bright Morning, 1916) is a delightful curtain raiser (paso de comedia) based on a dolora of Campoamor (q.v.). It has been translated into several languages. In El genio alegre (1906) an austere household is transformed by the young laughter of the pretty Andalusian heroine. Las de Caín (1908) recounts merrily how Professor Caín manages to marry off his five daughters. In its counterpart, Las de Abel (1926), which is a better play, marriage is not achieved. Doña Clarines (1909; Eng. tr. in Four Comedies, 1932) is a serious character study of a blunt and slightly acidulous woman, with a passion for truth and straightforwardness. Based on Bécquer (q.v.), La rima eterna (1910) is delicate and poetic. Malvaloca (1912; Eng. tr., 1916), dedicated to the great scholar Menéndez y Pelayo (q.v.) and awarded a prize by the Spanish Academy, is one of the authors' most serious and most famous plays. It portrays the redemption, by a serious Asturian, of the apparently gay and light-hearted Andalusian Malvaloca, whose "life has been a long novel." The sentimental note is highly emphasized. Puebla de las mujeres (1912; Eng. tr., The Women Have Their Way, in Four Plays, 1927), admirably constructed, is all Andalusian gayety and laughter. Don Juan, buena persona (1918) presents a new and highly amusing kind of Don Juan, a most kindhearted fellow whose former inamoratas keep coming to him with all their problems, so that he is, as he says, "the slave of his female slaves." He finally marries an excellent woman named Amalia. La prisa (1921) contrasts modern haste with sweet Andalusian leisure. If the Quinteros added no new note in subsequent plays, such as Lo que hablan las mujeres (1932), El susto (1933), and La inglesa sevillana (1935), they at least showed that their humor did not diminish with age.

See: Helen and Harley Granville-Barker, introductions to S. and J. Alvarez Quintero, Four Plays (1927) and Four Comedies (1932); A. F. G. Bell, Contemporary Spanish Literature, revised ed. (1933), pp. 180-184.

N. B. A.

Alvaro, Corrado (1889-, Italian novelist), was born in Calabria. He has had what might be called a typical literary career, having been an editor of the Resto del Carlino and the Corriere della sera. His first book of importance, L'Uomo nel labirinto (1922), reveals some influence of Bontempelli (q.v.) as well as the author's own predilection for psychological study. Without abandoning his interest in the inner soul of man, he turned to a definite and meticulously portrayed background for two of his later—and still most highly regarded—works, La Signora dell'isola and Gente in Aspromonte. Both of these volumes appeared in 1930, and the setting was the author's native Calabria. In Gente in Aspromonte particularly, the nature of the background, the type of character presented, and the quality of tenseness and concision seemed to indicate that Alvaro could be classified as the Verga (q.v.) of his generation, and at this time Italian critics were inclined to place Alvaro in the group—for it is hardly a school—represented by Deledda and Tozzi (qq.v.) For this group Pancrazi uses the phrase "lyric regionalism." Actually however it would seem that there remains in Alvaro, in spite of the natural emotion which is apparent when he treats of his native land, more of the purely intellectual interest in the psychology of the individual than is found in either of the other two writers mentioned. Gente in Aspromonte was such a competent piece of work and the author was so obviously familiar with his background that it was easy to lose sight of his primary interest. With L'Uomo è forte (1938) he returned to the vein that inspired L'Uomo nel labirinto. For this is a novel which is entirely of the soul. The locale of the action is not even specified; at the time of publication it was politely assumed to be Russia, but it would not have been hard to imagine another setting. The novel is a study, made with penetration and sympathy, of the mind of man under totalitarian dictatorship. Its defect is an inevitable by-product of the subject: a certain lack of realism in the characters. But within its limits L'Uomo è forte is a fine work and one of the few Italian novels of recent years that will bear rereading. One who can write two such books as Gente in Aspromonte and L'Uomo è forte is a man of rare talent—and promise, for an encouraging thing about Alvaro is his steady growth and development. It is not unlikely that, barring accident, he will be one of the two or three really noteworthy novelists of his generation.

See: Pietro Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1934), pp. 186-191.

T. G. B.

Alverdes, Paul (1897–, German poet, story writer, and essayist), was born in Strassburg, where his father, a Prussian officer, was stationed. At 17 he volunteered for service in the First World War, the course and end of which aroused him to an awareness of all the serious problems of individual and national existence. His earliest imperfect efforts in verse and prose, which give expression to his rejection of the literary and political trends of the early 1920's and to his aspirations for the immediate future, found an eager acceptance among the German youth (Die Nördlichen, 1922; Kilian, 1922; Die Flucht, 1923; Die feindlichen Brüder, 1923). But with the appearance of the story Die Pfeiferstube (1929; Eng. tr., The Whistlers' Room, 1930) and the volume of stories Reinhold oder die Verwandelten (1931; Eng. tr., Changed Men, 1933) Alverdes won his place among the younger members of the group of leading figures in contemporary German literature which gathered annually for a week as the guests of Hans Grimm (q.v.) at Lippoldsberg. For Die Pfeiferstube he drew upon his own experience to depict three Germans and one Englishman all suffering from severe wounds in the larynx, and he writes a touching memorial to the comradeship of those men whose speech was possible only by means of metal tubes—"whistles"—in their throats. Reinhold oder die Verwandelten shows the war itself and the changes it wrought in those who went through it with their whole devotion, as Alverdes himself had done. Between the early works and these two volumes fall the Deutsches Anekdotenbuch (1927), which he edited together with Hermann Rinn, and translations from French and English including Cooper's The Deerslayer. Subsequently he wrote two enchanting bedtime stories for his children, Das Männlein Miltentzwei (1937) and Das Schlaf-türlein (1938), and a number of dramatizations, imaginary conversations, and radio plays, including Gespräch über Goethes Harzreise im Winter (1938).

In 1934 Alverdes together with Karl Benno von Mechow (q.v.) founded the monthly magazine Das Innere Reich. Since then Alverdes's interests have centered in this journal, for the editing of which his university training and literary gifts and experience admirably fitted him. Within its covers he has introduced to his German readers many contemporary writers of France and Italy, England and other countries, recounting his visits among them and their visits to Munich as his guests; here, too, he has published his own recent works and his numerous and excellent book reviews.

See Herbert Saekel, "Paul Alverdes" (with biography and bibliography), Die schöne Literatur, XXVII (1926), 145–150; H. G. Göpfert, "Paul Alverdes" (with bibliography), Die neue Literatur, XXXVII (1936), 503–513.

J. F. G.

Ambrus, Zoltán (1861–1933, Hungarian novelist, short-story writer, and critic), was born in Debrecen and died in Budapest. He studied law, then went to Paris. There he learned about French standards of literature, for which he had a natural aptitude, and when he returned to his native country, his critical and creative activities showed a spirit willingly influenced by French taste and clarity. His novels, short stories, critical essays on French writers, and theatrical criticisms displayed aesthetic maturity. Though he was a solitary figure in modern Hungarian literature—he never had a large reading public—his literary significance was never questioned. He received many literary prizes and was a member of the two leading literary societies of Hungary, the Petöfi Társaság (Petöfi Society) and the Kisfaludy Társaság (Kisfaludy Society). His collected works appeared in 20 volumes. From 1916 until 1922 he was the director of the Hungarian National Theatre. As the translator of good French novels and stories he helped to popularize French taste in the Hungarian world. What Georg Brandes (q.v.) as a critic and historian of modern European literature set out to do for the propagation of literature in general Ambrus did for French literature in Hungary. His own art was not faultless, but his realism and his irony seem convincing even today, notwithstanding the fact that much of his art has very little in common with European and Hungarian problems that grew out of the First World War. Ambrus was an echo of the French fin de siècle, of Flaubert, Maupassant, Anatole France (qq.v.).

Ambrus was one of the first Hungarian writers who tried to formulate literary views in which bon sens was the professed principle. His reasonableness seemed strange in an environment in which successful authors indulged in sentimentalism. His analytical keenness overlooked nothing that was provocative from an ironic point of view. Girofle és Girofla (1901; Girofle and Girofla), Berzsenyi báró és családja (1906; Baron Berzsenyi and His Family), Midas király (1906; King Midas), A türelmes Grizeldisz (1907; The Patient Griselda), Törpék és óriások (1908; Midgets and Giants), and his other short stories and novels were means through which Ambrus discovered the frailties and fallacies of a world in which the reader did not move, or if he did was apt to observe much less than the author observed. The critical works of Ambrus—Régi és új színművek (1914; Old and New Plays), Színházi esték (1914; Theatre Nights), Vezető elmék (1914; Leading Spirits), Költők és írók (1924; Poets and Writers)—show sharp intelligence and a critical power to translate into lucid sentences the understanding of characters, ideas, and motives expressed and portrayed in Hungarian and foreign creative works. Several of his novels and stories have appeared in French and German translations.

See: F. Szinnyei, Ambrus Zoltán (1918).

J. R.

Amiel, Denys (1884–, French dramatist), was born in Villegailhenc, Aude. For many years he was secretary to the playwright Henry Bataille (q.v.) and later wrote a critical biography of him. The First World War interrupted Amiel's literary career. Shortly after the war was over, in collaboration with his friend André Obey he wrote his first successful play, La Souriante Mme Obey (Nouveau Théâtre, 1921). The subject of this play may not seem very original, but Amiel handles with penetration the psychological study of the husband, a crude, inconsiderate individual, and of the wife, a sensitive, cultured woman. Like Emma Bovary (see Flaubert), the wife is bored with her existence in a small provincial town, with a husband who does not understand her. The unexpected turn which the authors give to the relations between the husband and wife is evidence of their dramatic skill. The play was produced in New York with the title The Wife with the Smile (Garrikk Theatre, 1921).

Amiel belongs to the group of writers which is often called the school of the unexpressed, or the school of silence. Amiel says that the most insignificant moments in life are perhaps the most pregnant with interior drama. One often sees people chatting peacefully, with the gestures of polite and sociable people; yet in their hearts may be stirring the most violent passions of the "ancestral beast." The writer must know how to exploit the dramatic value of the unexpressed. Le Voyageur, written in 1912 and produced in 1922, is an application of this theory. It is not in what the characters say, but in what they leave unsaid that lies the drama of their lives. La Carcasse (Comédie Française, 1926), also written in collaboration with Obey, Décalage (Théâtre Saint-Georges, 1931), L'Age du fer (Comédie Française, 1932),

Ma Liberté (Théâtre Saint-Georges, 1936), and some of his later plays treat such questions as the intellectual and sentimental problems of the young girl of today, the machine age, and the amorous difficulties of man. A strange play, Trois et une (1932; Eng. tr., Three and One, 1933), had more than 70 performances in New York. Amiel is a keen analyst of the human heart and a keen critic of contemporary society. He is also a clever technician.

See: L. Delpit, Paris—Théâtre contemporain, I (1925), 104–106, II (1938), 43–45, 56–59; B. Brisson, Au hasard des soirées (1935), pp. 193–199; M. E. Coindreau, La Farce est jouée (1942).

H. H.

Amiel, Henri Frédéric (1821–1881, Swiss poet and critic), was born in Geneva of a French family which had been driven there by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. His mother and his father, a prosperous businessman, died while he was still a boy; he was taken into the family of an uncle, educated in Geneva and Berlin, where he acquired a fondness for German literature and philosophy which he never lost, and provided with the means for extensive European travel. In 1849 he became professor of aesthetics at the Academy of Geneva, in 1854 professor of philosophy; his life was henceforth connected with this institution, which he watched develop into a university. Outwardly his life was a placid and mediocre one, hardly marked even by literary activity. Various critical articles, since collected by Bernard Bouvier in Essais critiques par Henri-Frédéric Amiel (1932; included is an essay, J. J. Rousseau, which had been translated into English by Van Wyck Brooks, 1922), and a few small volumes of poetry, notably Grains de mil (1854) and Les Etrangères (1876), translations, chiefly from the English and the German, were his only known productions, until after his death there appeared Fragments d'un journal intime (2 vols., 1884; Eng. tr., The Private Journal of Henri Frédéric Amiel, enlarged ed., 1935). These are selections from an enormous mass of material (173 notebooks comprising about 16,900 pages) made with the help of Edmond Scherer (q.v.) by a friend, Fanny Mercier, to whom Amiel had bequeathed these diaries. The effect of this revelation was immediate. Amiel was everywhere hailed as one of the great observers, analysts, and depictees of the human heart; and the personality which he studied with such absorption for some 35 years has lost little of its attraction with the passing of time.

The secret of Amiel's life is perhaps yet to be discovered; but at least a tentative analysis is possible. Gifted with both a keen analytic mind and a sympathetic, perceptive nature, undoubtedly poetic in his temperament, he suffered from a lifelong inability to bring any solid, definite work to completion. A strange timidity, an apparent intellectual indolence which delicate health perhaps partly accounts for, an almost neurotic inability to do the necessary act, these were drawbacks which he never overcame. Longing for the absolute, he had a distaste for the partial and immediate; fascinated by perfection, he hesitated to take the first step towards it. His reading was remarkable in variety and extent—but only because it was the result of the free and capricious wandering of his desire; as soon as a book had to be read for some good reason, the task became almost impossible. The same was true of his poetry: vers de société he could produce in profusion, anything else only with enormous effort. The marks of such effort are apparent in his criticism as well; the free and easy outpouring of the Journal on books read from day to day disappears, and in its place there is a stiff, labored, almost colorless attempt at complete thoroughness, a criticism, as Scherer remarks, which circles the subject, pursues it into all its relationships and ramifications, and catalogues it completely, without ever really entering into it. Through most of his life, as the Journal amply witnesses, Amiel meditated great projects, searched for the field in which his unusual genius could find its fullest expression. Very early he developed a beautifully sensitive intellect; for 30 years his mind remained, like a delicate and perfect piece of apparatus, ready for some rare task; but the will to choose or accomplish was lacking. In part, the keeping of the Journal may account for this weakness. Begun at first as a mental and moral discipline, a statement of goals to aim at and a record of success or failure, it became as the years passed perhaps an indulgence, a means of evasion. Here Amiel's tireless mental curiosity could have full play; here his passion for describing, analyzing, and judging himself could compensate for lack of will. Perhaps greater sympathy and encouragement of the right sort from his contemporaries would have made a difference. Amiel had friends in plenty, chiefly feminine, but they were above all admirers, and the incentive to activity which close acquaintance with such a man as Scherer might have provided was always denied him. He himself, with some exaggeration no doubt, traced the roots of his pliancy to a childhood fear of his domineering father. His isolation, too, from the best society of Geneva because of his supposed democratic tendencies undoubtedly helped to turn him in upon himself. But eventually in an attempt to explain, one must return, as he did in the Journal, time and again, to an inherent weakness of his own nature.

Nevertheless, it is to that weakness that we owe the Journal, his one work of lasting value. Its audience will probably never be wide, but there seems no doubt that it will attract steadily year by year a few thoughtful spirits who will delight in its delicate tints, its psychological nuances. It is certainly not of the highest sort of literature; even among records of spiritual experience it is perhaps not in the first rank. The side of Amiel that for want of a better term one must call feminine is far too predominant; his taste for the pretty and the sentimental exhibits itself in its fullness all too often. He edifies rather than exalts; he is a moralist rather than a mystic, as a comparison of the Journal with the Pensées of Pascal will make amply clear. Yet there are few who can read Amiel without being moved to reflection, few who after reading him cannot see with a new clearness some part of their own characters. The attacks of Bourget and Brunetière (qq.v.) have done little to shake the Journal's reputation; one may feel pity, or worse, for the man it reveals; but it still remains the most complete and detailed revelation of a personality to be found in any literature.

See: Paul Bourget, Nouveaux Essais de psychologie contemporaine (1885); Edmond Scherer, Etudes sur la littérature contemporaine, Vol. VIII (1885); Berthe Vachier, Vie d'Amiel (1885); Bernard Bouvier, introductions to Journal intime d'Henri-Frédéric Amiel (3 vols., 1923), Essais critiques par Henri-Frédéric Amiel (1932), and La Jeunesse d'Henri-Frédéric Amiel (1935); Albert Thibaudet, Intérieurs (1924).

C. W., Jr.

Amorós, Juan Bautista, see Lanza, Silverio.

Andersen, Trygve (1866–1920, Norwegian novelist), was born in the eastern part of the country. His father belonged to the official class, his mother had inherited farmer's traditions, and the son united in himself the two cultural and literary currents whose interplay and sometimes conflict have meant so much to modern Norwegian development. At the University of Christiania he received a good philological and historical education, and he became a fastidious stylist, adapting, with fine taste, words and expressions of the vernacular for the traditional literary language. From about 1890 he was the virtual leader of the neo-romantic group, and his stylistic ideals of conciseness and lucidity influenced many young authors. His own first work, the historical novel I cancelliraadens dage (1897; In the Days of the Titled Judge), was a profound study of a milieu and a psychology, picturing the conflicts of Norwegian society at the end of Danish domination. His second novel, Mot kveld (1900; Towards Night), is filled with apprehensions of death and forebodings of mental and general collapse. Both novels, each in its particular character, were succeeded by a number of short stories, evidently influenced by Edgar Allan Poe, which proved him the master of this branch of literature in Norway. They are brought together in his Samlede fortællinger (3 vols., 1916; Collected Stories).

H. K.

Andersson, Dan (1888–1920, Swedish poet, short-story writer, and novelist), is the greatest poet and one of the most gifted writers of prose fiction among modern Swedish proletarian authors. His life was short and tragic, extreme poverty dogging his every step from childhood to the grave. Born in an isolated district of Dalecarlia, son of a poor folk school teacher, he spent, at the age of 14, some eight months visiting relatives in America. Upon his return to Sweden he became a forest laborer and charcoal burner, at which occupations, except for a short period at Brunnsvik Folk High School, he spent the remainder of his life. His literary work was reasonably prolific, considering the vicissitudes of his life. The best of his poetry was published in two volumes, Kolvaktarens visor (1915; The Charcoal Burner's Songs) and Svarta ballader (1917; Black Ballads). A collection of short stories, Kolarhistorier (1914; Charcoal Burner's Tales), and two novels, De tre hemlösa (1918; Three Homeless Ones) and David Ramms arv (1919; David Ramm's Heritage), constitute the best of his prose. A selection from his poetry has been translated into English by Caroline Schleef under the title Charcoal-Burner's Ballad & Other Poems (1943). Andersson's poetry was strongly influenced on its formal side by Kipling and Service and perhaps to a lesser extent by his countrymen Fröding (q.v.) and Karlfeldt (q.v.), while his prose in both its spirit and its form owes much to Dostoevski (q.v.) and the Hamsun (q.v.) of Hunger and Mysteries. Though his work everywhere reveals a strong sense of solidarity with the lower working classes, he does not directly attack the existing economic and social order and scarcely seems conscious of any sharp class conflicts. His heavy, brooding temperament is concerned primarily with religious and metaphysical problems, though he was never able to resolve the somber disharmonies of the life that was the object of his brooding. He approaches these problems with a fierce primitive intensity, and whatever stray flashes of light he finds in the awesome gloom of human existence become a part of the primitive-wilderness mysticism which is essential with him. "His view of life," writes a recent Swedish critic, "is a grim fatalism, and his whole work is a fragmentary theodicy, occasionally lighted by flashes from his innermost soul . . ." His poetry is marked by rich, buoyant rhythms, on occasion softened and subdued, and by a bold, sharp, achingly haunting figurative language eminently appropriate to his somber, restless, ceaselessly searching poetic temperament.

See: Torsten Fogelqvist, introductory essay in Andersson, Samlade skrifter, I (1934), viii–lxxvi; E. Kihlman, "Dan Andersson," in Nordiska profiler (1935), pp. 69–88; Waldemar Bernhard, En bok om Dan Andersson (1941); Anne-Marie Oddestedt, Dan Andersson: en levnadsteckning (1941).

A. G.

Andrenio, see Gómez de Baquero, Eduardo.

Andreyev, Leonid (1871–1919, Russian short-story writer, novelist, and playwright), was born in Orel, studied at the universities of St. Petersburg and Moscow, and graduated from the latter as a lawyer. Having lost the only case he pleaded, he turned to writing, first as a court reporter and subsequently as an author of short stories. His first story, "Bargamot i Garaska" (Eng. tr., "Bargamot and Garaska," in The Little Angel and Other Stories, 1916, which also contains translations of many of the stories mentioned later), appeared in a daily Moscow paper in 1898 and drew the attention of young Maxim Gorky (q.v.) with its skeptical overtone. Under the influence of Gorky and with his help, Andreyev rapidly acquired fame and success. His reputation as a confirmed doubter was belied during the First World War, when he vehemently championed the Allied cause and bitterly opposed the Bolshevik Revolution. He died in exile, in a small Finnish village, heartbroken and completely disenchanted.

The vogue of Andreyev was due to the fact that he spoke for the average intellectual at the turn of the century, with his doubts and his bewilderment, characteristic of the twilight of a civilization. Andreyev discussed practically every philosophical, ethical, and social problem of the time, rarely attempting a solution. Even as a court reporter he showed less interest in the verdict than in the presentation of the case itself, from all angles imaginable. A perpetual questioner, Andreyev has prodded the modern man's conscience and consciousness. In story and play he brings to light overt and hidden ailments and follies in their universal aspect, to set us wondering and asking the unanswerable why and wherefore of life and of human existence.

In his early realistic stories Andreyev depicted helpless individuals tormented by fear of life and death ("U okna," 1899, At the Window; "V podvale," 1901, In the Basement), by loneliness and inability to bridge the chasm between fellow men ("Molchaniye," 1900, Silence; "Lozh," 1900, The Lie; "V tumane," 1902, In the Fog), by a sense of inferiority ("Rasskaz o Sergeye Petroviche," 1900, The Story of Sergei Petrovich), and by a craving after illusion and the inevitable disillusionment ("Angelochek," 1899, The Little Angel; "Stena," 1901, The Wall). At this time (1899-1902) he wrote in the traditional style of Russian realism, with a touch of Chekhov's (q.v.) impressionism. Gradually Andreyev's tone assumed a higher pitch, as he broadened his scope and deepened his probings. The style of "Zhizn Vasiliya Fiveiskovo" (1903; Eng. tr., "Life of Father Vassily," in When the King Loses His Head and Other Stories, 1920) was nervous and gaudy, echoing its Dostoevskian theme of faith versus reason. A similar crescendo could be noticed in "Mysl" (1902, Thought; Eng. tr., A Dilemma, 1910), a study of reason turned traitor to its master, who becomes its slave. Andreyev began to attack problems not on any individual and local scale, but in application to humanity and the world—of necessity varying his realism with symbolism and allegory. Thus his "Krasny smekh" (1904; Eng. tr., The Red Laugh, 1905) transcended the Russo-Japanese War, its immediate inspiration, and became an arraignment of war in general, with the "red laugh" as a symbol of war's madness and horror. "Tak bylo" (1906, Thus It Was; Eng. tr., "When the King Loses His Head"), though suggested by the revolutionary events in Russia, was a disparaging treatment of the French Revolution and of all revolutions that fail to go beyond the façade and leave man's inner slavery intact. Echoes of the Russian Revolution of 1905 could be felt in such plays as K zvezdam (1906; Eng. tr., To the Stars, 1907) and Savva (1906; Eng. tr., 1914), but the implications again went beyond time and place, touching on such questions as destructive anarchism and the conflict between man's response to the direct demands of the earth, the valley of tears, and the scientist's detached attitude sub specie aeternitatis. In Zhizn cheloveka (1907; Eng. tr., The Life of Man, 1914), a morality play, in which naturalistic passages jostle with vague symbols and obvious allegories, Andreyev attempted an epitome of the folly and futility of man's life, largely in Schopenhauer's vein. The play Tsar Golod (1907; Eng. tr., King Hunger, 1911) dissected modern society, from the upper classes down to the outcasts, and exposed its moribundity, not sparing even the working class, which was in the eyes of the intelligensia surrounded in those years by a halo. The hopelessness of Andreyev's outlook on individual and collective man was illustrated by most of his later stories and plays, culminating in his last novel, of which he left only a rough draft, Dnevnik Satany (1921; Eng. tr., Satan's Diary, 1920).

A student of Schopenhauer, Andreyev at times passionately sought to rise above despair by invoking the vision of the heroischer Lebenslauf of the hero or the saint. He rose to the peak of his talent in the noble delineation of selfless revolutionists in "Rasskaz o semi poveshennykh" (1908; Eng. tr., The Seven Who Were Hanged, 1909) and in the Christlike image of David Leiser in the play Anatema (1909; Eng. tr., Anathema, 1910). A heartening note may be discerned in the tragedy Chyornyya maski (1908; Eng. tr., The Black Maskers, in Plays, 1915), which ends in the self-immolation of Duke Lorenzo as a triumph of the will to truth. Fugitive though these flashes were, they reappeared persistently on the black horizon of Andreyev's outlook. His last play, Samson v okovakh (written in 1914, posthumously published in Sovremennyya zapiski, Vol. XXIV, 1925; Eng. tr. from the original manuscript, Samson in Chains, 1923), sounds a buoyant note—for Andreyev. The blind Samson rises above carnality and pettiness, and in destroying himself he also brings down the pillars of reigning mediocrity, the temple of Philistia.

See: D. Merezhkovski, "V obezyannykh lapakh," in Sobraniye sochineni, XII (1911), 197-242; A. Kaun, Leonid Andreyev; a Critical Study (1924).

A. K.

Andrian-Werburg, Leopold, Freiherr zu (1875–, Austrian poet), born in Vienna, came from a family whose lineage goes back to the 12th century. His maternal grandfather was the composer Giacomo Meyerbeer. A diplomatic career led him to Athens, Rio de Janeiro, and St. Petersburg, and during the First World War he represented the Austrian emperor at Warsaw. He had early seen the Hapsburg monarchy threatened by nationalistic and anti-Catholic forces. In July, 1918, he became the Generalintendant of the Imperial Theatres of Vienna. After the breakdown of old Austria, he retired. He then lived mainly in Austria and in Nice and, in recent years, in Brazil.

His poems were first published in the Blätter für die Kunst, although his ties with its founder, Stefan George (q.v.), were anything but close. George never ceased to admire the poems of Andrian's youth for being what they are, an essence of their period (the 90's), and for thus transcending the period. The same can be said of his short prose treatise, Der Garten der Erkenntnis (1895), the inner story of a youth, of a haughty and lonely soul—a story impregnated with a very strong feeling for atmosphere, for the promises and threats of life, in a way a Werther of its time. It has to be compared and contrasted with Hugo von Hofmannsthal's (q.v.) Märchen der 672. Nacht or with the youthful treatises of André Gide (q.v.). These writings were re-edited in 1919 as Das Fest der Jugend: Des Gartens der Erkenntnis erster Teil und die Jugendgedichte.

Among Andrian's few essays, the most notable deals with the rebirth of Poland, "Das erniedrigte und das erhöhte Polen" (in Österreichische Rundschau, 1921). Here it is the diplomat and the historian who speaks. In two substantial and significant books of Andrian's mature age the point of view is that of the Catholic, the philosopher, the Austrian. The first, Die Ständeordnung des Alls (1930), is, as the subtitle has it, "rationales Weltbild eines katholischen Dichters"; the second, Österreich im Prisma der Idee (1937), a philosophical dialogue, attempts to establish the existence of an independent Austrian nation. Another work, "De Anima," which may strongly show the author's introspective power as a moraliste in the French sense, is as yet unpublished. A booklet on Hofmannsthal, one of his close lifelong friends, was ready for publication when Hitler entered Austria.

See: H. Bahr, Renaissance (1897), pp. 41–45; Albert Verwey, Proza, III (1921), 173–183; F. Wolters, Stefan George und die Blätter für die

Kunst (1930), pp. 72–74; C. Du Bos, Approximations, Sér. 5 (1932), pp. 143–171.

H. St.

Andrić, Ivo (1892–, Serb short-story writer and poet), was born in Travnik, Bosnia, a Yugoslav region where intermingle influences of different ethnic origins, religions, traditions, and cultures. He went to school in Sarajevo and took part in the movement of nationalistic youth which strove to liberate this province from Austro-Hungarian rule. He studied philosophy in Zagreb, Vienna, and Cracow and for his Yugoslav nationalistic persuasions was put in jail during the First World War, held by the Austrian authorities as a political criminal. In 1918 he became secretary of the National Council in Zagreb, which proclaimed the union of the Croats and Serbs. After the establishment of Yugoslavia, he entered the diplomatic service and served in Rome, Bucharest, Trieste, Geneva, Madrid, Belgrade, Berlin.

During his difficult days in prison, Andrić composed his first series of lyric and philosophic fragments, Ex Ponto (1918). This was followed by the volume of short stories Put Alije Džerzeleza (1920; partial Eng. tr. in Slavonic Review, Vol. XIV, 1935–1936, pp. 13–19, 556–563); by poems entitled Nemiri (1921; Disquietudes); by Pripovetke I and II (1924, 1931; Stories); as well as by numerous other tales in different magazines, especially in Srpski književni glasnik (Serbian Literary Herald). Ex Ponto and Nemiri are really collections of a poetic prose which is mostly autopsychological analysis. They are not lamentations, but rather a man's feverish seeking for a comprehension of life, nature, eternity.

In his later work Andrić turned exclusively to story writing in an effort to depict the conditions, ways, and customs of the people of his very original native country. The gallery of his types is rich: people who are full-blooded, vehement, full of dark instincts and immoderate passions, heroic, quarrelsome; there are monks and dervishes, merchants and craftsmen, Ottoman bigwigs and adventurers, pasha's mistresses and cabaret beauties, Catholics, Orthodox, Moslems, Jews, Gypsies. All these persons have violent longings, but are checked by the petty circumstances of their narrow environment. They are continuously torn between their sensuality and their religious dogma. Andrić is a penetrating observer of these bizarre creatures with their highly oriental coloring, an excellent psychologist, a skillful organizer of his material.

He is definitely a master among modern Yugoslav story writers.

See: M. Bogdanović, "Put Alije Djerzeleza," Srpski književni glasnik, September 16, 1920; I. Sekulić, "Istok u pripovetkama Ive Andrića," Srpski književni glasnik, December 1, 1925; N. Mirković, "Ivo Andrić," Srpski književni glasnik, January-March, 1938.

P. A.

Anghel, Dimitrie (1872-1914, Rumanian poet), studied in Jassy, traveled in Italy, and lived for a long time in Paris. His leisurely youth, due to a rich inheritance, was a rare and precious apprenticeship for his later poetic achievements. Delicate, excessively sensitive, of extraordinary verve and powerful imagination, he wrote his first book of poetry, In grădină (In the Garden), in 1903. His prose works Fantome (1911; Phantoms) and Oglinda fermecată (1911; The Enchanted Mirror), his comedy in verse Cometa (The Comet), written in collaboration with St. O. Iosif and produced in 1912, his Caleidoscopul (1908; Kaleidoscope), also written with Iosif, as well as numerous poems and poetic sketches, were the product of a distinct individuality.

When Eminescu's (q.v.) monument was unveiled at Galatz in 1911, Anghel seized this opportunity to read at the official exercises his "Prinosul unui Iconoclast" (Offerings of an Iconoclast), a short proclamation of independence from the master's sway. With Anghel, a new efflorescence of profuse diversity spread over Rumanian poetry, and many young singers were inspired by him. Maiorescu (q.v.), aged and powerful premier, called Anghel's works "fancy bonbons unhealthy for peasants' stomachs," but Iorga (q.v.) sensed their suavity and splendor, writing lines of marked appreciation in their favor. An unhappy love life, complicated by poverty and disillusionment, caused Anghel to commit suicide.

See: N. Iorga, Un poet al florilor (1914); L. Feraru, Un manuscris al poetului Anghel (1922).

L. F.

Annenski, Innokenti Fyodorovich (1856-1909, Russian poet, critic, and translator), was born into the family of an important government official in Omsk, Siberia, but while still a child was taken to St. Petersburg. After studies at the University of St. Petersburg, he intended to continue for a higher degree, but abandoned this plan and accepted a position as instructor in classical languages in a Gymnasium.

Eventually he became principal of the Tsarskoye Selo Gymnasium and then director of schools. He also lectured on Greek literature in the Women's College courses in St. Petersburg.

Annenski began his literary career in the 1880's by submitting reviews to various periodicals. In the 1890's he began his work of translating (and popularizing) the works of Euripides. Not until 1904 did Annenski publish a book of his own verses, Tikhiya pesni (Quiet Songs)—under the pseudonym Nik. T-O (Nikto = Nobody). His second book of verse, Kiparisovy larets (The Cypress Chest), appeared posthumously, in 1910, and soon became a classic among the literary élite. The small amount of his original verse prevented quick recognition of Annenski's poetical talent. Only shortly before his death did he become an influential figure in the St. Petersburg literary circles.

Although Annenski's verse in some respects resembles that of Baudelaire, Verlaine, and Mallarmé (qq.v.), it is distinctly Russian in character. His penchant for clarity and his aversion to the diffusiveness of symbolist verse endeared Annenski's poems to the "Acmeist" group of Russian poets. Gumilyov, Akhmatova, Mandelshtam (qq.v.), and other lesser poets of this circle were greatly influenced by Annenski.

See: V. Khodasevich, "Ob Annenskom," Feniks, I (1922), 122-136.

O. M.

Antoine, André (1858-1943, French actor, theatre director, and dramatic critic), was born in Limoges and went to Paris at the age of eight. He had little or no formal education and at 13 was a clerk in a publishing firm. He used his spare time to educate himself and to satisfy an early passion for the theatre by attending plays every night. He wanted to be an actor, took a course in diction, but failed to enter the Paris Conservatory. After five years of military service (1878-1883) and when employed as clerk in the Paris Gas Company, he joined a group of amateur players. His energy and enthusiasm soon made him their leader, and he was able to realize on a stage, however small, the ideas he had long entertained for a reform of the French theatre whose conventionalism he abhorred. He had meant at first to give plays of all kinds, but found himself welcoming more and more exclusively the dramatists of the naturalist school (see French naturalism), the opponents of the "well-made play," who found Antoine the only director in Paris willing to accept their works. His theatre, now called the Théâtre Libre, open only to season-ticket subscribers, was not considered a public place of entertainment, and the often bold dramas of the naturalists thus escaped the censorship. During the seven years of his directorship (1887–1894), Antoine produced 124 new plays by many playwrights later to become famous—Brieux, Curot (q.v.), Henri Lavedan; the contemporary masters of the German, Russian, and Scandinavian drama were likewise introduced by him to French audiences. Many great actors, like Gémier, also began their career under him. Financially, however, the Théâtre Libre never was a success, and in 1894 he abandoned its directorship.

In June, 1896, he was appointed codirector, with Paul Ginisty, of the government-subsidized Odéon, but he resigned at the end of six months after many difficulties with the actors and his associate. In 1897 he opened his own playhouse, the Théâtre Antoine, where for almost 10 years he continued with great success the tradition of the Théâtre Libre. His reputation as a great reformer of the stage was now made; with his troupe he toured Europe and South America. He was appointed an examiner at the Paris Conservatory and received the ribbon of the Legion of Honor. In October, 1906, the minister of education again placed him at the head of the Odéon for a seven-year period, this time as sole director, thus officially crowning his success. Antoine accepted this opportunity of applying his ideas, on a much bigger stage, to the production of the great dramatic masterpieces of the past. The end of his directorship in 1914 marked the end of his active life as a producer. He had the satisfaction of knowing that in spite of much adverse criticism he had achieved his life ambition—to make the French theatre abandon artificiality and conventionalism in favor of truth and naturalness. He served afterwards as dramatic critic on several newspapers and wrote his memoirs. The cinema attracted him for a while, and he directed the screen version of Alphonse Daudet's (q.v.) L'Arlésienne. Beset all his life by financial difficulties, he died penniless at Camaret in Brittany.

See: A. Thalasso, Le Théâtre Libre (1909); Antoine, Mes Souvenirs sur le Théâtre Libre (1921) and Mes Souvenirs sur le Théâtre Antoine et sur l'Odéon (1928); S. M. Waxman, Antoine and the Théâtre-Libre (1926).

V. Gu.

Anzengruber, Ludwig (1839–1889, Austrian playwright, novelist, and short-story writer), was born in Vienna. His father, of Austrian peasant stock, wrote poems and plays in his leisure time and the son inherited his inborn love of the country and the urge to write. He was poor and earned his living first as a clerk in a bookshop, then as an actor. Both attempts were unsuccessful, but they nourished Anzengruber's early interest in literature and the theatre. To amplify his meager income, he wrote plays, librettos, songs, and sketches, though almost despairing of his talent and his future and glad to accept, at the age of 30, a small position with the imperial Austrian police. Thus at last protected against starvation, his spirit liberated from the drudgery of writing for money, he wrote Der Pfarrer von Kirchfeld (1870), a Volksstück which was immediately successful on the Vienna stage. Its theme, love and tolerant understanding as against narrow religious fanaticism, remained throughout one of Anzengruber's major theses. His reputation established, Anzengruber gave up his tedious office work and in the remaining 19 years of his life wrote nearly 20 plays, two novels, and a great number of short stories, tales, and sketches.

His work is uneven in quality. His best plays, Der Meineidbauer (1871; Eng. tr., The Farmer Forsworn, 1913–1915) and Die Kreuzelschreiber (1874), reveal his strong dramatic gift, his realism touched with humor, his faith in human nature freed from conventions and firmly rooted in the soil. The later plays, however, repeat themselves in plot and characterization; the characters are types rather than individuals. His novel Der Sternsteinhof (1884) is perhaps his most original work and is very different from the traditional German Bauernroman of his contemporaries Rosegger (q.v.) and Auerbach. Helen, the heroine of the novel, represents beauty, health, and ambition which win out in this world over both good and evil. Although a peasant girl, she is a sister in spirit of Becky Sharp in Thackeray's Vanity Fair, drawn with a similar detached, almost cruel understanding. Anzengruber's short stories, like most of his plays, deal chiefly with Austrian peasant life, but the themes and problems are also of general significance. His dramatic gift is again revealed in lively dialogue, well-balanced plot, and contrasting sets of characters. At first written only in moments of leisure and relaxation, these stories became Anzengruber's chief means of expression when his success on the stage diminished. Deeply conscious of his ethical responsibility as a Volksschriftsteller, Anzengruber considered them, even more than his novels and plays, as expressive of his philosophy of life—a philosophy which matured from traditional idealism into a simple faith in the brotherhood of man, mixed at times with a humorous disdain for the human race as a whole.

See: A. Kleinberg, Ludwig Anzengruber (1921).

E. M. F.

Apollinaire, Guillaume (pseud. of Guillaume de Kostrowitski, 1880–1918, French poet), was born either in Rome, where he was baptized, or in Monaco, where he was educated at the Lycée Saint-Charles. His real name was that of his mother, who was of Polish origin. In 1898 he went to Paris, and there his first verses were published in the Revue blanche and the Plume. At the Soirées de la Plume he met Alfred Jarry (q.v.) and “conversed on heraldry, heresies, versification.” Symbolism was still alive, and Apollinaire was to inherit some of its tenets, enrich its tradition, and, by embracing its spirit of liberty, develop from it the new movements, modernism, cubism, dada, surrealism.

His laboratory was Paris. His method of studying his times was not unlike Villon's. His poetry, like Villon's, may remain the testament of a man who leaves behind him an agonizing era and who senses ahead of him much that is, at the least, utterly different (for Apollinaire this means the first automobiles, the first moving pictures, the first airplanes, the First World War, all important to poetry). He studied his times like an anthropologist eager to detect in customs and costumes what, for lack of a better word, he called l'esprit nouveau. Such was the title he gave to a manifesto published in December, 1918, in the Mercure de France. Already, in Italy, his Antitradition futuriste (1913) had appeared. He was widely read and developed his erudition throughout his life in different ways, including the editorship of rare books and responsibilities as censor during the First World War. He edited for the Bibliothèque des Curieux erotic books of repute and helped to catalogue the Enfer de la Bibliothèque Nationale.

He became the friend of the great cubists, Picasso, Braque, et al., and saw in cubism the expression of the times, an enrichment of the power of art to seize the present and with it the past and the future, its constituents. He wrote Les Peintres cubistes (1913), which founded cubism as a school. Two epithets, ubiquitous and simultaneous, describe the aim of the new art, which abolished the laws of perspective.

Apollinaire has left novels (Le Poète as- sassiné, 1916; La Femme assise, 1920, which deals with the Mormons), short stories (L'Hérésiarque & Cie, 1910), plays (Les Mamelles de Tirésias, staged in 1917; Couleur du temps, published in 1920 in the Nouvelle Revue française). These are all attempts at humanizing the universe by means of fiction and the limelight.

His most important contributions to literature are the two volumes of poems, Alcools (1913) and Calligrammes (1918). In Alcools there are songs in which Apollinaire's technical skill, his varied versification, now free, now classical, his use of traditional phrases in a new composition, his grouping of images, the absence of punctuation, create an original unity of tone that involves not sentimentality but intimacy, the intimacy resulting from the somewhat casual alternating between the contemporary and the classical. Calligrammes goes much further in the direction of the ubiquitous and simultaneous art mentioned; words are used to draw lines, and we are at the confines of the art of writing and the art of drawing. Apollinaire was a soldier in the First World War; he was perhaps the only poet who lived the war poetically. In “A Nîmes” (Calligrammes) the seeming haphazard, the seeming disorder under the control of the verses, arranged as heroic couplets, gives the order of military life.

Apollinaire's influence has been great. Some critics have condemned Apollinaire's puns, his playing with words; other poets, including Cocteau (q.v.), have borrowed these tricks used by him to allow poetry to take care of itself and to give back to words their own initiative. The surrealists have acknowledged their debt to him; André Breton (q.v.) considers him “the last poet,” meaning that he has carried the art of poetry to its extreme limits.

See: A. Billy, Apollinaire vivant (1923); R. Taupin and L. Zukofsky, Le Style Apollinaire (1934).

R. T.

Apukhtin, Aleksei Nikolayevich (1841–1893, Russian poet), born into an old noble family in Bolkhov, Orlov, was educated at an exclusive secondary school and at a select school of jurisprudence. Having in private life close ties with the high society officialdom of St. Petersburg, Apukhtin in his poetry reflected to a great extent the moods of that milieu. His verse (Stikhotvoreniya, 1886; Verses) underscores primarily classical motifs and deals with patriotic and historical themes or with rustic idyls. It is frequently light and jocular in tone.

See: S. A. Vengerov, “Etapy neoromanticheskovo dvizheniya," in Russkaya literatura XX veka, Vol. I (1914).

O. M.

Aragon, Louis (1897–, French poet, novelist, and essayist), is a brilliant and imaginative writer, gifted with a style that can cut dialectical capers, animated by intellectual curiosity and sentimental quixotism, whose career epitomizes literary and social conflicts of the period between the two World Wars. He started out by participating successively in the cubist and dadaist movements, both of which he repudiated in turn, publishing Feu de joie, his first book of poems, in 1920, and following it with fictional pictures of the modern world's anarchy and moral disarray, like the satirical and whimsical Anicet, ou le Panorama (1921) and the caustic and erotic Le Libertinage (1924). He adhered in 1924 to the surrealist doctrine which, in his view, aimed to accomplish "an unexpected synthesis of the conflicting aspects of the moral world" and "the transmutation of everything into a miracle." He achieved such a "miracle" in Le Paysan de Paris (1926), in which his imagination clothes with the enchantments of poetry the commonplace scenes of Parisian reality.

But he criticized subsequently what he termed, in his Traité du style (1928), the néant poétique he observed in modern, and even surrealist, poetry and its apparent inefficacy in the social sphere. He renounced, finally, the idealistic basis of pure literature, a tainted product, in his eyes, of bourgeois materialism and in 1930 espoused Communism and the concept of "socialist realism." One fruit of this conversion was his inflammatory poem "Front rouge" (1931; Eng. tr., The Red Front, 1933), for which he was prosecuted and given a suspended sentence of five years. The surrealists had jumped to his defense, claiming immunity for the poetical as against the political connotations in a poem. This was Communist heresy. Aragon disavowed it, broke definitely with his surrealist friends, and dedicated himself to exalting the social revolution—in his journalistic activities, in publications like Commune, Humanité, and Ce Soir, of which he was an editor at various times; in his poetry, as in Persécuteur persécuté (1931) and Hourra l'Oural (1934), in which, conforming to Lautréamont's advice, he aimed to sing "practical truth"; and in novels which describe what he called "the real world." These novels give a complex and somber picture of social and moral decline of bourgeois society and of proletarian struggles, in the years preceding the First World War in France; they consist of Les Cloches de Bâle (1934; Eng. tr., The Bells of Basel, 1936), Les Beaux Quartiers (1936; Eng. tr., Residential Quarter, 1938), which won for him the Renaudot literary prize in 1936, and Les Voyageurs de l'impériale (1941; Eng. tr., The Century Was Young, 1941). In a book of poems published in Paris in 1941, Le Crève-Cœur, Aragon sings with the accent of tragic purity his twin passionate loves for his wife, the writer Elsa Triolet, and for fallen France, thus reverting in it to what is the core of his genius—poetry. His other wartime works include, in poetry, Les Yeux d'Elsa (1942), Brocéliande (1943), En français dans le texte (1943), Le Musée Grévin (1943), a waxworks gallery of collaborationists, and La Diane française (1945), and, in the novel, Aurélien (1945). Le Crève-Cœur and Les Yeux d'Elsa were republished in New York in 1943 and 1944 respectively.

See: Marcel Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933), pp. 346–348; M. Cowley, "Louis Aragon," New Republic, LXXXVIII (1936), 258; H. Josephson, "Louis Aragon, 'Poet of the War,'" Saturday Review of Literature, Vol. XXIV (1941), No. 20, pp. 10–11; H. Josephson and M. Cowley, Aragon, Poet of the French Resistance (1945).

S. A. R.

Arany, János (1817–1882, Hungarian poet, writer, and critic), was born in Nagyszalonta and died in Budapest. He was the youngest in a family of ten; his people were poor. Arany is rightly considered as one of the purest Magyar poets—his perceptions, his images, his humor and pensiveness, his very words show indigenous characteristics. He was a strolling actor, a school teacher, a guardsman in the war of freedom in 1848, a notary, a municipal counselor, professor at a Calvinist secondary school, a literary editor, and for a long time secretary of the Hungarian Scientific Academy. His friendship with Sándor Petőfi, the Hungarian Robert Burns, gave the rather shy Arany self-confidence. In 1845 he entered a literary contest of the Kislelő Társaság (Kislelő Society) with a satirical epic, entitled Az elveszett alkotmány (The Lost Constitution), and received the first prize, but it was in 1847 that the attention of the Hungarian literary world was directed to Arany for his Toldi, an epic of 12 songs. This was merited recognition of a poetic genius. During his life and after his death his ever-increasing prestige proved the Hungarian nation's need of such a poet; he never struck a false note, and even today he is read not only by students (his poetry is included in textbooks) but by the general public. It is fair to say that Arany exemplifies in his poetic utterances the essence of the Hungarian spirit. In his capacity as the editor of Szépirodalmi Figyelő (Belletristic Observer) and Koszorú (Wreath), he inaugurated standards of editorial policy which disturbed or silenced the dilettantes of expression. His family life was happy; his son, László, was a poet in his own right. There is nevertheless a note of deep sadness in Arany which was laid bare by his lyric poems, written in old age, but felt in his earlier works too. The tragic lot of the Hungarian nation after the War of Independence in 1848–1849, the enforced passivity of Hungarian leaders, the emphasis on “modernity” which was displeasing and disheartening in its pretense and hollowness, all explain the melancholy of this poet in whom, otherwise, were calm, restraint, and undramatic dignity. His collected works first appeared in 1867; since then there have been several editions, enriched with later writings. Because of its genuineness his poetic voice is still audible despite the fact that the tone of creative realism in which he believed has changed considerably since his time.

Arany was a definitely national poet, but without intolerance. When he presented to the Hungarian world his epics, ballads, satirical and descriptive poems, and brief lyrics, his critical works, and his translation of several comedies of Aristophanes and plays of Shakespeare, he proved that the kind of nationalism which a creatively used language radiates does not ignore man's universal attachments. His epic trilogy, Toldi (1847), Toldi estéje (1848; Toldi's Night), Toldi szerelme (1879; Toldi's Love); his heroic epic, Buda halála (1864; Eng. tr., The Death of King Buda, 1936); his sardonic Nagyidai cigányok (1852; The Gypsies of Nagy Ida); his ballads, e.g., “A Walesi bardok” (The Bards of Wales), “Ágnes Aszszony” (Mistress Agnes), “Éjféli párbaj” (Duel at Midnight); his ode, “Széchenyi emlékezete” (In Memory of Széchenyi); his descriptive poem, “A rab gólya” (The Captive Stork); his lyric poems expressing anxiety over the fate of the nation or bashfully revealing the wounds of his soul—these lend support to the view of Hungarian critics that Arany is a confrère of the supreme poets of world literature. It is not presumptuous to say that as a ballad writer he is one of the greatest. The sense of guilt and the tragic shock of his ballads imply an emotive and imaginative force which brings to the surface the deepest conflicts and contradictions of human nature. In its pure Hungarianism his prose is as authentic as his poetry. Arany was an exceptionally intelligent man, widely read, an authority on philological and literary criticism. His translations display a spiritual and verbal sensitiveness which only a real poet and a master of the language can possess. To read Aristophanes or Shakespeare in the translation of Arany is a fascinating experience, especially when one compares the original with the translation and discerns the Hungarian poet's imaginative and literal reliability in the matter of words.

Arany's interest in Attila, the leader of the Huns, or in the era of chivalry in Hungarian history, or in other features of Hungarian life related to the past, was, of course, dictated by poetic curiosity, but also by a desire to stir the people's feeling for the nation's historical greatness. He was apt to conceive romantic issues realistically. The current of nationalism so characteristic of 19th-century Europe had its Hungarian parallel, and in the sphere of poetry Arany's objective was identical with a constructive design of nationalism. Arany perhaps hoped his epics would mean to the Hungarians what the Kalevala meant to the Finns. This great and noble poet who never traveled abroad did not narrow the horizon of the world to that of Hungary; in fact through his poetry the horizon of Hungary was widened. He was an excellent craftsman. He conquered despair with the courage of a tragic sense; he conquered formlessness with a flawless sense of form. Some of Arany's work is translated into foreign tongues, including English.

See: P. Gyulai, Arany életrajza (1884); F. Riedl, Arany (1887); A. Schöpflin, Irók, könyvek, emlékek (1925); Arany, The Death of King Buda, tr. by W. Kirkconnell (1936).

J. R.

Arbaud, Joseph d' (1874–, Provençal poet and novelist), was born at Meyrargues in Provence. His mother, herself the daughter of a poet, had written a book of Provençal verse long before marrying the comte d'Arbaud. She had joined the Felibrige, an association with the purpose of reviving the language and literature of southern France, and acquired a good reputation under the pen name La Felibresso dóu Cauloun. Thus Joseph d'Arbaud was born and raised in a milieu where poetry and love for the home speech were long-standing traditions. Furthermore, he was encouraged by Mistral (q.v.), who always took a keen interest in his literary activities. “You are above them all,” once wrote the master comparing him to the other poets of the younger generation. Time has not belied this judgment. Arbaud still holds the foremost place among contemporary Provençal writers.

After finishing his law course at the University of Aix-en-Provence, he remained for some time in the old capital enjoying society life in the company of young writers such as Paul Souchon and Joachim Gasquet, who later made names for themselves in French literature. Having decided to go to the deep sources of Provençal poetry, Arbaud left the "Athènes du Midi" for the remote and solitary Camargue, one of the rare places where the language and traditions were still unimpaired. He owned droves of wild bulls and, for nine years, lived integrally the life of a gardian or cowboy. It is to this long and direct contact with primitive nature and rustic people that he owes the best of his work. Back in Aix, he was for many years a very active champion of Provençal regionalism; he contributed articles to both French and Provençal reviews and devoted much of his time to Le Feu; organe du régionalisme méditerranéen, of which he was editor or coeditor for various periods between 1917 and 1937.

Arbaud has produced four books in the vernacular, with accompanying French translations. Lou Lausié d'Arle (1913; The Laurel of Arles), a volume of verse, was acclaimed by Mistral as a masterpiece comparable to those of Greece and Rome, in which "live again the language and genius of a race." This is fine poetry, remarkable for its power of suggestion, clothed in admirable form, written in a refined and at the same time rich, racy, and colorful language, which the author learned first from the lips of his mother, then from the rough and rustic men of the Camargue. The laurel of Arles, that Provençal tree which must ever root deeper in order to grow higher, is symbolic of the poet's own conception of life. Among his poems published only in reviews or in the form of short pamphlets are a few which must be considered among his best, Li Cant palustre (1919; Songs of the Marshes), Li Rampau d'aram (1920; The Brazen Boughs), and La Visioun de l'Uba (1921; Vision of the North), the last two being partly inspired by the war. Arbaud's philosophy is further developed in La Bèstio dóu Vacarès (1924; The Beast of the Vaccarès), the story of a gardian with his horse and also that of the "beast," a fantastic being, half human, half animal, a voice of the past, the qualified interpreter of Provençal traditions. This work transcends the limits of regional literature. The next two books, La Caraco (1926; The Gypsy) and La Souvagino (1929; Wild Animals), are collections of short stories, also set in the Camargue and likewise carrying a philosophical and social meaning.

Joseph d'Arbaud has confined himself to the expression of his deepest feelings, and this with the utmost precision, constraint, and sobriety. The classical and somewhat aristocratic quality of his work makes it more appealing to the elite than to the common folk of Provence who speak the language. It is not characterized by the joyous spirit and optimism of the other Felibres, and there is no Rabelaisian laughter—hardly a smile—in his stories. The "most worthy successor of Mistral" is undoubtedly a genuine Provençal and one who has drawn most of his inspiration from the soil of Provence, but he belongs to the serious, reserved, and meditative type that is sketched in his recent study La Provence; types et coutumes (1939). It is to this book, the only one he has written in French, that Arbaud owes the crowning of his complete works by the French Academy (Prix Lasserre, 1939). In 1906 he had been elected laureate of the Felibrean Jeux floraux. Another and more important literary prize, the award received 33 years later from the Academy, was to establish or rather recognize his great distinction.

See: C. P. Julian and P. Fontan, Anthologie de Félibrige provençal (1924); C. Maurras, preface to Arbaud, La Bête du Vaccarès (1924); F. Mistral (neveu), "Joseph d'Arbaud, gardian, poète et romancier de Camargue," . . . Et nous verrons Berre (1924), pp. 289-296; E. Chauffard, "Un Grand Poète provençal: Joseph d'Arbaud," Revue de France, Année X (1930), Tome II, pp. 717-738.

A. V. R.

Arniches y Barrera, Carlos (1866-1943, Spanish playwright), the modern standard-bearer for the género chico, was born in the Mediterranean coast city of Alicante. He is next heard of in the employ of the Barcelona newspaper Vanguardia. Removing to Madrid at the age of 18 or thereabouts, he endured the usual privations, lightened momentarily by an award for the preparation of a history of the reign of Alfonso XII in the form of a primer. Shortly he scored a success with his (and Gonzalo Cantó's, for he was already writing in the collaboration which was to be so usual later) Casa editorial (1888), a literary-musical satire of authors and publishers. Exhibiting the lack of outward cheerfulness which is at least traditional in humorous writers, this rey del chiste, "king of jest," continued to write so steadily that by 1927 his creations, including the many done in collaboration (with García Álvarez above all and also with Abati, Asensio Mas, Celso Lucio, Fernández Shaw, Jackson Veyán, López Silva, q.v., and others) numbered approximately 135.

The farce in one act has long held a position of honor in the Spanish theatre, its popularity being such between 1890 and 1900 that new pieces came to the boards at the rate of 150 a year. Arniches was the chief purveyor to the trade during the first two decades of the 20th century. Composed for the teatros por horas—in which each number required a ticket and took about an hour to perform—these short dramatic pieces in prose or verse, with or without the accompaniment of music, constitute the género chico. Its temple was the Teatro de Apolo in Madrid. The popularity, of some 40 years' duration, of the género chico came to an end about 1910.

Arniches's sainetes (the term of broadest significance, modernly, for the brief jocose dramatic composition, dealing usually with popular manners or types) were written in the language, somewhat conventionalized, of the lesser citizens of Madrid. They present cuadros de costumbres depicting dance halls, restaurants, parks and other places of recreation, fiestas, street scenes, patios, plazas, wherein appear small shopkeepers, itinerant vendors, the policeman on the beat, taxicab or hack drivers, laundresses, seamstresses, hairdressers, lady-killers, district bullies, and indeed all those representatives of society who make up the population of the poorer sections of Madrid. The plots of these sketches are almost never worth recalling, and their literary qualities often nil, but among the earlier successes of Arniches may be mentioned the following: El santo de la Isidra (1898), with music by Torregrosa; El puñado de rosas (1902), of which the action takes place in Andalusia, the music being by R. Chapí; Los chicos de la escuela (1903), El terrible Pérez (1904), and El pobre Valbuena (1904), all with music by Valverde hijo; Alma de Dios (1907), La alegría del batallón (1909), and El trust de los tenorios (1910), with music by J. Serrano. The titles and characters from some of the productions of Arniches have become almost proverbial, but—though he cannot fairly be dismissed as merely a librettist—some of the specimens of typical music seem more likely to preserve memory of the text. A trifle less hilarious, but with at least equal documentary value and even some philosophy, are Las estrellas (1904), El amigo Melquiades (1914), and El chico de las Peñuelas (1915). When Arniches dilutes his thought to fill the two or three-act farce, the results are less pleasing. The thinness of the plot is harder to conceal, the lack of distinction of idea and expression becomes more obvious, as in Angela María (1924) or El señor Adrián el primo (1927). The characters, however, are equally recognizable, if no more sharp of outline, the puns are as frequent, and laughs from all causes as plentiful. La señorita de Trevélez (1916) leaves the level of the barrios bajos and ascends to the middle-class comedy of manners. In the opinion of one—and perhaps only one—critic (Pérez de Ayala, q.v.), Arniches has here produced a work of more enduring value.

See J. Cejador, Historia de la lengua y literatura castellana, X (1919), 119–120, 126–127; R. Pérez de Ayala, "La señorita de Trevélez," in Las máscaras, 1924 ed., II, 171–177.

R. K. S.

Artsybashev, Mikhail Petrovich (1878–1927, Russian novelist, playwright, and essayist), was the son of a district constable from the lesser landed gentry in the Ukraine. Like so many other Russian authors, he began as a painter. His first story to be published was "Pasha Tumanov" (1901; Eng. tr. in Tales of the Revolution, 1917). This was followed by other stories of a somewhat Tolstoyan trend. "Smert Lande" (1904; The Death of Lande) was especially noted as a study of moralistic self-perfection, with a disheartening ending. During the revolutionary events of 1904–1905, Artsybashev wrote a number of stories that had an immediate appeal. While they displayed no depth of analysis or understanding of the social and political causes, they depicted the external dramatism of the Revolution. In "Krovavoye pyatno" (Eng. tr., "The Blood-Stain," in Tales of the Revolution), "Na belom snegu" (On the White Snow), "Odin den" (One Day), "Chelovecheskaya volna" (The Human Wave), and other stories of that period, the author records the bloodiest episodes of such significant events as the Red Sunday (January 22, 1905), punitive expeditions in the Baltic Provinces, mutiny on the battleship Potemkin, December barricades in Moscow. Descriptions of murder, rape, suicide, death, are Artsybashev's strong point.

Fame—and notoriety—came to him after the publication of his novel Sanin (1907; Eng. tr., Sanine, 1914). In 1903 the manuscript had been rejected by all publishers as false to life. But four years later, after the disenchantment of the abortive Revolution, Sanin, the champion of carnal self-gratification, found an eager hearing among the tired youth of Russia.

Groups of Saninists were formed by school-boys and schoolgirls for the discussion and emulation of the principle of being unprincipled, so alluringly presented for the first time in Russian literature. As a reaction against the traditional Russian traits of introspection and service to lofty ideals, Sanin had novelty and freshness. The author made his hero attractive by the old device of rendering the other characters dull and inferior. The novel breathes a torrid eroticism, which is suggested even in the purely descriptive passages; small wonder that it was proscribed in a number of places, both in and outside of Russia, as pornography.

With the success (de scandale, in a certain measure) of Sanin, Artsybashev shook himself free from whatever Tolstoyan and revolutionary notions he may have voiced earlier. Later novels such as Milliony (1910; Eng. tr., The Millionaire, 1915) and plays such as Revnost (1913; Eng. tr., Jealousy, 1923) and Zakon dikarya (1912; Eng. tr., The Law of the Savage, 1923) treat, primarily, sexual problems. Artsybashev has an undeniable gift for bringing out the biological element in human relations. Unfortunately, this gift is one-sided, reducing as it does the complexity of sexual and marital relations to one common denominator. His is also a depressing talent, for outside of a few sun-drenched pages in Sanin, his stories and plays are joyless and defeatist. The novel U posledney cherty (1912; Eng. tr., Breaking-Point, 1915) is a hymn to suicide, as the only dignified way out. Its hero, Naumov, preaches the need of "destroying in men the superstition of life." Artsybashev's gloomy outlook was intensified after his exile from Soviet Russia (1921). During his last years he wrote nothing but venomous articles against the Bolsheviks; these were issued in book form as Zapiski pisatelya (Warsaw, 1925; Notes of a Writer).

A. K.

Asch, Sholem (1880–, Yiddish novelist, short-story writer, and playwright), was born in Kutno, a small town in Poland, then part of the Russian Empire. Asch was the 10th child in a family of small-business people. At 19 he went to Warsaw. His schooling had consisted of little more than a limited training in the Hebrew language and its literature, both ancient and modern. Brought up in an orthodox environment, he already considered himself "enlightened." He had inherited from his mother a delicate romanticism, from his father self-confidence and a healthy aggressiveness. He took with him to Warsaw sketches of small-town life, and a year later these sketches appeared in the Yiddish press. In 1904 was published a series of episodes and scenes in lyric prose, under the title Dos Shtetl (The Town), issued in book form in 1905. This semi-idyllic, quietly humorous picture of Jewish small-town life represented a kind of romantic realism which was a departure from the pure realism of Mendele mocher sforim (q.v.) and other older Yiddish writers—with the exception of Y. L. Peretz (q.v.), the father of neo-Yiddish romanticism. Asch introduced a method of idealization to replace the sober and pointed satire practiced by all of them excepting the humorist, Sholem-Aleikhem (q.v.) In 1906 he wrote his lyric drama Moshiakhs Tsaytn (The Days of the Messiah), in 1907 Der Got fun Nekome (Eng. tr., The God of Vengeance, 1918), followed by various other dramatic works. These plays were performed not only in the Yiddish theatres of Europe and America, but also on the Russian and Polish stage and in Max Reinhardt's Deutsches Theater in Berlin. Thus Yiddish literature, which until then was known to the world almost exclusively through the translated poems of the American Yiddish poet, Morris Rosenfeld, appeared on the horizon of international literature. Both Asch's novels and his dramas were translated into Russian, German, and Polish, later into English and other languages. Their fascination is due to the freshness of his approach, the intimate humor and the restrained but warm lyricism with which he depicts the mundane experiences of the ordinary person.

The novels which Asch began to write just before the outbreak of the First World War are drawn on an epic scale, covering the social ladder from the lowest to the highest rung, from thieves, brothel inmates, and other underworld characters to revolutionary leaders, martyrs, and saints. The motifs of his works are just as kaleidoscopic. As to the often incompletely rounded central figures, they are mostly people striving to free themselves from inner conflicts, people yearning for a faith. Like the hero of The God of Vengeance almost all of them suffer from a sense of guilt, from a deep soul conflict, and they seek security in an ideal, a faith, or a God who will purify them, grant them vigor, wholeness, and inner peace. Like Hans Bodenheimer in Baim Opgrunt (1937; Eng. tr., The Calf of Paper, American title, The War Goes On, both 1936), Asch's other heroes also have "firm faith in a Godhood which is beyond and above the limits of all faiths and confessions, which streams forth from the higher sentiments of faith in eternity which every religious nature possesses."

Asch's most imposing and richest novels are his trilogy Farn Mabf (1927-1932; Eng. tr., Three Cities, 1933), in which the romanticism of the hero is accentuated by the realistically painted social background; Der Tilim Yid (1934; Eng. tr., Salvation, 1934), in which Asch sums up the basic themes of almost all his earlier novels and in which he expresses with greater lucidity than anywhere else his faith in faith; Der Man fun Notseres (1939; Eng. tr., The Nazarene, 1939), which in some important details is a continuation of Der Tilim Yid and the main purpose of which is to describe the historical Jewish background of the legend of the founder of Christianity; and The Apostle (1943; published in English translation only), based on the life of St. Paul. The last two books attracted great attention by their colorful and meticulous descriptions of the beginning of the Christian era and because in them the author attempts to lift the tragic barrier between Judaism and Christianity.

In 1932 Asch was awarded the Order Polonia Restituta. About the same time he was elected honorary president of the Yiddish P.E.N. Club. In 1937 the Jewish Institute of Religion in New York conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Hebrew Letters.

Other books by Asch of which there are English translations are Amerike (1911; America, 1918), Motke Ganev (1916; Motke the Thief, 1935), Mayselekh fun Khumesh (1923; In the Beginning, 1935), Di Muter (1925; The Mother, 1930), Dos Gezang fun Tol (1938; The Song of the Valley, 1939). Three Novels (1938) contains Uncle Moses (Onkl Moses, 1920), Chaim Lederer's Return (Chaim Lederer's Tsurikkumen, 1927), and Judge Not (Toit Urteil, 1926). What I Believe (1941) was first published in German under the title Woran ich glaube. Children of Abraham (1942) is a collection of stories about America which had appeared in Yiddish.

See: S. Niger, Sholem Asch, tsu zayn 60stn geboyren-tog (1940); Charles A. Madison, "Sholem Asch," Poet Lore, XLVI (1940), 303-337; A. A. Roback, The Story of Yiddish Literature (1940).

S. N.

Aseyev, Nikolai (1889-, Russian poet), is the chief survivor of Russian futurism. In 1939 the 25th anniversary of his first book of poems, Nochnaya fleita (Nocturnal Flute), was celebrated throughout the Soviet Union, and the poet, once an extreme individualist and iconoclast, was decorated with the Order of Lenin. Aseyev was one of the closest friends of Mayakovsky (q.v.), and one of his more recent efforts is a novel in verse, Mayakovski nachinayetsa (1940; Mayakovsky Starts Off), an intimate portrait of the late poet, composed in a style resembling Mayakovsky's. Aseyev, like his friend, began as a poet of a city bohemia—in Vladivostok, instead of Moscow. In 1918 he arrived in Moscow, where as a member of the "Centrofugue" group he attempted to combine "pure" classic lyrics with the innovations of cubo-futurism. He was fond of such bohemian images as "the half-naked moon on a blue couch," the sky a night café, with a star serving oysters and angels smoking cigars. Moscow ripened his talent and imbued him with proletarian, industrial motives. During the New Economic Policy (NEP) and its temporary restoration of private capitalism, Aseyev expressed alarm at the resurgence of everyday-ness—"la Traviata languidly sniveling from endless cabarets," and "our time is colored carrot, not red." Typical of Aseyev's concern with industrialism was his volume Stalnoi solovei (1922; Steel Nightingale). He reflected the Revolution and the civil war in his epic Semyon Proskakov (1928). Primarily Aseyev is a lyricist, however, who records his emotions and observations with a gentle directness that is free both from sentimentality and from the once fashionable Bolshevik Spartanism. His range is wide, his form varies from regular meter to futuristic broken lines and meter, and his vocabulary is fresh and clear, seldom displaying the extreme coinages of the early futurists. As he continues to mature, he may throw off the sobriquet of a lesser Mayakovsky.

A. K.

Asín Palacios, Miguel (1871-1944, Spanish Arabist and philologist), was born in Saragossa. He combined early studies in theology with a profound knowledge of the Arabic language and culture to produce a long series of works on the Christian origins of Islamic mysticism. He made very important contributions to understanding the philosophical and theological views of Hispano-Arabic thinkers of the 12th and 13th centuries and the relation of these men to later European writers. Abenmasarra y su escuela: Orígenes de la filosofía hispanomusulmana (1914) and Aben-házam de Córdoba y su historia crítica de la ideas religiosas (3 vols., 1927-1929) are significant studies in the history of philosophy and religion. La escatología musulmana en la Divina Comedia (1919) attracted world-wide attention; this work on the Islamic sources of The Divine Comedy became the subject of long and heated discussions (see the answers of Asín Palacios to his critics in "Historia crítica de una polémica," Boletín de la Academia Española, Vol. X, 1923, pp. 505-537, Vol. XI, 1924, pp. 5-53, 129-148, and also C. H. Grandgent, "Islam and Dante," Studi medievali, Vol. III, 1930, pp. 1-5).

See: Angela González Simón, Revista de filología, XXVIII (1944), 349-356, necrology and bibliography.

F. S. y E.

Asnyk, Adam (1838-1897, Polish poet), was born in Kalisz, Russian Poland, of gentry stock recently turned merchant. Unlike the romantic writers of the previous generation, most of whom viewed contemporary struggles from the sidelines, Asnyk took active part, even as a student, in the conflicts of his day. Imprisoned in 1860 in the notorious Warsaw Citadel for conspiracy in connection with the movement for national independence, Asnyk left Poland in 1861 for Paris, London, and eventually Heidelberg, but returned to Warsaw in 1863 to participate in the national uprising and to serve, finally, on the National Council improvised in September of that year by Romuwałd Traugutt. Upon the collapse of the uprising, Asnyk fled to Italy and thence to Heidelberg, where in 1866 he received his Ph.D.

After two years in Lwów, where he wrote literary articles for various periodicals, Asnyk finally settled in Cracow (1870). Here he took a leading part in every contemporary movement: in the struggle of Austrian Poland for full political rights—he served for a while as a city councilor and later as a deputy to the Galician Diet; in the "discovery" of the Tatra region as literary material; and in the battle of the Cracow conservatives, known popularly as "Stańcycy" (see Polish literature), with the progressive Warsaw positivists, a conflict in which, as editor of Nowa reforma (New Reform) from 1882-1894, he took a stand midway between the two.

Asnyk wrote several plays and novels but he is remembered for his lyrics. These appeared in periodicals from 1864 on and were very popular, probably because they suited perfectly the mood of the times. Pleasant, graceful, and never dangerously moving, they met the requirements of a generation suspicious of profoundly stirring poetry, since this, they believed, had led them to the catastrophe of '63, yet desirous of something more nourishing to the spirit than the chill prose of the positivists. Many of Asnyk's lyrics were inspired by the Tatra. His short poem "Do młodych" (To Youth), which begins "Seek out the clear ray of truth . . . Forget the dreams of yesteryear," became the credo of the generation to which belonged, among others, Marie Skłodowska Curie. Two of Asnyk's great admirers were the Polish actress Helena Modjeska, to whom the poet addressed an elegy prematurely in 1871 when she was reported deceased, and Ignace Paderewski. Paderewski, and also his distinguished pupil Sigismund Stojowski, set many of Asnyk's lyrics to music.

See: G. Korbut, Literatura polska (1931), IV, 92-95; Z. Nowakowski, Słownik biograficzny (1935), I, 171-173.

A. P. C.

Aubanel, Théodore (1829-1886, Provençal poet), was born in Avignon. He belonged to a family of printers, since the 18th century honored by the Holy See with the title Printers to His Holiness. Théodore Aubanel began writing poetry in French, which was the language usually spoken in his home. His shift to Provençal, not an imperative urge, was due principally to the influence of Roumanille (q.v.). Having realized that the local speech was a rich, poetical language, closer than French to Provençal reality, he joined that group of young poets who were to be the founders of the Felibrige. As is well known, the purpose of this organization was to bring about the restoration of the Provençal language and literature.

Aubanel's literary production is relatively small in bulk. He is known above all as the author of La Miougrano entre-duberto (1860; The Split Pomegranate) and of Li Fiho d'Avignoun (1885; The Young Ladies of Avignon), two collections of lyrics, published with an accompanying French translation. The former appeared at a very opportune moment, a year after the epoch-making appearance of Mirèio, by Mistral (q.v.). It added much to the fast-growing prestige of the Felibrige school. It brought a new element to Provençal lyricism, that of pure passion. Here was found a bold, direct, and realistic expression of intense human suffering caused by frustrated love, the anguish experienced by the author himself after his sweetheart had entered a convent to become a nun. Immediately critics acclaimed Aubanel as having won a place between Mistral and Roumanille. Ever since then, these three names have been regarded as forming a symbolic trinity of Provençal literature, a triumvirate of the Felibrige.

Li Fiho d'Avignoun has been interpreted as a confession of the author's mature age. Here again poetry has its source in the violent conflict between flesh and spirit, Christian principles winning over passion and desire. Although a zealous Catholic and a highly honorable husband and family head, the author had to suffer persecution from the pens of unenlightened censors who accused him of being an impious renegade. It is generally believed that the ordeals he had to undergo in his various attempts to publish the book actually shortened his life. A pure hymn to beauty, Li Fiho d'Avignoun contains very fine verses on almost every page. A few of its poems, such as "Lou Bal," "La Venus d'Avignoun," and, above all, "La Venus d'Arle," are little masterpieces by themselves, fine jewels, any one of which would have been sufficient to bring his name to posterity. Aubanel has written three five-act plays in verse. He published one, Lou Pan dóu pecat (1882; The Bread of Sin), which was produced in the original text and in a French version by Paul Arène. It is a powerful, violent, grim drama of rustic love. A posthumous collection of poems, Lou Reire soulèu (1899; From behind the Sun), does not give anything essentially new about the author or his art. More important from the standpoint of biography is his correspondence with one of his feminine inspirers, Lettres à Mignon (1899).

Aubanel is a great lyric poet, second in Provençal literature only to Mistral. His work has not reached a very large public but has been appreciated by those for whom it was written, the select few. His plea, "Luse tout ço qu'es bèu, tout ço qu'es laid s'escounde" (Let beauty shine and ugliness hide), is that of a great artist whose main object has always been to find love and beauty, whether moral or physical, Christian or pagan.

See: L. Legré, Théodore Aubanel, par un témoin de sa vie (1894); N. Welter, Théodore Aubanel, un chancre provençal de la beauté (1902); J. Vincent, Théodore Aubanel; la vie et l'homme (1924); J. L. Vaudoyer, "Avec Zani," in Beautés de la Provence (1926).

A. V. R.

Audiberti, Jacques (1900–, French poet and novelist), took his place in his late 30's as one of the most promising of the younger French poets. A reporter on a Parisian newspaper, Audiberti began writing verse about 1933 and made a strong impression with his first book, Race des hommes (1937). Since then his work has appeared in several periodicals, notably the Nouvelle Revue française, and two novels, Abraxas (1938) and Septième (1939), have been published. His poetry is distinguished at first glance by an extreme richness of vocabulary; he seems drunk with words, reveling in rare terms and the specialized language of a dozen professions. This extravagance of diction is accompanied by an equally striking use of metaphor and in general a heroic rhetoric that reminds one of Hugo—but a Hugo tempered by Rimbaud (q.v.). A closer examination of Audiberti's work reveals a subject matter to match his style. Poetry, he has said, should treat of "la destinée et . . . la grandeur de l'homme." It is modern man, knowing as no man has known before the secrets of time, space, and the elements, probing in his laboratories the very essence of his universe, that Audiberti exalts. He is trying to write the epic of man in a scientific world and to seize and impart the new sort of communion with nature which science has made possible and perhaps even necessary. Audiberti's novels, though probably less important and certainly less original than his poetry, show the same unrestrained imagination, the same preoccupation with rhetoric, and the same verbal profusion.

See: Gabriel Bounoure, "Race des hommes, par Audiberti," Nouvelle Revue française, XLVIII (1937), 615–617; Marcel Arland, "Quelques Romans français," Nouvelle Revue française, LI (1938), 1037–1040.

C. W., Jr.

Aukrust, Olav (1883–1929, Norwegian poet), was born in the mountain valley of Gudbrandsdal, hearth of the ancestral folk culture of Norway. Home, surroundings, and extensive studies early imbued him with the country's national heritage, the literary traditions that go back to ballads and the Edda, the New Norse language, the folk art and material civilization, and the whole popular philosophy; under the influence of the folk high school movement he conceived a religious nationalism in which mystic and realistic elements curiously mingled, as they did in his own mind. His literary work is an attempt to show in poetic images the spiritual growth and destination of the Norwegian people within the eternal framework of Norway's nature.

In two large volumes of loosely connected lyrical poems, Himmelvarden (1916; The Mountain Cairn) and Solrenning (1930; Sunrise), he attacked the problem from the angle of the individual, symbolizing the development of the nation in his own struggle against the primitive powers of darkness and his own redemption through Christianity. In a remarkable way the psychological interpretation is made to emanate from the landscape, pictured with overwhelming power of visualization. The collections contain striking pictures of folk life and some of the deepest love lyrics in Norwegian literature; they show profundity of thought and feeling, orchestral mastery of the language, and amazing rhythmical inventiveness. Aukrust's other books, Hamar i hellom (1926; Spirit from the Mountains) and the unfinished Norske terningar (1931; Norwegian Dice), are fragments of a large cycle which was intended in a similar way to consider the nation from the local beginnings of culture through the development of national self-assertion into the universal realm of ideas. The work shows the same poetic power and a baffling knowledge of all manifestations of Norwegian character and life, moving freely from sublime spirituality to broad realism and baroque humor.

In spite of its fragmentary character, Olav Aukrust's poetic work is one of the most original interpretations of the inner history of his nation and one of the strongest expressions of poetic genius in modern Norwegian literature.

See: I. Krokann, Olav Aukrust (1933).

S. S.

Averchenko, Arkadi Timofeyevich (1881–1925, Russian short-story writer and dramatist), born at Sevastopol, was a merchant's son and in his youth worked as a clerk. He began his literary career with serious stories, but soon turned to humor, and eventually achieved fame in that genre. He edited the well-known humorous periodical Satirikon (1908–13) and contributed frequently to it as well as to other magazines. His short stories and his one-act plays also achieved popularity in such collections as Vesyolyie ustritsy (6th ed., 1911; The Gay Oysters), Rasskazy dlya vyzdoravlivayushchikh (5th ed., 1913; Stories for Convalescents), and Chudesa v reshete (1915; Wonders in a Sieve). Averchenko relied chiefly on broad farce, but his humor has elements of social satire, burlesquing as it does human frailty in fields ranging from friendship to surgery—and not forgetting the plight of an elderly ghost confronted by modern inventions. After the Russian Revolution, Averchenko emigrated and for a time bitterly lampooned the Communists (Dyuzhinu nozhei v spinu revolyutsii, 1921; A Dozen Knives into the Back of the Revolution), but in later works reverted to kindlier moods (Rasskazy tsinika, 1925; The Stories of a Cynic). English translations of Averchenko are given in B. G. Guernsey's A Treasury of Russian Literature (1943).

See: "Averchenko," in Entsiklopediya "Granat," Vol. XI (1912), appendix, p. 610; "Averchenko," in Bolshaya sovetskaya entsiklopediya, I (1926), 141.

P. A. P.

Aymé, Marcel (1902–, French novelist), was born at Joigny in Burgundy. He was successively insurance broker, bricklayer, journalist, salesman. After a long illness which put an end to his picaresque existence, he began his literary career. His first novel, Brûlebois, was printed at Poitiers in 1926 and later in Paris in 1930. Aller et retour (1927) and Les Jumeaux du diable (1928) reached a very limited public. The reputation of Aymé began with La Tableaux-Crevés (1929), which was unanimously praised by the critics and received the Théophraste Renaudot prize. This robust episode of peasant life was followed every year by a novel or a volume of short stories. The novels are La Rue sans nom (1930), Le Vaurien (1931), La Jument verte (1933), Maison basse (1935), Le Moulin de la Sourdis (1936), Gustalin (1937), Le Bœuf clandestin (1939); the short stories are Le Puits aux images (1932), Le Nain (1934), Derrière chez Martin (1938), Les Contes du chat perché (1939), which last were rewarded the Chantecler prize. Another volume of short stories, Le Passe-Muraille, was added in 1943.

Marcel Aymé's art is thoroughly logical and realistic under a false appearance of eccentricity. His points of departure are often burlesque and sometimes absurd, but the stories develop afterward with a mathematical precision leaving an impression no longer of fantastic pieces of fiction but of scrupulous pictures of a real world. He possesses a broad sense of humor in the best Gallic tradition, particularly in his bawdy tales of country life. La Jument verte is the best example of his Rabelaisian verve. But he can also handle grimly tragic subjects or, as in Les Contes du chat perché, emulate Charles Perrault and La Fontaine in his presentation of charming fairylands peopled with wise and witty animals. By his multiform talent Marcel Aymé has placed himself among the original authors of his generation.

M. E. C.

Azaña, Manuel (1880–1940, Spanish statesman and critic), born in Alcalá de Henares, was sent when young to the school run by the Augustinian order at the Escorial. There, after finishing his secondary education, he began his studies in law, which he continued at the University of Saragossa. He obtained his doctorate in jurisprudence at the University of Madrid. On his return (1912) to Spain from Paris, where he had been sent on a scholarship, he became a government functionary. Fulfilling his duties soberly and seriously, he remained a government employee, with little interruption, until he entered politics (1930) and established the Partido de Acción Republicana.

At a time when the intellectuals of the new literary generation were disinclined to utilize, as they could have, the famous Ateneo de Madrid as a debating society and tribune from which to influence minority opinion, Azaña joined the organization. True to the glorious traditions of the Ateneo, which had shaped so much of the history of Spain from the romantic period down to the end of the past century, he distinguished himself by keeping faith with its political program. From 1913 to 1920 he was its secretary and in 1930 became its president. During the First World War he was a newspaper correspondent in France and Italy. Out of this experience came his book Estudios de política francesa: La política militar (1918). Under the mild dictatorship of Primo de Rivera he began his really fecund literary career. A few years before this period he had produced the first Spanish version (1920-1921) of George Borrow's The Bible in Spain. With Cipriano Rivas Cherif he founded and directed the literary magazine Pluma (1920-1924); in 1922 he took over the political weekly España, started originally by Ortega y Gasset (q.v.). Azaña came into prominence as a literary critic in 1926 when the coveted National Prize for Literature was bestowed on him for his Vida de Juan Valera. His interest in Valera continued. He wrote a copious and valuable introduction to the "Clásicos castellanos" edition (1927) of Pepita Jiménez; in 1929 his Valera en Italia; amores, política, literatura was published.

With two exceptions, all the writings of Azaña from the advent of the Second Republic until his death deal with politics. The first, La invención del "Quijote" y otros ensayos (1934), gives a brilliant interpretation and appreciation of Don Quixote; Tres generaciones del Ateneo (1930) is a study on the history and significance of the Ateneo. From 1930 to 1940 Azaña showed energy, great talent, and disciplined leadership in his various posts as minister of war, premier, and president of the republic. In the opinion of many, Azaña was a really great parliamentarian and orator. With the triumph of Franco, he took refuge in France, where, on November 4, 1940, at Montauban, he died a broken man.

Azaña had entered the literary scene late in life. In the two magazines Pluma and España he engaged in vitriolic criticism of the apolitical attitude assumed by the writers of the Generation of '98, then enjoying prestige and public patronage. His arrogant optimism, his Spanish soberbia, made small beer of the claims of those writers. Perhaps he was at his best in studies on Gánivet, Unamuno, and Costa (qq.v.). The most ambitious and devastating is "El Idearium de Gánivet" (included with the others mentioned in Plumas y palabras, 1930), in which he charged this original writer with ignorance of Catholic dogma and with an egregious misconception of Spanish history. The reader, overwhelmed by Azaña's logic and his knowledge of Spanish history, readily acquiesced, if only for the pleasure of anticipating the day when Azaña, a statesman in power, should succeed where the others had failed. But Azaña's optimism, unfortunately, failed too.

In all likelihood his claims to remembrance will rest on his translation of Borrow's The Bible in Spain, his sensitive essay on Don Quixote, and, above all, his remarkable recapturing of the essence of his disturbed soul when he studied at the Escorial. Juan Ramón Jiménez (q.v.) has well pointed out how the Spaniards of his time cultivated a literary genre which had not enjoyed much prestige in 19th-century Spain, namely, the book of reminiscences of childhood and adolescence. Jiménez himself, Unamuno, Baroja (q.v.), Ramón y Cajal, Azorín (q.v.), Pérez de Ayala (q.v.), and Azaña in his El jardín de los frailes (1927) must be included. As a sensitive artist Azaña gave a memorable account of the psychology and moral restlessness of a Spanish adolescent coming from the hallowed Alcalá de Henares (made famous by Cardinal Cisneros and by Cervantes) and going to study at the Escorial where, in spite of the august presence of Philip II, he showed a temperament inimical to the political and religious relics of the past. It is in these recollections that Azaña proved his marvelous grasp of the Spanish language. At a time when all the writers of Spain were swayed by stylistic innovations imported from abroad, he used a style derived from the Spanish theologians and moralists and characterized by a raciness and compactness comparable to Spanish wrought iron. Azaña, whose ideology owed much to the revolutionary and liberal tradition of Europe, is most castizo in his style, without being affected or archaic. It was into this resilient Spanish that he translated Borrow's book.

See: E. Giménez Caballero, Manuel Azaña (1932); N. González Ruiz, Azaña; sus ideas religiosas, sus ideas políticas, el hombre (1932); M. Góngora Echenique, Ideario de Manuel Azaña (1936).

M. J. B.

Azorín (pseud. of José Martínez Ruiz, 1873–, Spanish essayist, critic, novelist, and dramatist) cultivated so many genres that he defies precise definition. His early novels are made of intimate remembrances, descriptions of town and country, and criticism of Spanish life; the later Don Juan (1922; Eng. tr., 1923) and Doña Inés (1925) are evocative vignettes. Evocative in the same manner are attempts at drama such as Old Spain (1926) and Brandy, mucho Brandy (1927) and short stories such as Blanco en azul (1929; Eng. tr., The Syrens and Other Stories, 1931). Azorín's many volumes of criticism—the most important aspect of his work—are chiefly short essays, which are a mixture of the newspaper article, the erudite disquisition, and the lyrical impression. What gives unity to all his work is an unmistakable personal tone, certain very definite stylistic traits, quite new and fresh in his time, and a vision of life, literature, and reality in which the aesthetic, the emotional, and the rational are inseparably blended. In the highly personal quality of his writings Azorín appears as the embodiment of the intellectual subjectivism brought forward in Spanish literature by the Generation of '98. Azorín, in fact, was the first writer to adopt this term and the first to define its main characteristics in a series of articles (see "La generación del 98" in Clásicos y modernos, 1913). When Azorín spoke of "the men of '98" he was really speaking about himself. He was giving a perfect characterization of his own work and personality when he pointed out the feeling of these men for the Castilian landscape and for the past, their critical attitude toward an academic and pseudoclassical tradition, their love for the primitive poets, their admiration for El Greco and the spirit of such cities as Toledo, their indebtedness to Larra, their varied European influences.

His life has been entirely consecrated to literature except for a few, unsuccessful attempts to enter politics. He was born at Monovar in Alicante province. After attending a religious boarding school (these experiences are the subject of one of his first important books, Las confesiones de un pequeño filósofo, 1904), he began the study of law at the University of Valencia. There he wrote his first articles. About 1896 he went to Madrid and very soon became well—and unfavorably—known through the radical character of his writings and campaigns. Between 1893 and 1900 he published, under various pseudonyms, 10 or 12 pamphlets and minor critical works violently attacking accepted social and literary values. With the appearance in 1900 of Los hidalgos and El alma castellana (1600–1800), the real Azorín is revealed. In them were evident that poetic gift for bringing out the "presentness" of the past and that talent for uncovering the lasting significance of the most seemingly insignificant facts which were to form the core of his style. In 1902 and 1903 appeared La voluntad and Antonio Azorín, two autobiographical novels which contain the full expression of his sensibility and inner life. These two books make up a profound document for the study of the spiritual crisis at the end of the last century in Spain. In describing the perplexities of Antonio Azorín, Martínez Ruiz—who henceforth identified himself with and adopted the name of the character that he had created—analyzed in a moving way the spiritual unrest of the intellectual youth of his time. He showed them torn by an inner conflict between sentiment and reason, between a cult of will and of individual energy and an absolute incapacity for action, looking toward Europe for guidance and trying at the same time to discover the deep roots of the Spanish soul, dissatisfied with the decadent state of Spanish life, rebelling against tradition and yet with a great emotional attachment to that tradition which they wanted to destroy.

The purpose of the greater part of Azorín's works, comprising over 50 volumes, is to give a vision of the eternal values of Spain as perceived by a modern spirit—a poetical and critical vision. He has never abandoned the rational urge for renovation and the "revision of values" which was his point of departure. But on the whole, criticism is more than overbalanced by sentiment. The lyrical impression received when reading his prose is the result of two concentric emotions, the emotion of the atmosphere of things and the emotion of time. Both find their center in the Castilian landscape and history. Books such as Los pueblos (1905), La ruta de Don Quijote (1905), and above all Castilla (1912) rank with some of Unamuno's essays and certain poems of Antonio Machado (qq.v.) as the highest attainments of the typical "Castilianism" in contemporary Spanish literature. In these volumes he detects in the contemplation of silent and often very humble things the shadow of a past which he merges with the present to suggest poetically a feeling of the static emotion of time: everything changes, everything is fleeting; the only permanent thing is this very emotion about the return of things. He brought a similar sensibility to literary criticism in Lecturas españolas (1912), Clásicos y modernos (1913), Los valores literarios (1913), Al margen de los clásicos (1915), reawakening an interest in many forgotten authors and books. There is also an exquisite and purely poetic quality in such works as Don Juan, Doña Inés, and Félix Vargas (1928).

Azorín had an extraordinary influence in the first 20 years of the century. At that time he was acclaimed one of the most original exponents of a new epoch. He owed much to modern European literature, to France especially—Taine, Flaubert (qq.v.), the symbolists, and the impressionists. He combined the aesthetic sense and the methods learned from them with a philosophical conception which could be traced indirectly to Germanic sources (e.g., his ideas of time and change, his subjectivism). In addition he had a direct understanding of Spanish spirituality and a profound sense—also Spanish—of the value of the common things of reality.

See: S. de Madariaga, The Genius of Spain and Other Essays on Spanish Contemporary Literature (1923), pp. 148–164; Werner Muleritt, Azorín (1926, in German; Spanish tr., 1930).

A. del R.

B

Bååth, Albert Ulrik (1853–1912, Swedish poet), appeared first on the literary scene as one of that impressive group of poets from Sweden's rich, southernmost province, Skåne—a group that includes, besides Bååth, Ola Hansson, Anders Österling, and Vilhelm Ekelund (qq.v.) Bååth spent his boyhood and youth in a quiet little parish vicarage in southern Skåne, was educated at the University of Lund, and passed a considerable portion of his later life in his native province. Though his career was an essentially academic one (he was an Icelandic scholar, folk high school and university teacher, and director of a museum), the best of his poetry was as little intellectual as poetry can well be. Among the eight published volumes of his verse, covering a span of about 20 years, only the first three are of serious importance—Dikter (1879; Poems), Nya dikter (1881; New Poems), and Vid allfarväg (1884; Along the Great Highway). Some of the poems in these volumes express in rather obvious forms the social sentiments typical of the literature of the day; but the majority of them, and by far the most important, give spontaneous, personal, and direct expression to Bååth's solid animal delight in the folk life and the landscape of his rural Skåne. The strength of these poems lies in their healthy sensualism, their vigorous aliveness to the rich variety of substantial physical forms, colors, odors, and sounds characteristic of the fertile countryside of southern Sweden.

Bååth's poems lack, however, any profounder evocative qualities, the philosophical undercurrents and the explosive emotional core of all really great lyric expression; and they are almost entirely devoid of the sensitive musical qualities of Swedish verse at its best. His work is nevertheless of real importance in the development of modern Swedish poetry; for he not only "discovered Skåne" as subject matter for a rich efflorescence of provincial verse, but he pointed the way toward healthy forms of poetic realism for all of Swedish poetry since his day. Such superb lyric poets of the 1890's as Heidenstam, Fröding, and Karlfeldt (qq.v.) owe not a little, directly and indirectly, to the example of a new poetic realism in the provincial poetry of Bååth.

See: K. Fredlund, "A. U. Bååths diktning," Ord och bild, XXI (1912), 538–547; O. Hansson, "A. U. Bååth," in Litterära silhuetter, 1885, in Samlade skrifter, II (1920), 9–29.

A. G.

Babel, Isaak Emmanuilovich (1894–, Russian short-story writer), revived the genre of the short story after the Revolution. Uniquely gifted within limits, he is unrivaled for the concentration, impact, and brevity of his stories and for his mastery of dialect. A "fellow traveler," he became a sensation in the first decade of Communism, but since then he has lapsed into relative obscurity. Certain of his tales, however, already belong among the classics and are known by heart by many admirers. Born in Odessa of a typical petty-bourgeois Jewish family, he graduated (1910) from the Odessa School of Commerce. His principal training was received at home, where he studied Hebrew, the Talmud, and the Bible. At 15 he developed a passion for French literature, and he wrote his first stories in that language. In 1916 he went first to Kiev and thence to St. Petersburg, where he suffered hardship because Jews were then denied legal residence. Gorky (q.v.) encouraged him by publishing his first two stories in Letopis (Chronicle), but rejected his subsequent work as poor and callow. The next seven years Babel wrote nothing, but devoted himself to the Revolution, serving as people's commissar, member of a food expedition, and agent of the Cheka. He fought with Budyonny's cavalry in the Polish campaign of 1921-1922 and with Yudenich's cavalry. Later he operated a printing press in Odessa. He returned to literature (1923) with a number of short stories printed in periodicals. Their instant success led to two volumes of tales, Odesskie rasskazy (1923-1924; Odessa Tales) and Konarmiya (1926; Eng. tr., Red Cavalry, 1929), which brought him international fame. There followed Bluzhdayushchie zvyozdy (1926; Wandering Stars), a scenario; Yevreiskie rasskazy (1927; Jewish Tales); Benya Krik (1927; Eng. tr., 1935), a "film novel"; and two plays, Zakat (1928; Sunset) and Mariya (1935), produced by the Moscow Art Theatre. Since then he has written other stories and has engaged in a long novel, but he has failed to hold the brilliant popularity won by his earlier work. This is sometimes ascribed to the enforced proletarianization of literature under the first Five-Year Plan and to Babel's unwillingness to submit his pen to a dictated tendentiousness.

Babel's subject matter falls into two main cycles, the sufferings of Odessa Jews and the exploits of the Red fighters of Budyonny's cavalry. Benya Krik, a famous Jewish bandit, whose real name was Misha Yaponchik, or Mike the Jap, is the leading character of the first group. Depth and subtlety underlie the concise simplicity of Babel's work, which is a mixture of heroic romance and the utmost naturalism seasoned with irony. All his stories are founded on sharp paradox, violence and serenity, extreme cruelty and lyrical tenderness, humor and tragedy. Apparently crude and fragmentary, in reality they are constructed with the nicest precision, without a superfluous word. His finest things are in dialect, that of the Kuban Cossacks and the Russo-Jewish jargon of Odessa. The speech of such characters is a marvel of phonetic reproduction, impossible to translate. Even so, the foreign reader receives an indelible impression from the story—such is Babel's power. Among the best tales are "Sol" ("Salt"), "Pismo" ("A Letter"), "Smert Dolgushova" ("Death of Dolgushev"), "Zhizn i priklyucheniya Matveya Pavlichenko" ("Life and Adventures of Matvey Pavlitchenko"), all in Red Cavalry, and "Korol" (The King, in Odesskie rasskazy, 1924, Stories from Odessa) and "Istoriya moei golubyatni" (1926; Eng. tr., "The Story of My Dovecote," Slavonic Review, X, 1-11).

See: D. S. Mirsky, "Babel," Sovremennyya zapiski, XXXVI (1925), 485-488; A. Kaun, "Babel, Voice of the New Russia," Menorah Journal, XV (1928), 400-410.

N. S.

Babits, Mihály (1883-1941, Hungarian poet, critic, novelist, and short-story writer), was born in Szekszárd and died in Budapest. Babits was educated at the Cistercian secondary school in Pécs and at the University of Budapest. In his career as a professor in various provincial towns, in Baja, Szeged, Fogaras, Ujpest, he showed a fine professional conscientiousness; but in his moments of real freedom he was a poet, and gradually his poetic self demanded complete attention. Fortunately the childhood of Babits was spent in a cultural atmosphere; his people belonged to the intellectual middle class. His whole life suggests cultural roots. When his first poems appeared in Nyugat (West), they immediately impressed the discriminating readers; they gave the impression of a poeta doctus. This first impression was so strong that later it was difficult for readers and critics to recognize the vehemence, the emotional restlessness, the fantastic horizon, the crucified spirit of the poet. Babits never sided with dogmas which narrowed life; he never subordinated the principle of artistic integrity to didacticism or propaganda. By nature he was a contemplative person rather than a man of action; he had the intelligence of a creator and not of a pamphleteer. His neurotic sensitiveness sometimes seemed to be in need of humanization, but in truth he was never so removed from life as to be fairly called an ivory-tower poet. While Freud in psychology, Bergson (q.v.) in philosophy, and Julien Benda (q.v.) in certain critical norms influenced him, the catholicity of Babits's taste was always such that he could absorb many ideas without paying the tribute of mere resemblance or imitation. He believed in values, not in slogans. His marital life with Sophie Török, a poetess, was ideal; it was a Hungarian version of the Robert Browning-Elizabeth Barrett relationship. Babits was a pacifist, but it is logical to assume that his sense of proportion would have rejected any unreasonable peace.

Babits was not only one of the most gifted poets and writers of modern Hungary, but one of the most erudite and versatile. He made the discursive essay popular in his native country; he translated Sophocles' Oedipus, Dante's The Divine Comedy, Shakespeare's The Tempest, medieval Latin hymns, and the works of many French, German, English, and American poets and writers into Hungarian. His Az európai irodalom története (1934; History of European Literature) shows an independent spirit's interpretation of great writers and poets. His plays are book-dramas. After the First World War, Babits became one of the editors of Nyugat; he was less radical than his predecessors, but not less strict in his standard of criticism. As a matter of fact, despite increased political nationalism he was unwilling to compromise with his aesthetic doctrines; the hysterical times of course affected him, but he repudiated their standard. The saccharine patriotism of certain Hungarian poets, the conforming rhetorics of certain writers and publicists, the "folkishness" of certain literary or pseudo-literary tendencies, never touched the deepest strings of his heart and his mind. His passion for creative integrity was so honest that his pragmatic compromises were merely matters of inevitable policy and they were not the betrayal of the spirit.

The collected works of Babits were published in 1939. Babits traveled very little, but his work, like that of the non-traveling Immanuel Kant, symbolized his relationship to the cosmos. The sphere of his art and of his thoughts was the universe. He was brought up as Roman Catholic but he did not confine his views to the dogmatic horizon of the Church. His early poems showed ability in poetic symbolism; he was always very fond of Edgar Allan Poe and of certain French and English symbolic poets and emphasized images and workmanship in their fashion. In some respects, like so many other symbolic poets, he was a master of onomatopoeia. When he reached maturity, he felt that even modern terminologies become stereotyped; he dug into his innermost self, and a comparison of his early poems with those of the later period reveal a broader conception of the good life, a deeper understanding of life's experiences. The somewhat "decadent" Babits is best represented by the following volumes of poetry: Herczeg, hátha megjön a tél is (1911; But Prince, if Winter Should Come); Recitativ (1911; Recitative); Nyugtalanság völgye (1917; The Valley of Restlessness); Sziget és tenger (1925; Island and Sea). The mellow Babits found his voice in Versenyt az esztendőekkel (1928; In Race with the Years) and in Jónás könyve (1939; The Book of Jonah). Halálfiái (1926; The Sons of Death) is his most ambitious novel; it is a bulky work, written with compassion about the dying gentry and middle class. Karácsonyi Madonna (1920; Christmas Madonna), Timár Virgil fia (1922; The Son of Vergil Timar), Kártyavár (1924; House of Cards), and other stories and novels written by Babits reflect a mind inclined to be fantastic in its psychological orientation and positive in its refusal of the obvious. Irodalmi problémák (Literary Problems) shows Babits at his very best as an essayist. His language, rich and sometimes baroque, makes the reading of his works difficult for the uninitiated. Some of his works have been translated into German, Italian, French, and English.

See: H. Horváth, Neue ungarische Lyrik (1918); A. Schöpflin, Írók, könyvek, emlékek (1925); W. Kirkconnell, The Magyar Muse; an Anthology (1933); J. Reményi, "The Passing of Mihály Babits," Books Abroad, XVI (1942), 36. J. R.

Bacchelli, Riccardo (1891-, Italian novelist), born in Bologna of a wealthy, well-known family, is one of the few novelists in a literary generation that went in more for lyricism than for narration and that was, until recently, rather wary of construction and plot. Bacchelli's success is due more to his patience and to a persistent will to become a great novelist than to any natural gift. It took him 18 years to acquire any fame at all. His production earned him respect rather than enthusiasm and more authority than popularity. With the exception of Il Diavolo al Pontelungo (1927; Eng. tr., The Devil at the Long Bridge, 1929), a historical novel, alive and humorous, Bacchelli's work is for the most part ponderous, and his characters are not well enough defined to emerge as living types. Il Diavolo, in two distinct parts somewhat separated from each other in tone, is a fictionalized account of Bakunin's attempts to introduce socialism in Italy. His early book, Il Filo meraviglioso (1910), printed at his own expense, was somewhat mannered, and this same quality persisted throughout all his works. Only once did he try his hand at a light novel, La Città degli amanti (1929; Eng. tr., Love Town, 1930), in which he tells of a city built for lovers by an American tycoon, but where true lovers cannot really live. This very same invention in the hands of an Anatole France (q.v.) or of a Shaw would have resulted in a very amusing satire, but what attracted the critics in La Città was a description of the retreat of Caporetto, which entered into the plot only as a side issue. This would indicate that the best qualities of Bacchelli are of a descriptive rather than a narrative nature. Sometimes he gives evidence of a very fine mastery of vocabulary, especially in his tale of fishes, Lo sa il tonno (1923), written with satirical intentions in that rather forced style of academic exercise common to the group of the Ronda. Occasionally he displays a wealth of detail which goes well with the rather slow and majestic rhythm, earning him the comparison to a river (scrittore fluviale).

Bacchelli's most imposing work, a three-volume novel of the time of the Italian Risorgimento with his native land of Emilia as background, Il Mulino del Po (first published in the Nuova Antologia, 1938–1940), is hardly exciting; but it certainly merits consideration for the magnitude of the enterprise, rare among the parsimonious writers of present-day Italy. In Oggi, domani e mai (1932), he tried his hand at more serious historical problems (the responsibility of the Reformation for the modern sick political state of Europe) without giving a solution to them, nor creating in the character ofANCESCHI a true representative of the veteran of the First World War. He merely confirmed the critics' estimation of his qualities as an accomplished academic writer. A few short stories, Bella Italia (1928); a tentative retelling in modern words of Hamlet, Amleto (1923); some literary memoirs, Memorie del tempo presente (1919–1920); one historical essay, La Congiura di Don Giulio d'Este (1931); some lyrics in prose, Poemi lirici (1914), Parole d'amore (1935); and another novel, Il Rabdomante (1936), complete the essential achievements of this man of high literary discipline.

See: P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento, revised ed. (1939), pp. 221–227; T. G. Bergin, "Riccardo Bacchelli," Italica, XVII (1940), 64–68, with bibliography.

G. P.

Bagritsky, Eduard (pseud. of Eduard Dzyubin, 1895–1934, Russian poet), was born in Odessa, of a poor Jewish family. He graduated from a technical school as land surveyor, but never practiced his profession. Bagritsky took part in the civil war as a member of a guerrilla detachment and as a poet attached to the "propaganda train" which was sent to the front by proletarian organizations. Bagritsky started to produce poetry in 1915–1916, but his mature works were written after 1924. He belonged to the group of constructivists whose leaders were his personal friends, but his poetry is by no means an expression of this particular school. Eclectic in scope, it impresses by its romanticism and passionate sense of life. The romantic trend is strongly felt in Bagritsky's imagery and his visions of the far distant past. It was not by mere chance that one of his first collections of poems bore a Dürer drawing on the cover. In the "Ptitselov" (Bird Catcher) Bagritsky proclaimed his utter love for "nature, wind, songs, and freedom." One of his preferred heroes was the exuberant Till Eulenspiegel. He made excellent translations of various poets, especially of Burns and Walter Scott. He also devoted many of his poems to contemporary themes, always choosing colorful scenes and dramatic episodes. Soviet critics praise highly his "Duma pro Opanasa" (Ballad of Opanas), a narrative poem of civil war in which motives of the Ukrainian folklore are skillfully merged into modern rhythms. In spite of its great metric variety and the trace of many conflicting influences, ranging from the classics to Mayakovsky's (q.v.) futurism, Bagritsky's poetry has a fundamental unity revealed by the dynamism of its images, the tense rapidity of its rhythms, the sensuous strength of its descriptions, and the general feeling of optimism and vitality. After his death his works were published in Sobraniye sochineni v dvukh tomakh (1938; Collected Works in Two Volumes).

M. S.

Bahr, Hermann (1863–1934, Austrian critic, novelist, and dramatist), was born in Linz, Austria, and died in Munich. His closest association was with Jungwien, a group of writers which he claimed to have founded or discovered in 1891 and which dominated Austrian literature during the quarter of a century preceding the First World War. This group included Arthur Schnitzler, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Richard Beer-Hofmann, Peter Altenberg, and Felix Salten (qq.v.). Bahr was its most prolific and most versatile member. As a critic (in his Zur Kritik der Moderne, 1890) he anticipated the reaction against naturalism, just as this movement was attaining supremacy (see German naturalism), and as early as 1891 he espoused in his volume Die Überwindung des Naturalismus the cause of the emerging neo-romanticists, symbolists, and decadents. When these finally triumphed, he became the spokesman of the new expressionistic youth, and in his book Expressionismus (1916; Eng. tr., Expressionism, 1925) he helped to define the characteristics of this literary tendency. As a novelist (e.g., Theater, 1897) he was a superb and witty narrator of the charm and the folly of Vienna, when this metropolis was the overrefined capital of a dying empire. As a dramatist he is best remembered for Das Konzert (1909; Eng. tr., The Concert, 1910), a sophisticated comedy of Vienna, which was successfully produced both on the Continental and on the American stages.

S. L.

Bainville, Jacques (1879–1936, French historian and essayist), was born in Vincennes, Seine. He attended the Lycée Henri IV in Paris, then studied law. He was only 20 when he brought back from a trip to Germany a biography of Ludwig II of Bavaria, the protector of Wagner (q.v.).

He wrote short stories and essays of a philosophical nature. Jaco et Lori (1927) and La Tasse de Saxe (1929) are examples. He was well suited to edit, as he did, the works of Voltaire; the two writers resemble one another in more than one respect—their irony, their scorn for mankind, their pessimism, their admiration of intelligence, their wit, their style.

Bainville's main work, however, was in history and journalism. His historical publications include Histoire de deux peuples (1915), Histoire de trois générations (1916), Histoire de France (1924), and Napoléon (1931). As a journalist he contributed political articles to the Action française and Liberté, economic and political editorials to the Petit Parisien and Nation belge, and literary essays to the Revue universelle, which he founded in 1920 with Henri Massis (q.v.). He was able so to expose the most complex problem, the most involved circumstance, as to render them perfectly comprehensible to his many readers. He admittedly looked upon Sainte-Beuve as his model. No matter what the subject matter, his style was one of precision and lucidity. Some of his articles have been collected in Les Conséquences politiques de la paix (1920), La Russie et la barrière de l'est (1937), and L'Allemagne (1939–1940). He was elected a member of the French Academy in 1935, the year before his death.

P. B.

Balart, Federico (1831–1905, Spanish poet and critic), born in Pliego, Murcia, was active in the ranks of the liberal party and held office during the revolutionary period (1868–1874), returning to private life when the monarchy was restored. Before this he had been an outstanding journalist and was considered an extremely able literary and art critic; selections from this phase of his work were collected in 1894 in a volume entitled Impresiones: Literatura y arte. That same year, when it seemed as though he had almost passed into oblivion, he achieved one of the greatest literary successes of the day with the publication of a book of poetry entitled Dolores, the name of his deceased wife. Her death had occurred in 1879, and the poems dedicated to her had been written between that year and 1891. These verses of marital love were the quiet welling of a wounded heart and were written not for the public but to assuage an inner sorrow. It is to this quality of sincere emotion, expressed in simple, noble, pensive form, in terse nitid language, and tinged with religious resignation that their author owed his late-flowering glory. To this is due the place accorded him as one of the great minor poets of the 19th century. Two later volumes of poetry, Horizontes (1897) and Sombras y destellos (1905), add nothing to his glory.

See: J. M. Alvarez Sotomayor, "Federico Balart," Revista católica de Chile, XLVI (1924) 389–394, 551–554; L. Alas and E. Gómez de Baquero, prologues in Balart, Poesías completas (1939).

F. de O.

Baldensperger, Fernand (pseud. Fernand Baldenne, 1871–, French literary historian), born in Saint-Dié, Vosges, is a stalwart Lorrainer who, under a transparent pseudonym, has occasionally extolled in prose and verse the healthy values of local tradition. He is also a scholar of universal knowledge, who has been in recent years engrossed in the preparation of a history of international literature. He has had an extraordinarily full career, producing books by the dozen and articles by the hundreds.

For 36 years (1900–1936) a professor in French universities (Lyon, Strasbourg, Paris), Fernand Baldensperger came to Harvard University in 1936 and has lately been on the staff of the University of California at Los Angeles. Research, lectures, and visiting professorships have taken him to the four corners of Europe, to China and Japan, to both Americas. As early as 1904, when he published his Goethe en France and a posthumous, enlarged reedition of Louis Paul Betz's Littérature comparée; essai bibliographique (1st ed., 1897), he became a world leader in the field of comparative literature. For his 30th academic anniversary in 1930, 62 scholars from 18 different nations offered him the unprecedented homage of two volumes of Mélanges exclusively devoted to comparative studies. Many more contributed to the Revue de littérature comparée and its "Bibliothèque" of monographs which he and his foremost disciple, Paul Hazard (q.v.), founded together in 1921.

Some of Baldensperger's work is modeled after the pattern set by Gustave Lanson (q.v.) and is strictly concerned with national subjects (outstanding in this category are his critical edition of Alfred de Vigny and his two "contributions to the intellectual biography" of the same author, 1912 and 1933). But for the most part his studies have stressed the international viewpoint—Etudes d'histoire littéraire (2 vols., 1907–1910), Le Mouvement des idées dans l'émigration française (2 vols., 1924), La Littérature européenne aux XVIIe et XVIIIe siècles (1930), to quote only a few titles. These works are backed up by a definite philosophy, expressed in a work of 1913 (La Littérature; création, succès, durée) and in Baldensperger's important introduction to the very first number of the Revue de littérature comparée ("La Littérature comparée; le mot et la chose"). Comparative literature—which crosses at will geographical, linguistic, and cultural boundaries—he characterizes not only as a dynamic conception of literary history but as the possible harbinger of a "new humanism."

See: Emmanuel Beau de Loménie, review of Le Mouvement des idées dans l'émigration française in Revue de littérature comparée, V (1925), 708–718; Paul Van Tieghem, La Littérature comparée (1931), pp. 33–48 and passim.
J.-A. B.

Baldini, Antonio (1889–, Italian novelist), was born in Rome. An apathetic son of a prosperous family, he spent his early youth dreaming of poetry. Casting aside any idea of practical employment, he was content to turn over the pages of old and good books, studying, elaborating, and polishing literary forms. He presently achieved a mature literary style saturated with an instinctive, individual humor that distinguishes him from other writers of Italy today. Baldini studied at the University of Bologna and received his doctorate with a thesis on Ariosto, whom he liked to call "Lodovico the tranquil." The First World War interrupted his literary studies and brought him a medal for bravery; in Nostro Purgatorio (1918) he records some of his more interesting war experiences. Baldini has been a lecturer, a merchant (in Upper Silesia), and since 1931 the editor of the Nuova Antologia.

The three literary works that are most representative of Baldini are Michelaccio (1924), La Dolce Calamita (1929), and Amici allo spiedo (1932). Michelaccio is an amusing story of a bad boy. It symbolizes perhaps the natural laziness and mischievousness of the author himself. Michelaccio loves to eat, to drink, and to sleep. So does Baldini. Michelaccio loves women. So does Baldini. Michelaccio is hopelessly indolent. So is Baldini. But here, as the critic Panzini remarks, the analogy must end, for the laziness of Michelaccio is just one characteristic while that of Baldini is a mode of being and of thinking—it is a style, a philosophy. La Dolce Calamita contains a series of amusing portraits of women Baldini has known or of women he would like to have known. According to the author, the tools used in constructing this novel were his eyes and his memory, but much of the quality comes from Baldini's fantasy—which he pretends to overlook. In Amici allo spiedo he makes fun of many of the leading contemporary luminaries. The quips are those of a good-natured friend; there are indelible portraits of Malaparte (pseud. of Curzio Suckert, q.v.), Bacchelli (q.v.), Soffici (q.v.), Papini (q.v.), Giuliotti (q.v.), De Chirico, Spadini, Don Benedetto (Croce, q.v.), et al. To each Baldini devotes a few paragraphs or a chapter, varying the tone and the music, but without ever forgetting the pinch of good humor—the pizzicata.

P. M. R.

Baliński, Stanisław (1898–, Polish poet), was born in Warsaw, of Border gentry stock, the son of a one-time mayor of Warsaw. Educated at home and abroad, Baliński came to maturity at the time of the founding of Skamander (see Polish literature) and was associated with this group until 1939. Baliński's early poems, published mostly in Wiadomości literackie (Literary News) and Skamander, were slight pieces, but his verses published in exile, after the invasion of Free Poland (Wielka podróż, London, 1941; A Great Journey), together with those to be found in the emigration journal Wiadomości polskie (London; Polish News), are sincere, moving records of deep spiritual experience.

See: A. P. Coleman, "Polish Literature in Exile," New York Times Book Review, June 1, 1941, pp. 8, 18.

A. P. C.

Balmont, Konstantin Dmitriyevich (1867–1943, Russian poet, translator, and essayist), was born into a noble family in the province of Vladimir, Russia. While a student at the Gymnasium, Balmont was temporarily expelled for revolutionary activity. Soon reinstated, he finished the secondary school and enrolled in the faculty of jurisprudence at the University of Moscow (1886); here, however, he studied chiefly German literature and the history of the French Revolution. Within a year he was expelled from the university and exiled to Shuya for leading some of the student outbreaks. In the following year he was permitted to resume studies at the College of Law at Yaroslavl. Given to emotional instability, Balmont at 22 leaped from a window in an attempted suicide and as a result was confined to bed for over a year. He was ever attracted by the lore of strange lands and traveled extensively. In 1904 he visited Mexico; in 1905, because he had written a number of revolutionary poems, Balmont was obliged to emigrate and spent the better part of a decade in Paris, Brussels, and elsewhere. He visited the Orient, Africa, and even Oceania. In 1913 Balmont returned to Moscow. In 1917 he ecstatically greeted the October Revolution; subsequently he was commissioned abroad, where he switched to the émigré camp. After that he lived chiefly in France.

When in the middle of the 1890's symbolism as a literary movement had begun in Russia, Balmont supported the new trend and soon was recognized as one of its leaders. Thereafter his name was linked with the symbolists. His first book of melancholy civic verse, Sbornik stikhotvoreni (1890; Collection of Verses), reflects the influence—in its content—of the poetry of Nadson (q.v.), Nekrasov, Koltsov, Nikitin (q.v.), and—in its form—that of Pushkin. Even in his second book, Pod severnym nebom (1894; Under Northern Skies), one still finds a similar strain, although here the reader feels that music is used to convey a mood. Balmont's studies of Western verse (eventually he translated into Russian the collected works of Shelley, Whitman, much of Poe, Wilde, Calderón, Hauptmann, q.v.) completed a transformation in his poetry. In his V bezbrezhnosti (1895; In the Infinite) and Tishina (1898; Quietude) Balmont shows a complete break with the traditions of civic poetry and appears as one of the leaders of the new school. His poetry now not only seeks the infinite, but also attempts, through the music of its verse, to convey the ineffable. His next few books, Goryashchiya zdaniya (1900; Flaming Buildings), Budem kak solntse (1903; Let Us Be like the Sun), Tolko lyubov (1903; Love Alone), Liturgiya krasoty (1905; The Liturgy of Beauty), reveal Balmont as a spectacular, resplendently colorful, self-centered romanticist. Here he attempts to discard the tenderly melancholy mood of his previous poetry and to become a Nietzschean superman (see Nietzsche) whose desires are a law unto themselves. After 1905 Balmont's muse begins to falter, and his poetry becomes repetitious. His verse after 1910 scarcely deserves mention. As a translator Balmont's worth is unequal. His translations suffer from being too free; those he made of Shelley are more paraphrase than translation. Balmont's essays on poetry treat the writing of poetry as a magical process and reflect a typical "symbolist mentality" that prefers to guide itself by inspirational and irrational methods.

Balmont's greatest achievement lies in the mellifluousness of his verse; in this he is a master. Although his poetry inspired numerous imitators, most of them were second and third-rate poets, and Igor Severyanin (q.v.) alone enjoyed a long period of popularity.

See: Ellis (pseud. of L. L. Kobylinski), Rus-skiye simvolisty (1910); Zapiski neofilologicheskovo o-va pri Peterburgskom universitete, 1914, No. 7; E. Anichkov, "Balmont," in S. A. Vengerov, ed., Russkaya literatura XX veka, I (1914), 66–100.

O. M.

Bałucki, Michał (pseud. Elpidon and Załęga, 1837–1901, Polish dramatist), the father of Polish bourgeois comedy, was born in Cracow, and there he spent most of his life. His early writings, poems of love and death in the mood of Słowacki, are all forgotten except for the lyric "Góralu, czy ci nie żal?" (Oh, mountaineer, dost thou not grieve?), which is sung to a popular folk melody. In the 70's Bałucki turned from poetry to the novel, using this form as an instrument of protest against the clergy and aristocracy, whose form of conservatism he hated, against, on the other hand, the growing trend to naturalism in life and literature, and especially against the new freedom accorded women and the mounting popularity of Ibsen (q.v.). Bałucki did not find his proper medium until he began to write plays, and even then, although the successful Radcy pana radcy (The Counselors of Mr. Councilor) appeared in 1867, it was not until the 80's that he can be said to have mastered that medium. With Krewniaki (1879; Kinfolk), the still popular Grube ryby (1881; Big Fish), Dom otwarty (1883; Open House), and Klub kawalerów (1890; Bachelors' Club), he provided the Polish theatre of the future with a rich repertory of satirical bourgeois comedy. Bałucki was a man out of tune with his times, his gift of comedy being largely unappreciated by contemporary theatregoers who sought in the drama not amusement, but sublimity and emotional exaltation. Bałucki died a suicide, unable to survive the storm of disapproval that greeted his play Blagierzy (1900; The Impostors).

See: G. Korbut, Literatura polska (1931), IV, 220-221; Z. Nowakowski, Słownik biograficzny (1935), I, 252-254.

A. P. C.

Bandrowski, Juljusz (known also as Kaden, from his mother's name, 1885-1945, Polish novelist and publicist), was born at Rzeszów, in the heart of Austrian Poland, the son of a distinguished and public-spirited physician. Brought up mostly in Lwów, Bandrowski studied in Cracow and later in Brussels, where he specialized in music. He became involved at an early age in the patriotic activities centering around Piłsudski and took a leading part in the exploits of the legionaries during the First World War. After the Piłsudski coup of 1926, Bandrowski became, in effect, the "grand pontiff of official literature" in Poland. His finest work artistically is the tender, autobiographical Miasto mojej matki (1925; My Mother's Town). His most ambitious works are Generał Barcz (1923), a story of the reconstruction of Polish political and social life in Warsaw immediately following the First World War, and Czarne skrzydła (1929; Black Wings), an attempt, only partially successful, to portray fictionally the life of Polish workers in the great Dąbrowa coal basin. In 1938 Bandrowski entered the then officially cultivated field of romantic biography with a fictionalized life of Chopin (Życie Chopina).

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, II (1928), 287-302; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 51-98, 686-690.

A. P. C.

Bang, Herman Joachim (1857-1912, Danish novelist), was born on the island of Als. He came of an old distinguished family which was showing signs of decadence. His father, who was a clergyman, died insane. Herman Bang's mother was his friend and playfellow, but died when he was 14. She figures often in his works, which draw, to an unusual extent, on reminiscences of his childhood. His first important book, the novel Haabløse Slegter (1880; Generations without Hope), describes the struggle in himself of the conflicting elements in his heredity. In Tine (1889) he uses his own home as the background for his description of the war with Austria and Prussia in 1864 and the retreat from Dannevirke—though actually the family had moved away from the neighborhood the year before. Det hvide Hus (1898; The White House) is an idyllic description of his childhood home, with his mother as the central figure.

A sexual abnormality and a morbid sensitiveness placed Bang outside that human fellowship for which he passionately yearned. His own spiritual loneliness is reflected in De uden Fædreland (1906; Eng. tr., Denied a Country, 1927), though it purports to be the story of a homeless violin virtuoso. It was partly his longing for human contacts and partly his strong love of play-acting that drew Bang in his youth to the stage. When he failed both as actor and playwright, he turned to journalism as a means of livelihood and showed himself a brilliant though subjective critic. No fiction could be less dramatic than Bang's, but no doubt his early failure contributed to his sympathy for those on the periphery of the art world, e.g., the aged danseuse in the tragicomic short story "Irene Holm" (1890). Within this narrow compass Bang's art is almost perfect. Ved Vejen (1886; By the Wayside) is generally regarded as his masterpiece. It is a short novel in which, with the slightest means and the subtlest touches, he draws a picture of Danish provincial life and portrays a gentle, shrinking woman who is bound to a coarse, selfish husband. Pity for all who suffered helplessly and loathing of that which he regarded as the most potent cause of human suffering, sexual desire, were the motivating forces in Bang's authorship. Love, he said, always grew into desire; desire brought degradation and misery. His conviction that sexual desire was beyond the control of the will led to rebellion against the idea of a God who placed this devastating impulse at the root of all life and remained coldly aloof and indifferent while his creatures struggled. Bang's art was impressionistic, and he developed a style that exactly fitted his approach. His death was lonely and tragic. He was on a reading tour in the United States when he was found bleeding and unconscious in his berth on the train. He had evidently suffered a stroke and hemorrhage. He was taken to a hospital in Ogden, Utah, but died without regaining consciousness.

See: P. A. Rosenberg, Herman Bang (1912); Hans Brix, Danmarks Digtere (1925).

H. A. L.

Banville, Théodore de (1823–1891, French poet, dramatist, and prose writer), was born in Moulins, where he had a happy early childhood. From the age of seven on, his life was largely spent in Paris. His family encouraged his literary ambitions from the start, and except for a period of illness and depression his life was serene and uneventful. After a brief liaison with the actress Marie Daubrun, to whom the volume Améthystes (1862) is addressed, he found complete happiness in his marriage to Mme Rochegrosse in 1866. On the death of Gautier he became, with Leconte de Lisle (q.v.), one of the masters of the younger generation of poets, but lived to see the decline of his popularity.

Banville produced some 20 volumes of verse. In Les Cariatides (1842) a romanticism all too reminiscent of Hugo and Musset colors even the Greek themes so dear to Banville and is bridled only by the conscious craftsmanship which marks all his verse. His technique owes much to the poets of the Renaissance, as is evident in Les Stalactites (1846), Odelettes (1856), and Le Sang de la coupe (1857) and particularly in the later volumes in which he rings the changes on a single form such as the ballad or the rondel. From Les Stalactites on, Banville's early pessimism gradually disappears, and he becomes the poet of joy, beauty, and love. In the Odes funambulesques (1857) and the Occidentales (1869) his virtuosity reaches its height as he walks the tight-rope of poetic technique. In Les Exilés (1867) the poet comes down to earth, to share the misfortunes of his fellow exiles and to speak for them as well as for himself with a depth of feeling and vigor of form rare in Banville's work. Idylles prussiennes (1871) is an unfortunate attempt at political satire. Banville's last volumes of poetry reflect a period of disillusionment, followed by renewed optimism.

The dozen or so plays, nearly all in verse, which constitute Banville's dramatic work, are transpositions of his favorite lyric themes. La Pomme (1865), Le Forgeron (1887), and Esope (1893) bring the gods of Greece to the boulevards; Riquet à la houppe (1884) and Le Baiser (1888) are pure fancy, while Gringoire (1866) and Florise (1870) glorify the poet in various guises. Banville is almost entirely without dramatic sense, and his plays are armchair drama indeed. During the latter part of his life Banville also wrote a quantity of prose, chiefly journalistic, most of which was collected in Scènes de la vie (1859–1888) and Petites Etudes (1882–1885). The miniatures of 19th-century Paris, the intimate glimpses of contemporaries, such as are found in Mes Souvenirs (1882), have a certain picturesque charm, but all too often the style is diffuse and undistinguished, cluttered with facile formulas and clichés.

Baudelaire (q.v.), writing in 1861, noted that Banville's originality lay in the happy and serene quality of his work—a poetry of sunlit hours, of escape from reality to a paradise peopled by his dear Greek gods, where the poet has the place of honor which is his due. But his feeling often lacks intensity, his optimism seems all too facile, and one wearies of the profusion of muses and lyres and of Banville's reiterated reminders to his reader that he is a lyric poet. His pleasure in complicated patterns, his emphasis in the Petit Traité de poésie française (1872) on the supreme importance of rhyme, often lead to a Parnassian rigidity. Yet the variations in meter, the rejection of many of the traditional rules of versification, the use of the rhythms and cadences of popular poetry, as in "Nous n'irons plus au bois," make Banville one of the rare artists of his time to anticipate the elusive music of Verlaine (q.v.).

See: M. Fuchs, Théodore de Banville (1912); J. Charpentier, Théodore de Banville (1925); I. Siciliano, Dal romanticismo al simbolismo (1927).

M. G.

Barbey d'Aurevilly, Jules Amédée (1808–1889, French novelist and critic), was born at Saint-Sauveur-le-Vicomte near Coutances. He unquestionably belonged to an aristocratic family of the Cotentin peninsula in Normandy. His literary fame now is in the ascendant. The dramatic life, haughty and daring character, famous dandyism (see Du dandysme et de Georges Brummel, 1845), unassailable loftiness and unflinching absolutist convictions of this Connétable des lettres, Sagittaire, Corsaire noir, etc., who had "a laurel planted in his imagination," can be found in the 50 volumes (besides many uncollected writings) of his work. As a novelist he wrote Une Vieille Maîtresse (1851), L'Ensorcelée (1854), Le Chevalier des touches (1864), Un Prêtre marié (1864), Les Diaboliques (1874; Eng. tr., Weird Women, 1900), Une Histoire sans nom (1882; Eng. tr., The Story without a Name, 1891, new ed., 1919), Ce qui ne meurt pas (1883; Eng. tr. by Sebastian Melmoth, pseud. of Oscar Wilde, What Never Dies). As a critic he wrote Les Œuvres et les hommes, a series ranging from Les Prophètes du passé (1851) to Le Théâtre contemporain (1886–1896) and Portraits politiques et littéraires (1898). In the 24 volumes of this criticism are collected the most important articles and reviews brought out over a span of 50 years—beginning with his contributions to the Nouvelliste de Dieppe (1838) and including those in the Globe, Revue du monde catholique (which he founded in 1846), Journal des débats, and Revue indépendante (1886–1887). His gifts as a letter writer appear particularly in the admirable Lettres à Trébutien (Œuvres complètes, Vols. XIV–XVII), in the Lettres à Léon Bloy (1903), and in the correspondence with Eugénie de Guérin, whose brother Maurice was his admired friend (see Lettres de M. de Guérin à Barbey d'Aurevilly, 1928) and whose works he published in 1855 (Lettres intimes, 1921).

The novels of Barbey d'Aurevilly bear the imprint of a bold and original genius. They form the most important ensemble of French romans du terroir. Barbey made good his wish to become the "Walter Scott of the Cotentin," i.e., the coastal region between Coutances, Valognes, and Saint-Sauveur. "Everything," he declared, "must be Norman with me and be related to Normandy"; such were his novels with their sturdy realism and well-defined historical or legendary events, spacious scenery, and local types—noblemen, peasants, wizards, beggars, priests. All his characters share in the "adhering power" he knew he possessed, as well as in his sometimes Rabelaisian zest for life. Everything in them stands out with a convincing reality due to great creative imagination enhanced by his capacity for remembering, which he prized above all his other gifts. This visionary power, more than his famous descriptions of magic or witchcraft, takes the reader into a weird, mysterious world. On the other hand, those tragic tales "of love, hatred, and deceit" usually are based on some inner drama—the struggle between spiritual forces and the passions at work in his accursed characters, criminals or expiatory victims, out of which rises what Barbey himself termed "the fearful poetry of crime . . . more intellectual than physical."

As a critic he especially revealed his aggressive power, according to Aristide Marie, when dealing with "conflicting social or religious ideas." He is most suggestive when he discusses from a writer's point of view literary schools or forms, the nature of the novel, style, and the like. He is famous for some strongly partial indictments, for his devotion to Balzac (see Balzac, Œuvres . . . recueillies par Barbey d'Aurevilly, 1909), and for farsighted divinations, notably of Baudelaire's genius and Hello's spiritual gifts. He "pulverized" non-entities like Feuillet, the third-rate dramatists of his day, the hated bluestockings. He fiercely challenged what appeared to him faked literary or moral literary values. None pointed out more decisively the limitations of naturalism. His always genuine criticism bears witness to the immensity of his reading. At its best it is that of a poet and, like his other writing, has the live quality of a spoken rather than written expression, even though carefully devised and achieved. His lashing irony, buoyancy, tempestuous magnificence, and ever gushing bold images entertain, irritate, and dazzle his readers. His later years were watched over by Mlle Read, "Mademoiselle ma gloire," who undertook the publication of his posthumous works.

See: E. Gréclé, Jules Barbey d'Aurevilly (1902–1904); Les Cahiers aurevilliens (1933), published by the Société Barbey d'Aurevilly; A. Marie, Le Connétable des lettres, Barbey d'Aurevilly (1939). There is a "Musée Barbey d'Aurevilly" at Saint-Sauveur-le-Vicomte, where Barbey was buried.

M. M.

Barbusse, Henri (1873–1935, French novelist, journalist, and political writer), was born at Asnières near Paris and died in Moscow during a trip made at the invitation of the Russian government. He made his début in journalism with the Siècle in 1889 and became the protégé of Catulle Mendès (q.v.), whose youngest daughter he married. The following works were published: Pleureuses (1895), poems of a bizarre inspiration; Les Suppliants (1903), a novel; L'Enfer (1908; Eng. tr., The Inferno, 1918), a novel showing an obsession with the sexual instincts and death; Nous autres (1914; Eng. tr., We Others, 1918), a collection of tales inspired by pity for human stupidity and suffering, together with extreme sentimentality towards animals. None of these books had any success, and Barbusse had to get a living by serving as editor of a popular magazine, Je sais tout. The war was needed to bring him public notice, and it found him in a Swiss sanatorium. In August, 1914, fired by patriotism, Barbusse enlisted and, in spite of a new threat of tuberculosis, succeeded in being sent to the trenches. This in itself is meritorious, but biographers of Barbusse have unduly eulogized his record at the front with no more sense of responsibility than the biographers of Dorgelès (q.v.) and, in the following decade, those of Erich Maria Remarque (q.v.). Barbusse could not stand the hard life under fire and broke down; he also lost the illusions he owed to his utter ignorance of the realities of war. When recuperating in Paris, sometime in 1916, he wrote a war book, Le Feu, with the subtitle Journal d'une escouade, which was published as a serial in the daily Œuvre, beginning in August, 1916. Later, in December, it appeared in book form just in time to be considered for the Goncourt prize. It won the prize for 1916, and if its success was great with some readers, it caused a great scandal with others. It was a brutal piece of realism, the consequence of shattered illusions. Its partial and one-sided presentation of life at the front aroused protests. There are no officers in the book, only privates with their one corporal—no spring, no summer, only a perpetual winter. The applause was, however, louder than the protests, because those ugly pictures were a welcome change from the unreality and optimism of Gaspard, the war novel that had received the Goncourt prize the year before. Le Feu (Eng. tr., Under Fire, 1917) remains the best seller among French war books. Its success oriented the author towards social questions. He founded the Clarté group and took the part of a leader in anti-war propaganda colored with socialism and later with communism. His later books benefited from the success of Le Feu, but they do not rank above his earlier works. L'Enfer was presented anew to the public and had then its first success. Clarté (1919; Eng. tr., Light, 1919) was a second attempt at depicting the war, with increased prejudice. Les Enchaînements (1925; Eng. tr., Chains, 1925) is a lengthy string of episodes marking the evolution of civilization and culminating in an episode of the war in 1915. Force (1926) and Jésus (1927; Eng. tr., 1927) are his last works.

See: H. Hertz, Henri Barbusse (1919); J. N. Cru, Témoins (1929), pp. 555-565.

J. N. C.

Barlach, Ernst (1870-1938, German dramatist, sculptor, and designer), was born at Wedel in Holstein, the son of a country physician. Because of the early death of his father his education was somewhat irregular, but he eventually succeeded, in 1891, in being admitted to the Academy of Arts at Dresden to study sculpture and design. For 15 years after 1895 he traveled extensively, lived in Hamburg, Berlin, and many other German cities and visited Russia and Italy. Of these trips the stay in Russia in 1906 was decisive, for there he learned "a Christian humility towards all things." In 1910 Barlach established himself permanently at Güstrow, an old Mecklenburg town, famous for its magnificent cathedral. There he lived in solitude and almost complete seclusion until his death.

To speak of Barlach the dramatist is to speak of Barlach the sculptor and designer as well. His characters and figures alike bring back to the mind the great figures of the Romanesque and early Gothic period. With his lithographic illustrations made for some of his plays he achieved an almost perfect unity of the two arts. It was no vain ambition to achieve a double distinction but an eager urge for confession that created the plays of the sculptor Barlach.

Although many literary critics see a representative of expressionism in him, he himself wanted his dramatic characters interpreted as real people, not as visions or reflections of his own condition. It remains true that when he wrote for the theatre he often tried to push forward into metaphysics. His is the old Faustian tradition, emerging here against a Mecklenburg background, and also reminding us of the romanticists Hoffmann and Arnim or even of the strange visions of William Blake. Only his first drama, Der tote Tag (1912), is an allegoric story of a son who wants unsuccessfully to break away from his mother, because he perceives the creative paternal spirit in the world outside. The same tension between the world and God, the maternal and paternal powers, is repeated in the plays that followed. His strongest drama, Der arme Vetter (1918), reflects this contrast, and the same theme can be found in Die echten Sedemunds (1920), Der Findling (1922), and Der blaue Boll (1926). In Die Sündflut (1924) the contrast is expressed in biblical terms: the pious Noah and the refractory Calan contend for God. Some of these plays with their mixture of mysticism, realism, and grotesque humor are surprisingly effective. Barlach himself was a Faustian seeker who was always driven by his longing for God. Tied to the earth he wanted to share in infinity, in order to save himself from resignation or despair.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4 Auflage (1927), pp. 742-747; Barlach, Ein selbsterzähltes Leben (1930); J. Bithell, Modern German Literature, 1880-1938 (1939), pp. 450-451.

H. Sch.

Baroja y Nessi, Pío (1872-, Spanish novelist), was born at San Sebastián in the Basque Provinces. He graduated as doctor of medicine from the University of Madrid and for two years was municipal physician of a small Basque town. Because the practice of medicine did not appeal to him he finally gave it up and after some experiences in a small bakery business devoted himself to writing. His first work, Vidas sombrías, a collection of charming literary sketches, appeared in 1900. In 1934 he was elected to the Spanish Academy. He lived with his mother until her death (1935) and has never married.

The list of Baroja's publications consists of some 80 titles, of which all are novels except for about a dozen volumes of essays (e.g., El tablado de Arlequin, 1904; Nuevo tablado de Arlequin, 1917; La caverna del humorismo, 1919; Divagaciones apasionadas, 1924) and other miscellaneous writings, among them the autobiographical Juventud, egolatría (1917; Eng. tr., Youth and Egotry, 1920). Baroja's idea of the novel, however, is elastic enough for him to have included in it all his ideology and all his emotional reactions. In his own words, "it is a sack capable of containing everything," a definition which aptly characterizes the author's type of novel. As to the nature of that ideology, it reflects its double source of inspiration, namely, an exalted spirit of individualism and, in spite of Baroja's rich humoristic vein, a deeply rooted pessimistic sense of life. The two aspects complement each other. It means that, life being the mess of conventions that it is, the highest value goes to the individual, and precisely to the individual strong enough to affirm himself against that mess of conventions. In search of this type of individual, Baroja has descended into the more spontaneous and primitive world of the vagabond, the adventurer, the rebel, and all the picturesque variety of the golfo and the picaro and has embodied in such heroes the spirit of rebelliousness and of protest against social abuses, against the church and the state. In their free and dynamic personalities he has also embodied the ideal of a life of action, in which the quiet, sedentary, and intellectual Baroja likes to project his dreams of happiness. It can hardly be said, however, that any of his heroes measures up to the standards of a superman. In the end it is effective will power and a really constructive purpose that they lack. They are thus condemned to final ruin. Though Baroja's novel abounds in such ideological and subjective elements, it is above all as a realistic picture of life, and of Spanish life in particular, that it imposes itself. The picture is an unconventional and a crude one, and to the full rendering of this realistic and vital effect Baroja's novel, with its loose composition, episodic character, and simple and familiar language, is particularly well suited.

The bulk of Baroja's novelistic production can be grouped into two main divisions, the trilogies and the Memorias de un hombre de acción. The reason for the grouping into trilogies is obvious in the case of La lucha por la vida, Agonías de nuestro tiempo, and La selva oscura, the three novels of each being in reality three parts of the same novel. In the other instances the reason is more conventional than real—sometimes only two of the novels are related, as in the trilogies El pasado, La raza, and La vida fantástica, sometimes the three novels are independent of each other, as in Tierra vasca and Las ciudades. El mar is a tetralogy, and only two of the novels are related. Though the basic traits of Baroja's personality as a novelist are present in each and all of the novels of these trilogies, the particular kind of novel itself varies somewhat. A good example of the realistic novel is to be seen in the vivid picture of the Madrid underworld in La lucha por la vida, comprising La busca, Mala hierba, and Aurora roja (1904; Eng. tr., The Quest, 1922; Weeds, 1923; Red Dawn, 1924). The philosophic novel is best represented by the somewhat autobiographical El árbol de la ciencia (1911; Eng. tr., The Tree of Knowledge, 1928). As a psychological novel Camino de perfección (1902) deserves mention. Baroja's free play of imagination and good sense of humor are well illustrated in Aventuras, inventos y mixtificaciones de Silvestre Paradox (1901) and Paradox, rey (1906; Eng. tr., Paradox, King, 1931). A good example of the would-be Nietzschean superman who finally ends in ruin is offered in César o nada (1910; Eng. tr., Caesar or Nothing, 1919). An equally good example of the adventurer type is to be seen in Zalacain el aventurero (1909). As to the Memorias de un hombre de acción, it is a series of 22 historical novels covering, though fragmentarily, the first half of the 19th century. The main hero is a second uncle of Baroja's mother, the liberal-minded and adventurous Eugenio de Aviraneta, who played a significant role in many of the political events and intrigues of the time. Two of the novels in the series, all of which can be read separately, are among the author's best—El aprendiz de conspirador (1913) and El escuadrón del Brigante (1913). Baroja wrote also in a separate volume the biography of his hero, Aviraneta, o la vida de un conspirador (1931).

See: J. Ortega y Gasset, El espectador, I

(1916), 129-205; Andrenio (E. Gómez de Baquero), Novelas y novelistas (1918), pp. 113-216; F. de Onís, "Pío Baroja," Nosotros, LIX (1926), 171-182; C. Barja, Literatura española: Libros y autores contemporáneos (1935), pp. 299-359; Demuth Helmut, Pío Baroja: Das Weltbild in seinen Werken (1937).

C. B.

Barrès, Maurice (1862-1923, French novelist, essayist, journalist, and politician), was born at Charmes-sur-Moselle in Lorraine and died at Neuilly-sur-Seine near Paris. He came to be recognized as one of the two or three most prominent French writers of his time. His first article appeared in a Nancy newspaper in 1881. He left his native province for Paris, where he was to spend the major part of his life, and began to write for several Parisian reviews. He founded one himself, Les Taches d'encre (November, 1884-February, 1885), but it was through a humorous pamphlet, Huit Jours chez M. Renan (1885), that he finally attracted the attention of the Paris literary circles. The success of his first novel, Sous l'œil des barbares (1888), was partly due to a favorable review by Paul Bourget, who sensed the budding genius of the young author. With Un Homme libre (1889) and Le Jardin de Bérénice (1891) this volume formed the trilogy entitled Le Culte du moi. These three books, of unequal value, contain a number of passages with deep and clear insight into human psychology, cast in a graceful, fluid, and musical language. Their subject is the fascinating investigation of the inner life of a young man who admits but one reality, his own self. However, this egotist begins to meditate on society when he realizes that he cannot cultivate and enrich his personality without communing with his fellow men, whom he professes to despise. The next book of Barrès was L'Ennemi des lois (1893).

Having discovered that his "individual soul" was dependent on the "collective soul," Maurice Barrès was led first to accept his own limitations, next to convince himself of the predominance of instinct over reason, finally to believe that French energies would be best revived through the cult of provincial and national traditions and reverence for the soil and the dead. Hence his passage from dream to action, his evolution from pure egotism to regionalism and nationalism. This new aspect of the philosophy of Barrès is illustrated and dramatized in a second trilogy, Le Roman de l'énergie nationale, which includes Les Déracinés (1897), L'Appel au soldat (1900), and Leurs Figures (1903). Les Déracinés is the story of seven Lorrainers whose lives turn out to be failures because, according to the author, they have been "uprooted" by college education. The book, packed with social and philosophical digressions, has been one of the most influential, and also most discussed, of modern French literature. Like his Scènes et doctrines du nationalisme (1902), a collection of articles and essays dealing primarily with the Dreyfus case, L'Appel au soldat and Leurs Figures were directly inspired by the author's personal experiences in public life. Having been elected deputy of Nancy as early as 1889, he had already played an important role in national politics.

But Barrès also sought inspiration in foreign lands. Two collections of tales and essays, Du sang, de la volupté, de la mort (1894), and Amori et Dolori Sacrum (1903), the morbid and sensual character of which is accurately suggested by the titles, are the results of travels in Spain and Italy. In these books the author appears again as a peerless artist, dilettante, and romantic seeker of violent sensations. His now well-developed ego, immensely enriched, remains the real subject matter of these as well as of some subsequent works. Inspired by travels abroad are also his Le Voyage de Sparte (1905), Greco, ou le Secret de Tolède (1912), Un Jardin sur l'Oronte (1922), which is a delightful short novel, and Une Enquête aux pays du Levant (1923). His third trilogy, Les Bastions de l'Est (Au service de l'Allemagne), 1905; Colette Baudouche; histoire d'une jeune fille de Metz, 1909, Eng. tr., Colette Baudouche; the Story of a Young Girl of Metz, 1918; Le Génie du Rhin, 1921), is a logical sequence to the novel of national energy. Maurice Barrès, who at the age of eight had seen his home occupied by the enemy and his father and his grandfather taken as hostages, devoted the greater part of his life to the building of those "bastions" or intellectual fortresses meant to protect French civilization from any threatening foreign influences—or armed forces. A book like Les Amitiés françaises (1903) as well as numberless speeches and articles had similar aims.

Among other important works of Barrès must also be mentioned La Colline inspirée (1913; Eng. tr., The Sacred Hill, 1929), a fascinating lyrical and symbolical novel; La Grande Pitié des églises de France (1914), a collection of speeches in Parliament; and Le Mystère en pleine lumière (1924), a posthumous collection of short stories. Barrès himself, and some critics with him, regarded his Chronique de la Grande Guerre (1920-1924) as the most beautiful and deserving of his works. It consists of 14 volumes of collected articles dealing with current events during the war, from 1914 to 1918. Finally, 11 volumes of Mes Cahiers, his journal from 1896 to 1918, have also been published posthumously, from 1929 to 1938. These are essential for a full understanding and appreciation of his life and work.

Primarily Maurice Barrès must be considered a great literary artist, an original writer who has created a style of his own and whose influence on young intellectuals has been twofold, in some cases purely literary, in others both literary and ideological. Barrès endowed words and ideas with such an intense life, he marked them with such a personal stamp, that some soon became as inseparable from his name as they were to be from the history of modern thought and literature in France. This applies particularly to le culte du moi, i.e., the best expression of rugged individualism; the theme of les déracinés and that of la terre et les morts, which are fundamental elements of regionalism; and le nationalisme, destined to be the rallying doctrine of all reactionary forces during the last decade of the 19th century. More specifically his main concerns were the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France and, after the First World War, the problem of the Rhineland, considered as a check to the expansion of Pan-Germanism. Toward the end of his life he was widely respected as a sincere and great patriot. Even among his political opponents many admired the man who had tempered his traditionalism and finally given up polemics in an effort to further the realization of national unity during the war.

See: R. Jacquet, Notre Maître, Maurice Barrès (1900); H. Bremond, "L'Évolution littéraire de Maurice Barrès," Revue des deux mondes, February 15, 1908, pp. 790-824; V. Giraud, Les Maîtres de l'heure: Maurice Barrès (1918); E. R. Curtius, Maurice Barrès und die geistigen Grundlagen des französischen Nationalismus (1921); A. Thibaudet, La Vie de Maurice Barrès (1921).

A. V. R.

Barrili, Anton Giulio (1836-1908, Italian novelist), was born in Savona, but spent most of his life in Genoa. His love of that city and of the Ligurian coast appears in many of his books. In the course of his long life he was a journalist, a professor of literature, a deputy, a soldier in Garibaldi's army, but above all a writer of fiction.

His short stories have an extraordinary grace of style. Their humor, good taste, and great charm brought him at once innumerable readers and made the fortune of his publisher, Treves. Young Italians of Barrili's day were not troubled by what Croce (q.v.) calls Barrili's superficiality, nor by his indulgence in digressions. They were immediately delighted by the heroes and heroines of his love stories, who responded to the secret longings of their hearts. The best known of these tales are Capitan Dodèro (1865), Santa Cecilia (1866), Val d'Olivì (1873), Come un sogno (1875), L'Olmo e l'edera (1877). Capitan Dodèro is still read and was translated into English (The Adventures of Captain Dodèro) in 1920. Santa Cecilia, which deals with a mad organ-grinder, became so popular that every organ-grinder in Genoa was known by the name of its hero.

The faults that Croce finds in Barrili's novels appear also in the story of his campaign days with Garibaldi, Con Garibaldi alle porte di Roma (1895), which is a recital of adventures such as war correspondents have made popular today. The portrait of Garibaldi is written with an intensity of emotion and interest that appear nowhere else in Barrili's writings. Other heroes of Italian history also caught his imagination, and he wrote novels about them. Sorrisi di gioventù (1898) represents, the author says, the smiles of his youth without the tears. There are few tears in Barrili, but much charm, many happy endings and sentimental dreams, which, if they do not lead to the highest literary pinnacles, enable the reader to share in a pleasant nostalgia.

G. B.

Bartrina, Joaquín María (1850-1880, Spanish poet and journalist), is the voice of doubt, disillusionment, and pessimism in the so-called philosophical school of poetry. He was born at Reus in Catalonia and received his early schooling there. Obligated in his youth to assist in the support of the family, he did not enjoy a university education, but he satisfied his desire for knowledge through wide if desultory reading. Before long he gained prominence in local literary circles as a dynamic journalist and forceful poet. His first collected poems, Páginas de amor, already reveal skepticism and independence in his interpretation of emotion and human values in general. Evident, too, is his philosophic approach to poetry. His best-known work, Algo (1876), underlines his point of view which led him to seek the meaning of life in terms of reason and the senses. Like other youths of his generation, he was disappointed in the capacity of knowledge to reveal absolute truth, and this made him skeptical and pessimistic. While on occasion he expresses doubt about the material world and scientific progress, in the main his spiritual discomfort derives from his inability to be sustained by faith. Soul, spirit, and conscience mean little to him, but equally meaningless are all forms of human behavior which he sees, as it were, in terms of physiology and biochemistry.

Beneath the banter and irony of his tone, Bartrina is essentially sincere in the expression of his perplexities. His sincerity and his stylistic ingenuity, which is at times more prosaic than poetic, earned for him a rank among the poets of the 19th century in spite of his scant production. After his death, his friend J. Sardá published his collected works—Obras en prosa y verso (1881). The volume Algo still enjoys wide circulation in Catalonia.

See: J. Roca y Roca, Memoria biográfica de Joaquín María Bartrina y d'Aixemús (1916?).

H. C. B.

Basterra, Ramón de (ca. 1887–1928, Spanish poet), concerned with both past and future of things Hispanic, wrote with equal fervor about Basque seigniorial and Catholic tradition and about the novelties of the machine age. The scion of a wealthy Bilbao family, he studied in Germany and saw diplomatic service in Rumania, Rome, and Venezuela. His prose studies, La obra de Trajano (1921) and Una empresa del siglo XVIII: Los navíos de la ilustración (1925), recall his constant pursuit of the centrifugal culture of Spain.

In successive books Basterra's thought—all important in his poetry—becomes more inclusive and moves westward under the dome of Greater Spain which, for him, arches over the Occident from Rome to Manila, "the fringe of the sky." Las ubres luminosas (1923) records a pilgrimage to Rome. It is a paean of praise to the Mother City ("most illustrious of wolves") from whom Spain inherits her culture. La sencillez de los seres (1923) is a tribute to the people of northern, and especially Basque, Spain. Los labios del monte (1924) is a panoramic glorification of their defense of the Catholic faith, from the Reconquest down.

The "Virulo" of Basterra's last two books represents the peripatetic poet himself. In the morning of Virulo, mocedades (1924) he starts west for the mechanized world of the Hispanic present and future; his finger "turns the pages of the horizons", "tunes the meridians." Virulo, mediodía (1927) finds him at noon in the heart of modernity. His poetry no longer has the classicism of Las ubres luminosas or the romanticism of La sencillez de los seres and Los labios del monte. It is pneumatic, "inflated with the air of the day." It is charged with neo-baroque figures: the sky of the Occident is now "a parasol whose ribs are the meridians." The poet is now "the Aesop of the Machine"; the characters in his fables—a plane, a crane, a truck—"do not speak with jaws, mouths, or beaks, but with escapes, valves, and horns." The book is brilliant, audacious, sometimes puzzling. Its use of image and metaphor displays an inventiveness, worthy of its theme, which allies Basterra to the vanguard poets of his day.

See: A. Valbuena Prat, La poesía española contemporánea (1930); F. de Onís, Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, 1882–1932 (1934).

D. K. A.

Bataille, Henry (1872–1922, French playwright and poet), born in Nîmes, entered the Ecole des Beaux Arts in 1890 to study painting. Four years later, influenced by Robert d'Humières, with whom he had written La Belle au bois dormant (1894), he made his début as a dramatist. From 1900 to 1914 Henry Bataille was the most celebrated of the French playwrights. Both the public and the critics praised L'Enchantement (1900), Le Masque (1902), Maman Colibri (1905), Poliche (1906), La Femme nue (1908), Le Scandale (1909), La Vierge folle (1910), L'Enfant de l'amour (1911), Les Flambeaux (1912). In 1913 Le Phalène, too obviously inspired by the life of Marie Bashkirtseff, was violently discussed. Three plays, L'Amazone (1916), L'Animateur (1920), and La Chair humaine (1922), mark an evolution towards the theatre of ideas. L'Homme à la rose (1920) offered variations on the theme of Don Juan. La Tendresse (1921) and La Possession (1921) are the last manifestations of a great talent which had gradually degenerated.

The weakness of Bataille's theatre is partly due to the fact that it is the reflection of a period which belongs already to the past. Many of his plays were inspired directly and exclusively by contemporary events and have become dated very rapidly. A romanticist by nature, Bataille felt, moreover, a morbid attraction for exceptional and often repulsive characters. His best dramas are excellent psychological studies of irrepressible passions. They contain powerful scenes, but suffer from an excess of lyricism and from artificialities of style, factors contributing in no small measure to the partial oblivion into which they have already fallen. As a poet Bataille wrote La

Chambre blanche (1895), Le Beau Voyage (1905), La Divine Tragédie (1917), La Quadra-ture de l'amour (1920). Some of his opinions on dramatic art can be found in Ecrits sur le théâtre (1917). L'Enfance éternelle (1922) contains autobiographical data.

See: D. Amiel, Henry Bataille (1912) and Le Règne intérieur (1912); P. Lièvre, "Henry Bataille," Marges, XV (1918), 203-212; Herse, May-June, 1921 (special number); P. Blanchart, Henry Bataille; son œuvre (1922); L. Lemonnier, "Le Théâtre d'Henry Bataille," Grande Revue, CVIII (1922), 244-262; G. de Catalogne, Henry Bataille, ou le Romantisme de l'instinct (1925); E. Scillière, L'Évolution morale dans le théâtre d'Henry Bataille (1936).
M. E. C.

Baty, Gaston (1885-, French theatrical director and producer), was born at Pélussin, Loire, and studied at the University of Lyon, where he became interested in the traditional puppet theatres. In 1919, steeped in the theories of Gordon Craig, Adolphe Appia, Georg Fuchs, and Meyerhold, he began to help Firmin Gémier stage vast productions at the Cirque d'Hiver and the Comédie Montaigne. His "Compagnons de la Chimère," formed in 1922, wandered from theatre to theatre until they settled in the small Studio des Champs-Élysées (1924), performing such experimental, and often expressionistic, plays as J. J. Bernard's (q.v.) Martine, S. Gantillon's Maya, and J. V. Pellerin's (q.v.) Têtes de rechange. Finally the Baty company (probably the best ensemble group in Paris) found the Théâtre Montparnasse, famous for its use by André Antoine (q.v.). Constantly protesting against the all-importance of the dramatist's text, he naturally became the godfather of the "theatre of the unexpressed" of Denys Amiel (q.v.), J. J. Bernard, et al. and strove to enrich his repertory with free adaptations of such novels as Madame Bovary (1936), Manon Lescaut (1938), Crime and Punishment (1932-1933), and Don Quixote (1938-1939). Unlike the other contemporary metteurs en scène (Dullin, Jouvet, Pitoëff, qq.v.), Gaston Baty likes to "adapt" and stamp each detail of a work with his personality, creating thus a series of controversial spectacles which he defends in his essays and prefaces.

See: P. Blanchart, Gaston Baty (1939); A. Villeroy, Dix Ans de théâtre: De la Comédie Montaigne au Théâtre Pigalle (1930).

J. O'B.

Baudelaire, Charles Pierre (1821-1867, French poet and critic), was born in Paris and spent most of his life there. Soon after his elderly father's death, in 1827, his mother married Colonel Aupick, whom Baudelaire found a difficult and unsympathetic stepfather. After his school years at Lyon and then at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand in Paris, Baudelaire enjoyed a brief period of independence and began his literary career. In 1841 his family sent him off on a long sea voyage, supposedly to India; he returned, however, in less than a year, after short stays on the islands of Mauritius and Bourbon (Réunion). Inheriting his father's fortune on his coming of age, he lived for a time the life of a rich young dandy. But his family, alarmed by the rapidity with which his fortune was disappearing, encumbered him with a financial guardianship. From then on he was burdened with debts, in constant difficulties with publishers and printers, forever moving from one miserable lodging to another. His life was further complicated by his liaison with the mulatto Jeanne Duval, to whom he remained attached for many years. Many of his poems were inspired by her; others belong to a period of idealized devotion to Mme Sabatier, and still others to a brief liaison with the actress Marie Daubrun. After the death of his stepfather in 1857, Baudelaire found some respite from increasing ill-health and financial difficulties in stays with his mother at Honfleur. In 1864 he set out on his unfortunate lecture tour in Belgium. Struck down there by paralysis in 1866, he was brought back to Paris, where he died in 1867.

In Les Fleurs du mal (1857) Baudelaire brought together poems on which he had been at work for years, many of which had already appeared in periodicals. The appearance of the volume brought on a trial which resulted in Baudelaire's condemnation for an offense against public morals and the suppression of six of the hundred poems. The second edition (1861) added 35 new poems, and the posthumous edition of 1868 25 more. In the Petits Poèmes en prose (1869), most of which had been published during Baudelaire's lifetime, he developed a new form, a spontaneous and natural poetic prose which allowed him more freedom, more detail, than the traditional versification of his earlier poems.

Baudelaire's affiliation with his predecessors, with the Pléiade and Racine as well as with the romantics, is plain, and his passion for perfection of form allies him to the Parnassian poets. But his poetry is intensely personal, marked with a desperate sincerity. The struggle between good and evil, the efforts and failures of the faltering will, the dark and devious attempts to escape from spleen and despair, the passionate devotion to beauty, cry out from the depths of this poetry. Baudelaire's external world is as distinctive as his inner one—the great city with its sordid streets and crowded houses, the vast expanses of sea and sky, the tropical sights and sounds and smells of his early voyage. For him nature is a great storehouse of images; the outer and inner worlds are bound together by mysterious correspondences, not merely between the different senses, but between the visible and invisible worlds. His images are not developed in splendid isolation, like those of the romantic poets, but are symbols in which image and meaning are fused into one. His poetry has a perfection of form and music that gives at times classic simplicity, at times a far-echoing intensity. Undoubtedly the charm is broken sometimes by platitudes, by mediocre lines, by a too heavy and morbid sensualism, but Baudelaire brought to French poetry a dark splendor, a magic density that it had not yet known.

Baudelaire himself said that he considered the poet the best of critics. His own criticism, collected in the two posthumous volumes, Curiosités esthétiques (1868) and L'Art romantique (1869), is almost entirely of his contemporaries, whom he judged with amazing sureness. The art criticism, centered on Delacroix, includes the Salons of 1845, 1846, and 1859, the Exposition de 1855, three articles on caricature (1855–1857), Le Peintre de la vie moderne (1863), and L'Œuvre et la vie d'Eugène Delacroix (1863). In literary criticism there are articles on Poe (1856 and 1857) and Gautier (1859), the series Poètes français (1861–1862), and a number of shorter articles, including one on Madame Bovary (1857). In 1861 Baudelaire made his one excursion into musical criticism, with Richard Wagner et Tannhäuser à Paris. For him criticism is first of all poetic, the translation of an experience, a reflection of the work of art. Then the intelligence comes into play, and he goes on to “transform delight into knowledge” (transformer la volupté en connaissance), to deduce from experience the laws of art, crystallized in his great all-embracing conception of the imagination.

About 1846 Baudelaire discovered Poe, with whom he felt from the first a fraternal affinity. A large part of his literary effort was devoted to his admirable translation of Poe's tales and other works, Histoires extraordinaires (1856), Nouvelles Histoires extraordinaires (1857), Aventures d'Arthur Gordon Pym (1858), Eureka (1864), and Histoires grotesques et extraordinaires (1864). Les Paradis artificiels (1860) comprises an original work, “Poème du haschisch,” and “Confessions d'un mangeur d'opium,” an adaptation of De Quincey's work. After Baudelaire's death the Œuvres posthumes (1887–1907) gathered together early poems, scattered articles, and unfinished sketches, as well as Fusées and Mon Cœur mis à nu, the so-called Journaux intimes. The publication of the Lettres 1840–1866 (1907), Lettres à sa mère (1918), and Dernières Lettres à sa mère (1926) has added much to our knowledge of Baudelaire the man.

Though he died in 1867, one has only to think of Mallarmé and Rimbaud, Claudel and Valéry, Gide and Proust (qq.v.), of Swinburne and Yeats, Pound and Eliot, of Stefan George (q.v.) and Rilke (q.v.), to realize how truly Baudelaire belongs with the moderns.

See: E. and J. Crépet, Charles Baudelaire (1907); G. de Reynold, Charles Baudelaire (1920); J. Pommier, La Mystique de Baudelaire (1932); A. Ferran, L'Esthétique de Baudelaire (1933); M. Gilman, Baudelaire the Critic (1943).

M. G.

Bazin, René (1853–1932, French novelist), was born and brought up at Angers in Anjou. As a boy he was very fond of country life and read many novels of adventures by Maine Reid and tales of Red Indians. He attended the Catholic University of Angers and in 1875 was appointed professor of law at that institution.

His first novel, Stéphanette (1884), was published under the pseudonym Bernard Seigny. Many other novels followed, published under his own name, most of which dealt with country life in Anjou, Poitou, and Vendée. The list includes Une Tache d'encre (1888; Eng. trs., A Blot of Ink, 1892, Ink Stain, 1905), Les Noëlets (1890; Eng. tr., This, My Son, 1909), La Sarcelle bleue (1892), Madame Corentine (1893; Eng. tr., Those of His Own Household, 1914), Humble Amour (1894), De toute son âme (1897; Eng. tr., Redemption, 1897). Particularly successful was a series dealing with the then acute problem of the threatened desertion of the land for the industrial cities: La Terre qui meurt (1899; stage version in 1913), Donatienne (1903; Eng. tr., The Penitent, 1912), Le Blé qui lève (1907; Eng. tr., The Coming Harvest, 1908), La Closerie de Champdolent (1917). Another capital problem which challenged the attention of Bazin was the question of Alsace-Lorraine, in Les Oberlé (1901; stage version in 1912; Eng. tr., The Children of Alsace, 1912), Les Nouveaux Oberlé (1919), and Baltus le Lorrain (1926). This patriotic note was never dissociated from the religious, Roman Catholic note, as well illustrated in the author's last story, Magnificat (1931; Eng. tr., Magnificat, 1932).

Bazin also wrote books in various other fields: La Douce France (1911; Eng. tr., Gentle France, 1913), Charles de Foucauld, explorateur du Maroc, ermite au Sahara (1921; Eng. tr., Charles de Foucauld, Hermit and Explorer, 1923), several collections of short stories, and several accounts of travels in Italy, Spain, and the provinces of France. Étapes de ma vie (1936) was published posthumously.

Bazin is an urbane writer, more serious than brilliant, a conscientious and orthodox workman. He was elected to the French Academy in 1903.

See: A. de Bersaucourt, René Bazin (1906); Charles Bauman, René Bazin (1924); François Mauriac, René Bazin (1931).

A. Sz.

Becher, Johannes Robert (1891–, German poet and novelist), was born in Munich, the son of a judge. He studied philosophy and medicine in Munich, Berlin, and Jena and started his literary career with poetry of the most radically expressionistic kind. His first collection of poems and prose, Verfall und Triumph (1914), is typical of the explosive and chaotic early expressionism which destroyed the traditional language and syntax as a gesture symbolic of the intellectual destruction of the traditional world. With the critical vehemence of his intellectual attitude Becher soon turned to radical politics; he joined the Communist Party at its inception. In his many books as well as in his personal life he remained a fighter for Communism and Soviet Russia.

Characteristic of his poetry are such works as An Europa (1916), Verbrüderung (1916), Gedichte für ein Volk (1917), Päan gegen die Zeit (1918), Ewig im Aufruhr (1920), Am Grabe Lenins (1925), Maschinenrhythmen (1925), and Der grosse Plan: Epos des sozialistischen Aufbaus (1931). He published a selection of his early poems in Ein Mensch unserer Zeit (1930). His ecstatic eruptions are often of great poetic strength, but he sometimes uses his lyric gifts for the mere presentation of lengthy political effusions. He realized himself that this chaotic and erratic type of expression was not easily understood by the masses for whom his poetry was actually written, and gradually he modified his style. Gedichte an Lotte (1920) and Um Gott (1921) are written more calmly. He produced a play about and for the masses (Arbeiter, Bau- ern, Soldaten, 1920), as well as a volume of political prose (Vorwärts, Du rote Front, 1925) and two novels (Der einzig gerechte Krieg, 1925; Der Bankier reitet über das Schlachtfeld, 1925), all serving the same radical tendency. Becher is not only the most constant but also the most vigorous of the "political" poets of the left, yet it is a fact that in his poetry written later in Russia there appears a deep longing for Germany and its culture.

Indeed after his emigration to Russia, where he lived in exile from 1932 to 1945, his poetry also began to show classical and traditional forms, at times even the didactic simplicity of a child's reader. During this period he produced some 20 volumes of poetry and prose, e.g., Neue Gedichte (1933); Des Siegs Gewissheit und Sicht auf grosse Tage; Sonette (1939); Abschied (1940), a novel; Dank an Stalingrad; 53 Balladen (1943). He returned to Germany with the victorious Russian army in 1945 and became president of the Kulturbund zur Demokratischen Erneuerung Deutschlands.

K. P.

Becque, Henry (1837–1899, French dramatist), was born in Paris and lived there all his life. He was the first playwright successfully to introduce in the French theatre certain aspects of the materialism, immorality, and cupidity current in some parts of Parisian society in his day. His emphasis on a minute and truthful observation of life gave a new and important orientation to a French theatre that had been cluttered with sterilizing artificialities.

Becque's family was impecunious. When he finished his schooling at the Lycée Bonaparte (later the Lycée Condorcet), his father, a government clerk, secured work for him in a railroad office. He did not remain there long, but drifted restlessly from post to post. A maternal uncle, a dramatist and collaborator of Labiche, kept alive Becque's interest in the theatre and saw to it that he became acquainted with the Paris theatres, particularly with the Molière repertory at the Comédie Française. An omnivorous reader and a poet who wrote verse all his life, Becque began to give lessons in literature in preference to filling clerical positions. As secretary to a Polish diplomat who encouraged his literary inclinations, Becque met men in public life, artists, and intellectuals; had it not been for his poverty, he would have seriously considered entering the diplomatic service. He wrote the book for an opera, Sardanapale (1868), by a young musician of this milieu. His first serious effort, however, was L'Enfant prodigue (1867), a vaudeville which was favorably received by the critics and which revealed the dexterity in expression and the vivid dramatic sense that were later to be so highly developed. His second play, Michel Pauper (1870), reflected his concern, as he later wrote, "with the innocent and helpless who struggle against force and all tyrannies and injustices." The play is particularly interesting as a commentary on the changing society during the last days of the Second Empire and for the sharply defined characterizations. Becque had to produce this play at his own expense. In 1871 (after service in the Franco-Prussian War) he wrote L'Enlèvement, which failed immediately. Impoverished and discouraged, he worked on the stock exchange for the next few years, but was an active member of the Society of Dramatic and Musical Authors. For a while he eked out a living by writing articles on the theatre for Peuple; he contributed at various times during his life to other newspapers, among them Henri IV, Union républicaine, Figaro, Gaulois, and Matin (see the collection entitled Querelles littéraires, 1890). The entire year of 1877 he devoted to writing his first masterpiece, Les Corbeaux, determined "to defend it against everything." It took him five more years of untiring effort to find a producer for Les Corbeaux. During this time he wrote and had presented two successful short plays, La Navette (1878) and Les Honnêtes Femmes (1880). When Les Corbeaux was finally produced in 1882 at the Comédie Française, it was greeted with both hisses and applause. The resulting controversy was not unlike that aroused by Hugo's Hernani in 1830. In Les Corbeaux the plight of the helpless in the clutch of economic circumstance is again set forth, the helpless being a rich bourgeois family suddenly bereft of the father and at the mercy of former friends who pluck from the mother and daughters all their worldly possessions. The dialogue reflected relentlessly the cupidity and moral weakness of the characters. The play was something new in the French theatre and is still remarkable for its simplicity, for its consistency, for vigorous dramatic effects obtained with the utmost literary economy. Becque's second masterpiece, La Parisienne, was produced in 1885. Here, in even sharper, more brilliant dialogue, Becque presented with complete detachment the immorality of one Parisian wife and her particular milieu. A sardonic humor evolves from the characters who not only naturally accept their deviations from accepted morality but rationalize and moralize about them convincingly. After the usual rejections Becque found a producer and rehearsed the play himself. The première at the Renaissance Theatre was a sensation. The Comédie Française later performed the play, in 1890, but incompetently; it remained for Antoine (q.v.) with the help of a great actress, Réjane, to bring out the full possibilities of the piece. Antoine saw that Becque's dialogue demanded a naturalness and simplicity in acting that were then all but unknown in the French theatre. He systematically cultivated this new acting technique and introduced it in his Théâtre Libre, of which Becque was the literary head. The vitality of the movement Becque inaugurated is evidenced by the dramatists Curel, Brieux, and Courteline (qq.v.), all of whom later made their débuts at the Théâtre Libre.

In focusing attention on moral evils of his time Becque was relentless. Therein lie the strength and the limitations of his theatre. Observations are projected with a new vividness, scrupulous honesty, and plausibility. The illusion of reality is achieved with unusual poignancy; the picture is all black, but the particular characters are true to life, their weaknesses and cupidity could not be otherwise, and their actions follow logically and with the inevitability of a Greek tragedy. That Becque had tenderness and tolerance in him, as well as cynicism, appears in his poetry, maxims, and Notes d'album (see Œuvres complètes, 1924-1926). His qualities of irony and humor and his gift of concision are well represented in Souvenirs d'un auteur dramatique (1895), a collection in which he sets down his tribulations as a dramatist and his opinions of producers, critics, and playwrights.

Despite the controversies to which his plays gave rise, Becque won a substantial literary reputation in France. He was admitted to the Legion of Honor in 1886. He enjoyed society and there gave vent to his exuberance and mordant wit. Though he was accepted as a dramatist of the first rank, he achieved no financial success. There was a strange contrast between the brilliant dramatist, the lion of the literary salons, and the poverty and solitude of his private life. Such was his fierce pride that he declined a pension which the government was willing to grant him after his brother and main support died. Becque's plays were especially successful in Italy, to which country he went in 1893 to lecture. Constant poverty and illness prevented Becque from completing his last play, Les Polischinelles (1910). A few faithful friends placed him in a private sanatorium, where he died May 15, 1899.

See: A. Antoine, Mes Souvenirs sur le Théd-

tre Libre (1921); E. Dawson, Henry Becque; sa vie et son théâtre (1923); A. Arnautovitch, Henry Becque; sa vie et œuvre (1927); L. Jouvett, Réflexions du comédien (1938).

E. B. M.

Bécquer, Gustavo Adolfo (1836–1870), Spanish lyric poet and author of legends and essays in prose, was born in Seville of noble lineage. His father and his uncle were painters. Bécquer spent his early years in Seville, devoted like his brother Valeriano to the study of painting, but soon he decided in favor of literature. In 1854 he transferred to Madrid, where he lived until his death. He married, had children, and always remained in close touch with Valeriano. His training as a painter, his constant reading in the ancient authors and in the Spanish and foreign writers, together with his trips to Toledo and to the region of the Moncayo, are the most important factors in the formation of his spiritual life. He inspired and directed various cultural works and collaborated in magazines and periodicals. On his death, his friends collected his writings from periodicals and still unedited manuscripts: Obras de Gustavo A. Bécquer (2 vols., 1871; 3 vols., 1904). Later, the publication of his works was continued: Páginas desconocidas de Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer (3 vols., 1923). In the National Library of Madrid is conserved a notebook entitled "El libro de los gorriones," which is a holograph manuscript of some of his poetry and prose.

In spite of his early death, he created a work as significant as it is brief. His Rimas soon made him famous in Spain and in Spanish America. His poetry has an anecdotic background that in sentiment and linear quality expresses the poetic decoration of his period. Brief poems reveal his rare moments of felicity, his constant grief, the suffering and the anguish of a sad love, in an atmosphere typical of the years 1850–1870—a balcony with swallows and honeysuckle vines, a tree-shaded walk, a salon with a harp in an obscure corner. Occasionally he deals with an attitude of strolling lovers, or their angry encounter at a ball, or the poet's own room. His contemporaries felt in this anecdotal manner and matter the complete fulfillment of their sentimental aspirations. They found in this poetry, which departed from tragic romantic desperation, the purest conception of the melancholy, sad, and resigned love of their epoch. The anecdote is the decorative, period element which Bécquer utilizes to present a new sentimental life of the heart.

Another theme of the Rimas is poetic creation, felt as a conflict between idea and form which can be solved only by means of the word—an inadequate instrument. Bécquer's idealistic realism is preparing and announcing the symbolistic and impressionistic world. His poetry does not capture the fugacity of the present, nor found itself on sensation, nor become a symbol, but seeks to be as fugitive as the present, as light as sensation, and as secret as the symbol. It is the poetry of a will to be, a wish to be one with the beloved, a desire to give form to the ideal which is felt, significantly, as a dream.

Bécquer gives to his poetry a musical rhythm which is at times almost cantabile. The sonorous material—accents, pauses, accent and phonetic structure of the word—of the verse is in reality not a form for the voice, yet achieves that form thanks to the voice when the personal sentiment of a man or a woman imbues the material with feeling. Just as the musician indicates the tempo of his melody, so Bécquer points out that his poetry should be softly murmured close to the ear of the fair listener, so that with only the slightest interference of the physical the soul may communicate. It is the poetry of the ineffable, of the intangible, which is still not an allusion to reality, which preserves only the lightest impression of that reality, just as the butterfly leaves on the hands that would detain it only "the golden dust that embellishes its wings." Bécquer demands of his reader an active and a collaborative attention.

The Rimas have served as a guide and a stimulus to 20th-century Spanish poetry, and their value is being more and more clarified with the passage of time. Bécquer's prose, on the other hand, has not been looked upon with so much interest; nevertheless it is interesting and has a definite place in the development of 19th-century Spanish prose. Along with his essays—some of which are single and others grouped together by a common theme (Cartas literarias a una mujer) or by the place in which they were written (Cartas desde mi celda)—appear his Leyendas. Although these legends may be narrative or descriptive, they are inspired by the same feeling of mystery which imposes upon all of them a similar pattern of development. Sometimes the mystery expresses the impossibility of capturing the fundamental meaning underlying the creation of life, or the activities of the creative spirit, or the operation of destiny; in other instances, the purgation of sin; and finally, the longing for beauty and love. From the dense shadows which surround him the poet flings himself into the search, representing even in the physical action of his characters the urgency of his spiritual quest. Mystery encircles the earth, hides feelings and things from the profaning glance of the vulgar. At the same time mystery is created by the imagination of the select few with finer sensibilities. Thanks to the imagination, man is transformed into poet, into seer. By means of the imagination, Bécquer succeeds in breaking through the layers of the ordinary daily life of his contemporaries which conceal the virginity of feelings and realities. History is the receptacle of legend. As it recedes from the present, time returns to reality and to life their pristine purity and in this purity lies the essence of their poetry. Imagination is accompanied and is dominated by sentiment. Imagination provides the decoration of his work: brilliant or somber, melancholy or bitter, it forms the labyrinth in which reality is lost; sentiment is the thread of this labyrinth—the constructive element. Bécquer (cf. Pre-Raphaelitism in England, Baudelaire, q.v., in France) enriches the world of the heart and arrives at the moral values through sentiment. He feels death as a form of solitude, of abandon, of oblivion. This solitude is achieved after an extended leave-taking. The feeling that life is a melancholy farewell to time as it passes explains the meaning of his study of types and customs, which do not propose to fix the present, but rather “to preserve the last word of an epoch which is vanishing . . . the [provinces] of which tomorrow there will remain only a confused memory.” The poet should conserve the traces of an epoch which is disappearing, but his supernatural gift consists in being able to construct with his evocative power that which time and the barbarism of men destroy.

A Bécquer paragraph is extensive and rich in harmony. The enumeration, the symmetrical disposition of equal syntactic groups, the pairing of words and of reiterative or antithetical sentences, the repetition of the last word or words of a sentence at the beginning of the next, are the structures to which he resorts in order to give movement and variation to his paragraph. A certain characteristic of style, the use of a trimember group—subjects, verbs, and complements—was to appear later in Valle-Inclán (see A. Alonso, “Estructura de las ‘Sonatas’ de Valle-Inclán,” Verbum, XXI, 6–42). His vocabulary is widely varied and he was proud of his knowledge of technical terms.

See: D. Alonso, “Aquella arpa de Bécquer,” Cruz y raya, June, 1935, pp. 59–104; J. Guillén, “La poética de Bécquer,” Revista hispánica moderna, VIII (New York, 1942), 1–42.

J. C.

Bédier, Joseph (1864–1938, French medievalist and literary historian), though born in Paris, prided himself on his Breton origin (the name Bédier is the Arthurian Beduer, Bedivere) and on the fact that his ancestors, involved in the conspiracy of Cellamare, had emigrated to the Ile de Bourbon (Réunion). Expecting to go into secondary teaching, he graduated from the Ecole Normale Supérieure at 22 and then fell under the influence of the famous Gaston Paris (q.v.), whose brilliant and original pupil he became. To complete his knowledge of Romance philology he went to Germany, where Hermann Suchier guided him in the acquisition of the latest scientific methods. The University of Fribourg, in Switzerland, next offered him a post (while there he edited the Lai de l'Ombre in 1890), which he held until he was recalled to France by the University of Caen. Here at the early age of 27 he presented his theses for the French doctorate and then joined the staff of his alma mater, the Ecole Normale.

The budding medievalist now displayed his scientific temper and perspective by an incursion into the modern field with a volume of studies (Etudes critiques, 1903) on Chateaubriand, Diderot, and the Entretien de Pascal et de M. de Sacy. Fame came to him, however, with his genial reconstruction in classical modern French of the Roman de Tristan et Iseult (1900; first Eng. tr., 1903). Here—at a stroke—the modern troubadour opened up the Middle Ages to the cultivated reading public. Noteworthy is the fact that philology now becomes the handmaid of art and that factual research scores one of its greatest triumphs. This set the pace for all of Bédier's later work.

In 1903, on the death of Gaston Paris, Bédier succeeded him at the Collège de France, an institution which he regarded as the honneur de l'Europe. He now devoted himself to the line of research in which Paris had been so much interested, namely, the Old French epic or chansons de geste. It is characteristic of Bédier that he planned nothing revolutionary. If he came to uphold a view differing toto caelo from his predecessor's, it was due to his unshakable probity (the first asset of a scholar, according to Paris) and his instinctive literary insight. Thus was produced his masterpiece, the four volumes of Les Légendes épiques (1908-1913). Bédier's hypothesis is that the French epic was primarily the product of the 11th century, the age of the Crusades, to which the figure of Charlemagne was a heroic "revival" presented as the Christian champion against the threatening Moham-medan world. Hence, according to Bédier, the Chanson de Roland is not the survival of an epic song contemporaneous with the defeat of the Franks in 778, but an original composition inspired by the enthusiasm for the First Crusade. The background of the chansons de geste he found in the pilgrimage roads to holy places and the monuments (tombs, churches, relics) situated on them, combined with the clerical imagination that was stimulated by them. So arose a new view of medieval literature as expressive of the age from which the extant manuscripts can be dated.

Supplementary to this view is Bédier's stand on textual reconstruction. To him the Chanson de Roland is essentially the poem as preserved in the Oxford manuscript (Digby 23). To "reconstruct" medieval literature on the classical theory of Lachmann appeared to Bédier like reconstructing Chateaubriand's Atala by mingling the "readings" of the three, separate editions made by Chateaubriand. This fresh approach to the problem has had wide repercussion, for instance in Bédier's own critique of Dom Quentin's reconstruction of the Bible. Bédier did not settle the question, but he established the principle that each text is a problem unto itself which cannot be solved by a a priori theory.

Like Gaston Paris, Bédier became administrateur of his institution, at a time when the Collège de France needed new buildings and a progressive policy. He fulfilled this task surprisingly well. Honors poured in on him; in 1920 he was elected to the French Academy. In 1936 he retired from active teaching. The remaining years of his research he devoted to a critical work—never published—on the history of the editions of the Roland.

In appearance Bédier was tall and thin, with clear blue eyes in which were wedded candor and passion, perspicacity and imagination. Shy in manner, with an honesty that refused to compromise, he drove an argument to its basic truth—as in the Dreyfus case, where he became an ardent revisionist. But he was always skeptical of material that he could not himself control. This appears in his Les Fabliaux (1893, often revised), in which he takes an anti-folklore attitude in his advocacy of individual literary composition. Yet, despite this limitation, he remains both a traditionalist (in the Cartesian manner) and an outstanding pioneer in the field of pure scholarship. His many pupils and admirers in France and abroad testify to his abiding influence. In this age of propaganda he remains the exemplar of "the disinterested pursuit of truth."

See: Ferdinand Lot, Joseph Bédier (1939)
W. A. N.

Bedny, Demyan (pseud. of Yefim Pridvorov 1883-, Russian poet), born at Gubovka in the former Government of Kherson, is the oldest poet of Soviet Russia; his Bolshevik verse appeared in St. Petersburg periodicals years before the First World War. Previous to 1917 his reputation was based on his political fables, a genre much in vogue under the tsarist regime, when censorship conditions invited the use of an Aesopian language. In these fables Demyan Bedny managed to dodge the censor with his nimble verses about birds, animals, inanimate objects, and rustic simpletons. Their message was perforce subtle, and the very form of fables dictated brevity and precision. Though a university graduate, Bedny likes to pose as a muzhik and he is, indeed, a master of the colorful folk speech rich in parables, proverbs, unexpected phraseology, and well-aimed epithets.

The Revolution freed Bedny from the fetters of censorship and enabled him to unfold his power fully. It also robbed his verse of subtlety and has rendered it pedestrian and obvious. His services to the Revolution were valuable (he has been decorated several times). Unconcerned about form and hardly sensitive to it, he produced thousands of racy, conversational verses on current issues. He addressed the masses directly on problems of war and of reconstruction, he gave them courage and confidence, entertained them with a bit of coarse humor, whetted their hatred for foreign and inner enemies, and kept them informed, stirred, exhorted, consoled. His agitki (bits of agitation, or propaganda) had a tremendous appeal during the civil war; they were recited and sung by soldiers and workers, they penetrated the remote backwoods of Russia and the thick skulls of the peasants. In more recent times as the Russian public grew more exacting and critical, Demyan Bedny lost his appeal and wrote practically nothing; but with the Second World War his short poems began to appear once more in the periodicals. His verse has been offered to the public in numerous editions.

A. K.

Beer-Hofmann, Richard (1866–1945, Austrian poet, novelist, dramatist), born in Vienna, was most closely associated with Jungwien, the literary group that dominated Austrian letters at the turn of the century. He first attracted public notice in 1893 with a slender volume entitled Novellen, consisting of two short tales, "Das Kind" and "Camelias." These tales betray the influence of Maupassant (q.v.) in subject matter and of Flaubert (q.v.) in style. His earliest lyric, Schlaflied für Miriam (1898), is the finest philosophic lullaby in German. Eternal chords are touched—the dark origin of life and its unknown end, the blind and lonely path that we tread throughout our days, the impossibility of communicating our deepest experiences even to those nearest to us, and the tragic necessity for each generation to recapitulate the past with all its errors and suffering. Yet behind the apparent chaotic structure of the universe, the poet recognizes a mysterious purpose and a certain continuity of existence. Even as each cell is a necessary part of an organ and each organ has a specialized useful function to perform in the entire organism, so each individual is a necessary link in a historical community of fate; each community of fate has a specific way of life and a definite useful task to perform in man's ascent to an ever higher level of culture. In the poet's only novel, Der Tod Georgs (1900), this realization comes to the hero as, in the presence of death, he broods on the meaning of life; he is wrested from his self-centered existence as an aesthetic epicurean and whirled into the midst of his people's struggle for justice.

In Der Graf von Charolais (1904), Beer-Hofmann's first and best-known play, the hero, who sees the brittleness of all human relations and the instability of all human emotions, retains to the end his unshakable faith in the bonds linking parents and children to one another. This continuity of existence remains, though all else fails. Our psychic configuration is molded by the past of our ethnic kind and it, in turn, determines the way of life to be lived by our remotest descendants.

Beer-Hofmann was of Jewish origin, and his approach to eternal problems is essentially biblical. His thoughts are ever directed toward God, and his visions are reminiscent of the prophets of the Old Testament. In a biblical trilogy he seeks to restate for modern man the Hebraic position on fundamental questions. The first part, Jaakobs Traum (1918), depicts the inner crisis of Jacob, the legendary ancestor of the Jews, during the memorable night at Bethel, when he accepts for himself and his offspring the blessing and the burden of the blessing offered him by God. The second part of the trilogy, Der junge David (1933), deals with the testing of David, the descendant of Jacob. Completed shortly before Hitler's rise to power, this play gives the Hebraic answer to Nazi ideology: just as it does not pay for an individual to live solely for himself, so too it does not pay ("Es lohnt nicht!") for a people to think primarily in terms of its own aggrandizement. An individual is valuable only to the extent of his contribution to the well-being of other individuals. A people is important only in so far as it confers its creative gifts upon others, coordinating its own welfare with that of humanity at large. Deprived of this constructive urge, man is but dung of the earth and a people but dust of history.

In 1939 Beer-Hofmann was forced to leave his native land and emigrated to New York. In his 75th year, in 1941, the poet collected in a slender volume, Verse, all his lyric production that he cared to see preserved. A new aspect of his creativeness came to the fore on American soil in 1944 in the impressionistic sketches Aus dem Fragment Paula: Herbstmorgen in Oesterreich. The poet, who had heretofore spoken only through the masks of his dramatic and fictional heroes, attempted to recapture the autumnal mood of Austria as it interpenetrated his own life and shaped his own personality.

See: R. Reik, Das Werk Richard Beer-Hofmanns (1919); S. Liptzin, Richard Beer-Hofmann (1936, in English).

S. L.

Belgian literature in Flemish. When the southern Netherlands were separated from the northern provinces, at the end of the 16th century, the intellectual as well as the economic center of the Lowlands moved to the north. For 200 years Flemish literature was reduced to pietist writings of sometimes inane sentimentality and ridiculously detailed symbolism. Literary expression died out. Immediately after the creation of an independent Belgium in 1830, it was revived by the prolific novelist Hendrik Conscience (q.v.). His sentimental nationalism, based on what Flanders had achieved in the Middle Ages and on the story of its revolt against tyranny in the 16th century, brought about a renaissance of literary activity. About 1860 his work was well under way, and a number of writers had sprung up who created a literary "climate" in which the fundamental trends of Flemish letters were already plainly visible—a constant tendency toward cozy provincialism, which finds its expression in the peasant novel, and, on the other hand, a definite longing for universality which uses social and psychological elements. At times these two tendencies intermingle.

About 1880 the majority of the reading public in Flanders belonged to the rural Catholic population. In their struggle against linguistic inequality in the new state, and as a means of self-defense, they took comfort in their local characteristics, their picturesque way of life, their verbal particularities, all of which were employed to prove that Flanders and the Flemish language had a right to exist. Therefore it was quite natural as well as fashionable for the writers of the second half of the 19th century to depict the amenities of life on the farm and in the country in the most lively colors, to exalt the virtues of the rustics, to underline their habits, their wit, and their customs, and to represent them as a touchstone to guarantee the language and personality of the Flemish people. The cult of local expression and idiosyncrasy led to an acute provincialism which manifested itself in the use of dialectic forms and in an opposition to the generally accepted medium of a standard Netherlandish language.

All these handicaps, however, were brilliantly overcome by the one poet of universal stature Flanders produced in the last century, the priest Guido Gezelle (q.v.). He embodied the pure gothic spirit; he looked at nature and its botanic details as the miniaturists of the Middle Ages did and with absolute faith in his metaphysical certainties he attained to a mystical familiarity with the Creator which made his art appear as the last flowering of Middle Age devotion. His verse is purely lyrical, although he seldom referred to his personal life, which was at bottom difficult and not devoid of the tragic. Most of his poems deal with the feasts and ceremonies of the Church or with the rural Flemish landscape. They have a charming simplicity and directness and a warmth which was never equaled in Dutch letters except in the 14th century. Nevertheless, he wrote his best poetry on those occasions when he broke the restraint his clerical functions imposed upon him—his verse is then of a very high lyrical quality. It has the unerring musical perfection of the best Lieder. He was, indeed, the perfect example of the Franciscan poet, for never was so much joy derived from nature without evident sensuality, never was there in Dutch literature a character as simple in its unity, as forceful in its lyrical power. Reacting against verbose pomposity and pedantic metrical rules, Gezelle adopted an extremely versatile meter for which he found inspiration in the English and Scotch poets. His poems abound in subtle, elegant onomatopoeia, in graceful alliterations, and follow a strictly personal rhythm. Many of them would fit the later formula of "la poésie pure."

A great linguist, he made such an excellent translation (1886) of Longfellow's Hiawatha that it became familiar to all Flemish readers. It took his countrymen and the Dutch some time to recognize his significance, to find out his exceptional stature. His localisms had constituted a barrier for both groups, his uncompromising and enthusiastic Catholicism was another. When about 1880 he was introduced to the general public in Holland, his plea for a predominance of the West Flanders tongue was already lost, but he had become the outstanding example of a writer who by the mere contemplation and idealistic description of rural beauties had achieved greatness and even universal recognition. Although some of his poems (e.g., "Dien Avond en die Rooze," That Evening and That Rose; and "O 't ruischen van het Ranke Riet," O Rustling of the Rushes' Throng) have been translated carefully into English, like all great lyrical work, they remain essentially unrenderable.

Parallel to Conscience's enthusiastic prose was the sudden romantic burst of national feeling expressed in the poems of Albrecht Rodenbach (1856–1880). He was the herald of the Flemish political revival. His turbulent, ebullient inspiration was a combination of classicism and Germanic lyricism. Having produced a number of songs and recitation pieces on historical themes and an unfinished drama in verse, Gudrun (1882), he died very young, a great promise, a symbol of idealistic youth.

Against the rural idealism of Conscience and Gezelle there reacted a few minor realists like August Snieders (1825–1904) and Domien Sleenckx (1818–1901); a charming essayist, Anton Bergmann (1835–1874); and the interesting novelist, Virginie Loveling (1836–1923). Except for the last-named, their writings had little power in their realism, and their style was conservative and often dull.

It took the revival of Dutch letters, about 1880, to provoke a definite emancipation of Flemish literature. This renewal was prepared by a transitional writer of great dynamism, Pol de Mont (1857–1931), a moderately sensual, highly lyrical, and musical poet who was a true internationalist in his thoughts and a genuine symbolist in his expression. He was the first writer in many decades to feel and speak with the freedom of a well-educated heathen, but this attitude, although closer than that of anybody else in Flanders to the main currents of European thought and sensibility, was never expressed in an aggressive fashion. He discovered and heralded Gezelle's poetry in Holland and in Flanders. He wrote Rijzende Sterren (1879; Rising Stars) and Lentesotternijen (1881; Spring Follies).

In the 1890's a new generation of writers came to the fore. They rallied around a monthly called Van Nu en Straks (Today and Tomorrow) which was definitely internationalist and liberal in its program. The driving spirit, the philosopher of the movement, was August Vermeylen (q.v.), a forceful critic with generous views; the literary theorician of the movement was Prosper van Langendonck (1862-1920), a somber, weak, romantic poet; but its real creative geniuses were Cyriel Buysse (q.v.), Herman Teirlinck (q.v.), Stijn Streuvels (q.v.), and, above all, Karel van de Woestijne (q.v.).

Buysse was a born narrator of the Maupassant (q.v.) school, whom Maeterlinck used to count "among the three or four great rural raconteurs of these last fifty years." He wrote a faithful chronicle of life in the Flemish villages as it evolved rapidly in the last decades.

Undoubtedly, the country baker Stijn Streuvels, a nephew of Guido Gezelle, was the most gifted of the prose writers of that period. There exists an evident synchronism between his early books and the vogue of luminist painting (e.g., Lenteleven, 1899; Spring Life). Except when portraying children (Prutske, 1922), his psychology appeared rather simple, but his gift for plastic detail and minute yet lyrical description was impressive. In his writings the physical environment, the atmosphere, absorbs man, or rather reduces him to a secondary, even minor role. Man to Streuvels was not the measure of things, he was their plaything. Several of his longer novels, De Vlaschgaard (1907; The Flax Field), Werkmensen (1927; Working People), have an epic quality which is very much akin to Scandinavian and Russian literature. In his later work (e.g., Alma met de vlassen Haren, 1930; Alma with the Flaxen Hair) the analysis of devotional life was his preoccupation, and he began also to give more attention to the sexual relations and problems of his personages. The exclusive love for the native soil and its inhabitants, which hampered many of his colleagues on their path to greatness and condemned them to provincialism, turned out in his case to be an asset and a starting point for truly universal expression.

All the writers grouped around Van Nu en Straks were decided individualists. Like their Dutch colleagues of the 1880's they wanted "to give the most individual expression to their most individual emotions." The outstanding poet of the group, Karel van de Woestijne, succeeded in doing this to such an extent that, had he been writing in one of the major world languages, he could hardly have failed to be universally recognized as one of the greatest lyric poets of his time.

He had no other theme but himself; no other drama to tell but the eternal conflict between mind and matter. His extensive poetical work is little else but a symbolic autobiography. He was as responsive as Gezelle to nature and its thousand details, but his life was dominated by a pendulum movement of attraction and repulsion of the eternal feminine (Het Vaderhuis, 1903, The Father House; De Gulden Schaduw, 1910, The Golden Shadow). In one of his long poems he sees with Adam "that Eve, in her wickedness, was beautiful." The drama of his life, as expressed in his writings, lies there as well as in a deep conviction of the sinfulness of his spontaneous reactions. He sang his joys and pains with such refined analytic preciseness, such exceptional warmth and tenseness, that there is scarcely anything that approaches his work in European literature. He had the burning heat of the great mystics like St. John of the Cross or St. Theresa, but always, like Paul Verlaine (q.v.), he went to the extreme in the humiliating confession of his weakness and frailty. Never in Flemish or Dutch literature had such a great heart witnessed and interpreted the constant conflict between a lucid intelligence and a hypersensitive nature. A good deal of his poetical work exists in a brooding atmosphere in which sensations and thoughts bloom like hothouse flowers of rare and slightly terrifying beauty. Life to him, who harbored a gothic heart in a renaissance body, is but a long conflict between his brilliant intelligence and the toll inevitably exacted by his senses. Woman, who had appeared until then in Flemish poetry and prose either as the devoted mother or the idealized Dulcinea, was to him full of mystery, of charm, of menace, a messenger of destruction and death. The leitmotifs of love and death run through his poems as if they were a verbal transcription of Isolde's Liebestod.

Van de Woestijne was a profound humanist. The rare poems which do not refer to his personal life deal with heroes of antiquity (Interludiën, 2 vols., 1912; Interludes), especially with Hercules whom he made the symbol of disenchanted grandeur. His goddesses, heroes, and heroines, in their Greek disguise, reveal the split personality, the melancholy, the doubt, and the longing for serene beauty which was characteristic of the atmosphere and literature of the turn of the century. These are decorative poems of moving beauty. In the second period of his life Van de Woestijne became a poet of great metaphysical depth; often his verse had a strange wry sarcasm, De modderen Man (1920; The Man of Mud), God aan Zee (1926; God at the Sea), Het Bergmeer (1928; The Mountain Lake). To such an extent did Van de Woestijne interpret the lyrical sensuality of Rubens, as well as Breughel's irony and keen observation, that his influence dominated Flemish letters for over two decades. Many poets were under his spell and, lacking his subtle balance and genius, devoted themselves to a decadent kind of writing which, by its extremely personal character, provoked a strong reaction in the generation of writers which spoke out during and after the First World War.

The writers of the generation that sprang up between 1917 and 1921 were greatly impressed by social and political problems. Although they recognized the eminence of authors like Van de Woestijne and others, they objected to an ivory-tower attitude, which they condemned as irresponsible and anti-social. They wanted poetry not to be a lyrical confession; they felt that the poet should be the conscience of the world, a seer and prophet like Walt Whitman, always busy drawing the moral of events and—in a broad sense—guiding public opinion. The external elements of the modern world should be incorporated into the poetical vocabulary, no conservative rules of prosody should hamper free expression. They used vers libre or they resorted to the psalmodic rhythm so successfully used by Paul Claudel (q.v.). For a brief period they indeed succeeded in interpreting the spirit of their time; their expressionist experiments exploded the calm impressionist atmosphere, and literature became unthinkable without humanitarian declamations and modernistic bric-a-brac. Their organ Ruimte (Space), which rallied Paul van Ostayen (q.v.), Wies Moens (1898–), Achilles Mussche (1896–), Gaston Burssens (1896–), Jan-Albert Goris (q.v.), Victor Brunclaire (1899–1945) and others, was short-lived, but their influence was decisive for a considerable period.

They were essentially poets. The leader and most versatile of them all, Paul van Ostayen, started out as a young literary dandy, following the footsteps of the Jungwien poets. Soon he turned to the political, prophetic genre, in the manner of the German expressionists Werfel, Trakl, and Becher (qq.v.), in Het Sienjaal (1918; The Signal). Later on he became dadaist for a brief period (Bezette Stad, 1921; The City Occupied) and concluded his short life by writing extremely suggestive, highly musical poetry of great refinement and purity. His short stories, burlesque adventures (Self Defense, 1933), told with a keenly analytic sarcasm, were a very effective antidote against rhetoric and pomposity. Moens and Mussche, both generous, ardent, lyrical natures, used a biblical and slightly oriental style to express their vivid social reactions, while Goris, after writing a spectacular modernistic baroque piece on St. Francis (Lof-Litanie van Sint Franciscus van Assisi, 1919; Litany in Praise of St. Francis of Assisi), evolved a style which has been considered a reconciliation of expressionism and classic simplicity; in his apparently free verse the discipline is as severe as in the classical meter (Het Huis, 1925; The House). Other poets were given to cosmic jugglery, sometimes really impressive. Others still, like Paul Verbruggen (1891–), attained a great purity of expression.

However, this revolt against tradition did not change the aspect of Flemish letters: the cozy rural and small-town novel received a new and powerful endorsement in Felix Timmermans (q.v.), a most prolific novelist who expressed a kind of reserved pantheistic joy of life in a very fresh and lyrical book Pallieter (1916; Eng. tr., 1924). This dionysian paean was followed by a number of books which were amusing transcriptions of old Flemish paintings and which were sometimes as charming as the products of these petits maîtres. He enjoyed a tremendous popularity in Germany, where he was considered a Low-German author. Notwithstanding very humorous, although unorthodox stylistic gifts, he remained a popular author, and one of his recent novels, Boerenpsalm (1935; Peasant Psalm), is a remarkably adult and sanguine book. Other authors like Teirlinck, Maurits Sabbe (1873–1938), Ernest Claes (1889–), Lode Baekelmans (1879–), continued the solidly established tradition of charming provincial writing.

Besides the Ruimte group, a number of poets gathered around a tiny review called Het Fonteintje (The Little Fountain). They were not humanitarians, but humanists, classicists, and they tried to disengage themselves from Van de Woestijne's grip. They resorted to a humoristic style, inspired by Toulet (q.v.) and other French poets. Their master and patron saint was Jan van Nijlen (q.v.), a wise, melancholic poet, who wrote fluent, charming verse in which he told people that the world was not exactly "cosmic," but strictly personal. Among them, Raymond Herreman (1896-) was the most outstanding and the most versatile.

The novelist Alfons de Ridder (q.v.), whose writings through their merciless humor and grim moral courage are unique in Flemish letters, can also be considered as belonging to this school. He writes in Villa des Roses (1913) and Tsjip (1934; Cheep) of middle-class people with deep sarcastic anger and a chastely hidden feeling for man's misery. Although he wrote only a few poems, he is also a very remarkable poet.

When the conflict and discussions between the two groups, the humanitarians and the cozy moralists, had subsided, when principles and theories no longer determined literary activity, when the eternal problems of existence had again taken the place of temporary political and social issues, a number of young novelists appeared who brought a new accent into Flemish letters. They had found out that the one and only subject of the novel is man, not the climate or the fauna and flora that surround him. This discovery was responsible for an increase in tempo and a better psychological insight. Among these writers, the most classical-minded is Maurice Roelants (q.v.). His novels go back to the great tradition of Benjamin Constant's Adolphe and to the works of other keen analysts of the human soul. With less technical perfection, but extreme generosity, Lode Zielens (1901-1944) devotes attention to the Flemish proletariat. He overflows with the milk of human kindness. But the most powerful and productive of them all is Gerard Walschap (q.v.). Using all the resources of rhetoric, his story rushes down like a mountain stream. His search is essentially along psychopathological lines. Although his personages often border on the abnormal, the moral of his work is always a belief in the profound goodness and greatness of life and of man. Aside from his torrential tempo, which comes close to the tornado pace James Cain used in The Postman Always Rings Twice, the European author he may best be compared with is François Mauriac (q.v.).

The great influence of Herman Teirlinck on the Flemish theatre between the two wars should be mentioned. He introduced the modernistic theatrical conceptions with great success.

One of the most remarkable literary facts after the First World War in Flanders was that the influence of Flemish letters on Dutch writing augmented considerably. Most of the young Flemish writers, by increasing the distance between their work and the folklore novelistics of their elders, came close enough to Dutch literature to make their works indistinguishable from Dutch publications.

See: G. Kalff, Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (6 vols., 1906-1910); J. Bithell, Contemporary Belgian Literature (1915); J. Persijn, A Glance at the Soul of the Low Countries (1916); J. Bithell, Contemporary Flemish Poetry (1917); G. L. van Roosbroeck, Guido Gezelle, the Mystic Poet of Flanders (1919); P. Hamelius, Introduction à la littérature française et flamande de Belgique (1921); A. de Ridder, La Littérature flamande contemporaine (1923); A. Vermeylen, Van Gezelle tot Timmermans (1923); F. de Backer, Contemporary Flemish Literature (1934); M. Gijzen, De Literatuur in Zuid Nederland sedert 1830 (1940; 3d ed., 1945), Peripatetisch Onderricht (1940), and Vlaamse Lyriek (1944).

J.-A. G.

Belgian literature in French. The presence in Belgium of two races of different mentality—the Flemish are of Germanic origin, the Walloons of a Latin tradition—and a glorious common inheritance in the plastic arts have made their mark on the national literature. Many writers of mixed blood use French as their medium of expression, and the Walloons show to some degree traits of their Flemish colleagues. Predominant in the latter is the inspiration drawn from painters. Many scenes, sometimes whole volumes are primarily pictures in words, veritable transpositions of canvases. Color in separate episodes rather than rigidly coherent architecture is sought, and evocation rather than logical thinking. Love of the picturesque contributes to a democratic note, uppermost in fiction. "Go to humble folk," advised De Coster (q.v.); "the bourgeois are all tarred with monotony." The Walloons share this interest in the people, but are relatively sober in description; their art reveals more subtle psychology and delicate shades of landscape. Regionalistic fiction, portraying the manners of a city or province, has fascinated the majority of the novelists. This trend comes in part from realistic theories prevalent during the last decades of the 19th century, in part from the historical novel, much in vogue from the moment the desire arose to endow the country with a new glory after independence was won in 1830. Two writers of the following half century have won lasting fame, and between them they represent the two poles of the national temperament—joy in physical vigor and in contemplative sensibility—to become familiar later in Verhaeren and Maeterlinck (qq.v.). Charles De Coster's Ulenspiegel (1867) is an epic novel culminating the effort to glorify the past in its struggle for freedom. Years of labor had been devoted to the composition; the sources are old chronicles, museums, and folklore; an archaic style lends color to the 16th-century setting. The influence of this novel has been enormous; it was proclaimed the Bible of Belgium by the rising generation. Thus the modern revival of letters starts with a masterpiece of distinctly national inspiration. Octave Pirmez (q.v.) was an aristocratic recluse who sought communion with the infinite through nature. Fascinated at once by Pascal, Rousseau, and Chateaubriand, he has left his personal mark on his intuitive philosophy, and his spiritual family includes some of the most distinguished poets. The generation coming of age in 1880, known as Jeune Belgique, hailed De Coster and Pirmez as two of their authentic forerunners.

The great majority of representative Belgian authors are essentially poets, thanks to their aesthetic perception and sheer gusto in living, whatever their mode of expression. A striking example is Camille Lemonnier (q.v.), whose voluminous works include no verse; his La Belgique (1888), was pronounced too "lyric" for distribution among scholastic prize winners. It was to be an inspiration for his successors in regionalistic fiction. Lemonnier appears as a Proteus with 13 volumes of art criticism, 20 collections of short stories, and 29 novels. He saw in De Coster the supreme painter of the past and advised his younger contemporaries to be the historians of their own time. His counsel has been generally followed except by Eugène Demolder (q.v.) who, more than any other Belgian novelist, was fascinated by the old masters of the brush (La Route d'émeraude, 1899). Certain critics have sought a sociological trend in Lemonnier. A few novels of his middle period lend color to such an interpretation, but his characterization of himself as an instinctive temperament fascinated by the beauty of life can hardly be bettered. Social revolt marks the vitriolic work of Georges Eckhoud (q.v.). He was born of a bourgeois family and spent his mature life in Brussels, but his work is shot through with nostalgia for his native Antwerp countryside and with sympathy for the downtrodden and the outlaws. He would be the interpreter of the peasant soul, expressing sentiments they feel but cannot utter. La Nouvelle Carthage (1888, definitive ed., 1893; Eng. tr., The New Carthage, 1917) reveals the fascination that Antwerp, in its squalor and its energy, held for him. The novel recalls the attitude of Verhaeren in the poems of the period of Les Villes tentaculaires (1895). The question arises as to how much is pure literature in the humanitarianism of certain Belgian writers, but Eckhoud is at least consistent throughout and broke with his friends of Jeune Belgique when they championed exclusively the doctrine of "art for art's sake." Still there is ample evidence that he appreciated to the full the picturesqueness of his lusty heroes. Georges Virrès (pseud. of Henri Briers, 1869–) deals with the peasants of Limburg in a different manner. He speaks as a realist, as one who has spent his life among the folk he portrays (Les Gens de Tiest, 1903), while Eckhoud is an ideologist whose characters are almost symbols. Nor is the cult of plastic art prominent in Virrès; he resembles the novelists of the Walloon tradition by his finesse of observation of landscape and character. While he is aware of the truculent side of his rustics, he excels in a quiet humor which replaces to advantage the violent hatreds in which Eckhoud indulged. He remarks that Eckhoud often missed the mystic element in peasants and points to apparently supernatural influences which arise from the soil itself and shape character. Yet the work of this Catholic leader is devoid of propaganda; he possesses a sense of structure rare in typical novelists of the Flemish wing. An exaggerated tendency to personify environment may be seen in the once-famous novel of the symbolist poet, Georges Rodenbach (q.v.). He states that he intends to make the city an essential and directing personage in Bruges-la-morte (1892). Today this work seems singularly artificial beside the vigorous realism of Virrès.

The Walloon novelists are also regionalists, but show a conscious effort to distill the universal and to generalize from close observation of familiar scenes and folk. In this sense, and because they are less attracted by color for its own sake, they are truer realists than the Flemings. Hubert Krains (q.v.) is an excellent example. By his style and choice of matter he has grasped to the full the classic precept of imitating the majestic simplicity of nature; he is aware that her great plan is always the same across apparent variety. His art is highly selective, eliminating all that is not of structural value. He meditates on every scene until he can evoke it in its most vital features. He wrote relatively little, two short novels and five collections of short stories and a volume of critical essays. His outlook is one of resigned pessimism, yet suffering always arouses his discreet sympathy. Offering no panaceas, defending no theses, he accepts the universe, not as perfect nor as susceptible of becoming so, but as presenting, to those who have eyes to see, the most fascinating of spectacles. A similar ideal characterizes Edmond Glesener (q.v.), who extends his observation over a wider range. He bars his criticism of society with psychological acumen; his objectivity and scourging irony have occasionally brought the charge of cynicism, but Le Cœur de François Remy (1904) suffices as refutation. In the stories of L'Ombre des sapins (1934) his art lends a tragic grandeur to rustics which makes them symbols of suffering humanity. The popularity of Maurice Des Ombiaux (1868-1943) comes in part from his adaptation of the methods of the Flemish school to the portrayal of Wallonia with its folklore and customs (Mihien d'Avène, 1904). Thus he appears as a broadly national novelist. His exuberance recalls Rabelais, yet his naïve paeans to lusty living disarm criticism. If the joy of the spirit gives the measure of its strength, Des Ombiaux is an intellectual titan.

Belgians are at their best in the short story, a genre favored by most of the novelists, whose technique has been profoundly influenced by it; often novels are a series of carefully wrought but loosely connected episodes. Two masters are Hubert Stiernet (1863-1939) and Louis Delattre (1870-1938). Stiernet's originality lies in his use of mysterious forces, not fantastic but springing from the soil, from violation of tradition, or from revival or some past incident. He occasionally recalls Hawthorne. Occult influences skillfully entwined with everyday life appear as prolongations of a word or act which escapes from the subconscious. Once released, they guide the destiny of an individual (Histoires hantées, 1906). Delattre, a doctor by profession, is keenly aware of human tragedy yet always fascinated by life observed in its minutest details, which he contrives to forge into drama. He passes for an optimist, but declares that his smile is largely a reaction against the all too prevailing gloom. He succeeds in arousing interest in the apparently commonplace with the maximum simplicity of means (Le Parfum des buis, 1911).

Three of the younger novelists deserve special attention. Jean Tousseul (q.v.) received his education in the school of hard knocks. Proud of his humble ancestors, he determined, as an artist, to perform his task with the conscientiousness they displayed in theirs. Hence a note at once realistic and idealistic unheard before. The setting of his stories and novels ranges from the prehistoric past to the present of his region; like Michelet, he would resuscitate the common people, and the solidarity with his forebears gives unity to his work. His constant theme is the effort of the downtrodden toward justice for all, but he writes as a poet, not as an agitator. Franz Hellens (q.v.) stands apart among Belgian novelists—he has little of the regionalist and nothing of the sociologist. Convinced that the domain of the rational has been thoroughly explored, he turns to the extraintellectual; Réalités fantastiques (1923) offers a synthesis of his work. He would use all the techniques of modern psychology in his analyses of the subconscious; the phenomena of involuntary reminiscence fascinate him. He is inspired by music rather than by painting and avows his ambition to create matter by sound. His closest affinity is with his fellow townsman, Maeterlinck, but he appears always as an explorer of purely artistic realms with no didactic purpose. Constant Burniaux (1892-), whom R. T. House has aptly called "the poet of nature's stepchildren," has devoted his life to teaching abnormal waifs. His own sensitive nature is at once repelled and attracted by their degradation, which he is at pains not to gloss over, but, with no illusions about working miracles, he finds a stoic joy in his profession. There is perhaps no truer humanitarian in Belgian literature (see Crânes tondus, 1930).

Women have made a significant contribution to letters in Belgium; 70 using French as their medium were represented at an exposition in 1936. In fiction they reveal an acumen in dealing with feminine psychology rare among their masculine colleagues. Marguerite van de Wiele (Maison flamande, 1883), who painted Bruges before Rodenbach, and Marie Gevers (Madame Orpha, 1934), who gives her version of Eekhoud's Campine, represent the regionalistic wing. Blanche Rousseau (L'Eventail, 1906) portrays with exquisite delicacy everyday reality. France Adine (La Cité sur l'Arno, 1931) deals with aristocratic, cosmopolitan society; she is interested in the refinement of egoistic males by woman's tact. Julia Frezin (Le Nid ravagé, 1937), creates unforgettable characters of both sexes without departing from normal experience. She excels in the portrayal of stoic idealists placed against a realistic background. In poetry Elise Champagne writes with wistful sincerity of the humble citizens of Liège.

A striking phenomenon in Belgium is the number of reviews. The catalogue of the Exposition of 1930 names 166; no less than 25 sprang up in the decade 1874-1884 to defend the cause of literature and art; many others have appeared since. Some were ephemeral, but three require special mention: the Jeune Belgique, Art moderne, and Wallonie. Most of the writers who were to count in the revival of Belgian letters were affiliated with one or another. In December, 1880, Albert Bauwens and four friends published the first number of Jeune Revue littéraire, which became a year later Jeune Belgique. At the end of 1881, Bauwens ceded his review to Max Waller, who desired a more aggressive attitude. The Jeune Revue littéraire had announced itself as a free organ with no other program than that of furthering the cause of literary effort. The policy of its successor varied, but turned more and more to a strict Parnassianism with the exclusive doctrine of "art for art's sake." Hence internal strife and polemics with former friends. Waller, taking for his motto Fear nought, quickly won a reputation for spirited impertinence by his attacks on the official and uninspired literature of his time; he did succeed in arousing his countrymen from their lethargy. His collaborators were primarily poets, and while he lived he held his group together. After his death in 1889—he was succeeded in the editorship by the poet Valère Gille (q.v.)—inner dissension became violent, culminating in 1895 with the foundation of the short-lived Coq rouge by Verhaeren (who was experimenting with free verse), Eekhoud, and other prosateurs. Jeune Belgique lasted until 1897; the consummation of the renaissance of Belgian letters is due in large measure to the efforts of its staff. Art moderne (1881-1914), whose moving spirit was the lawyer Edmond Picard, aimed at once at the renovation of letters and at a large social reform. Picard was as bellicose as the leaders of Jeune Belgique and quite as eager as they to further the cause of a distinctly national art. Accusing his rivals of aping Paris, he sought to foster expression of the "Belgian soul," even if certain niceties of French usage were violated. Wallonie (1886-1892), organ of the symbolists, was founded at Liège by Albert Mockel (q.v.). Belgian and French poets were among its contributors. The trend of later literary reviews, e.g., Thyrse, has been eclectic.

Poets gave to Jeune Belgique its distinctive mark. Albert Giraud (q.v.) is the unflinching champion of studied Parnassian perfection; he sought in art a refuge from the prevalent vulgarity. Hors du siècle (1887), hymning the glories and color of the past, recalls at once Leconte de Lisle and Heredia (qq.v.). Giraud's prevailing note is one of pessimism; he was born disillusioned, yet in 1919 he entered the arena with Les Lauriers to commune with his countrymen who, he felt, had then met his ideal. His colleague, Iwan Gilkin (q.v.) appears as a poet of cosmic interests. He had planned "a sublime journey through Hell, Purgatory and Paradise," but only the first part, La Nuit (1897), was written. Here Baudelaire's influence was paramount. But this work seems inspired by a crisis in his career; his subsequent poems, while often accompanied by a subtle note of irony, reveal a joyous acceptance of life. His dramatic poem, Prométhée (1899), written in varied meters—he invokes La Fontaine as sponsor—carries out the idea of his unfinished trilogy. The magnificent pantheism of the foreshadowed reconciliation between Zeus and the rebellious Titan seems to symbolize his hope of union between the warring groups of Belgian poets. Only by harmony of endeavor, he felt, could they achieve their goal of giving their country its potential place on Parnassus. He proved his critical acumen when, in the first article published on Maeterlinck's La Princesse Maleine, he declared that the piece was certain to mark a date in the history of the theatre (Jeune Belgique, December, 1889). Fernand Séverin (q.v.) recalls Pirmez by his love of solitude and by the inspiration he found in communion with nature (Poèmes, 1930). Some form of pantheism, reached by various means, is a marked trait of Belgian letters. Now it arises from the cult of regionalism, which branches out to embrace ever-widening horizons; Belgians are very conscious of being a tiny nation which has made and is determined to make a noble contribution to the realms of art and civilization. Again it appears as a child of the mystic trend exemplified by Maeterlinck. In Charles Van Lerberghe (q.v.) it is inspired by the cult of beauty; his Eve "returns in a smile to the universe she has sung" (La Chanson d'Eve, 1904). Van Lerberghe shared the typical Fleming's inspiration from painters, but his ideal was that of Memling and the English Pre-Raphaelites. An idea of the wealth and variety of recent Belgian poetry (see also articles on Max Elskamp, Odilon Jean Pérrier, Eric de Haulleville) may be gained from F. Castillo Nájera's Un siglo de poesía belga (1931), in which 78 poets are quoted, discussed, and translated.

The theatre has not received in Belgium the attention devoted to the novel and to poetry. Some critics claim that the Belgian temperament, essentially lyric and descriptive, is unadapted to stage requirements. It is certain that a number of poets, as Van Lerberghe, Rodenbach, Verhaeren, Giraud, and Henri Maubel (pseud. of Maurice Belval, 1862-1919), have written dramatic pieces not primarily intended for the footlights. Other observers find that the wealth of French drama acts as a deterrent to similar efforts in Belgium because producers favor Parisian celebrities. Fernand Crommelynck (q.v.) indeed made his reputation with a play first presented in Paris, La Cocu magnifique (1921). Yet there is considerable activity in Belgium, and the absence of a national tradition has encouraged originality. The work of Maeterlinck is better known in Anglo-Saxon countries than in his own; Kistemaekers (q.v.) had a certain success in Paris; Picard invented the monodrame for the promulgation of his social theses; Marguerite Duterme (1882-), whose first inspiration came from Ibsen, and Gustave Van Zype (1869-), the most gifted of Belgian dramatists, represent the theatre of ideas. Among the younger men, Michel de Ghelderode is experimenting brilliantly with new techniques.

The First World War has been the theme of volumes by most writers who witnessed it: novels, stories, poems, and objective essays abound. Belgium's place among independent nations dates from little more than a century; her men of letters are deeply conscious of their role in giving her artistic autonomy, and Belgian literature is largely inspired by local scenes and by intense regional patriotism. Hence the devastation of the country aroused great indignation. Verhaeren himself discarded for a moment his cosmopolitan doctrines to brand Germany's crime. An anthology of work by those sacrificed in the holocaust appeared in 1922. Among the surviving combatants, Maurice Gauchez (pseud. of Maurice Gilles, 1883-), poet, novelist, and critic, set the example with Ce que j'ai vu (1915), and the caustic novelist, Max Deauville (q.v.), produced a masterpiece of objective observation, Jusqu'à l'Yser (1917).

Poets and novelists vie with scholars in critical essays. The leaders of Jeune Belgique did pioneer work here; the first modern Belgian critic, Francis Nautet (1855-1896), whose unfinished Histoire des lettres belges d'expression française (1892) is still of value, belonged to the group. Krains's Portraits d'écrivains belges (1930) offers penetrating portraits of six; Mockel, Gauchez, and Georges Rency (1875-) divide their efforts between criticism and creative work. Belgian historiography glories in Henri Pirenne's (q.v.) magisterial Histoire de Belgique (7 vols., 1900-1932); Maurice Wilmotte (1861-1942) was the dean of philological scholarship in his country; Gustave Charlier (1885-), Georges Doutrepont (1868-) and Spoelberch de Lovenjoul (q.v.) have made large contributions to both French and Belgian literary history; younger men like J. M. Culot, Léon Sosset, and Gustave Vanwelkenhuyzen are making their mark. There is every evidence that the seed sown by Jeune Belgique has not fallen on barren ground.

See: M. Gauchez, Livre des masques belges 3 vols., 1908-1911); O. Thiry, La Miraculeuse Aventure des Jeunes Belges (1911); M. Wilmotte, La Culture française en Belgique (1913); J. Bithell, Contemporary Belgian Literature (1915); G. Charlier, "Les Lettres belges," in J. Bedier and P. Hazard, Histoire de la littérature française, II (1924), 318-326; H. Liebrecht and G. Rency, Histoire illustrée de la littérature belge de langue française (1926); B. M. Woodbridge, Le Roman belge contemporain (1930).

B. M. W.

Beltramelli, Antonio (1879-1930, Italian novelist), was born at Forlì and died in Rome. He first gained recognition as a militant young journalist and later became known as a writer of novels, comedies, poetry, books for children, and travel books. He was made a member of the Italian Academy in 1929. Beltramelli was active in the political strife which followed the First World War in Italy, taking sides finally with the Fascists. In Il Cavalier Mostardo (1921), he describes the struggle between republicans and socialists, and in L'Uomo nuovo (1923), perhaps his best work, he writes of the atmosphere of his native province Romagna.

Beltramelli's early literary works, such as Anna Perenna (1904) and I Primogeniti (1905), had seemed to reveal originality. He developed qualities suggestive of the Sicilian writer Verga (q.v.). Solicchio (1913) is a book of verse in which he attempts to revive legends of Romagna. Later, abandoning the countryside as his subject, he began to write lyric novels in an ultra D'Annunzio (q.v.) style, eulogizing past wars and heroic figures. Among his other works are compilations of tales, L'Alternativa Vicenda (1909), Le Novelle di Ceppo (1911), La Vigna vendemmiata (1919), and the novels, L'Ombra del mandorlo (1921), Ahi Giacometta la tua ghirlandella (1921), and Il Passo dell' ignota (1927).

See: Arturo Lanocita, Scrittori del tempo nostro (1928), pp. 29-38; Giuseppe Ravegnani, I Contemporanei (1930), pp. 31-37; Renato Serra, Scritti (1938), I, 49-69.

J. C. D. L.

Bely, Andrei (pseud. of Boris Nikolayevich Bugayev, 1880-1934, Russian poet, novelist, critic, essayist, and theoretician of symbolism), was born in Moscow, the only child of one of Russia's leading mathematicians, N. V. Bugayev, dean of the faculty of natural sciences at the University of Moscow. From early childhood he was moved by the music of Schumann, Schubert, Beethoven, and Chopin and by the poetry of Uhland and Goethe. Between 1891 and 1899 he attended the Polivanov Gymnasium, where his inclination toward literature was encouraged. The family of M. S. Solovyov, who was a brother of the poet Vladimir Solovyov (q.v.), played a primary role in helping the future poet find himself. Under the guidance of the Solovyovs, Bugayev became interested in philosophy and in literature, particularly in modernistic trends. The poetry of Vladimir Solovyov made a lasting impression on the youth. In 1899 in accordance with his father's wishes he enrolled in the faculty of natural sciences at the University of Moscow. Shortly after his father's death in 1903 he finished his course and transferred to the liberal arts curriculum.

In 1902 Bugayev published his first literary effort, Dramaticheskaya simfoniya (The Dramatic Symphony), using the pseudonym Andrei Bely (Andrew the White), under which he became known in literature. Between 1904 and 1909 he acted as member of the editorial board of the symbolist periodical, Vesy (The Balance); he was given charge in 1906 of the theoretical and polemical departments of the magazine. In 1909 he became a member of the editorial board of the Mousagethe Press and also organized the Society for the Study of Poetic Rhythm. Bugayev spent several months abroad in 1906, visiting Germany, Switzerland, and France. During 1910-1911, with his wife, Anna Turgeneva, he journeyed to Italy, Sicily, Tunis, Egypt, Palestine. With the collapse of symbolism as a school in 1912 Bugayev became absorbed in the anthroposophical doctrines of Rudolf Steiner and in 1913 went abroad and eventually joined the anthroposophist colony at Dornach, Switzerland. On returning to Russia in 1916, he joined Ivanov-Razumnik and the "Scythian" literary group and, with them, greeted the Revolution. To the Scythians it was a manifestation of the destructive cataclysm that would leave Russia rejuvenated and purified and thus fit for the messianic role which they believed she was destined to play. After the Revolution, Bely took an active part in the various cultural organizations sponsored by the Soviet government—the Moscow Proletkult, Palace of Arts, Theatrical Division of the Department of Education—and organized the Free Philosophical Association. In 1921 he went to Berlin, but returned to Russia two years later.

Bely, throughout his voluminous literary works, appears first of all as an ardent seeker of new truths and, as a result of his searches, a bold experimenter. He created a new literary genre, the "symphony," a novelette written in rhythmic prose and developed in form and content much after the pattern of a musical composition. In his poetry also Bely appears as an innovator, and his early verses served as a first step toward the formal revolution in Russian verse that was achieved by Blok, Akhmatova, and Mayakovsky (qq.v.). Bely's talents made him a legendary figure in Russian literature, and he was looked upon as the standard-bearer for those symbolists who regarded the movement as a Weltanschauung, rather than mere literary method (see French symbolism). In his "symphonies" and verses Bely reveals his belief in the Solovyovan notion that "this world is but a shadow" of another world that is revealed to a poet in moments of creative ecstasy. In his counterpoise of the real with the imaginary Bely constantly denies the empiric reality. He sees objects and people as shadows and caricatures of the prototypes of the ideal world. He is therefore prone to satirize what he sees, and in this he is undeniably a master. In his works, autobiographical to a large extent, Bely appears as an exponent of the realist current in symbolism.

Bely's many works, which reflect in content the influence of Solovyov and also of Nietzsche (q.v.), are characterized by their verbal artistry, rhythm, and penchant for "stylization"; his prose therefore approaches poetry. This is illustrated best by his four "symphonies" (1901–1908). His books of verse as well show him as a maker of rhythm; his Zoloto v lazuri (1903; Gold in Azure) is Solovyovan in content and distinctly original in form. Subsequently in Pepel (1904–1908; Ashes) and Urna (1908–1909; Urn) and in the brilliant narrative poem (Pervoye svidaniye (1921; 'The First Meeting), which in part resembles Vladimir Solovyov's Tri svidaniya (The Three Meetings), Bely shows in addition a reversion to the poetry of Nekrasov and Pushkin. His critical and theoretical works include Arabeski (1911; Arabesques), Simvolizm (1910; Symbolism), Lug zelyony (1910; Green Pastures), Ritm, kak dialektika (1929; Rhythm as Dialectics), Masterstvo Gogolya (1932; Gogol's Mastery). Of particular significance are his experiments in rhythm, for they opened the way to the researches of the formalists. Bely's volumes of memoirs, Vospominaniya ob A. A. Bloke (Memoirs of Blok; in Epopeya, 1922–1923, Nos. 1–4), Na rubezhe dvykh stoletii (1929; On the Border of Two Centuries), Nachalo veka (1932; The Beginning of a Century), and Mezhdv dvykh revolyutsii (1933; Between Two Revolutions), give a brilliant sketch, at times bordering on caricature, of the Russian intellectual circles of the quarter century preceding the October Revolution.

Two of Bely's novels, Serebryany golub (1910; The Silver Dove) and Peterburg (1912; Petersburg), which resemble some of the best of the fantastic pages of Gogol and Dostoevski (q.v.), are regarded by several critics as the masterpieces of 20th-century Russian prose; certainly, although they never achieved widespread popularity, they were assiduously studied by many a young writer. Bely's later novels, Moskva (1927; Moscow) and Maski (1933; Masks), do not measure up to his earlier works. Bely's influence has been felt by most of the leading Russian novelists of the 1920's and by such poets as Blok, Pasternak (q.v.), Aseyev (q.v.), and many another younger poet.

See: Ellis (pseud. of L. L. Kobylinski), Rus-skiye simvolisty (1910); R. V. Ivanov-Razumnik, Vershiny (1921); Vladimir Orlov, ed., "Aleksandr Blok i Andrei Bely, perepiska," in Letopisi gosudastvennovo literaturnovo muzeya, Vol. VII (1940).

O. M.

Benavente, Jacinto (1866–, Spanish dramatist), was born in Madrid. He has always lived there, and his personality and dramatic work are stamped with the unmistakable character of that city. The society of Madrid in which he has lived and moved, particularly the upper middle class and the aristocracy, constitutes the world of most of his comedies and dramas. The title of his second dramatic work, Gente conocida (1896), might just as well have been applied to the first, El nido ajeno (1894), and to most of those that followed, over a hundred in number. Before devoting himself to the theatre he had begun his literary career with a volume called Teatro fantástico (1892), made up of short sketches of a lyrical, imaginative nature not intended for the stage. This was followed the next year by a volume of poetry, Versos, and a prose work entitled Cartas de mujeres in which already the keen analyst of the feminine soul that Benavente has always been makes his appearance. The lyric and poetic notes also have been present, in a varying degree, in all his dramatic work. These first plays of his, refined and exquisite in their art, initiated certain aspects of the literary revolution of the end of the century, and they definitely place Benavente among the creators of modernism in Spain. His theatre stems, not from that of Echegaray (q.v.), against which indeed he reacted, but from the comedy of manners which had evolved in Spain, in varying forms, from Moratín to Pérez Galdós (q.v.), with marked influences of contemporary French and English playwrights and, a step removed, of Molière and Shakespeare, whose works he has translated. Though not without difficulty, this new theatre triumphed completely about 1905 and came to replace that of the 19th century in the trend of the writers and the taste of the public.

Outstanding among the works of his early period (1894–1905) are La comida de las fieras (1898), Lo cursi (1901), and La gobernadora (1901; Eng. tr., The Governor's Wife, 1918). Almost completely devoid of action, these plays consist of a series of scenes or pictures in which figures and types of Madrid society appear on the stage—while they themselves look on as spectators. The painting was not at all flattering; it was refined satire, faithful and keen in its analysis, always ironical in tone, reserved, and natural, but at heart cruel and implacable, without the slightest attempt at moralizing. In other works of this same period, such as La noche del sábado (1903; Eng. tr., Saturday Night, 1918) and La princesa Bebé (1904; Eng. tr., Princess Bebé, in Plays, Ser. 2, 1919), Benavente leaves the narrow confines of the society of Madrid and the limitations of reality for a cosmopolitan, international atmosphere, artificial and fantastic, essentially theatrical. In these works his satire takes on a symbolic, transcendental character, allowing him freely to express his ideas, fundamentally skeptical and pessimistic but tolerant and kindly, on love, education, politics, human nature. Other dramas in which symbolism enters the framework of everyday life are a blend of the two foregoing types. Rosas de otoño (1905; Eng. tr., Autumnal Roses, in Plays, 1919) represents the triumph of this superior form of Benavente's drama in which he expresses that conception of life found in varying forms in all his better works. Here the drama of good and evil has as its setting love and marriage; human kindness is incarnated in woman and, as in almost all of Benavente's work, is in keeping with feminine ideas and sentiments. To Benavente kindness is pity, the spirit of self-sacrifice, abnegation, generosity, accepting without protest the unavoidable evils of life, and it is stronger than brute force (La fuerza bruta, 1908; Eng. tr., Brute Force, 1935), than the evil that is done to us (El mal que nos hacen, 1917), stronger even than love (Más fuerte que el amor, 1906). This essentially Christian conception of life is in no wise in contradiction to the skeptical, pessimistic, critical, negative character which is found in his first works and which will always be the dominant characteristic of Benavente's writings, for his eye catches with greater precision, fidelity, and acuteness the weaknesses of human nature. But, in spite of this inclination, the fact that there is a touch of sweetness in his bitterness, of sadness and melancholy in his laughter, entitles Benavente to a place among the great modern satirists. Whatever place we or posterity may assign him, his art is related to that of Cervantes, Shakespeare, and Molière. The idealism, kindness, and optimism in his work counterbalance his critical, negative vision of life and humanity and elevate it to the plane of profound, consoling irony.

This moral and aesthetic conception is expressed in a variety of forms in Benavente's later works and achieves its greatest perfection, depth, and intensity in Los malhechores del bien (1905; Eng. tr., The Evil Doers of Good, in Plays, 1917) and Los intereses creados (1907; Eng. tr., The Bonds of Interest, in Plays, 1917), which both the public and the critics have considered his masterpieces. Los malhechores del bien presents one of the most deep-rooted and enduring traits of the Spanish character, the idea of moral tolerance. It is expressed through the satirization of outward, pharisaic goodness which smugly sets itself up as an example and rule—that intolerant, inflexible goodness which to Benavente as to the Spanish people is not only not good, but the most unbearable form of evil. In Los intereses creados, with classic simplicity, free from the limitations of time and space, is found the quintessence of Benavente's conception of human nature. The use of the device of two characters and two worlds which are really one might lead us to think that Benavente was approaching the aesthetic quality of the Celestina or of Cervantes if it were not for the contrast between the vigor and liveliness of his vision of these two worlds, the baser, evil side of humanity being so much better presented than the good.

Two works of Benavente differ markedly in character from those already mentioned—Señora ama (1908) and La malquerida (1913; Eng. tr. in Plays, 1917). These are rustic tragedies, simple yet masterly in their dramatic construction, of classic perfection and power. It was La malquerida, together with Los intereses creados, that established his national and international prestige and culminated in the award of the Nobel prize in 1922.

See: M. Bueno, Teatro español contemporáneo (1909), pp. 129–167; A. González-Blanco, Los dramaturgos españoles contemporáneos (1917), I, 27–168; John Dos Passos, Rosinante to the Road Again (1922), pp. 182–195; F. de Onís, Jacinto Benavente; estudio literario (1923); Walter Starkie, Jacinto Benavente (1924, in English); Angel Lázaro, Jacinto Benavente; de su vida y de su obra (1925).

F. de O.

Benda, Julien (1867–, French philosopher, essayist, and novelist), has offered in two recent volumes a recapitulation of his life as a “cleric” and a “monk” in the service of what he considers the only true religion, that of Intelligence. La Jeunesse d'un clerc (1936) and Un Régulier dans le siècle (1938) rank among the most extraordinary books of self-analysis ever written. The cold, clinical lucidity with which the author looks at himself and the world about him, his uninhibited candor, his readiness to flout every social convention that would restrict his freedom of movement, his imperviousness to even the mildest type of sentimentality—all these traits combine to make up an exceptional character whose single but devouring passion is to avoid all passions. "From the life of the heart," Benda declares, "I never expected the full expression of my being nor the satisfaction of my innermost faith. . . . Reason was my choice—reason in its nonhuman aspects."

To the reader of Benda's confessions it will doubtless appear that he had strong dispositions for this type of vocation. "Eleuthère," the Free Man, as he likes to call himself, moved very early indeed in the realm of the "nonhistorical." Born in Paris of unorthodox Jewish parents whose ancestors had been settled in France for no more than two or three generations, he felt from the start no sternly binding attachment to either land or race or religion. As a boy he admired Spinoza who, he was told, lived all alone and had an algebraic mind. As a student he applied himself with unlimited seriousness to both the sciences and the humanities, merely wondering which of the two disciplines would offer the greater guarantee of universality. Having first entered the Ecole Centrale des Arts et Manufactures, he thought better of it and wound up with a literary degree. From then on he clung to the Greco-Roman tradition and the French classical models with such aggressive partiality that cultural nationalism has sometimes been denounced as the weak spot in his "clerical" armor.

Projected against this background, Benda's career shows a remarkable consistency. He began philosophizing at the time and on the subject of the Dreyfus affair (Dialogues à Byzance, 1900). Recognition came, rather oddly, with a novel, L'Ordination (1912; Eng. tr., The Yoke of Pity, 1913), a powerful work the hero of which, having succumbed to the "life of the heart" after a long struggle, becomes that useless phenomenon, "a thing that loves." Then followed in quick succession three massive attacks upon the "man of the hour," Henri Bergson (q.v.), and his intuitive metaphysics: Le Bergsonisme, ou une Philosophie de la mobilité (1912); Une Philosophie pathétique (1913), hospitably received in his Cahiers de la quinzaine by the Bergsonian Charles Péguy (q.v.); and Sur le succès du bergsonisme (1914). Still during the same, fertile period Benda wrote Belphégor (1919; Eng. tr., 1929). Placed under the sign of the pagan god of Palestine who once inspired Machiavelli, this "essay on the aesthetics of present-day society" engulfs the vast majority of contemporary writers in a sweeping condemnation of the erratic, emotional, effeminate tendencies of our age. Romain Rolland, Paul Claudel, Maurice Barrès, Paul Bourget, Charles Maurras, Georges Sorel (qq.v.), and others, including Benda's former friend, Charles Péguy, and, needless to say, Henri Bergson, are summoned to the bar as utilitarians, obscurantists, and demagogues. The time is not far off when Benda will call them traitors. La Trahison des clercs, his most sensational book (1927; Eng. tr., The Great Betrayal, American title, The Treason of the Intellectuals, both 1928), mourns the defeatist, shameful, fateful surrender of Intelligence. Erasmus is no more. His descendants have sold his sacred trust; they have turned ideas into ideologies; they have become party men, propagandists, organizers of political passions; they adore the particular and the contingent and despise the Eternal.

La Trahison des clercs was widely misinterpreted as meaning that the intellectual must withdraw from temporal affairs. Of course he must not. Far from taking shelter in holy abstention, he enters worldly debates, but he does so as an intellectual, namely, by considering things sub specie aeternitatis, from the sole viewpoint of abstract truth and justice, without regard to any practical consequences whatsoever. Having definitely established this point in La Fin de l'Eternel (1929) and his Essai d'un discours cohérent sur les rapports de Dieu et du monde (1931), Benda added example to precept and offered a "clerical" discussion of such burning topics as that of nationality (Esquisse d'une histoire des Français dans leur volonté d'être une nation, 1932), Europeanism (Discours à la nation européenne, 1933), and democracy (La Grande Epreuve des démocraties, 1942). The manuscript of this last book, a strong, dialectical reaffirmation of the democratic principle, was smuggled out of German-dominated France and published in New York. There is, after all, courage, responsibility—and risk—in Benda's chosen profession.

See: Louis Dumont-Wilden, "Julien Benda, ou l'Idéologue passionné," Flambeau, I (1921), 382-413; Constant Bourquin, Julien Benda, ou le Point de vue de Sirius (1925); Daniel Halévy, "Deux Livres sur l'apostasie des peuples" [La Trahison des clercs and Jacques Maritain's (q.v.) Primauté du spirituel], Bibliothèque universelle et revue de Genève, II (1927), 733-750; H. E. Read, Julien Benda and the New Humanism (1930); Jean Malaquais, "Julien Benda et la justice abstraite," Cahiers du sud, XVIII (1939), 378-392.

J.-A. B.

Benedictsson, Victoria (pseud. of Ernst Ahlgren, 1850–1888, Swedish novelist and short-story writer), was born in Fru Alstad's parish in southern Skåne. A child of elderly parents whose marriage had been unhappy, she herself married, at the age of 20, a widower much older than herself in order to escape the tyranny of her parents. Later a separation took place. Meantime she had begun to try her hand at literary composition, bombarding editors of newspapers and magazines with immature romantic tales of all kinds. Upon the suggestion of one of these editors she turned soon to an entirely different subject matter, the peasant life of her native Skåne; and in this she immediately succeeded in attracting wide attention. In the course of her very short literary career of some four years were published two volumes of short stories and two novels, in addition to two unimportant plays, one in collaboration with Axel Lundegård (q.v.). She took her own life in Copenhagen on the night of July 21–22, 1888, because of her hopeless love for the Danish critic Georg Brandes (q.v.).

Despite the weak strain in her nature which precipitated the final catastrophe in her life, Victoria Benedictsson was on the whole one of the most sane and balanced literary figures of her generation. Her short stories and novels reveal a solid, healthy genius which reacted strenuously against the morbid aestheticism of certain of her immediate contemporaries. Though her art is marked by sharp individual traits, she was influenced to some extent by the Danish and Norwegian "problem literature" of her generation as well as by Dickens and George Eliot. Her two volumes of short stories, Från Skåne (1884; From Skåne) and Folkliif och småberättelser (1887; Folk Life and Short Stories), deal primarily with realistic folk motifs from the south of Sweden which she knew so well. She simply describes, with no literary pretensions and no forced obtrusion of "problems" or "themes," a form of life which she had known intimately from childhood. In this description of folk life there is no attempt either to idealize or to brutalize, and hence the tales remain to our day among the most genuine and living literary documents of the 1880's. The two novels published during her lifetime, Pengar (1885; Money) and Fru Marianne (1887), as well as the posthumous novel Modern (1888; The Mother), are more purely in the spirit of the Scandinavian 1880's than are her short stories, particularly in their choice of subject matter, marriage and the relation between man and woman. In Fru Marianne, however, Victoria Benedictsson reacts strongly against the tendency of the literature of the day (e.g., A Doll's House by Ibsen, q.v.) to attack the man and glorify the woman-in-revolt in the marriage relationship. Fru Marianne is, to begin with, a kind of "doll," but she finds salvation ultimately within the marriage relationship in consequence of a growing admiration for her husband's solid though unromantic virtues. The novel becomes a hymn to man at work on the soil. Among the unfinished manuscripts which Victoria Benedictsson upon her death left with her literary executor, Axel Lundegård, were a number of short stories and a play which deal with her tragic relationship with Georg Brandes. They reveal with marvelous intensity and power the nobility of her feelings in that relationship and are among her greatest literary productions. Apart from Strindberg (q.v.), it may be said that the 1880's in Sweden produced no more significant literary personality than Victoria Benedictsson.

See: A. Lundegård, Victoria Benedictsson; en självbiografi ur brev och anteckningar (1890; 3d ed. revised and enlarged, 2 vols., 1928); F. Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of O. Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919–1921), pp. 135–150; Ingrid af Schultén, Ernst Ahlgren (1925); S. Linder, Ernst Ahlgren i sina romaner (1930); G. Castrén, Den nya tiden, 1870–1914 (1932), Vol. VII of H. Schück and K. Warburg, Illustrerad svensk litteraturhistoria, 3d ed., pp. 176–192.

A. G.

Benediktsson, Einar (1864–1940, Icelandic poet), was born at Elliðavatn near Reykjavík, but he grew up in the North of Iceland. His father was a judge of the superior court, a district magistrate, and a political leader. Emulating the father, the son studied law in Copenhagen (graduating in 1892) and became a political editor (Dagskrá, 1896–1898), an attorney, and a district magistrate (1904–1907). After that he lived abroad, often in England, dividing his time between promotion of Icelandic natural resources and writing poetry, until he returned to his homeland shortly before 1930, his health broken. There he stayed in seclusion until his death.

His criticism of the older poets, especially the realists, in Dagskrá marks the turning point to a new national romanticism, with renewed stress on the national heritage and an insisting on a new capitalistic development of the country's natural resources. To begin with, he experimented with impressionistic prose sketches, but later he concentrated on poetry, producing the volumes Sögur og kvæði (1897; Stories and Poems), Hafblik (1906; Smooth Seas), Hrannir (1913; Waves), Vogar (1921; Inlets), and Hvamar (1930; Hollows). He made a translation (1901) of Ibsen's (q.v.) Peer Gynt.

Einar Benediktsson towers over his contemporaries. He is a great idealist aspiring to material as well as spiritual progress for his nation. His mind is occupied with the science and philosophy of the times, but it is also furnished with an abundance of images and patterns drawn from the native word-stock, and his power over the Icelandic language has become proverbial. His style is aristocratic and ornate, and there is hardly a slipshod note in the whole of his production. His poems are at times hard reading because of the unusually heavy burden of thought that they carry. Like Matthías Jochumsson (q.v.), Benediktsson is both broad and profound; but while Jochumsson centers his thought on God and man, Benediktsson starts with nature, whose outer form, land, sea, and sky, he describes with unequalled mastery and whose inner structure, from the electron to the galaxy, he seems to sense in a mystic communion. Indeed this mystic communion with the whole world, this pantheistic feeling, is evident in most of his poetry, whether he writes about the virgin nature of his homeland or the works of man in civilized countries—the forges of Newcastle upon Tyne, an evening in Rome, Stockholm, Fifth Avenue. He has tried to formulate his pantheistic religion in the essay “Alhygð” in Eimreiðin (1926).

In the beginning Benediktsson was a progressive national romanticist urging his compatriots not only to conserve the precious part of their heritage, their language and literature, but also to throw off their political yoke and even more so the sloth of centuries in order to join in the rapid progress of industrialization. What he preached he tried to carry out in practice, but without much success. In his later years his philosophical and mystic bent came more to the fore, but he never lost his dream of progress and expansion. In his poetry he roamed vikinglike over many lands in search of subjects, but no amount of foreign influence ever brought him to forget his beloved homeland.

See: K. Andrésen, Einar Benediktsson sjötugur (1934); R. Beck, “Iceland's ‘Poet Laureate,’” Books Abroad, X (1936), 270–271; S. Nordal, “Einar Benediktsson,” Skírnir, CXIV (1940), 5–23.

S. E.

Benelli, Sem (1875–, Italian dramatist), was born in Prato in Toscana. He has had a long career, writing many plays which commanded attention at the time of their production, but it seems likely that he will be remembered principally as the author of La Cena delle beffe (1909; the dates used here are those of presentation, not of publication). In its way this is as good a play as any in the modern Italian theatre; La Cena has not the intellectual appeal of a Pirandello (q.v.) drama, but it has more feeling, more poetry, and certainly an individuality of its own. The background of the Renaissance with its contrasts of subtlety and violence, refinement and brutality, is brought to a focus in a plot which has something of the flavor of a novella. La Cena portrays the traditional astute weakling who gains his terrible vengeance over the bullies who torment him, but the story is told with a psychological awareness which is quite modern and prevents the play from being merely a period piece. Not the least of its qualities is the language; a staccato blank verse, full of imagery and feeling, gives the play its tempo. La Cena won international acclaim (Eng. trs., The Jester's Supper, 1924–1925, The Jest, 1939); in no other play did Benelli show the same technical skill or create the same emotional intensity. The best of his other works, La Maschera di Bruto (1908), L'Amore dei tre re (1910), Le Nozze dei centauri (1915) have, it is true, the same elements, but the fusion of the lyric and the dramatic is not successfully achieved. Tignola (1908) is a sort of modern dress version of La Cena but lacking its power, and Il Vizzo di perle (1926) is a comedy that has charm but is of no particular importance.

Benelli was not merely a dramatist. He served his country as a soldier in the First World War and afterwards entered politics, being elected deputy in 1921. It would seem that the war had an important effect on his inspiration; his post-war plays, though not uninteresting, reveal an unsettled psychology, a restless striving after a new vein. In the late 20's he became manager of a company dedicated to producing plays of real artistic and literary merit on the Italian stage. In this venture Benelli had considerable success; his last noteworthy work, Orfeo e Proserpina (1929), was written for and produced by this company. The Opere of Benelli, one play to each of the 30 volumes, were published in 1934.

See: C. Lori, S. Benelli, il suo teatro, la sua compagnia (1928).

T. G. B.

Bengtsson, Frans Gunnar (1894–, Swedish essayist), born in Tossjö, province of Skåne, is a gentleman scholar with remarkably sensitive and highly developed literary talents. He has tried his hand with very considerable success as a lyric poet (Tärningskast, 1923, Throw of the Dice; Legenden om Babel, 1925, The Legend of Babel), as a translator (Paradise Lost, Chanson de Roland), as a biographer (Karl XII, 2 vols., 1935–1936), and, most recently, as a historical novelist (Röde Orm, 1942; Eng. tr., Red Orm, 1943). But he excels in the informal personal essay, a literary genre which he alone among modern Swedish authors handles with consummate skill and complete mastery. His first volume of essays, Litteratörer och militärer (1929; Literary and Military Figures), revealed him as a finished practitioner of informal prose exposition; and three volumes of essays which followed—Silver-sköldarna (1931; The Silver Shields), De långhåriga merovingerna (1933; The Long-haired Merovingians), and Sällskap för en eremit (1938; Companionship for a Hermit)—have firmly established him as the incomparably most distinguished Swedish exponent of the literary genre developed with so much success in England and France during the 19th century. In form Bengtsson's essays are primarily in the great tradition of the informal essay in England. They are particularly related, it would seem, to the essays of the romantics Lamb and Hazlitt, and perhaps to those of Stevenson, though the Swedish essayist's prose is nowhere slavishly imitative in manner. It is rather a marvelously virile, precise, and flexible medium of expression for a vigorous, many faceted, and astonishingly learned mind. The immense erudition in these essays—which includes a penchant that amounts almost to a passion for unusual, off the beaten track areas of knowledge—is handled lightly, with a grace and ease and a pulsing stylistic flair that one tends to associate with the clever dilettante rather than with the precise thinker or the serious scholar. In subject matter Bengtsson wanders widely over the whole range of human experience and the whole calendar of historical and semihistorical records and events. His earlier essays concerned themselves, apparently by personal preference, with literary figures and military heroes; one essay on Villon and another on General Stonewall Jackson are certainly among the best short prose sketches of these two personalities. His later essays reveal that he can write with fascinating freshness and comprehension on such well-worn themes as the difficulties of maintaining an optimistic view of human existence ("Försök till optimistisk betraktelse") or man's relation to nature ("Vintermänniskan"), or he can indulge in outpourings or apparently inexhaustible whimsicalities on such topics as the curious vagaries of his own literary tastes ("Framför en bokhylla") or the physical and mental habits of semidomesticated cats, rats, and bats ("Det närmaste sällskapet"). Serious or whimsical, penetrating or playful, satiric or constructive in purpose, Bengtsson is always interesting, for his essays give inimitable spontaneous expression to a restless, original mind possessing a natural flair for the unexpected, the unusual, one might almost say the unique. In tone and point of view Bengtsson may be said to combine in his essays something of the whimsicality of a Lamb with the vigor and independence of spirit of a Hazlitt and the heroic-romantic ideal of a Stevenson.

See: O. Bjurling, "Frans Bengtsson poeten och filosofen," Ord och bild, XLI (1932), 377–379.

A. G.

Benjamin, René (1885–, French novelist, dramatist, and critic), was born in Paris and educated at the Sorbonne. At the beginning of the First World War he had made a moderate reputation with a novel, Madame Bonheur (1909), a comedy, Le Pacha (1911), and two volumes of amusing but not very penetrating criticism of French officialdom, La Farce de la Sorbonne (1911; enlarged ed., 1921) and Les Justices de paix (1913). In 1915, however, his novel Gaspard, whose highly conventional hero demonstrated the heroism of the Parisian "little man" against the boche, found a ready-made public and won the Prix Goncourt. Since then Benjamin has produced prolifically without greatly adding to his reputation. His most successful work has been not his comedies or novels but the continuation of his satiric attacks on pretentiousness in high places, such as Aliborons et démagogues (1927) and Au soleil de la poésie: Sous l'œil en fleur de Madame de Noailles (1928). Witty and urbane, catching with a few swift strokes the very accent and visage of his victims, these sketches, whether of professors, judges and lawyers, politicians, or modern poets, cut through the haze of convention and tradition to reveal that it often hides the supremely ridiculous. Benjamin's point of view is essentially that of the rather skeptical bourgeois, and his success consists of applying to more exalted and pretentious circles the standards of common sense by which the average man would judge his neighbor. The results were superficially devastating. But Benjamin is no Voltaire, and the easygoing attitude, the bourgeois good humor, that makes him often more pleasant reading than Voltaire at the same time keeps him from going very deep, from ever grappling with ultimate principles. With La Prodigieuse Vie d'Honoré de Balzac (1925; Eng. tr., Balzac, 1927) Benjamin entered a new field. He has written since then a large number of popular biographies, notably Joffre (1929), Molière (1936), and Marie Antoinette (1940), marked by an entertaining style and his usual common sense but on the whole not rising greatly above the level of journalism. Les Sept Etoiles de France (1942) is a routine glorification of Pétain, and not even very good journalism.

Versatile as he is, in all his work Benjamin seems to be the victim of his own facility and his willingness to capitalize immediately on the undoubted power of his lively, practical, but often superficial mind. He was elected to the Goncourt Academy in 1938.

See: Lucien Dubech, Les Chefs de file (1925).
C. W., Jr.

Benn, Gottfried (1886–, German poet and critic), was born in Mansfeld, son of a Protestant minister and a Frenchwoman. Before the First World War intensified his personal problem, Benn, who as physician had specialized in venereal diseases, published his first poems under the significant title Morgue (1912). He continued to write while serving in the army, and Fleisch (1917) and Schutt (1924) evidenced an uncompromising pessimism. Much later, he turned to critical and essayistic prose—Nach dem Nihilismus (1932), Der neue Staat und die Intellektuellen (1933), Kunst und Macht (1934). Meanwhile he had written a number of stories ("Gehirne," "Die Eroberung," "Die Reise," "Der Geburtstag," all in the volume Gehirne, 1916) and a few dramatic scenes.

The importance of Benn for German literature transcends by far the value of his individual works, few if any of which may survive. In the unmitigated horror of his images he stands in the forefront of those German expressionists who, scorning the flight from life of the neo-romanticist or the cool impersonality of the impressionist, hurled themselves in passionate rebellion against the demons of a mechanized world, insisting upon the regeneration of man and the rediscovery of God. Benn functions here negatively, so to speak, carrying the work of the literary naturalist one step farther: the horrors he reports must lead to reform and reversal. In his prose he shares in those daring linguistic experiments which triumphantly demonstrated unsuspected possibilities of language.

B. Q. M.

Benoit, Pierre (1886–, French novelist), was born in Albi, Tarn; his childhood was spent in Tunisia and Algeria in the various garrisons to which his father, an army officer, was assigned. This background partly explains his love of travel and his inappeasable curiosity concerning picturesque places and exotic countries. In 1910, having started the study of law in Algiers, completed his military service in a regiment of Zouaves, and obtained his degree in literature in Montpellier, he went to Paris to prepare for a degree in history. His preparation was not, however, of a very serious nature. He much preferred the society of his friends, many of whom were also to make a name for themselves in the world of letters, such as Francis Carco, Pierre Mac-Orlan, and Roland Dorgelès (qq.v.). He failed to receive his degree but later, having passed an examination for a position in the Ministry of Public Instruction, became a government employee. During the First World War he served as a lieutenant and was wounded.

At the time of his arrival in Paris, Benoit had already written a play, which has never been published, and several poems, which appeared in 1914 under the title Diadumène. His first novel, Koenigsmark (1918), enjoyed great success and revealed its author to be a talented novelist. Conceived during the war, it is natural that it should deal with Germany. L'Atlantide (1919), one of the first best sellers of the post-war period, was a very well done adventure story. The scene of Pour Don Carlos (1920) is Spain, of Le Lac salé (1921) Utah, of La Chaussée des géants (1922) the Ireland of the Sinn Feiners. Mlle de la Ferté (1923) takes place in France, as does Le Roman des quatre, published in the same year and written in collaboration with Paul Bourget, Gérard d'Houville (qq.v.), and Henri Duvernois.

Because his duties with the Ministry of Public Instruction did not leave him sufficient leisure, Benoit resigned and in 1923 left for a 22-month tour through Turkey and Syria, from which he brought back La Châtelaine du Liban (1924) and Le Puits de Jacob (1925). A trip to the Far East furnished him with the inspiration for Le Roi lépreux (1927). There but remained for him to take a trip around the world, and this he proceeded to do. From Suez he went to Ceylon, Australia, New Caledonia, the New Hebrides, Tahiti, Panama, and the Antilles. Upon his return he wrote Erromango (1929), the locale of which is the New Hebrides. The heroine of Le Soleil de minuit (1930) is called Amide, and like all the author's heroines her name begins with the letter A. His Axelle (1928) conforms to this rule, and in it he once again treats of Germany and of the camps of war prisoners there. Since 1930 Benoit has every year written a love and adventure story, usually cleverly done and easy to read. He was elected to the French Academy in 1931.

See: René Aigrain, "L'Art et l'érudition de M. Pierre Benoit," Correspondant, CCLXXVIII (1920), 701-719; Armand Praviel, "Un Romancier de Gascogne: M. Pierre Benoit," Correspondant, CCLXXXVII (1922), 835-847.

P. B.

Berdyayev, Nikolai Aleksandrovich (1874-, Russian theologian, philosopher, and critic), is perhaps the foremost interpreter of modern Russian orthodoxy, whose challenging analyses of the philosophy of religion and history have exerted considerable influence in the Western World, without, however, having founded any school. An eclectic, he has followed no single master, though he has been variously influenced by Marx, Hegel, Schopenhauer, Nietzsche (q.v.), and Solovyov (q.v.). His thinking is essentially apocalyptic and eschatological. Its emphasis is on the moral and spiritual depths of the contemporary crisis in Western civilization. He attacks the heresies of racialism and collectivism, which in his view mean the end of Renaissance humanism with its basis in individualism and which herald a new Middle Ages. From this will emerge an era of a newly spiritualized man. In this cyclical conception of history Berdyayev is closer to St. Augustine than to Spengler. To Berdyayev history per se is tragic, but its contradictions may be resolved when set against the background of eternity.

Berdyayev was born in Kiev and educated in the Kiev Cadet Corps and in the University of Kiev, first in the faculty of natural sciences, then in the law school. Ever a stormy petrel, he has more than once run afoul of established policy. As a youth he became a student of Marxism. In 1898 he was arrested and expelled from the university. His first article appeared (1899) in Die neue Zeit, followed by his first book, Subektivizm i individualizm v obshchestvennoi filosofii (1900; Subjectivism and Individualism in Social Philosophy); this brought about a three-year exile in the Vologda region. In 1904 he became editor of Novy put (The New Path), and in 1905 editor of Voprosy zhizni (Problems of Life). Just before the fall of the monarchy (1917) he was again in jeopardy for having criticized the Erastianism of the governing synod of the Orthodox Church. After the Revolution he founded (1919) in Moscow the Free Academy of Spiritual Culture and was given the chair of philosophy at the University of Moscow. His defense of religion caused first his imprisonment and finally his exile (1922). He went to Berlin and thence to Paris (1934), where he has since resided as director of the Academy of the Philosophy of Religion, first founded by him in Berlin, and as editor of Put (Path).

Berdyayev has published a long series of works, widely translated, of which the most important are Novoye srednevekovie (1923; A New Middle Ages), Mirosozertzanie Dostoyevskago (1923; Eng. tr., Dostoevsky, 1934), O naznachanii cheloveka (1931; Eng. tr., The Destiny of Man, 1935), Filosofiya svobodnago dukha (1927; The Philosophy of the Free Spirit), which was awarded a prize by the French Academy, Smysl istorii (1923; Eng. tr., The Meaning of History, 1936), Dukh i realnost (1937; Eng. tr., Spirit and Reality, 1939), Konstantin Leontev (published in a French tr., 1938; Eng. tr., Constantine Leontiev, 1940). Other books, available in English, are The Russian Revolution; Two Essays on Its Implication in Religion and Psychology (1931), The End of Our Time (1933), The Bourgeois Mind and Other Essays (1934), Freedom and the Spirit (1935), The Origin of Russian Communism (1937), War and the Christian Conscience (1938), Slavery and Freedom (1943).

See: Eberhard Dennert, Die Krisis der Gegenwart und die kommende Kultur: Eine Einfuehrung in die Geschichtsphilosophie Berdjajews (1928); Leo Shestov, "Nikolai Berdyayev: gnosis i ekzistentsialnaya filosofiya," Sovremennyya zapiski, LXVII (1938), 196-229; Monroe Beardsley, "Berdyayev: Sybil in Waste Land," Russian Review, II (1943), 10-18.

N. S.

Berent, Wacław (1873-1940, Polish novelist), was born in Warsaw, the son of a prominent dealer in optical instruments. A passion for research was Berent's most marked trait, from his boyish excursions into the natural world with the help of his father's microscopes to the final accumulation of primary material for his Zmierzch wodzów (1939; Twilight of the Leaders). The same zeal for investigation which won Berent a doctorate in biology from Munich in his early 20's drove him later as a man of letters to undertake the task of revealing through the novel the "genealogy of the Polish soul" from the partitions to the resurrection. His pioneer work in the execution of this task was Fachowiec (1898; The Expert), a portrait of Polish society in the epoch of positivism, when youth fled from cultural pursuits into engineering and business. Next came Próchno (1901; Rotten Wood), a case study of the Young Poland era and of the fin-de-siècle mood in general, based on Berent's own experiences and observations over a wide area, including Munich and Paris, Zurich and Berlin, as well as Cracow and his native Warsaw. After this followed Ozimina (1911; Winter Wheat), which Berent intended as an answer to the Wesele of Wyspiański (q.v.) but which was in reality only a Warsaw counterpart of that Cracovian warning, since in this the author depicted with exact fidelity the danse macabre of Polish life in the capital on the eve of the Russo-Japanese War. Finally, in the cycle Nurt (The Current), Berent delineated, in order, the buriers of Poland (Pogrobowcy, 1934), then certain of her restorers (Diogenes w kontuszu, 1937; Diogenes in Polish Dress). Berent's last work, the above-mentioned Zmierzch wodzów, was a fictionized evocation of certain of Poland's "last leaders," notably General Dąbrowski.

Berent endeavored in all his writings to suit his style to the period in question, and the effort, coupled with the fact that he was an investigator by temperament rather than an artist, made his style often seem labored and artificial. A deep student of Nietzsche (q.v.) and an admirer of the Middle Ages—this is seen especially in Żywe kamienie (1918; Living Stones)—Berent was also a great Warsaw patriot and to the end of making Warsaw a great intellectual and artistic center founded in 1930 a new literary monthly, Pamiętnik warszawski (Warsaw Memoir). Berent lived to see all his dreams for his native city shattered and the city itself in ruins under German occupation.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, I (1927), 85–105; reviews in Wiadomości literackie, 1934, No. 47, 1937, No. 13, 1939, No. 23; M. Kridl, "Wacław Berent, 1873–1910," Slavonic Year-Book, XX (1941), 401–404.

A. P. C.

Bergamín, José (1894–, Spanish essayist), was born in Madrid. He is a prominent figure in the group of writers of the post-war generation who, influenced by current literary taste, tend to adopt shorter forms of prose expression. The most consummate examples of this fragmentation of the literary unit are seen in the "glosses" of Eugenio D'Ors, in the gruerías of Ramón Gómez de la Serna (qq.v.), and, as its most recent manifestation, in the "aphorisms" of Bergamín.

His first book, El cohete y la estrella (1923), and also some of his most felicitous contributions such as La cabeza a pájaros (1934) are in this manner. Notwithstanding his very modern sensibility, Bergamín has pronounced Spanish roots; in a sense he directly stems from the Generation of '98 and was influenced by the master Unamuno (q.v.), from whom he takes a number of themes; more remotely he is connected with the classic writers of Spanish thought and language. Bergamín at times is closer to the literary processes arising with the Generation of '98 than to the evolution of taste after the First World War. His group posited a whole series of ideological and stylistic problems. Then, as it sought a new linguistic flexibility, as it rejuvenated words by giving them new yet pristine meanings, a rhetoric was evolved in certain sectors of Spanish prose which in successive stages becomes linguistic "wit," the modern "conceptism" of Bergamín. He himself offers us a sagacious interpretation of the related spirit of the 17th century in his work Mangas y capirotes (1933).

"Popular" themes are part of Bergamín's inspiration. Popular thought and sentiment are ever present in his work. He frequently starts the development of a theme or the conclusion or analysis of a bit of reasoning with a word used in the sense given it by the people. He often makes use of a saying or a proverb from which he draws all the depth and wisdom that it has lost in the course of being bandied about from mouth to mouth. Sometimes he modifies a proverb by altering its traditional meaning in favor of a new one, or he combines popular expressions to reach an unexpected conclusion. Frequently the best and most attractive part of his prose results from this literary manipulation. Bergamín makes real discoveries, full of philosophic meaning, of a trenchant wit and humor which connects him with certain permanent modalities of the Spanish spirit. This humor, bitter at times, this "intention," his vivaciousness and passionate interest in the current or historical themes that he treats, prevent his work from degenerating into a pure display of cleverness. A militant fervor, an intellectual passion, are constant in his writings. Often, along with the deft selection of expression, there is an echo of the impassioned and lyrical tremor of Unamuno.

From the beginning Bergamín found his norm in a Catholic position, continually vivified by doubt. This is an interior combative position, much in harmony with his temperament. He was the founder in Madrid of Cruz y raya (1933-1936), a journal which, besides collecting the most select Spanish literature produced during the years of its publication, reflected the Catholic and liberal, the religious and ideological position of Bergamín, who had close connections with the French and Belgian group of the journal Esprit. In the light of his character, he could not help taking a definite position in the Spanish civil struggle, and he was an ardent supporter of the cause of the people. More recently, from his refuge in Mexico City, some of his latest books (e.g., Detrás de la cruz, 1941) are devoted to the spiritual drama of the Spanish people. In this city he is continuing his publishing activity as the founder and editor of the publishing establishment "Séneca."

See: P. Salinas, Literatura española siglo XX (1941).

F. G. L.

Berger, Johan Henning (1872-1924, Swedish novelist and dramatist), a native of Stockholm, spent the 1890's in the United States, for the most part in Chicago. Later he visited Munich and Paris and after 1902 Copenhagen became his official residence.

Berger's work is founded primarily on his own experiences; e.g., Ysail (1905) and Bendel & C:o (1910), the second novel of the trilogy Drömlandet (1909-1911; The Land of Dreams), have settings laid in Chicago. At times Berger seems to be baldly realistic, but his work bears the hallmark of impressionism. There is no deep probing, no profound experiencing; rather, there is a deployment of poignant emotions, with that of pain predominating. Although strong in descriptive powers, Berger revealed weaknesses in plot construction. His outstanding works are Ysail, the trilogy Drömlandet, Livets blommor (1912; Life's Flowers), and the drama Syndafloden (1908; produced in the United States in 1917 as The Deluge). Berger often depicted Swedish immigrants who could not adapt themselves to the American environment. The figures are sensitive creatures fashioned for intense suffering, even from superficial hurts. They long for the world of dreams and are bitterly disappointed in never attaining it.

See: A. Möller, ed., Boken om Henning Berger, en minnesgård av hans vänner (1924); E. Norling, Mänskligt (1930), pp. 149-191, 229-271.

C. E. W. L. D.

Bergman, Bo (1869-, Swedish lyricist, critic, and writer of short stories), was born in Stockholm and educated at Uppsala. At first an official in the Post Office Department, he has mainly worked as a newspaper critic. He made his debut as a poet with Marionetterna (1903; Marionettes). This he followed with other volumes of lyrics and of short stories, notably Skeppet (1915; The Ship). Bergman is a city recluse, a serene observer of life, who has a deep love for both the past and present of his native city. Although not an outstanding figure, he has a certain mastery in whatever he undertakes: essay, narrative, or verse. Inclined to pessimism, he cultivates the mood of sunset with especial charm. There is something of Wordsworth in Bo Bergman's poetry—an observant eye, a serious trend of thought, and a spirit attuned to the bliss of solitude. In his stories there is a similar fineness of perception and an understanding pity for the victims of complex maladjustments. In this he shows the influence of Hjalmar Söderberg (q.v.). Bergman has well deserved the distinction of membership in the Swedish Academy.

See: C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930); H. A. Larsen, ed., Sweden's Best Stories (1928); G. Bach, The History of the Scandinavian Literatures, ed. by Frederika Blankner (1938).

C. W. S.

Bergman, Hjalmar (1883-1930, Swedish novelist and playwright), was born at Örebro, a small residential town in central Sweden. Delicate and sensitive as a child, he suffered all his life from mental depression. He studied at Uppsala and in Italy, specializing in history and philosophy, but the most important part of his education was the knowledge of local life he obtained through the clientele of his father, who was a banker. Marrying into a well-known theatrical family, Bergman became early familiar with the stage and began his literary career as a dramatist. He won a decided success in comedy, having several plays produced at the Royal Dramatic Theatre. His most important piece, Swedenhielms (1925; The Swedenhielm Family), is a study of amusing artistic types.

It was, however, in the novel and short story that Hjalmar Bergman attained his fullest expression. From 1910 to 1930 he was the most popular prose writer in Sweden, producing volume after volume of such variety in mood and characterization that he has been called by some a Swedish Dickens. He began in a tragic vein with exotic scenes inspired by his sojourn in Italy and the Near East, notably the volume Amours (1910), a group of masterly studies in sex psychology. He then turned to themes in many other times and places, but most significantly to contemporary life in the small Swedish town and in Stockholm. This group of novels may, on a small scale, be compared to La Comédie humaine of Balzac. Conspicuous among them are Markurells i Wadköping (1919; Eng. tr., God's Orchid, 1924); Farmor och Vår Herre (1921; The Grandmother and Our Lord); and Chefen fru Ingeborg (1924, Madame Directress Ingeborg; Eng. tr., The Head of the Firm, 1936). There is in these a sharp cynical tone, much more akin indeed to the French masters than to Dickens, as well as an increasing influence of Freudian abnormality. The result is brilliant and highly sensational, not always agreeable to conventional readers. The plots frequently border on the grotesque and improbable. It is perhaps in his short stories that Hjalmar Bergman is most satisfying. Yet in all his work he shows deep insight and a command of plastic and vivid style that raise him close to the best in modern fiction.

See: R. G. Berg, "Preface," in Bergman, The Head of the Firm (1936); G. Bach, The History of the Scandinavian Literatures, ed. by Frederika Blankner (1938); E. Linder, Hjalmar Bergmans ungdom (1942).

C. W. S.

Bergson, Henri (1859–1941, French philosopher), undoubtedly possessed and illustrated some of the finest qualities of the French genius; yet, to the confusion of race theorists, not a drop of Gallic blood was flowing in his veins. His ancestors had been wealthy, orthodox Jewish merchants of Warsaw, who shipped grain down the Vistula to Danzig. His father, a musician and composer, roamed Western Europe and married an English girl by the name of Katherine Levinson. Their children were British citizens, and the future philosopher, though born and reared in Paris, became a naturalized Frenchman only after receiving his bachelor's degree. As late as 1878–1881 professors and students of the Ecole Normale Supérieure pronounced him très anglais in his training and mental bent. Did he not, in a generation newly won over to Kantianism, present the unusual spectacle of remaining faithful to the tenets of John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer?

It was not long, however, before the young educator, then in the provinces, underwent a spiritual crisis of his own. It dawned upon him that mechanistic hypotheses, and our ordinary activities as well, rest on a conception of time thoroughly incompatible with the immediate data of consciousness. Time as we perceive it from within is not at all that homogeneous, quantitative substance which the clock parcels out in equal installments. "Lived time," or duration, is irregular, qualitative, indivisible. Valid though they may be, even indispensable, for practical purposes, the mensurations of the dial rob time of its temporal essence; they are indeed but a symbolical substitute borrowed from the categories of space; they transcribe something intensive into something extensive, something alive into something inert, something of the spirit into something of matter.

Such was Bergson's famous "intuition of duration," a truly decisive step in his career since it determined both the method and the content of his doctrine. Starting from the pragmatic assumption that our subservience to the external world tends to standardize and mechanize the processes of the mind, Bergsonian philosophy boldly proceeds to reverse the trend and to remove, as it were, the several layers of materiality accumulated upon us. The Essai sur les données immédiates de la conscience, Bergson's doctoral dissertation (1889; Eng. tr., Time and Free Will, 1910) proclaims the freedom of the mind as an experimental fact, directly ascertainable by intuition, although most men ignore it and their superficial psychic states are heavily embedded in the law of necessity. Matière et mémoire (1896; Eng. tr., Matter and Memory, 1911) asserts just as positively that our so-called past recollections preserve an immanent existence and are always present within us or, in other terms, that the mind, being one continuous flow of consciousness, never forgets, never distinguishes between today and yesterday, whereas the brain, supposedly the receptacle of memory, is but an instrument of selection which eliminates and throws into oblivion what is not useful to us. Finally, L'Évolution créatrice (1907; Eng. tr., Creative Evolution, 1911) defines the mind as undiluted energy, knowing itself intuitively as a genetic impulse, an élan vital, ever swelling, ever "becoming," ever participating in the universal creation of forms, despite and against the downward, the deadly pull of instinctive passivity.

Rather foolish doubts have been cast occasionally on Bergson's originality. But these three great, epochal books, however much they may owe to Heraclitus, Plotinus, Maine de Biran (1766–1824), Félix Ravaisson (1823– 1900), Emile Boutroux (q.v.), and a score of others, bear in themselves sufficient testimony that he who wrote them knew how to melt a variety of elements in the crucible of his own thought. Other works by him merely strengthen the very personal fiber of his doctrine. Le Rire, a little classic (1900; Eng. tr., Laughter, 1911), stresses the ridiculous character of whatever in man is grossly reminiscent of the mechanical. L'Energie spirituelle (1919; Eng. tr., Mind-Energy, 1920) and La Pensée et le mouvant (1934) are collections of essays with self-explanatory titles. In Durée et simultanéité (1922) Bergson appraises his theories in relation to those of Einstein. As for Les Deux Sources de la morale et de la religion (1932; Eng. tr., The Two Sources of Morality and Religion, 1935), this book, in many respects the author's testament, effects a near-fusion of Bergsonism and Christianity. The former disciple of Spencer, having demonstrated to his satisfaction the factual immanence of the soul, is now willing to admit of its immortality.

Anti-intellectual in the sense that it grants intelligence the privilege of "thinking matter" but denies it the higher one of "understanding life," the new metaphysics drew heavy fire from the rationalists (e.g., Julien Benda, q.v.). When called a mystic, a fetishist, a dreamer, Bergson rebelled, clinging to his tenacious belief in the experimental value of intuition. When called a poet he softened because, after all, he was quite aware of being one—the rediscoverer of some sort of paradise lost, a supreme artisan of words and images, who broke the automatism of language, who, with the help of metaphors, suggested at least, if he could not express, the reality that he had seen. Thus Bergson was a stirrer of souls. His courses at the Collège de France, where he was made a professor in 1900, held spellbound huge crowds of listeners (among them the usual number of snobs and fashionable women) who thronged the lecture room hours before his arrival. In much the same manner L'Evolution créatrice fascinated readers all over the world. International from then on, the Bergsonian current ran its unpredictable course far beyond the limits of philosophy proper. Bergsonism outside of Bergson is much less a body of doctrine, faithfully accepted and transmitted as such, than it is an état d'âme or, more appropriately still, an élan vital. In France alone, it pervaded literature through Charles Péguy and Marcel Proust (qq.v.); it entered the field of literary criticism through Albert Thibaudet (q.v.) and that of aesthetics through Tancrède de Visan (1878–; see his Attitude du lyrisme contemporain, 1911); it made itself felt in psychopathology with Charles Blondel (1876–), in sociology with Maurice Halbwachs (1877–), even in syndicalistic theory with Georges Sorel (q.v.). To Edouard Le Roy (1870–), Bergson's successor in the Collège de France (1921), fell the task of achieving the complete merger of Bergsonism and Catholic theology.

Elected to the French Academy in 1914, chosen by the League of Nations as the first chairman of its International Committee on Intellectual Cooperation (1921–1925), awarded the Nobel prize in 1927, Bergson rode on the crest of honors until his health broke down. The last years of his life were a long agony of bedridden invalidism. But as if to crown his evidence with the most triumphant argument of them all, the flame of the spirit shone to the last in the stricken body.

See: Albert Thibaudet, Trente Ans de vie française, Vol. III in 2 vols.: Le Bergsonisme (1923); Jacques Chevalier, Bergson (1926; Eng. tr., 1928); André Metz, Bergson et le bergsonisme (1933); Gilbert Maire, Bergson, mon maître (1935); Alfredo Coviello, "Bibliografia bergsoniana," Sustancia (Tucumán, Argentina), II (1941), 394–440 (also 11 articles by various collaborators, pp. 317 ff.).

J.-A. B.

Bernanos, Georges (1888–, French novelist and political writer), was born in Paris. He suddenly came into the limelight in 1926 with the publication of Sous le soleil de Satan (Eng. tr., The Star of Satan, 1940), a powerful study of mysticism and satanism, a masterpiece of French fiction. Up to 1926 his literary activity had been limited to occasional articles in the Action française, the Revue universelle, and less widely known royalist newspapers and magazines. He is both a novelist of rare originality and an effective polemist.

Bernanos can perhaps be best characterized as a firm believer in the essential dignity of man and a militant Christian for whom sanctity constitutes the highest form of adventure and heroism. The comment attributed to him by a critic to the effect that all Dostoevski (q.v.) should be done over in a Catholic spirit best illustrates the fundamental aim which he has pursued not only in Sous le soleil de Satan, but in the novels L'Imposture (1927), La Joie (1929), and Journal d'un curé de campagne (1936; Eng. tr., The Diary of a Country Priest, 1937). Succeeding where Huysmans and Léon Bloy (qq.v.) had failed in the final decades of the last century, he has described in these books the mysterious reactions of the human soul to the solicitations of divine grace in a way satisfactory to exacting literary critics and to informed students of mystical theology.

As a polemist Bernanos is strongly opposed to the spirit of parliamentary democracy because, according to him, this form of government is based upon a materialistic philosophy which offers no real check to the greed and selfishness of the financially powerful and leads inevitably to either economic or political tyranny. For France he advocates a return to monarchy as the political regime offering the best guarantees for the harmonious development of a society based upon true honor and justice. The policy of appeasement pursued by the great powers, more particularly by certain elements in his own country, in connection with the conquest of Ethiopia, the destruction of Loyalist Spain by the forces of fascism, and the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia at Munich constitutes in his estimation one of the blackest and most shameful pages in the history of mankind. It is also his earnest conviction that Western civilization can be saved from total disintegration only by a spiritual revival based upon the unequivocal acceptance of the Roman Catholic interpretation of the concepts of justice, honor, and freedom. His plea for a new moral order is not addressed exclusively, or even specifically, to those outside the Catholic Church, but is intended just as much for members of that body. Many Catholic leaders, the author contends, have allowed casuistry and opportunism to lead them into unholy alliances with the forces of reaction. These views, which form the sum and substance of the political creed of Bernanos, have been expressed with great force and earnestness in La Grande Peur des bien-pensants: Edouard Drumont (1931), Les Grands Cimetières sous la lune (1938; Eng. tr., A Diary of My Times, 1938), Scandale de la vérité (1939), Nous autres Français (1939), and Lettre aux Anglais (1942; Eng. tr., Plea for Liberty, 1944).

See: Pierre Brodin, "Georges Bernanos," in Maîtres et témoins de l'entre-deux-guerres (1943), pp. 183-199.

J. M. C.

Bernard, Jean Jacques (1888-, French dramatist and novelist), born at Enghien-les-Bains, is the son of the well-known playwright Tristan Bernard (q.v.) He is the outstanding exponent of the dramatic theory baptized the "school of silence." According to it "the theatre is first and foremost the art of expressing what is unspoken," that is to say, the inaudible but pregnant speech of the heart and soul, what lies inhibited or buried in the subconsciousness, what a pretentious rhetoric be-fogs or conceals behind a screen of words.

Bernard's talent, first revealed before the First World War, came to flower in his post-war theatre, in La Maison épargnée (1919) and especially in Le Feu qui reprend mal (1921; Eng. tr., The Sulky Fire, 1939), both dramas of soldiers who return from war to face, the one an unsympathetic environment and the other love grown cold through absence and not readily rekindled. His art reached its peak in Martine (1922; Eng. tr., 1927), which tells the simple tale of a peasant girl's romance with a city charmer, blighted all too soon. Here is pure drama in its very essence, freed from all rhetoric, ideology, and dramatic trappings. The characters in it are transparent, the passion is both intense and diaphanous.

The same qualities characterize the rest of Bernard's delicately intimate dramas. He has mirrored the illusions and deceptions of life, its pipe dreams, the rainbows of romance and highways of desire, which the imagination builds from the horizons to one's doors and which reality pricks like bubbles; he has painted the tragedies of love, of deep but smothered passion, of soul mates in distress and divided on earth, and the dramas of spiritual and social imperfections and even of industrial strife, in plays like L'Invitation au voyage (1924; Eng. trs., Glamour, 1927, Invitation to a Voyage, 1939), L'Ame en peine (1926; Eng. tr., The Unquiet Spirit, 1932), A la recherche des cœurs (1934), National 6 (1935). He has rendered as with strings, and in a minor key, the themes and variations the post-war theatre often played as though with wind instruments, sometimes off key. With him poetry catches up with realism and psychology in the theatre. He extracts beauty and pathos out of the most fugitive aspects of life—a look, a sigh, a momentary silence. His insight into the heart is not marred by splashes of jarring passion. The quality of his analysis, the purity of his style, and the sensitiveness of his dramatic climate give to his creations a classic ring. Bernard has also written short stories, as well as novels like Le Roman de Martine (1929) and Madeleine Landier (1933). After the liberation of France, he published an account of the imprisonment of French Jews in a concentration camp, Le Camp de la mort lente: Compiègne 1941-1942 (1945).

See: J. L. Palmer, Studies in the Contemporary Theatre (1927), pp. 94-111; L. Hommel, "Le Théâtre de Jean-Jacques Bernard," Revue générale, XIII (1935), 592-597; J. L. Frith, "Introduction," in Bernard, The Sulky Fire (1939), pp. 7-11.

S. A. R.

Bernard, Tristan (pseud. of Paul Bernard, 1866-, French dramatist, novelist, and wit), was born at Besançon. He changed his given name to Tristan, desiring to suggest, some of his friends have said, the underlying melancholy of his humor. At the beginning of his career he contributed to the Revue blanche. In 1889 his novel Les Mémoires d'un jeune homme rangé and his well-known short comedy L'Anglais tel qu'on le parle both met with great success. His later novels, such as Le Mari pacifique (1901), were widely read and exerted through their keen power of observation, sense of the ridiculous, and fundamental pessimism a beneficial influence over the novel of that period which had turned to a rather questionable lyricism.

His fame, however, rests chiefly on his hilarious comedies which have amused several generations of theatregoers both in France and abroad. He has often been compared with Courteline (q.v.), while his detached irony and sly humor recall American and English writers of the same school. Essentially a popular dramatist, he has remained apart from any school and has followed the old traditions of the comedy since the time of Plautus, with frequent resort to concealments, disguises, and mistaken identity. One of his best-known plays, Triplepatte (1905), shows the difficulty experienced by a man who cannot make any decision as to marriage because of too much advice from his many friends; Le Prince Charmant (1921) portrays the familiar type of young man who is sympathetic to everyone but absolutely unreliable in financial matters. Le Petit Café (1911) presents the amusing situation of a waiter who is to inherit a fortune on condition that he remain with his employer for 20 years. Some of his other well-known comedies are Daisy (1902), M. Codomat (1907), Le Danseur inconnu (1909), La Gloire ambulancière (1913), and Les Petites Curieuses (1920).

A familiar figure in both Parisian society and literary circles, Bernard has created many a famous bon mot and has graciously accepted the paternity of many others until he is now not infrequently spoken of as the national humorist.

See: L. Treich, ed., L'Esprit de Tristan Bernard (1925).

J. F. M.

Bernstein, Henry (1876-, French playwright), was born in Paris. He is generally thought of as a painter of heartless and brutal characters, hard businessmen, cynical adventurers. This reputation is due to violent dramas such as La Rafale (1905), La Griffe (1906), and Samson (1907). Bernstein, however, had begun his dramatic career with comedies of a milder type, Le Marché (1900), Le Détour (1902), Joujou (1902), Frère Jacques (1904; written with Pierre Veber), Le Bercaïl (1904).

After 1913 he wrote a few plays where the emphasis is placed on the characters rather than on a tense and dynamic plot. Le Secret (1913), an analysis of a malicious woman who enjoys hurting those whom she pretends to love, and La Galerie des glaces (1924), built around a case of inferiority complex and retrospective jealousy, are among his best psychological dramas. Such subtle studies are the exception in Henry Bernstein's theatre. As a rule his characters are dominated by violent passions which they satisfy without any consideration for the usual codes of morality and decency. The public at times reacted unfavorably, as in the case of Après moi (1911).

Henry Bernstein is an expert technician who knows how to place his characters in the light which will best intensify the tragic elements of the plot. Israël (1908), based on a conflict between Jews and members of the French aristocracy, provides an excellent example of his talent in creating dramatic atmospheres. Aware of the changes in the public's taste Bernstein, while keeping his main characteristics, treats with remarkable ease the most varied subjects. Judith (1922), Mélo (1929), Espoir (1934), are proofs of his versatility.

See: G. Rageot, "Un Nouveau Bernstein," Revue bleue, November 15, 1924, and "La Nouvelle Esthétique d'Henry Bernstein," ibid., April 3, 1926; L. Le Sidaner, Henry Bernstein (1931).

M. E. C.

Bertrana, Prudenci (1867-1941, Catalan novelist), was born in the city of Tortosa, received his education in Ampurdan, and spent much of his youth in Gerona, where he contemplated nature and developed gifts as a writer and painter. He originally intended to be a painter, but it was in the literary field that he was to attain real success. His first important work was Naufrags (1907; The Shipwrecked). Josefat is characterized by a crude and savage realism he never thereafter abandoned. Jo is a passionate and turbulent novel in which one does not know where the fiction ends and libel begins; characters are observed with a stinging sharpness. Proses barbares are wild stories written in a lively and colorful prose which came to be his habitual manner. Herois (Heroes) and El meu amic Pellini (My Friend Pellini) followed. In 1931 he won the coveted Crexells prize which the government of Catalonia awarded each year to the best novel, with L'hereu (The Heir). Full of biographical references, L'hereu reveals Bertrana's predilection for a vigorously portrayed nature, with sharp contrasts brought out with the love of a landscape artist. A later novel is El vagabund (The Vagabond). Bertrana also did considerable work as a journalist.

In all of his literary work there is present Bertrana's dual quality of painter and writer. He brought to Catalonian literature a pessimism perhaps less severe than that of Victor Català (q.v.) and cultivated a ruralism less full of bitterness, but still acrid. Some of his work has a human quality, blood-warm and vital.

F. de P.

Betteloni, Vittorio (1840–1910, Italian poet and critic), was born in Verona, where, except for university studies in Pisa, he passed almost all his life. He was a teacher and was often in contact with Milanese literary salons and coteries. Carducci (q.v.) defined him as the first Italian poet to get away from romanticism. He was a quiet, honest, simple soul and had the courage to remain so when Italian writers began to feel the need of absinthe, the smell of death and the attraction to suicide to stimulate their jaded poetic daemons. (In Italy this phenomenon was known as scapigliatura.) His own daemon obtained milder satisfactions from a milliner of Florence and a woman who played cards in the evening with professors and vicars. His poetry is gently sensuous and a little banal, but this very touch of ordinary living and of realistic details, simply and roughly applied from his palette to his idyllic pictures, produced something of a sensation in his time. Romanticists were irritated, and young readers, who had had a taste of the heady, heroic, and magniloquent Carducci, mocked him, but Carducci, the master, recognized him as a poet and wrote one of his rare prefaces for Betteloni's Nuovi Versi (1880). Because of these very details—prosaic, realistic—Betteloni in a certain sense is considered the predecessor of the Crepuscular school of poets, without, however, their characteristic heartaches and yearnings.

Cultured and very clever at versification, Betteloni translated with success Byron's Don Juan, Goethe's Hermann und Dorothea, and Hamerling's Nero. Now and then he gives evidence of having been exposed, like almost all Italian poets of that period, to the germ of Heine, but everyone may see how little the resulting malady afflicted him by comparing him with the contemporary Heine-tainted Stecchetti.

During the last few years of his life Betteloni manifested a degree of irascibility at being neglected when D'Annunzio (q.v.), who to him seemed bombastic, Pascoli (q.v.), whom he thought a deceiver, and Orsini (pseud. of Domenico Gnoli, q.v.), "a mystifier," gathered to themselves all the laurels. Perhaps he was not even mollified by the fervid approbation in 1904 of Benedetto Croce (q.v.). In some of his prose essays there are vivid sketches of living people written in a subdued tone of human irony. The best of his poetical production was gathered in a single volume, Poesie di Vittorio Betteloni (1914); his prose writings are contained in Impressioni critiche e ricordi autobiografici (1914).

See: G. Brognoligo, Vittorio Betteloni; note biografiche e critiche descritte dal suo carteggio (1938).

G. P.

Betti, Ugo (1892–, Italian poet, dramatist, and short-story writer), born in Camerino, is a judge by profession. A real poet of the post-war generation (although he began his literary career in 1910 by publishing a translation in the style of Foscolo of the Epithalamium of Catullus), he seems to stand at the confluence of European poetical streams. Critics have found in him traces of the nostalgic weakness of the crepuscolari, reminiscences of the glittering display of D'Annunzio (q.v.), echoes of the French symbolists (see French symbolism) and especially of the weird and uncanny visitations of Maeterlinck (q.v.), and imitations of popular ballads. It may be added that certain rapid cadences recall the manner of Jahier (q.v.). As for his theatre there come to mind the names of Pirandello (q.v.) and his feeling of inescapable human misery; of Georg Kaiser (q.v.) and his tendency to universalize; of Chekhov (q.v.) and his morbid softness; of Vildrac, Gorki, L. N. Tolstoy (qq.v.) and their collectivist thought. In his short stories the staccato style of Verga (q.v.) has struck the critics. All this shows that Betti is a cultured man of his epoch. Not one of these tendencies is permanent in his poetical language; and for each of these cultural resonances, there is evidence of a personal thought and feeling.

Betti is, to put it briefly and insufficiently, not so much a decadent, as he has been called, as a neo-romanticist. His poetical creations, which at the beginning had a folkloristic and later gradually assumed a realistic tone, are woven around the assumption that human happiness and pain are without reason or explanation and therefore a stupendous burden to man. His God, like that of Vigny or of Leopardi, is cold and indifferent towards his creation, and life, not guided by reason, is but a marvelous iniquity. This pessimistic view expressed itself in fables, tales, and myths, with a discernible popular rhythm; in ballads of laments of human groups (the little old women, the emigrants, the drinkers, the sleeping lovers); in figures without a name, symbols that bespeak humanity (a sinner without consolation, a worried king, dwellings of men). Later the same desolation reappeared in a realistic form, in short studies of everyday life, in which is felt Betti's vast solicitude, his feeling of being deceived, his presentation of sexual love with such a crude and intense perception of details that the general feeling of pity, commiseration, and ineluctable love for his fellow men is sometimes destroyed. His characters have a tendency to become types, his countries have no frontiers, his epochs no precise time. But even in the most realistic study of the Italian middle class, there is a final poetic inspiration, a current that carries the reader beyond prosaic everyday life. Characteristically enough, not a word of patriotic rhetoric, not a line of flattery for the Duce during the years of Fascism came from the pen of Betti.

Betti produced little between his Re pensiero (1922) and Uomo e donna (1937). The Canzonetta: La Morte (1932) won him the prize of the Mondadori Academy and, considering the general failure of these prizes in discovering good writers, this exception must be noted. Caino (1929) and Le Case (1937) are books of short stories. Several plays have been praised by critics and applauded by audiences: Frana allo scalo nord (1932), a study of the responsibility or better the irresponsibility of a criminal; Il Diluvio (1932); Il Cacciatore d'anitre (1937); and La Padrona (1927), considered his best play and perhaps symbolical of life, where the "Mistress," Life, is depicted as an attractive, powerful, cynical woman. Several critics have recognized in him a great poet and felt that he has succeeded in overcoming the calligraphic tendency of contemporary Italian lyricism, reverting to a poetry of human content. Some lines of his poems already enjoy a certain popularity and are often quoted.

See: E. De Michelis, La Poesia di Ugo Betti

(1937); D. Fabbri, "La Drammatica di Ugo Betti," Rivista italiana del dramma, Anno IV (1940), Vol. I, No. 2, pp. 129-153.

G. P.

Bezruč, Petr (pseud. of Vladimír Vašek, 1867-, Czech poet), is one of the greatest names in recent Czech literature. Bezruč was born in Opava (Troppau, then in Austrian Silesia), where his father, Antonín Vašek, was a prominent Czech patriot and philologist. For a time he studied classics at the University of Prague, but gave this up and entered the postal service in Brno, Moravia. He retired in 1927. During the First World War, Bezruč was imprisoned for his attacks on the Archduke Frederick. After the war, his voice was heard in favor of an aggressive nationalism and a strong local Moravian patriotism.

Bezruč is the author of only one collection of poems, Slezské písně (Silesian Songs), which first appeared in a small edition in 1903 as Slezské číslo (A Silesian Number) and then was successively enlarged. It is the most original and powerful group of poems in modern Czech poetry. Bezruč eschewed all expression of the self and created the figure of a popular bard and prophet, Petr Bezruč, who sings the sorrows of his race. He is particularly the poet of the Czechs in Silesia, where national and social oppression was especially strong under the old Austria. Bezruč passionately accuses the German landlords and capitalists, but also pleads for his people, the miners and peasants of Silesia, against the indifference to their fate among the Czechs in Bohemia and Moravia. His rhapsodies have a tragic pathos which succeeds in instilling an apparently local topic with universal content: an outcry for justice, a cry of hatred and anger against the oppressor. Bezruč is a master of an austere rhetoric, of grandiose visions and symbols, of a monumental semi-free verse which is still not completely divorced from popular forms. Only occasionally, in a few poems, there is a note of personal resignation and melancholy reminiscence, but usually the mask of the seer is preserved with dignity and pathos. Bezruč seems almost without ancestors in literature; he knows the folk ballad and uses it sometimes with great effect, as in "Maryčka Magdanova," the story of a girl who commits suicide by drowning. He knows and admires J. S. Machar (q.v.), from whom he took some unnecessary classical conventions, and he must have read some of the social poetry of the later Heine. But he stands alone: the fiercest and the finest voice of his nation against national and social oppression.

See: Adolf Veselý, Petr Bezruč (1927); J. V. Sedlák, Petr Bezruč (1931); Arturo Cronia, Petr Bezruč (1932, in Italian); Klementina Rektorisová, Bezručův verš (1935). There is a German translation of the Silesian songs by Rudolph Fuchs (Schlesische Lieder, 1931).

R. W.

Bezymenski, Alexander Ilyich (1898–, Russian poet and playwright), was born in the city of Zhitomir in the Ukraine and went to the Vladimir Gymnasium and then to the Kiev Commercial Institute in 1916. In 1917, at the age of 19, he fought in the Revolution in Petrograd on the side of the Bolsheviks. As Trotski said of him, "Bezymenski is flesh of the Revolution's flesh." He was a leader of the Vladimir Young Communists League (Comsomol) and retained a perpetual spirit of youth. In one of his youthful poems he told how his mother, who disapproved of his becoming a Bolshevik, threw away his membership card, and he added: "She did not understand that I do not carry my party ticket in my pocket, but in myself." Far from believing in "art for art's sake," he declared: "First of all I am a member of the party, and only afterwards a maker of verses." He was a member of the "October" group of poets who glorified the October Revolution. From its beginning down to its abolition in 1932 he was a director of the Association of Proletarian Writers.

His first book was Yuny proletari (1920; The Young Proletarian), a realistic and at the same time epic novel in verse, telling how a young worker became a Communist. His shorter poems are of heroic romantic nature, embodying the spirit of the Young Communists—youthful, cocksure, saucy, but severely self-critical. These poems were collected in a series of volumes whose titles give some indication of their contents: Oktyabrskie zori (1920; October Dawns); K solntsu (1921; To the Sun); Kak pakhnet zhizn (1924; How Life Smells); Gorodok (1925; A Little Town); Gruz (1926; Cargo); Put dorogi (1926; The Way of the Road); Serdtshe cheloveche (1928; The Human Heart). The style of these poems, somewhat under the influence of Mayakovsky (q.v.), is free verse, broken sentences, single words on a line, conversational phrases, staccato effects, hyperboles of metaphor, grotesque, satirical. The subject matter is the joy of work, a reveling in the commonplace, an enthusiasm for the Red army, for collective farms, for factories. "Our soul is a factory. Our heart is a living furnace." For him, flowers are all the more beautiful if they are in factory windows; waterfalls, if they are connected with turbines. The coming of spring is less important than the price of food. A girl's lips do not mean so much as factory chimneys. During a drought, when the fields need rain, the crowd is at the Dynamo Stadium in Moscow watching a football game. Suddenly rain begins to pour, stopping the game, but the crowd rises to applaud the rain.

Once Bezymenski turned to write a verse play for the Meyerhold Theatre. This was called Vystrel (1929; The Shot) and represented shock brigades keeping the trolley cars running in spite of the efforts of enemies to destroy them. Stikhi delayut stal (1930; Verses Make Steel) shows how Bezymenski uses poems, short verses, slogans on street banners, to help reconstruction and national defense. Tragedinaya noch (1931; Tragic Night) was written during the building of the Dneprostroi Dam and introduces an American engineer converted to Communism. More important than the ordering of a new hat is the ordering of a new world. "With the reconstruction of the world goes the reconstruction of emotion." When his master, Mayakovsky, committed suicide in 1930, Bezymenski condemned him as a fabulous tower standing on stilts of mere straw. A bullet ends a man, but not an age. Only he is on the right road who on every front is in the trenches of the great class war, who can in every little thing find a world revolution. In Kak ponimayu ya lyubov (1936; How I Understand Love) Bezymenski rejoices in the common everyday task. Since the German invasion of Russia he has thrown the same indomitable spirit into the war effort, but in form he has turned from Mayakovsky back to Pushkin and his war poems are written in regular meters.

See: A. Osenev, Alexander Bezymenski (1926); Alexander Kaun, Soviet Poets and Poetry (1943), pp. 136–137, 154–163.

H. W. L. D.

Bierbaum, Otto Julius (1865–1910, German poet, novelist, critic, and bibliophile), born at Grünberg, Silesia, was educated chiefly at Dresden and Leipzig and studied philosophy, law, and Chinese at Zurich, Leipzig, Munich, and Berlin. Back in Munich he turned to journalism, entering the circle of M. G. Conrad (q.v.), editor of Die Gesellschaft and leader of the South German naturalists, but he also championed the art of such romantic painters as Böcklin, Stuck, and others. In 1892 he published an enthusiastic book on Liliencron (q.v.), followed by editorial yeoman's service for the "moderns" which in 1894 took him to Berlin. Here his artistic taste and literary talents blended at last perfectly in the creation of the sumptuous art magazine, Pan (1895). Four years later, after an interim spent mostly in Southern Tirol, he collaborated with A. W. Heymel in founding the monthly, Die Insel, and with it the Inselverlag, known to bibliophiles. The Goethe-Kalender is likewise his work (1905 ff.).

Bierbaum's first marriage in 1891 is reflected in several volumes of verse eventually integrated in Der Irrgarten der Liebe (1901; revised ed., 1906). This book was a mine for composers (e.g., Richard Strauss, "Traum durch die Dämmerung"). Its unequaled success (86 editions up to 1923) was due only in part to the popularity which the author had attained as editor of Deutsche Chansons, the literary expression of the "Überbrettel" movement initiated in 1900. Bierbaum used traditional, even archaic forms and themes, applying, however, all the delicate nuances of a modern impressionistic verse technique and adding the touch of a personal experience. While replacing "Truth" by "Beauty"—lacking only depth—in his lyric work, he remained basically a naturalist in his fiction. Almost all his novels and stories deal with things directly experienced or observed as a child, as a Korpsstudent, or as a man of letters (e.g., Studentenbeichten, 1892, 1897; Pankrazius Graunzer, 1895; Stilpe, 1897). Later, after his second marriage to an Italian woman (1901), these were augmented by travel impressions gathered chiefly in Italy (Empfindsame Reise im Automobil, 1903, etc.). The intent is humor and satire carried to grotesque extremes, particularly in Prinz Kuckuck (3 vols., 1906–1907), a book hardly surpassed for its casual but detailed depiction of moral, social, religious, and political decay. However, there is far too much joy of living and faith in the future in Bierbaum to classify him as a pessimist or a decadent. Combining as he did an ironic sense of facts with a noble cult of aesthetic values, he was a perfect symbol of Germany's well-to-do bourgeoisie before the First World War. After almost another decade in or near Munich, he died at Dresden in 1910.

See: E. Schick, O. J. Bierbaum (1903); P. Pollard, Masks and Minstrels of New Germany (1911), pp. 121–177; A. Dreyer, "Bierbaum," Biographisches Jahrbuch und deutscher Nekrolog, XV (1913), 170–177; E. Darge, Lebensbejahung in der deutschen Dichtung um 1900 (1934).

H. W. N.

Billinger, Richard (1893–, German poet and dramatist), was born in St. Marienkirchen near Schärding on the Inn, where his peasant ancestors had occupied the same land since the 12th century. He abandoned his university studies preparing him for the priesthood after the discovery, in Ueber die Aecker (1921), of his literary talent. He achieved even greater success with his dramas (Das Perchtenspiel, 1926; Rauhnacht, 1931; Rosse, 1933), while continuing with lyric output (Sichel am Himmel, 1931; Der Pfeil im Wappen, 1932). His best poems have been called baroque or have been likened to woodcuts of the old masters. His main subject fields are traditional or hereditary—the simple piety of his Catholic forebears and environment, the close union with the soil and with nature which the European peasant of every country enjoys. He never wearies of singing the praise of God and of prizing the beauties of his native land. To these motifs may be added, especially in the dramas, the dark and uncanny powers which the country dweller has always been inclined to shape into superstitions or manifestations of the devil. Gifted with a true feeling for stagecraft, he wove these materials together with dance and sorcery into such a compelling piece that Max Reinhardt gave Das Perchtenspiel a stirring performance.

Estimates of Billinger are by no means uniform, and he is significantly absent from several recent accounts of German literature; one which gives him brief mention speaks of "der einst vielversprechende Richard Billinger."

See: G. K. Brand, Werden und Wandlung (1933), p. 345.

B. Q. M.

Binding, Rudolf Georg (1867–1938, German novelist and poet), was born at Basel, son of the internationally famous jurist Karl Binding. He studied at Leipzig and Berlin, but did not enter upon any professional career. Instead, he devoted his time to horse racing and to travels especially in Italy and Greece. A cavalry captain in the First World War, he was mayor after the war in a small town near Frankfurt am Main and died at Starnberg (Bavaria).

Binding was past 40 when he made his début in German literature. He began with translations from D'Annunzio (q.v.) and cultivated the small genre (legends and short stories), in which he soon established himself as a master. Although there are traces of Goethe, Kleist, Keller (q.v.), and George (q.v.) in his works, he is essentially a literary self-made man, his real "educators" being his father, the Rhine River, horses, the Hermes statue by Praxiteles, and nature itself. For Binding writing is a mission that carries the highest responsibility. It combines romantic longing for the divine with the classical urge to embody the divine in human form. His literary output is relatively small, but excels in deep psychological insight, dramatic condensation, and musical plasticity. His characters, when represented as human, are full-blooded individuals devoted to the pleasures and duties of this world, but humble before their god. When divine, they shine in ethereal beauty, but long for self-realization through earthly love and work. Whether human or divine, however, they all have the same chastity of soul, the same readiness for sacrifice, the same calmness in the presence of fate and death.

In his first publication, Legenden der Zeit (1909), inhabitants of heaven and earth meet in helpful understanding (Coelestina), occasionally mocking each other about rigoristic dogmas and priests (St. Georg's Stellvertreter). Miracles happen in these as in the Christian legends, but instead of detracting from everyday life they lead to a fuller realization of its inherent sanctity. The people in his Novellen live their religion through friendship (Die Waffenbrüder, 1910), love (Die Vogelscheuche, 1910; Der Opfergang, 1911; Angelucia, 1911; Unsterblichkeit, 1921), and service (Der Wingult, 1921). Aus dem Kriege, a diary written in the war and published in 1925 (Eng. tr., Fatalist at War, 1929) without any changes of the original form, is a courageous, realistic, prophetic, and chivalrous book, one of the few war productions with lasting appeal. Three years later appeared his Erlebtes Leben (1928), a classical autobiographical gem, symbolic of the best of a generation who in the search for the true meaning of their lives were tragically deceived by the "as if" values of the glittering but shallow Second Reich. In Rufe und Reden (1928) Binding discusses the political and cultural problems resulting from the war and warns the German people against increasing materialism, while in his Antwort eines Deutschen an die Welt (1933) he defends them against foreign accusations such as those of Romain Rolland (q.v.). He strikes a lighter chord in the Apollonian lyric prose hymn Reitvorschrift an eine Geliebte (1924), the charming philosophical dialogues Spiegelgespräche (1933), the tragicomical anecdote Wir fordern Reims zur Übergabe auf (1935), while in Moselfahrt aus Liebeskummer (1932) he attempts a new form of the Novelle by embodying in a beautiful woman the character of a special landscape, thus making nature the real protagonist of the story. Vom Leben der Plastik (1933) is a subtle interpretation of Georg Kolbe's sculptural work and revelatory of Binding's own production.

Although Binding wrote exquisite poetry (Gedichte, 1914; Stolz und Trauer, 1922; Ausgewählte und neue Gedichte, 1932; Sieg des Herzens, 1937), he earned his reputation as one of the foremost classical writers in modern German literature through his legends, Novellen, and autobiography. His inimitable style has gained, to be sure, through masterful translations of D'Annunzio, Bédier (q.v.), St. Francis of Assisi, and Villiers and through the study of the above-mentioned German writers; but essentially it is his own, the true expression of a perfect gentleman, a "virtuoso" whose art is life, because life is his art.

See: F. Lennartz, Die Dichter unserer Zeit (1938); T. Stenner, Rudolf G. Binding; Leben und Werk (1938); H. Millotat, Rudolf Georg Bindings erzählerisches Werk (1939).

E. J.

Björnson, Björnstjerne (1832–1910, Norwegian poet, novelist, dramatist, journalist, and orator), was born in a parsonage high up in the mountains of eastern Norway, but at the age of five moved with his parents to another parsonage at a northwestern fjord. He felt himself a son of this district, Romsdal, mirroring in his character the contrasts of the stormy fjords and the fertile valleys between stern mountains. His father was of farmer stock, his mother of a merchant family, and he combined in himself the different and even conflicting traditions of Norwegian history. It became a chief aim of his career to reconcile the contrasting characters of national life, revealing to his countrymen the live treasures of the farmer society and at the same time freeing the country people from the inhibitions of their isolated existence. The whole task involved the general problems of uniting primitive instincts with conscious self-mastery, of civilizing the human mind by giving spontaneity to its innermost needs, of strengthening both individual liberty and the laws of community. By his broad human sympathies, by the exceptional vigor and vitality of his personality, by his powerful creative imagination, he was able to bring these problems home to his own nation as well as to the other Scandinavian nations, and later to larger parts of the world.

He went to high school at Molde, the small capital of Romsdal, was prepared for the university by courses at Christiania, and started university studies in 1852, but abandoned them very soon for literary work. As early as 1848 he wrote his first newspaper article, inspired by the February Revolution, and for 60 years he was the most assiduous and brilliant journalist of Norway, beginning as a literary critic, by degrees embracing all political, social, moral questions of the day, always in the vanguard for liberal and democratic progress, for mental freedom, for social and national justice. He made his influence felt in the whole political development of Norway from 1859; ultimately, beginning in the 90's, he extended his activities to the foreign press. In 1859 also he began appearing as a public speaker and soon became the greatest orator of the Scandinavian countries; his magnificent voice, his splendid imagery, his dazzling logic, his ever ready wit, made his speeches powerful instruments in all kinds of campaigning.

In 1854 Björnson proclaimed his program for re-creating Norwegian literature. He lifted the banner of Henrik Wergeland, the greatest Norwegian of the first half of the 19th century. Like Wergeland he rebelled against the aestheticism that would keep individuality in severe bondage; he wanted literature to serve ideas, to reveal the intimate unity of life and poetry, to be faithful to truth and to nature. He wished to break absolutely with the literary traditions of the Danish language which, for the last centuries, had dominated Norwegian literature. Björnson won his first victory in this field by a demonstration, the "theatre battle" of 1856, by which he succeeded in stopping the engagement of Danish actors at the theatres of Christiania. The next year he became the director of the theatre at Bergen (for two years, until 1859); later he was the director of the theatre of Christiania (1865-1867), and even managed his own theatre there (1870-1872). The assertion of genuine Norwegian speech was to him only one aspect of his demand for truth in art, and as a stage manager he proved highly effective in teaching young actors to replace fine declamation by psychological realism; in fact, he was the father of a new theatrical school in Norway.

His own first literary work was published in 1857, a modest little novel, Synnöve Solbakken (first Eng. trs., 1881; Sunny Hill, a Norwegian Idyll, 1932). It was the first of a series of so-called "peasant novels" which, for half a century or more, were the most popular books of the nation. They were written in a style strongly personal, in a Norwegian that was modern and yet akin to the manner of the old sagas. The unbroken connection between ancient Norway and the modern farmer society was indeed a fundamental tenet with Björnson, and he wanted to reveal what still survived of the sagas in the culture of the farmer people—even though they themselves were unaware of it. Therefore, as a natural supplement to his peasant novels, he wrote a series of dramas, epics, and romances built on saga motifs. In all of them the chief theme was the struggle to liberate the suppressed forces of the soul and cultivate them to the advantage of human cooperation. Björnson offered an intimate combination of realism and poetry. He became the great national poet of Norway. It is significant that he published his lyrics under the title Digte og sange (1870; Eng. tr., Poems and Songs, 1915). Besides intimate personal poems this work contained a number of songs expressing sentiments of the whole nation, among them the song that became the national anthem of Norway. All of them are compactly filled with poetic ideas and images, and they have that peculiar quality of turning household expressions into a most vigorous poetry, as in the first line of the national anthem: "Ja, vi elsker dette laudet" (Yes, we love this country).

Björnson often stayed for long periods abroad (1860-1863 and 1873-1875, mostly in Italy; 1880-1881, in the United States; 1882-1887, in Paris; 1893-1896, in Italy and Germany). During these visits he studied other nations and enriched his own ideas. He sent home the play En fallit (1875; Eng. tr., The Bankrupt, in Three Dramas, 1914), which was really the first social drama in Norway and which had immediate repercussions outside the country, being performed and enthusiastically received in German and other foreign theatres. Its purpose was the revealing of the "lies" of modern society. Of Björnson's later dramas in the same vein none reached higher in art and psychological power than Over ævne (1883; Eng. trs., Pastor Sang, 1893, Beyond Our Power in Plays, 1913, Beyond Human Might in Plays, Ser. 2, 1914), which pictures the overstraining of Christian belief. The drama Paul Lange og Tora Parsberg (1898; Eng. tr., Paul Lange and Tora Parsberg, 1899) was an indictment of political fanaticism and was filled with mercy for noble weakness. The author's broad humanity emerges also in his gay comedy, Geografi og kaerlighet (1885; Eng. tr., Love and Geography, in Plays, Ser. 2, 1914). Björnson became increasingly known as an international as well as a national fighter for truthful life. He was honored by an annual state stipend from 1863 on and by the Nobel prize in literature in 1903.

From 1875 he made the farm Aulestad in eastern Norway his home, his workshop, and a center of national life. On his last trip abroad he died in Paris, in 1910. His funeral in Christiania was that of a king.

See: Björnson, Brev, ed. by H. Koht (6 vols., 1912-1932); C. Collin, Björnson, barn-dom og ungdom, 2d ed. (1923); C. Gierlöff, Björnstjerne Björnson (1932); J. Lescoffier, Björnson, la seconde jeunesse (1932); Harold Larson, Björnstjerne Björnson: A Study in Norwegian Nationalism (1944).

H. K

Blasco Ibáñez, Vicente (1867-1928), Spanish novelist), was born at Valencia. A republican in politics, a social reformer in economic matters, a freethinker in religion, several times a representative in the Cortes, founder and editor of the radical Valencian newspaper Pueblo, above all possessor of a tumultuous temperament—for years Blasco Ibáñez led the life of an agitator and was frequently imprisoned and exiled. His life took a new direction in 1909. Having gone to Argentina for a series of lectures, he finally decided to become a colonizer. The result, after four years of a hazardous, gaucho-like life, was the founding of the two colonies, Cervantes and Nueva Valencia. By 1914 he was back in Paris, and during the First World War he devoted himself to campaigning for the Allies. His outstanding piece of work in this connection was the novel Los cuatro jinetes del Apocalipsis (1916). Relatively little known until then as a novelist outside the Spanish-speaking world, with the appearance of the English-American translation of this novel, The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse (1918), he became an international figure and the most translated of all modern Spanish writers (all the novels mentioned in the present article are available in English).

With Blasco Ibáñez the naturalistic novel in Spain reached its highest mark. He is ordinarily referred to as the Spanish Zola (see Zola), but the denomination seems only in part correct if one considers the difference in temperament between the French and the Spanish master. At any rate, as stated by Blasco Ibáñez himself, "Zola was a reflective man in literature, and I am an impulsive one. He attained his final result slowly, through perforation, while I proceed through explosion, violently and loudly." By nature a man of action, life was for the Valencian novelist an immediate experience, a direct sensation. By the same token his art was not the product of a patient collection of data systematically classified and elaborated, but a vivid rendition of a series of first impressions of which his senses and his imagination, not his notes—he did not take them—kept the record. This keen sensory perception of things and the capacity to reproduce them in a fresh, vigorous, and colorful picture also characterize his novel, which is, at its best, an essentially descriptive, pictorial novel. Of this the series of Valencian novels (Arroz y tartana, 1894; Flor de mayo, 1895; La barraca, 1898; Entre naranjos, 1900; Cañas y barro, 1902; also Los muertos mandan, 1909, with its setting in the Balearic Islands) is the most perfect example. Though less consistently and in settings less colorful and less well suited to Blasco Ibáñez's sensualistic temperament, other examples are to be found in practically all his novels, including the two war novels, Los cuatro jinetes del Apocalipsis and Mare Nostrum (1918), especially the first with its pictures of Argentinian land and life and the war scenes. The result is inferior, however, when he deals not with living reality as perceived through his senses but with ideas (as in the social novels La catedral, 1903, El intruso, 1904, La bodega and La horda, both 1905, and the more picturesque Sangre y arena, 1908) or with psychological problems (La maja desnuda, 1906) or with archaeological subjects (Sónnica la cortesana, 1901). The same is true of the historical novel cultivated by him during the last years of his life in a series of works conceived as a historical revindication and an epic of Spanish heroes and deeds (El Papa del mar, 1925; A los pies de Venus: Los Borgia, 1926; and the two posthumous novels En busca del Gran Kan: Cristóbal Colón and El caballero de la Virgen, both 1929). In these works the epic heroes are more interesting than the superimposed novelistic action.

See: E. Zamacois, Vicente Blasco Ibáñez (1910); C. Pitollet, V. Blasco Ibáñez; ses romans et le roman de sa vie (1921); Joaquín Ortega, "Vicente Blasco Ibáñez," University of Wisconsin Studies in Language and Literature, No. 20 (1924), pp. 214-238; C. Barja, Literatura española: Libros y autores modernos, revised ed. (1933), pp. 391-414.

C. B.

Bleibtreu, Karl (1859-1928, German critic, novelist, and dramatist), was born in Berlin of well-to-do parents. His financial circumstances allowed him to devote his life to literary activity and historical researches. After his university years and wide travels through Europe, he settled in Charlottenburg, occupying himself with his writing and studies. In 1908 he made Zurich his home and turned his attention more and more to historical studies. He died in Locarno.

Bleibtreu's important contribution to the development of modern German literature is to be found in his naturalistic period, rather than in the series of narratives of important battles of world history inspired by his father, a well-known painter of battle scenes, or in his historical and literary studies. Outstanding among the theoretic documents of the naturalistic period was his Revolution der Literatur (1886), an analysis of German literature from the naturalistic point of view combined with highly subjective criticism of contemporary literary tendencies. Although he takes exception to the more radical tendencies of contemporary German naturalism (q.v.), Bleibtreu demands that literature play an active part in contemporary life and treat contemporary social subjects with extreme realism. Germinal by Zola (q.v.) he cites as the work that converted him to the naturalistic point of view. His later volume of essays, Der Kampf um das Dasein in der Literatur (1889), reveals the temperamental and egotistic nature of his criticism, but contributes little to an understanding of the naturalistic movement. Typical of his naturalistic period is the collection of short stories dealing with the bohemian life of Berlin, Schlechte Gesellschaft (1885). His Byron tragedies, Lord Byrons letzte Liebe and Seine Tochter (1886), he looked upon as examples of naturalistic treatment of the problem of heredity. Among his historical works were a history of English literature (1888) and a history of the First World War (1925).

See: H. Merian, Karl Bleibtreu als Dramatiker (1892); O. Stauf von der March, Karl Bleibtreu (1920).

W. H. R.

Blix, Elias (1836–1902, Norwegian hymnist), was the son of a fisherman in northern Norway. Working his way through a teacher's seminary at Tromsø and the University of Christiania, he became, in 1879, professor of Hebrew in the faculty of theology, was minister for church and education in the first leftist government, 1884–1888, and returned then to his professorship. In 1869 he published anonymously a small collection of hymns, original and translated, in the Norwegian vernacular, the Landsmaal (see Norwegian literature), and this, augmented, became the nucleus of the complete hymn-book in this language, published under his name in 1891 and authorized for the Established Church in 1892. His hymns are distinguished by their pure form, simple heartiness, and cheerful temper, their images often adopted from the nature-life of spring. His deep-felt patriotic hymn "Gud signe vaart dyre fedreland" (God Bless Our Dear-loved Fatherland) became a national anthem. In 1882 Blix began a translation of the New Testament in Landsmaal, and, partly translated, partly revised by him, the complete work was published in 1889. As to form it was a little stiff, conforming too strictly to the demand of a literal rendering of the original, but, together with his hymns, it served to make the vernacular fit again for Christian service.

See: L. Eskeland, Norsk salmesong, Elias Blix (1904); P. Hognestad, Evangelisk salmesong og Elias Blix (1905); E. Berggrav, Elias Blix (1936).

H. K.

Blok, Alexander Aleksandrovich (1880–1921, Russian poet, dramatist, critic, and translator), is beyond doubt the greatest poet of the century following Lermontov (1814–1841). He was the supreme exponent of the short-lived symbolist movement, but his creation and his influence far transcend the school that nourished his genius. Endowed with an extraordinary penetration into the inner reality of past and future, he had a genuinely prophetic intuition, but his relationship to his own times remained an insoluble problem for him to the day of his death and colored all his work with deepening pessimism. He was distinguished by a singular personal beauty, by a gentle, unassuming reserve, and by a rare naturalness and simplicity. Those who knew him felt themselves in the presence of a superior being who, for all his talent for friendship, seemed ever apart and alone, as if he were indeed a sojourner from other spheres.

Blok was a product of the most cultivated of the Russian intelligentsia. His father was professor of law at the University of Warsaw; his mother, also a poet, was the daughter of the botanist Beketov, rector of the University of St. Petersburg. Blok's parents were early divorced, and the boy was reared in his grandfather's home, his winters spent in the milieu of the university, his summers at the little estate of Shakhmatovo near Moscow. He was graduated from the Vvedensky Gymnasium (1898) and from the University of St. Petersburg (1906), where he studied with the faculty of history and philology. From 1897 on he traveled extensively throughout Europe. He married (1903) Lyubov, a talented actress and the daughter of the great chemist Mendeleev. Their one child, Dmitri, died shortly after birth, a loss that had a lasting effect upon the poet.

Blok began writing early and was already well known before his graduation. His first poems appeared (1903) in Novy put (The New Path), the journal edited by Merezhkovski and his wife, Zinaida Hippus (qq.v.). Like Bryusov, Bely, Vyacheslav Ivanov (qq.v.), and the other symbolists, Blok came under the powerful influence of Vladimir Solovyov (q.v.), one of the most original thinkers of his time. Blok's first book of lyrics, Stikhi o prekrasnoi dame (1904; Verses about the Lady Beautiful), instantly won the younger generation, who found in it the unresolved longings they themselves felt but could not utter. This was the era just before the abortive 1905 uprising, when in literature as well as in life revolt was spreading against the rigid rationalism of the 19th century, so that the nascent mysticism of Blok's poems, with their intensity of vision, their elusive, haunting music, and their expanding concepts, came as a revelation. They invoked the great spirits of the Romantic Age, Pushkin and Lermontov, and at the same time gave form to a profoundly felt, as yet inchoate, presage of the future, one of vast perspectives and of unknown hazards and rewards. They were genuinely a "new word," and they did in fact create a new literature.

Throughout his career Blok's creative passion was inspired by a trinity of the Lady Beautiful, Christ, and Russia. It is impossible to put a clear definition on their significance, for they change in aspect from time to time and in some sense partake of the elements of one another in varying degrees. The tributary sources of these concepts might be indicated, but their main wellspring was in the poet's own nature. The Lady Beautiful was something more than the restatement of the idealized image of medieval chivalry. At first she was an embodiment of Solovyov's vision of Sophia, Divine Wisdom, and for some time Blok experienced a profound and mystical relationship with her as fecund and fulfilling as that of Dante with Beatrice. Suddenly his visions ended, and the blissful communion broke in disillusion.

The political hopes of 1905 broke in disillusion as well. As Blok grew older, the romantic idealization of his immaturity gave place more and more to ironic realism, even to grotesquerie. The Lady Beautiful, no longer divine, became a mocking, carnal figure, while the focus of his passion shifted from a deified feminine abstraction to a messianic, revolutionary vision of Russia. The Communist Revolution set him on the side of the Bolsheviks. In January, 1918, he wrote Dvenadtsat (Eng. tr., The Twelve, 1920), the most vivid expression of revolution in literature, universally regarded as the supreme utterance of his genius. The edition soon ran into more than 12 million copies. Hoardings and banners bearing extracts from it were scattered all over Russia, though its final image of Christ leading the 12 rioting Red guards through the snowy streets of Petrograd pleased neither the religious nor the Bolsheviks. In the same month Blok wrote "Skify" (1920; Eng. tr., "The Scythians," in Russian Poetry; an Anthology, 1927), an implacable, bronze-throated challenge to the Western World, only less powerful than Dvenadtsat. This was his last work. His health began to fail, as much from spiritual as from physical exhaustion. Disillusion once more assailed him. Twice in his life he had given his whole passion to an ideal, which in each case had failed him. "Perhaps I am," he said once, "un enfant perdu." It had been given him to express both mystically and realistically man's eternal spiritual conflict. The Russian man in his poetry was a metaphysical being, not merely a historical or a geographical figure. At the same time Blok's poems, such as the remarkable Na pole Kulikovom (1908; On Kulikovo Battlefield), were historical and clairvoyant, filled with an apocalyptic sense of cataclysm. In a profound sense Blok was a herald of the Revolution. Khodasevich (q.v.) said of him that he suffered from an "insomnia of the heart." His terrible awareness of the tragic complexities of life, together with his special sense of its impenetrable mystery, in the end proved a burden too great to bear. After a long cardiac illness, complicated by psychasthenia, he died on August 7, 1921, and was buried in the Smolensk Cemetery in Leningrad, with all the honors accorded a great national poet.

Blok's collected work has been published in five volumes, the first containing the lyrical poems of the early mystical period from 1898 to 1904; the second, those of the transitional and still immature period from 1904 to 1908; the third, his finest lyrics, 1908 to 1916. The fourth volume contains Dvenadtsat and an unfinished autobiographical poem, Vozmezdie (1922; Retaliation). The fifth is composed of his wonderful lyric dramas. These include a trilogy produced 1906-1907 comprising Bala- ganchik (The Little Booth), a Pierrot comedy bitterly satirizing Blok's own mystical experiences, produced by Meyerhold in the Kommissarzhevskaya Theatre; Korol na ploshchadi (Eng. tr., "The King in the Square," Slavonic Review, XII, 489-512), a comment on the political and social consequences of the 1905 Revolution; Neznakomka (The Unknown Lady), a romantic theme colored by ironic and grotesque realism, wherein a star appears on earth as an alluring woman, tragically unrecognized by the Poet who adores her. There follow Faina, Pesnya sudby (1909; Eng. tr., "The Song of Fate," Poet Lore, XLIV, 1-41), a semi-autobiographical drama of the transformation of an isolated dreamer into an active worker in public affairs, with a symbolic connotation of Russia's destiny, and Roza i krest (1913; Eng. tr., The Rose and the Cross, 1936), the finest poetic drama in Russian, a mystical romance of medieval France and a transcendent utterance of the poet's sense of the inseparable joy and suffering in life. Blok's last play, commissioned by Gorky (q.v.), was Ramzes (1921; Rameses), scenes of life in ancient Egypt reflecting modern problems of strikes by labor. A translator himself (of Rutebeuf, Byron, Grillparzer, Heine, Jacobson, Hamsun, Finnish and Lettish poets), the works of Blok have been rendered into a dozen languages; many have appeared in English in anthologies and periodicals, by Selver, Noyes, Manning, Deutsch and Yarmolinsky, and others. The best translation of Dvenadtsat is the German by Wolfgang Groeger. Blok's letters (Pisma A. A. Bloka) were published in Leningrad in 1925.

See: A. Bely, "Vospominaniya ob A. A. Bloke," Epopeya (Berlin), 1922-1923, Nos. 1-4; N. Volkov, Aleksandr Blok i teatr (1926); Literaturnoye nasledstvo, 1927-1928, Nos. 27-28; V. Pozner, "Alexandre Blok," in Panorama de la littérature russe contemporaine (1929), pp. 159-172; C. M. Bowra, "Alexander Blok," in The Heritage of Symbolism (1943), pp. 144-179.

N. S.

Blomberg, Erik (1894-, Swedish poet and art critic), was born and lives in Stockholm. Ensamhetens sånger (1928; Songs of Solitude), his first work, was followed by several collections of verse, including Den fångne guden (1927; The Captive God) and Valda dikter (1928; Selected Poems). His best volumes, however, are Människan och guden (1919; The Man and the God) and Jorden (1920; The Earth). Blomberg's lyrics comprise not only songs of intimate feeling and pathos, but intellectual, philosophical poems in which the chief motive is the duty of the individual to the whole of which he is a part. A realist and a revolutionary, he has been the most successful of his group in free verse. Among Blomberg's other works are Tolkningar av engelsk och tysk lyrik (1926; Translations of English and German Poetry), Nya tolkningar (1931; New Translations), and En antologi av svenska dikter (1934; An Anthology of Swedish Poetry). He has also written at least three volumes of essays, including Tidens romantik (1931; Modern Romanticism).

See: Sten Selander, Den unga lyriken (1924); C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics, revised and enlarged ed. (1930).

C. W. S.

Blomberg, Harry (1893-, Swedish poet, novelist, and short-story writer), is among the more productive of that considerable group of Swedish authors of the last generation whose origins are among the poorer working classes and whose work has been concerned largely with conditions among various proletarian groups. Blomberg's published work, beginning in 1917, and including to date about 30 volumes, was in the early years predominantly poetic in form, but later he turned more to prose fiction, with an occasional volume of travels. His most recent work has been of a highly personal, religious-confessional kind. Blomberg's childhood and youth in Stockholm were spent in the deepest poverty and under the influence of pietistic sectarianism of a distinctly tawdry and dubious kind. Upon his escape from this unfortunate early environment, he became something of an irresponsible vagabond. But his feeling of solidarity with the working classes led him during and immediately after the First World War to take an active part in the organized struggle of these classes for better working conditions and for political power. He devoured Kropotkin and Gorki (qq.v.) at this time and wrote "Red verse" for extremist labor journals of the day, some of which reappeared in the volume I revolutionstid: agitatorisk verse (1919; In Revolutionary Times: Agitation Verse). Later he became a member of the more moderate labor group, the powerful Social Democratic Party.

Finally, in the late 1930's, he became a convert to the Oxford Group movement, partly in consequence of his growing disillusionment with the materialist-Marxist origins of modern socialism and communism. This last phase in Blomberg's development finds expression particularly in the novel Det brinner i snön (1935; It Burns in the Snow) and in the highly personal religious-confessional work Vi måste börja om (1937; We Must Begin Over Again). Land, öppna dig! (1938; Land, Open Your Gates!) reveals that Blomberg's conversion has not, however, resulted in religious quietism, in a passive acceptance of a social and economic and political status quo where ultimate comfort lies in the expectation of better things beyond the grave. Blomberg remains social and political minded, but he has finally come to approach the problem of man in his relation to his fellows in terms of a kind of Christian socialism which is in sharp contrast to his previous Marxist point of view. Though he has never been a really leading figure in Swedish working-class circles, his work has undoubtedly left its mark upon the ferment of ideas which has characterized the intellectual life of these circles since the First World War. As literature in the narrower sense, Blomberg's works are definitely not of the very first order, partly because his literary gifts are somewhat limited, partly because his primary concern has always been propagandistic and ideational. His latest books—among the best he has written—are an interesting, if not always profound, reflection of the state of mind of the more sensitive representatives of the proletariat in a world where social, economic, and political ideas are dissolving and rebuilding under the threats of wartime conditions and wartime psychology.

A. G.

Bloy, Léon Marie (1846–1917, French novelist and essayist), was a Catholic pamphleteer in Le Pal (1885), Les Dernières Colonnes de l'église (1905), and Belluaires et porchers (1901), as well as in a large part of his other works, and a novelist in Le Désespéré (1886) and La Femme pauvre (1897; Eng. tr., The Woman Who Was Poor, 1939). He was likewise the author of historical and critical literary essays, among which is an interesting review of Carlyle's French Revolution where he found a kindred genius; of the Journal, the seven volumes of which extend from the Mendiant ingrat (1898) to the Porte des humbles (posthumously published, 1918); and of a partly published correspondence, Lettres de jeunesse (1920), Lettres à la fiancée (1922; Eng. tr., 1937), Lettres à ses filleuls (1928), and Lettres à Véronique (1933). These volumes of correspondence, together with his two novels and a prophetic vision entitled Le Salut par les Juifs (1892), inscribed "to the glory of Israel and of the Christian God," are the high peak of Bloy's achievement.

His work mirrors his life and personality and cannot be considered apart from them. Born of a lower middle-class family of Périgueux in Guyenne, Bloy never could live in harmony with his unbelieving, anticlerical father. His mother, who had Spanish blood, gave him a deeply religious education. He arrived in Paris when 18, having totally lost his faith, and there frequented the art studios while earning his living as a minor employee. He at once became the prey of poverty, which harrowed him to the end. What he experienced as a volunteer at the age of 24 during the Franco-Prussian War is recounted in Sueur de sang 1870–1871 (1893). Having met Barbey d'Aurevilly (q.v.) by chance in 1866, he "contemplated" the master with ecstatic admiration and became his secretary. "Our great and adored Aurevilly, whose language I have endeavored to speak," was to be his leader, model, and introducer to Joseph de Maistre, Balzac, Baudelaire (q.v.), and the philosopher Blanc de Saint-Bonnet. He also made Bloy share his hatred for naturalist literature (see Les Funérailles du naturalisme, Copenhagen, 1891), rationalism, Victor Hugo, and George Sand. Aurevilly likewise introduced him into literary circles and into journalism and recommended him to publishers. In his preface to his disciple's first published book, Le Révélateur du globe (1884), on Christopher Columbus, Aurevilly praised the "new depth, energy, (and) fiery spirit" it revealed and the majesty of its biblical style. Yet he could not endow him with his own capacity to build well-constructed novels or to create characters living independently of their author.

Bloy's novels, filled with essays and disquisitions, are mostly autobiographical. They relate the slightly transformed events of his own life and the amazing and tragic lives of "Véronique" and "Clotilde Maréchal," i.e., Anne Marie Roulé and Berthe Dumont, whose strange fates were dramatically intertwined with his own, and they present a complete gallery of the people he knew. They express the bitterness of an original and powerful writer totally ignored, the agony of the spiritual night which followed the collapse of Véronique's prophecies about impending apocalyptic events when Bloy was to be a new Elijah, and finally the despair caused by the death of his patron-friend, the Reverend Father Tardif de Moidrey, and by the loss of two children due to his poverty. In spite of his tranquilizing marriage to Jeanne Molbeck, the daughter of a Danish poet, and the strength derived from a deepening spiritual life, he never quite recovered from those years of "torture and humiliation." His solitude, spiritual anguish, wounded pride, and violent temperament explain how Bloy came to speak of and to consider himself as an unfailing judge sounding "hosanna and reprobation" on his "twin trumpet"; but he could easily mistake his personal grievances for the sins of others. His chief victims were former friends—Huysmans (see Sur la tombe de Huysmans, 1913), Coppée (q.v.), Groux, gentle souls like Louise Read, Aurevilly's guardian angel, those who resented or ignored his demands for financial help (Mendiant ingrat), and the majority of contemporary writers. He poured vociferous réprobations scatologiques over the rich and powerful, many of his fellow Catholics, including a number of the clergy, and the revelers at Good Friday banquets. On the other hand, he remained deeply attached to Villiers de l'Isle-Adam (q.v.), who appears in La Femme pauvre as "Bohémon de l'Isle de France," and to Ernest Hello, both companions of his darkest days.

While protesting at his blind fury, one must admit that Bloy was essentially firing at bestiality, cruelty, and injustice and that the true causes for his deserved or undeserved attacks were his devotion to genius, courage, and humility and his burning faith. There is in all his writings a majestic and wild poetry drawn from his very blood. It is due to what Aurevilly termed "a deep, flaming continuous enthusiasm" issuing from his "kingly capacity for love," and especially love of God. It also comes from his self-termed "sepulchral imagination," heightened by his strange hungering for sorrow, and a Baudelairian passion for the absolute (see Le Pèlerin de l'absolu in the Journal). The highest gift of this scorner of poetry was his power to create images, at times decorative allegories, at times emblems as realistic as the paintings of Spanish primitives, again flaming visions. From Father Tardif de Moidrey's exegesis (see Le Livre de Ruth, published with a commentary by Paul Claudel, 1938), Bloy derived a conception of universal symbolism linking together "both abysses" with their "correspondences" in which several generating symbols such as Jesus or the Poor, the Cross, or the Paraclete play the chief part. All these images tend to give the reader a sense of the "Inconceivable" and to make him aware of the pervading presence of mystery. Bloy's style, which has the solemnity of Poe's, more and more became "a conflagration in the night," but as he divested himself of anger, pride, and convulsive despair, there stole into it an Edenic tranquillity.

See: J. Maritain, Quelques Pages sur Léon

Bloy (1927); S. Fumet, Mission de Léon Bloy (1935); A. L. Laquerrière and J. Bollery, Biblio-Iconographie de Léon Bloy (1935); J. Bollery, Le Désespéré de Léon Bloy (1937); Marie Joseph Lory, Léon Bloy et son époque (1944) and Inédits de Léon Bloy (1945).

M. M.

Blum, Léon (1872–, French statesman and critic), born in Paris, was comfortably reared in a liberal, righteous, Jewish merchant family. The schoolboy was sensitive, brilliant, and insubordinate. Leaving the Ecole Normale Supérieure in 1891 after one year of unsatisfactory work (he had found the discipline burdensome), he earned licences in letters and in law and at 23 was appointed to the Conseil d'Etat, where he served with distinction until entering the Chamber of Deputies in 1919. As a youth the future premier was charmingly successful in society and early became a respected and in some cases cherished companion of his literary generation. He was happily married in 1896. In 1892 had begun his tie with the Revue blanche, in which appeared the bulk of his writings for a decade—mainly literary reviews and essays, sometimes political articles (his friendship with Lucien Herr and Jaurès was decisive), sometimes autobiographical short stories. The volume En lisant (1906) offers a fine selection of his periodical essays. From 1904 to 1911 his dramatic reviews, partly collected with the title Au théâtre (4 vols., 1906–1911), regularly appeared in a succession of Paris journals. Here Blum gives free play to his powers of analysis, finds much to arouse enthusiasm, but recognizes no masterpieces. His Nouvelles Conversations de Goethe avec Eckermann (1907; in Revue blanche, 1897–1901) is written in a style both lucid and fertile with paradoxes; Blum presents, arbitrarily, but with fitting intelligence and gentility, a contemporary Goethe discussing letters, authors, ideas, and politics. Prophetically for Blum, his socialistic Goethe envisions a high role for synthesists—as supercritics and then statesmen, guiding art and science toward the betterment of humanity.

No traditionalist, Blum is still a moralist, like Gide (q.v.) whose genius he early noted. He wished his provocative Du mariage (1907) to be considered a sincerely moral essay. His literary affinities, aside from the 17th century, are closest with Stendhal, Flaubert (q.v.), Marivaux, and, outside France, Tolstoy (q.v.), Disraeli, and Hardy. Marivaux he prefers to Molière; he treasures L'Education sentimentale and places not only Tolstoy, but also Hardy and D'Annunzio (q.v.) above his modern compatriots of the novel. His crowning literary effort, Stendhal et le beylisme (1914), resulted from years of devoted scholarship and, though slow to gain recognition, now stands as an excellent example of intuitive, yet objective, literary penetration. Blum claimed Stendhal as a brother, early discovering in himself the qualities of the élite. But his sentimentality does indeed rather recall his other favorite, Marivaux, and his lucidity tends toward intellectuality. His severest critics, literary and political, stress the latter word and go so far as to call him unfeeling. Blum himself, with his race, speaks of "justice" before "charity." Few without prejudice have challenged his passion for that quality.

See: R. I. Stokes, Léon Blum (1937); M. Thiébaud, En lisant M. Léon Blum (1937); M. Vichniac, Léon Blum (1937).

J. D. Y.

Blunck, Hans Friedrich (1880–, German novelist and poet), born in Altona, is in every respect a genuine product of Low German peasantry and is today recognized as the interpreter of the natives along the Baltic and the North Seas and as the exponent of their folklore. For a number of years he was syndic of the University of Hamburg, and from 1933 to 1935 he served as president of the Reichsschrifttumskammer. He has since retired to a farm in Holstein and is devoting his time to writing.

He became known after the First World War through a trilogy of novels published under the collective title Das werdende Volk, presenting in the first part the story of the warrior and statesman Heinz Hoyer (1920), in the second part the adventures of the roving seaman Berend Fock (1921), and in the last part the life history of the farmer and prophet Stelling Rottkinnsohn (1923). All three are types of the poet's own people. Another trilogy, Drei Bücher aus der Frühgeschichte (1926–1928), is, in its searching qualities, even more subtle and more powerful than its predecessor. With the help of a new technique of combining saga, science, and poetry he re-creates in the first of these three books, Streit mit den Göttern (1926), the saga of Weland the smith, who outdistances Wotan in a flying contest. The next book, Der Kampf der Gestirne (1926), is written around an old sun myth, and the last, Gewalt über das Feuer (1928), deals in a deeply religious mood with the poet's ancestors. Since then he has added to these impressive long novels a volume entitled Märchen von der Niederelbe (1931) and two novels based on the journals of his travels through South America, Die Weibsmühle (1927) and Land der Vulkane (1929). Of his more recent works two important novels portray great historic leaders: Grosse Fahrt (1934) deals with the discovery of America by the pirate admiral Pining, and Der einsame König (1936) relates the end of Geiserich, the king of the Vandals. Of his dramatic works Jacob Leisler (1938), a stage version of the American rebellion headed by Leisler, is the most noteworthy. As a lyricist and writer of epic poetry Blunck has not reached the distinction of his prose works. But his last collection, Balladen und Gedichte (1937), which supersedes several previous editions, shows that he masters traditional forms with force and skill. In 1938 Blunck was awarded the German Goethe medal.

See: A. Soergel, Dichter aus deutschem Volkstum (1934); F. Lennartz, Die Dichter unserer Zeit (1938).

A. Bu.

Boborykin, Peter Dmitriyevich (1836–1921, Russian novelist, short-story writer, and dramatist), born near Nizhni-Novgorod, studied law and chemistry at the University of Kazan and then mathematics and medicine at Dorpat. Although he was the author and translator of some fairly successful textbooks, he soon turned his attention to the theatre and the novel. In 1860 he wrote his first drama, Odnodvoretz (The Freeholder), and also became known for his feuilletons published under the pseudonym Neskazhus. His novel V put-dorogu (On the Way) appeared in 1862, and from then on until his death he wrote over 20 novels and some 50 stories on Russian life. He studied in Germany and at the Collège de France and the Sorbonne. In 1872 he brought out Teatralnoye iskusstvo (The Art of the Theatre) and for a while in 1891 was director of stock at the Gorevaya Theatre in Moscow. He was a constant traveler. He withdrew from Russia at the triumph of Bolshevism and died in Switzerland in 1921.

For many years a kind of popular dean of Russian letters and constant favorite with most of the reading public, Boborykin did not win the approval of the critics and is not recognized as a really creative artist or thinker. He had a knack for giving a pleasant and somewhat superficial picture of the most recent developments in Russian life, often before the new ideas were fully assimilated by society. His interpretations were often faulty, but they were nonetheless well received. His great subject was the decay of the old aristocratic society and the growing power of the businessman, often drawn from the ranks of the old peasantry or the merchant classes of the Old Believers. Among his most characteristic works are Zhertva vechernyaya (1868; Evening Sacrifice), Solidnyia dobrodeteli (1870; Solid Virtues), Deltsy (1872; Men of Affairs), Doktor Tsibulka (1874), Kitai-gorod (1882), Na ushcherbe (1890; On the Wane), Vasili Tyorkin (1892), Pereval (1894; The Summit), and Tyaga (1898; The Flight).

With some talent for observing the shifting currents of life and one of the first to appreciate the new social trends in Russia, Boborykin hardly tried to penetrate deeply and indeed he remains as a novelist of a type that is rare in Russian literature. He had no message to convey, no doctrine to preach; he was simply able to give a good picture of the world around him and with this to hold the attention of the ordinary citizen of his own day.

See: S. Vengerov, Kritiko-biografichesky slovar, IV (1895), 191–241; M. J. Olgin, A Guide to Russian Literature (1920).

C. A. M.

Boelsche, Wilhelm (1861–1939, German critic, editor, scientist, and novelist), was born in Cologne. His life was devoted entirely to literary and scientific activities. Boelsche was one of the most active members of the naturalistic group in Berlin, a member of the literary club "Durch" (q.v.) and later a leader of the literary group in Friedrichshagen, cofounder of the socialistic Freie Volksbühne, and editor of the naturalistic journal Freie Bühne. A scientist in his own right and a well-known popularizer of contemporary scientific ideas, Boelsche formulated and defended the naturalistic position on questions of aesthetics and Weltanschauung in various articles in the Freie Bühne and wrote one of the important documents of the period, Die naturwissenschaftlichen Grundlagen der Poesie: Prolegomena einer realistischen Aesthetik (1887). In this he demands that modern literature accept science as its basis, and he analyzes the meaning of science for the special problems of literature. He further discusses in terms of contemporary scientific hypotheses the problems of freedom of will, immortality, and love as they impinge on the literary portrayal of the human being. Primary influences on his thought are Darwin and Zola (q.v.). Typically naturalistic are his demand that literature seek vital contact with contemporary life, his emphasis on the evolutionary nature of all human activity, his belief in the influence of heredity and environment, and his desire for extreme objectivity of portrayal. In Hinter der Weltstadt (1901) he wrote an important account of the contemporary literary life in Berlin and Friedrichshagen. His best-known novel is Die Mittagsgöttin (1891). His later career was devoted largely to popular scientific works, such as Das Liebesleben in der Natur (1898–1902). As biographer he wrote Heinrich Heine (1887) and edited the works of several well-known literary and scientific writers.

W. H. R.

Böhlau, Helene (1859–, German novelist and writer of short stories), was born in Weimar and there grew to maturity. In love with her literary mentor, a much older man, she followed him to Constantinople, where she married him; her husband became a Moslem under the name of Omar al Raschid Bey. Her early days in Weimar, her flight to Constantinople, and her subsequent idyllic life in the Near East were the significant experiences which shaped her work.

Her writings fall into two main groups, one composed of light, gemütlich, and often charming stories of Weimar in the time of Goethe, the other comprising "thesis novels" (and Novellen), largely feminist in tendency. Of the first group her Ratsmädelgeschichten (1888) is the most successful example. The primary theme of her more serious works is the problem of woman in a world dominated by men (Das Recht der Mutter, 1897; Halbtier, 1899); but with all her feminism, her male characters are often sympathetically drawn. She proclaims the right of the unhappily married individual to divorce (Im frischen Wasser, 1891). Isebies (1911) is an autobiographical novel. Helene Böhlau's novels are marked by strong feeling and ethical nobility; they suffer from a too obvious revealing of didactic purpose, from sentimentality, and from the fact that many of the problems which she discusses are no longer of immediate interest. A collection of her works in six volumes appeared in 1915.

H. C. H.

Boito, Arrigo (1842–1918, Italian poet, musician, and librettist), was born in Padua. His father, a good painter of miniatures, abandoned his wife, the Polish countess Giuseppina Radolinska, when Arrigo was about 10 years old and later was killed in a drunken brawl. With the disintegration of his family, young Boito was introduced to a life of want and loneliness. These tragic episodes, however, were mitigated by the companionship of his brother Camillo, who became an eminent architect, and by his mother's intelligent interest in his musical aptitude. Eager to foster this inclination, she went to live in Milan, where she succeeded in having Arrigo admitted to the Conservatory. While still there he composed a cantata, Il quattro giugno and a mystery, Le Sorelle d'Italia. The lyrics of these two works were entirely Boito's, but the music was in part by Franco Faccio, the poet's inseparable friend. Recognition for the successful presentation of these works at the Conservatory came in the form of a reward from Francesco De Sanctis (q.v.), then minister of education, which financed a trip abroad for the two young artists. In Paris they made the acquaintance of Rossini, Verdi, and Berlioz. The atmosphere was charged with the new theories and activities of the Parnassians, realists, and impressionists. It was natural for Boito, who had already shown a penchant for unorthodox phrase and defiant tone in his first works, to identify himself with this world. After Paris, Boito proceeded to Mystki, Poland, where he met his Polish relatives, and from there to Germany, Belgium, and England. He returned to Milan an avowed enemy of all that was smug and materialistic in the literary and musical world of Italy. An admirer of Goethe, Beethoven, and Wagner (q.v.), he hoped to infuse new life into Italian poetry by following the pattern of Germanic romantic poetry: the fusion of verse and music. But his real idols were Hugo and Baudelaire (q.v.).

Boito never in fact realized his noble intention of lifting Italian literature from its low estate, although he did succeed in introducing new harmonies in Italian music. Like most of the scapigliati, a group of eccentric and ultra-romantic writers of the 1860's, he lacked the spiritual insight and creative spark to produce a genuine poetic work. Boito was essentially a virtuoso of rhyme and rhythm, an able craftsman of supple, musical verse. Having led everyone to expect great things of him, Boito worked feverishly in a variety of genres: he translated Polish works, musical dramas of Wagner, and Weber's Freischütz; wrote critical articles on music, painting, and sculpture; and, with Emilio Praga, produced a satiric comedy, Le Madri galanti (1863). Praga and he also revived the Figaro, a critical and polemic review. But the masterpiece never emerged. Instead he only succeeded in presenting his problem, the eternal struggle of good and evil, against a weird and fantastic background, peopling his world with strange and morbid characters and flooding the whole with sonorous verses. Such features appear in Re Orso (1865), a dramatic legend and his first major work, and to a lesser degree in the more personal Libro dei versi (1877), and in Ero e

Leandro (1879), music by Bottesini; La Gioconda (1876), music by Ponchielli; and in other librettos: Pier Luigi Farnese (1891), music by Palumbo; La Falce (1875), music by Catalani; and Amleto (1865), music by Franco Faccio. In Otello (1887) and Falstaff (1893), music by Verdi, his vivid imagination appears more disciplined, inspired and also restrained no doubt by Shakespeare's art. It was lack of restraint which caused his original Mefistofele, first presented at Milan in 1868, to fail dismally. However, in 1875, abridged and modified, this same opera was generously and warmly applauded at Bologna.

The work upon which Boito lavished many years of thought and effort was the dramatic poem Nerone (1901), which he himself set to music. As an opera, it was first presented at La Scala on May 1, 1924, under the direction of Arturo Toscanini. Even this work, which represents both the fruit of a youthful inspiration and mature art, is replete with mystery and ritual, fanfare and pageantry, morbid passions and macabre scenes, depraved and cynical characters. Yet, although this work fails to satisfy and convince, it is somewhat redeemed by the portrayal of the simple, firm faith of the Christian Fanuel and the deep humanity of Rubria.

See: F. Ballo, Arrigo Boito (1938).

P. P. M.

Bojer, Johan (1872–, Norwegian novelist and dramatist), a native of Orkdalsøren, near Trondheim, won an international circle of readers by presenting the problems of early 20th-century Norway in entertaining fictional form. He established himself in Norway with Et folketog (1896; A Procession), in France and Italy with Troens magt (1903, The Power of Faith; Eng. tr., The Power of a Lie, 1908), in England and America with Den store hunger (1916; Eng. tr., The Great Hunger, 1918). These works revolved around rather simple themes, e.g., that many politicians are rascals, that idealists are often self-deceiving egoists, and that material success does not of itself bring happiness. But they were widely acclaimed, even by such prominent and various writers as Brandes, Rolland (qq.v.), Tagore, Galsworthy, and Hergesheimer, who found Bojer stimulating and praised him for his realism, his vigorous style, and his original ideas. Norwegian critics, however, refused to recognize him as a major writer, on the grounds that his ideas interfered with his art, his characters were insufficiently motivated, and his style lacked artistic cultivation. They were won over to a somewhat grudging admiration only by his epics of folk life, Den siste viking (1921; Eng. tr., Last of the Vikings, 1923), which dealt with the Lofoten fishermen, and Folk ved sjøen (1929; Eng. tr., Folk by the Sea, American title, The Everlasting Struggle, both 1931), a story of the poverty-stricken tenants among whom Bojer spent his boyhood. These works, along with some of his fairy tales and the fantasia entitled Fangen som sang (1913; Eng. tr., The Prisoner Who Sang, 1924), certainly seem to show the best promise of enduring value.

Within his own generation Bojer's grasp on his public was predicated on the immediacy of his writing to the problems that agitated the civilized world. Nowhere else outside the public press could one find so detailed and entertaining a panorama of all the surface aspects of Norwegian life through a generation of pre-war and post-war adjustment. Practically every major event and every topic of discussion between 1890 and 1925 turns up here: the status of women, the relation of labor and capital, the return to the soil, national defense, munitions manufacture, war profiteering, and many others. The characters in his books (in contrast, e.g., to those of Hamsun, q.v.) are such as one might conceivably have met in the rapidly advancing Norway of that day, a generation of hard-working and progressive people (the engineer is Bojer's favorite character), national and enthusiastic, liberal and somewhat inclined to overoptimism about the future. This purely sociological value of his writings is fortified by a remarkable skill of observation, which enables him to reproduce creatively the manners and mannerisms of real people, with their quips and anecdotes, their foibles and self-deceptions, as well as their unconscious heroisms. He does not delve deeply into the mechanism of their being, but marches them firmly along toward a dramatic dénouement. The ideas which he advocates through them are never profound, for his views are practically a barometer of liberal bourgeois opinion in his day; he is the mouthpiece of an idealistic individualism which already seems quaintly old-fashioned. It is easy to see the many influences that have played on his thinking—the ethical idealism of Ibsen (q.v.), the national and religious liberalism of Björnson (q.v.), the poetic exaltation of Victor Hugo, the realistic techniques of Zola and Maupassant (qq.v.). He lacks the colossal vigor of these men, and his brew is to some extent a dilution of their doctrines. He lacks those mighty swings of the pendulum that terrify, bewitch, and inspire. His appeal lies in his humanism, his kindliness, and that undogmatic religion which fills his best characters with an abiding faith in the glory of hard work and the mysterious power of love.

See: Carl Gad, Johan Bojer, the Man and His Works (1920); A. W. Porterfield, "America Reads Johan Bojer," American-Scandinavian Review, IX (1921), 477-481; H. P. Lödrup, "Johan Bojer," American-Scandinavian Review, XIV (1926), 207-217; O. E. Rølvaag, "When a Novelist Is in a Hurry," Scandinavian Studies and Notes, IX (1926-1927), 61-67; P. G. La Chesnais, Johan Bojer (1930, in French; Norwegian tr., 1932).

E. H.

Bölsche, Wilhelm, see Boelsche.

Bonilla y San Martín, Adolfo (1875-1926, Spanish critic and literary historian), was born at Madrid, where he spent most of his active life as a writer, university professor, academician, lawyer, and counselor of the stock exchange. He lived in an apartment completely choked with books which surrounded him on all sides as he sat at his diminutive table, making his vast frame seem doubly large. His learning was matched by an amazing memory, both being commensurate with the numberless volumes among which he had the habit of writing until early morning hours. His gifts bore a worthy comparison with those of his famous teacher Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo (q.v.), whose favorite disciple he was and in whose inspiring company he frequently spent many hours up to the time of Menéndez y Pelayo's death.

He was professor of philosophy at the University of Madrid, and his most enduring work is to be found in that field. Sound and original are Luis Vives y la filosofía del renacimiento (1903), Historia de la filosofía española (2 vols., 1908-1911; unfinished), El Código de Hammurabi y otros estudios de historia y filosofía jurídicas (1909), and Fernando de Córdoba (1425-1486?) y los orígenes del renacimiento filosófico en España (1911). While still a student of the law he published Concepto y teoría del derecho (1897); many legal investigations subsequently appeared, such as Derecho mercantil español (1904) and Derecho bursátil (1924; with D. Emilio Miñana).

In emulation of the vast literary labors of his maestro Menéndez y Pelayo, he edited, with commentaries, a number of Spanish classics. Some of these editions are of service as class texts and all of them reveal, in specific elucidations, his extensive unmatched information in the culture of his country. The most noteworthy are his definitive edition (1910) of Luis Vélez de Guevara's El diablo cojuelo and Clásicos de la literatura española (12 vols., 1915-1917). He was also coeditor, with R. Schevill, of Obras completas de Cervantes (18 vols., 1914-1941); 12 volumes were completed at the time of his death. Two admirable studies may conclude this abbreviated list, La vida corporativa de los estudiantes españoles en sus relaciones con la historia de las universidades (1914) and Las bacantes, o del origen del teatro (1921).

Bonilla traveled to the United States twice, in 1916 and in 1924, lecturing on Spanish literature at various American universities. Two long sojourns were devoted to courses given at the University of California. He was always greatly respected as a forceful teacher and attracted students by the readiness with which he gave to everyone his time and his unstinted kindly encouragement, he himself being the exemplar of a tireless and devoted worker in the field of Spanish literature and history.

See: J. Puyol y Alonso, Adolfo Bonilla y San Martín; su vida y sus obras (1927).

R. S.

Bonsels, Waldemar (1881-, German novelist, poet, and playwright), was born near Hamburg and wandered over Europe, Egypt, India, and much of the Western Hemisphere before finally settling in Ambach on Lake Starnberg. His Indienfahrt (written in 1912 but not published until 1916; Eng. tr., An Indian Journey, 1928) gave to the German public a new kind of travel literature; in a few simple and lyrically conceived incidents he characterized India, the poverty of its humanity, the lush extravagance of nature. Impressions of the Americas were set forth in two later books, Brasilianische Tage und Nächte (with A. von Dungern, 1931) and Der Reiter in der Wüste; eine Amerikafahrt (1935).

Bonsel's exceeding popularity rests, however, upon one book in particular, Die Biene Maja (1912; Eng. tr., Maya, 1922). In this tale, in which the creatures of nature are disarmingly endowed with the most pleasing aspects of human intelligence and emotions, he elaborates an incredibly sentimental gospel of love for nature, for a vaguely conceived God, and for his fellow beings. Three further tales in the same manner (Das Anjekind, 1913, Eng. tr., Angel-Child, 1926; Himmelsvolk, 1915, Eng. tr., Heavenfolk, 1924; Mario und die Tiers, 1927, Eng. tr., Adventures of Mario, 1930) proved to be almost equally popular with a certain public indifferent to the irresponsible and florid qualities of the prose of this minor author. The struggle and search for God and pleasure are enlarged in his "Vagabundentrilogie," Menschenwege (1918), Eros und die Evangelien (1920), and Narren und Helden (1923; Eng. tr., of the trilogy, Notes of a Vagabond, 1931). Even in such early "minutiae" as Ave Vita (1908, later appearing as Leben, ich grüsse Dich!), Der letzte Frühling (1905), Blut (1905), and the Faust-like Don Juan (1919) and in the later Mario und Gisele (1930), the theme is an indistinct sort of exuberant love. More attractive and of greater apparent promise are his earliest books, Der tiefste Traum (1911) and Wartalun (1911), in which the supernatural and German folk themes are happily fused.

See: Fritz Adler, Waldemar Bonsels: Sein Weltbild und seine Gestalten (1925); Bonsels, Tage der Kindheit (1931); C. R. Goedsche, "Bonsels' Indienfahrt, a Travel Book as a Work of Art," Monatshefte für deutschen Unterricht, XXVII (1935), 81-87.

V. L.

Bontempelli, Massimo (1884-, Italian novelist), born in the city of Como, has had an extremely varied literary career. In his early days a teacher in secondary schools, he was a writer in the academic tradition—Egloghe (1904), Settenari e sonetti (1910), and Odi (1910). There is even a tragedy, Costanza (1905), included in the production of this early period, which, as critics have noted, had a Carduccian flavor. Indeed like Carducci (q.v.) he edited texts for classroom use. At about the same time that he turned from teaching to journalism his artistic outlook underwent a revolutionary change, and he became a convert to futurism. As a journalist Bontempelli had a career of considerable distinction, serving at various times on the staff of the Piccolo and the Mondo and directing the Cronaca letteraria of Florence and the Fieramosca. Though he did not long remain faithful to the exaggerations of futurismo, this movement has left its mark on his work, and it is reasonable to say that the odd combination of the scholar and the advance guard experimentalist is what gives his books their peculiar charm and vitality. His style is sober and severe, natural, effortless, and eminently readable. His topics or plots, if they may be called that, are the most bizarre imaginable. In this combination of logic and eccentricity he has much in common with Pirandello (q.v.) and some of the grotteschi, but he is too original and individual to be classed as a member of any school.

Bontempelli is extremely intelligent and ironical, and his work has for the most part a purely intellectual appeal. It is hard to call to mind a really human character in all his novels and stories. On the other hand his comments on life and society in such volumes as Sette Savi (1912) or La Vita intensa (1919) are penetrating and arresting, and the characters and plots sufficiently well put together to give point to the underlying thesis. There is a certain restlessness in Bontempelli's art, as indeed one might expect from his checkered career, and this restlessness found its clearest expression as well as its most sympathetic audience in the 20's. In that period of post-war uncertainty and readjustment Bontempelli was at the height of his powers. La Vita operosa (1920), Viaggi e scoperti (1922), and Eva ultima (1923), in addition to the titles mentioned above, may be considered as representing the best of his work. Later works of note are La Vita e la morte di Adria e dei suoi figli (1930) and Il Figlio di due madri (1933). Bontempelli has achieved a recognized eminence among contemporary writers; among other distinctions he is a member of the Italian Academy.

See: R. Serra, Le Lettere (1914), pp. 94-95; G. A. Borgese, Tempo di edificare (1923), pp. 127-128; G. Antonini, Il Romanzo contemporaneo in Italia (1928), pp. 194-204; P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1934), pp. 102-107.

T. G. B.

Borchardt, Rudolf (1877-1945, German poet, essayist, historian), was born in Königsberg, of a Jewish family which had been Protestant for some generations and had settled in East Prussia. At Berlin, Bonn, and Göttingen he studied the classics; after 1904 he lived in Italy, chiefly near Lucca or Pistoia, with the exception of short periods in Germany and the years of the First World War, in which he took part. His few publications before 1918 and the lectures which he gave during later years aroused passionate interest and opposition.

Borchardt is a poet of high aim, a philologist and historian of genius gifted with the power of evoking the great past, a "revolutionary conservative," a violent fighter generous in love and hate, combining strongly nationalistic tendencies with a rare intuitive sense and an unusual knowledge of the European heritage, a volcanic personality. And such is his work—lava and flame. His style, with its sharp outlines, its Latin periods quivering with passion, its wide historical vistas, has a poetry of its own, heroic and scornful. He is highly individual, even when he seems closest to great models—as if, through their touch and medium, he won access to his deepest self. His anthologies (Deutsche Denkreiden, 1925; Ewiger Vorrat deutscher Poesie, 1926; Der Deutsche in der Landschaft, 1927) form an integral part of his work. His translations were born from his vision of the past, of the medieval period as well as of the Greek middle ages. They range from Tacitus' Germania (1914) and Hartmann von Aue's Armer Heinrich (1925) to the Homeric Hymns (Altionische Götterlieder, 1924) and to Pindar (Pindarische Gedichte, 1930; one of Borchardt's supreme achievements); from Landor's prose (Imaginäre Unterhaltungen, 1923) and Swinburne's verse (Englische Dichter, 1936—Borchardt in his youth was steeped in English literature) to old Provence (Die grossen Trobadors, 1924) and to Dante's Vita nuova (1922) and the whole of the Commedia (Dante deutsch, 1930—the work of decades). For Dante he created a poetical language of his own, a historically unrealized stage between the German of the Middle Ages and the later language—an undertaking in a way analogous to Doughty's in Arabia Deserta, isolated, daring, and grand.

Most of these translations as well as the anthologies are followed by essays which shed new light on their subjects. Borchardt has given a new interpretation to Dante and his epoch (Epilegomena zu Dante I: Einleitung in die Vita nova, 1923; Pisa, 1938). Some of his prose will stand the test of time: Das Gespräch über Formen und Platons Lysis deutsch (1905); Rede über Hofmannsthal (1907), a fragment; Der Krieg und die deutsche Selbsteinkehr (1915); Der Krieg und die deutsche Verantwortung (1916); Prosa I (1920); Gartenphantasie (1925); Handlungen und Abhandlungen (1928); Die Aufgaben der Zeit gegenüber der Literatur (1929); Führung (1931); Deutsche Reisende, deutsches Schicksal (1932); Schriften I, II (1934, 1935).

Of his poetry and fiction, up to now only a part is known: short plays (Krippenspiel, 1922; Die geliebte Kleinigkeit, 1923); prologues of tragic import (Die Päpstin Jutta I: Verkündigung, 1920; Staufer I: Alpenübergang, 1936); a comedy (Pamela, 1934); novelas and a novel in contemporary setting, of mannered density (Das hoffnungslose Geschlecht, 1929; Vereinigung durch den Feind hindurch, 1937); tales—some in verse (Die halbgerettete Seele, 1920; Poetische Erzählungen, 1923; Der ruhende Herakles, 1924). One of these tales, "Der Durant," published as a fragment, is perhaps the only legitimate continuation of the German medieval epic, remarkable for its somber force. On this tale and on some of his lyrics of love and of despair (Jugendgedichte, 1913; Die Schöpfung aus Liebe, 1923; Vermischte Gedichte, 1924) Borchardt's significance as a poet may be said to rest securely. His poetry as well as the rest of his work—unlike that of any other writer in tone—is at times of highest rank. An anthology of his verse and prose, Ausgewählte Werke 1900–1918, was published in 1925.

See: J. Nadler, "Von Bodmer zu Borchardt," Wissen und Leben, 1924, pp. 883–892; J. Nadler, Literaturgeschichte der deutschen Stämme und Landschaften, Bd. 4 (1928), pp. 730–732; J. Hofmiller, "Borchardts deutscher Dante," Corona, 1932, pp. 246–263.

H. St.

Bordeaux, Henry (1870–, French novelist and critic), has been a very prolific writer, following resolutely in the steps of such Roman Catholic authors as Vogüé, Bourget, and Brunetière (q.v.). He was born at Thonon-les-Bains, Haute-Savoie, of an old and distinguished family of magistrates. Although he remained all his life a devoted son of his province, he has spent most of his life in Paris, where he had come early to study law. He published reminiscences of his career as a lawyer in Carnet d'un stagiaire (1911).

He has written all through his career an abundance of essays along the most diverse lines—Ames modernes (1895), Les Ecrivains et les mœurs (three series, 1897–1902), Vies intimes (1904). He has composed monographs, books for the young, animal stories. But he is most likely to be remembered as a writer of fiction. A historical novel, Jeanne Michelin; chronique du XVIIIe siècle (1896), was soon followed by a series of stories that proved extremely successful with the general public, such as La Peur de vivre (1902; Eng. tr., The Fear of Living, 1913), Les Roquevillard (1906; Eng. tr., The Will to Live, 1915), Les Yeux qui s'ouvrent (1908; Eng. tr., The Awakening, 1914), La Croisée des chemins (1909; Eng. tr., The Parting of the Ways, 1911), La Robe de laine (1910; Eng. tr., The Woollen Dress, 1912), La Neige sur les pas (1912; Eng. tr., Footprints beneath the Snow, 1913). All are what may be called "family novels," with the setting in most cases in Savoy; they have received high praise from some critics and very severe handling from others; there can be no question of their moral earnestness.

In 1914 Henry Bordeaux was mobilized, serving as an infantry captain and then in the Intelligence Department, at General Headquarters. He wrote moving and valuable books on some of the events of these fateful years: La Chanson de Vaux-Douaumont, I: Les Derniers Jours du Fort de Vaux, II: Les Captifs délivrés (1916–1917; Eng. tr., The Last Days of Fort Vaux, March 9–June 7, 1916, 1917; The Deliverance of the Captives, Douaumont-Vaux, October 21–November 3, 1916, 1919); Le Chevalier de l'air: Guynemer (1918; Eng. tr., Guynemer, Knight of the Air, 1918); La Bataille devant Souville (1921); Le Maréchal Fayolle (1921).

After the First World War, Bordeaux resumed his career as a novelist, with such works as La Résurrection de la chair (1920), Le Fantôme de la Rue Michel Ange (1922), Valombré (1929). Murder Party, ou Celle qui n'était pas invitée (1931; Eng. tr., Murder Party, 1931) has a title borrowed from the American society game. In 1938 Bordeaux signed his 50th novel, Cendres chaudes. In Montreal in 1942 La Sonate au clair de lune was published. From his travels in the East, between the two wars, he had brought back Yamilé sous les cèdres (1928; Eng. tr., The Gardens of Omar, 1924). Bordeaux contributed to many of the best-known periodicals of the time, and from 1910 to 1921 he was dramatic critic of the Revue hebdomadaire (see his 4 vols., Vie au théâtre). He was elected to the French Academy to succeed Jules Lemaitre (q.v.) and officially received in 1920.

See: Fidus, "M. Henry Bordeaux," Revue des deux mondes, May 15, 1920, pp. 312–331; Jules Bertaut, Henry Bordeaux et son œuvre (1924).

A. Sz.

Borgese, Giuseppe Antonio (1882–, Italian critic, novelist, and publicist), born near Palermo, spent his early years in his native Sicily and went to school until he was 18. He then went to the University of Florence from which he obtained his doctor's degree in 1903, submitting as his thesis a masterly Storia della critica romantica in Italia (1905). Borgese was already closely bound in his intellectual development to the method and thinking of Croce (q.v.). This alliance, which after an exchange of views was to grow into a progressive, often controversial, relationship, keyed much of his early work.

After a one-year teaching apprenticeship at the University of Turin, Borgese went, in 1910, to the University of Rome, where he taught German literature for the following seven years. During this period his characteristic pace of intense creative activity was set. He wrote with intuition and taste about literature and the arts (much of this criticism was collected in the three-volume work La Vita e il libro, 1910–1913). In 1917 he was called to the University of Milan, first as professor of German literature and then, after 1924, as professor of aesthetics and literary criticism. He held this chair until 1931, the year in which he came to the United States. His activity in creative literature had come to the fore with Rubè (1921; Eng. tr., 1923), a novel highly praised in Italy and abroad. Rubè, summarizing an epoch, centered around its doomed hero the passions of the First World War and the catastrophe of the Armistice, foreboding vaster ruins. He also wrote poems, plays, and short stories (see especially a collection of stories, Il Pellegrino appassionato, 1933).

In 1917–1918, under Orlando's premiership, Borgese headed the Press and Propaganda Bureau. His political awareness, which had matured through sharply chastening perception of the pitfalls of demagoguery as personified in a former friend, D'Annunzio (q.v.), made him recoil from Fascism. During the year when Borgese was teaching and lecturing in the United States, the Fascist oath was imposed on members of the teaching profession. Unwilling to sign and being abroad, he chose exile for the duration of a regime he abominated.

Beginning in 1931 Borgese has taught at the University of California; the New School for Social Research, New York City; Smith College. Since 1936 he has been at the University of Chicago as professor of Italian literature. When, in 1938, he became a citizen of the United States, it meant something more to him than the casual assumption of a title, a new degree; he accepted it as a sign or seal of a new assignment in living. He felt his greatest duty now was to function within the framework of the new society in which he lived as a writer—and in the new language. Goliath (1937), The City of Man (1940; with Thomas Mann, Lewis Mumford, et al.), and Common Cause (1943) constitute a valid contribution of material prepared for the well-informed non-specialist in America.

Integration or Unity—or, as Borgese puts it, "Syntax"—beyond and against a transitional era of fragmentarism and decadence is his leading thought or idée maîtresse through all the phases of his career. Since the very start he has rallied directly to De Sanctis's (q.v.) example, merging the aesthetic analysis of a single poetic work with its interpretation as a witness to history, and assigning to each its place in the collective unfinished masterpiece which Borgese calls the Bible of Humanity.

See: E. Roditi, "G. A. Borgese," Sewanee Review, L (1942), 57–68.

F. K.

Borsi, Giosue-Francesco (1888–1915, Italian journalist and writer), was born in Leghorn, in a Carduccian, anticlerical environment typical of that time. His parents, Averardo Borsi, later editor of the Telegrafo, and Verdiana Fabbri, were natives of Castagneto Maremma, later known as Castagneto Carducci. It is not surprising, therefore, that their son became Carducci's (q.v.) godchild and that he was named Giosue (Joshua) in honor of his godfather, and not in honor of Moses' successor. Neither is it surprising, since Borsi's father was an ardent anticlerical while his mother was a fervent Catholic, that the name of the recalcitrant pagan-minded poet of the Maremma was coupled with that of the docile Seraphic poet of Assisi. After completing his elementary and secondary education in Leghorn, Giosue, to please his father, matriculated in the faculty of jurisprudence at the University of Pisa. He devoted more time, however, to his literary pursuits than to the study of law and had some difficulty in qualifying for a doctorate in jurisprudence.

As long as his father lived, Giosue led a carefree, dissolute life. He frequented the salons, where he was always welcome because of his literary talent and personal charm. He wrote well and recited even better. As one would expect of a Carduccian disciple, he took delight in classical artistry and in carefully wrought phraseology. This is evident in writings like Primus Fons (poems published in 1907), and in the much admired Il Pappa e i dindi (1922), a lyric written for his little nephew's birthday, in which there is an apologia of the Italian language. Upon the death of his father in December, 1910, Giosue found himself burdened with manifold cares and responsibilities, the weight of which was augmented by the sorrow caused by the death of his beloved sister, Laura, and of his little nephew, Dino. It was during this period that Borsi underwent the moral and religious crisis recorded in his Confessioni a Giulia (1915) which, helped by the beautiful example of his sweet, saintly mother, culminated in his return to the practice of the faith of his baptism. From this time on his writings are decidedly spiritual. They differ from those prior to his conversion not only in content, but also in style. There is no evidence of that fastidiousness of former years. Both in the Colloqui (1916; Eng. tr., A Soldier's Confidences with God, 1918), and in his Lettere dal fronte (1916), one is impressed by the sincerity of his thoughts and the simplicity of his style. Less than a year after his conversion, upon Italy's joining the Allies, Borsi enlisted in the Italian army. Five months later, on November 10, 1915, he was killed at Zagora while leading his men in a daring attack. His heroic death and his startling conversion gave to Borsi's writings a popularity which, under ordinary circumstances, they hardly would have attained.

See: Gustave Cantini, Giosue Borsi; nuova biografia (1938).

S. M. S. M.

Botelho, Abel Acácio de Almeida (1854–1917, Portuguese novelist), was born in Taboão, Beira Alta. He first followed a military career; later he turned to politics and subsequently to diplomacy. Under the republic (1910) he was appointed ambassador to Argentina, where he died. He began his literary career as a journalist; he tried poetry and the drama, without much success, and finally the novel, in which he embraced the Zolaesque realism (see Zola) initiated by Eça de Queiroz (q.v.). His first novelistic works are found in a compilation of stories, Mulheres da Beira (1885–1896; Women of Beira), in which, despite the still romantic character of the themes, already the technical process and the serenity of vision presage the realist. His predominantly visual temperament, his great powers of observation, and his talents as a painter of landscapes are revealed brilliantly in one of the stories, "Corrida de touros no Sabugal" (Bullfight in Sabugal). But the novelistic work to which he owes his fame is the series Patologia social, which begins with O barão de Lavos (1891; The Baron of Lavos). In the preface he explains the psychological basis of the work: the normal personality is a result of balance between thought, sentiment, and will; when any one of these predominates, a psychological case appears. Each novel proposes to exemplify a special case of disorder, in characters where this derives from a physiological-sexual determinism, from a carnal fatalism. Within this monism all of his work, which reached the extremes of descriptive naturalism, is developed—and limited. O livro de Alda (1898; The Book of Alda), Amanhã (1902; Tomorrow), and Os lázaros (1904; The Lepers) form a part of the Patologia, which shocked the public in its time. His style, showing great linguistic richness, is elaborated with medical neologisms. His powers of observation make him a minutely precise painter of attitudes and gestures, and he showed a remarkable feeling for color.

See: F. de Figueiredo, "Abel Botelho," in História da literatura realista, 1924 ed., pp. 214–218.

E. G. D.

Bourdet, Edouard (1887–, French dramatist), was born in Saint-Germain-en-Laye, Seine-et-Oise. When still a very young man he wrote a light comedy, Le Rubicon (1910), which established him as a master in the genre. Antoine (q.v.) expressed his amazement that a beginner should possess such sure touch and also praised Bourdet for his power of observation. For the next 10 years Bourdet was not heard from. He came before the public again in 1920 with La Cage ouverte, followed in 1922 by L'Heure du berger and in 1924 by L'Homme enchaîné. In 1926 he gained general recognition with La Prisonnière (Eng. tr., The Captive, 1926). Vient de paraître (1928) added to his renown. Le Sexe faible, produced in 1930 (Eng. tr., The Sex Fable, 1931), enjoyed an exceptionally long run, as did La Fleur des pois (1932), Les Temps difficiles (1934), and Margot (1935).

Bourdet is one of the principal contemporary exponents of the comedy of manners. His plays are satirical; the author, without ever losing his tolerant smile, mercilessly exposes the follies and foibles of the society of his day. His work is a gallery of the vices of the time, a clever mixture of fact and satire, which combines the daring of a very personal autobiographer and the prudence of the moralist.

See: F. Porché, "Edouard Bourdet," Revue de Paris, Année XLIV (1937), Tome V, pp. 217–228.

P. B.

Bourget, Paul (1852–1935, French novelist and critic), was born at Amiens. He was educated first at the Lycée of Clermont-Ferrand and later, in Paris, at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand and at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes. He began writing poetry, and in 1875 was published La Vie inquiète, a book of verse, followed by Edel (1877) and Les Aveux (1882). Meanwhile he was earning a living by contributing articles to newspapers. A series of essays, written for the Nouvelle Revue, published under the titles Essais de psychologie contemporaine (1883) and Nouveaux Essais de psychologie contemporaine (1885), attracted the attention of the literary world, for those studies marked a new departure in criticism. Adopting Taine's dictum that literature is a "living psychology," Bourget made a searching analysis of the mental and moral characteristics of certain writers who belonged to the generation preceding his own, and tried to determine to what degree they were responsible for the pessimism which he found everywhere around him. This approach to literature appeared so illuminating that the author was immediately rated as the most original critic since Sainte-Beuve.

But Bourget wanted above all to become a novelist, and he judiciously chose the genre which best permitted the application of his gift of analysis to the study of real life—the psychological novel. His first attempt, L'Irréparable, appeared in 1884. Cruelle Enigme (1885), André Cornélis (1887), Mensonges (1887), came next. In these works Bourget not only revived a kind of fiction which is specifically French, but gave it a new form; a minute analysis of human feelings was his chief aim. The author applied the method of precise investigation that had made his Essais so convincing, and met the tastes of a generation brought up under the unchallenged domination of realism. Bourget selected as the object of his dissection the wealthy parvenus who were the waifs left behind by the Second Empire. It was not a world in which love can be presented under its innocent aspects. But behind the painter of rather objectionable situations there lurked a stern moralist convinced that "psychology is to ethics what anatomy is to therapeutics." This moralist came out openly in the next novel, Le Disciple (1889), an earnest indictment of the deterministic theory. In the preface the author emphasized the lesson he wanted to impart. Asserting that the spiritual values are the important thing in life, he beseeched the youth of his time to shun scientific epicurism, a sure road to immorality. Henceforth the ethical note could be heard more distinctly, and Bourget still further enlarged the scope of his novels when he discovered that man, so far the chief object of his interest, cannot be dissociated from the social structure of which he forms a part. This conception found expression in Cosmopolis (1893), in which a love story is subservient to a denunciation of cosmopolitanism. The political discussions which were the aftermath of the Dreyfus case accelerated Bourget's advance towards the social novel. He became convinced that the only remedy for the moral diseases under which civilization labored was for his country a return to its ancient tradition. He therefore recommended the rehabilitation of an aristocracy, on the model of the English nobility, hereditary but constantly rejuvenated by the admission of men of merit, and a revival of the pristine religion of France. Nearly all the novels he wrote after 1900, L'Étape (1902), Un Divorce (1904), L'Émigré (1907), present different aspects of this belief. In Le Sens de la mort (1915), Cœur pensif ne sait où il va (1924), Nos actes nous suivent (2 vols., 1927), and others he turned his attention to the moral and social problems raised by the First World War.

Bourget wrote also a great number of nouvelles. The 22 volumes in which they have been collected exhibit the author's versatility. Bourget has tried all kinds of short stories, from a simple anecdote offhandedly told to a story leisurely unfolded by means of a complicated plot. The variety of subjects in such volumes as Pastels (1889), Complications sentimentales (1898), Drames de famille (1900), Les Détours du cœur (1908), Anomalies (1920)—to give only a few titles—baffles classification. Bourget's best short stories reach a degree of excellence that has rarely been surpassed.

With La Barricade (1910) and Le Tribun (1911) Bourget tried his hand at the drama. As their subtitles indicate, these plays are "chronicles" of the years 1910–1911, and they evoke the politico-social atmosphere of that period. A survey of this author's achievements would not be complete without mention of a more graceful side of his talent. Bourget was an indefatigable traveler, and he has related some of his wanderings in Études anglaises (1889), in Sensations d'Italie (1891)—probably the best—and in Outre-mer (2 vols., 1895), which is the journal of a tour in the United States.

Few writers have been successful in so many fields of literature, Bourget has a shrine of his own in the pantheon of French criticism. His place in fiction is also assured. In his lifetime he was passionately discussed; caught in the maelstrom of the political dissensions which divided public opinion during the period 1894–1914, to some he became an idol or a prophet, for others he served as a butt for detraction. His intellectual qualities, however—his keenness of mind, his insight into the hidden motives of human actions, the lucidity of his reasoning power, the deftness with which he handled the most complicated plots—have generally been recognized. Bourget had not the vitalizing imagination of Balzac, his chief model; but the minute accuracy of his observation, the sincerity with which he reported his findings, combine to make his works invaluable documents in which future students of manners will find a faithful image of French society between the War of 1870 and the Second World War.

See: Giraud, Paul Bourget (1934); A. Feuillerat, Paul Bourget; histoire d'un esprit sous la IIIe République (1937).

A. F.

Boutelleau, Jacques, see Chardonne, Jacques.

Boutens, Pieter Cornelis (1870–1943, Dutch poet), was born in the city of Middelburg, on the island of Walcheren. He studied classical philology at the University of Utrecht, taught Latin and Greek for some years at Noorthey, a boys' preparatory school at Voorschoten, not far from Leiden, and settled down at The Hague, in the first decade of this century, for a quiet bachelor life of study and poetic creation. He counts among the great poets—some consider him the greatest poet—of his generation. His first book of verse, entitled Verzen, appeared in 1898, with an introduction by Lodewijk van Deyssel (q.v.), then the leading literary critic of Holland. Van Deyssel's praise brought Boutens immediate recognition. His early poetry revealed a mood steeped in melancholy, a contemplative sadness which is purged of all self-pity and despair by the poet's awareness of visible and invisible beauty and by his gift of turning the seen into meaningful symbols of the unseen. This tendency likewise pervades all his later work, which appeared at regular intervals during the next four decades—Praeludiën (1902; Preludes), Stemmen (1907; Voices), Vergeten Liedjes (1909; Forgotten Melodies), Carmina (1912; Songs), Lente-maan (1916; Spring Moon), Liederen van Isoude (1919; Songs of Isolda), Sonnetten (1920; Sonnets), Zomerwolken (1922; Summer Clouds), Bezonnen Verzen (1931; Thoughtful Poems), Honderd Hollandsche Kwatrijnen (1932; One Hundred Dutch Quatrains). He was a deeply religious man, not of the church-going type but keenly sensitive to the divine and eternal beyond the everyday pageantry, and obsessed with a nostalgia for the real life of which the actual is but a token. Hence sorrow and death are his favorite themes, but he sees them transfigured into images of light and beauty.

The secret of his greatness is not merely in this aesthetic revaluation of man's existence. He shares that tendency with other poets. He was in addition past master in the handling of his native language. Being a classical scholar, he possessed an intimate knowledge of ancient Greek literature. But he was equally well read in German, French, and English poetry. Among the poets whom he admired were Goethe and Novalis, Louise Labé and Baudelaire (q.v.), Shelley and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. His many publications include a beautifully printed edition of the Œuvres complètes de Louise Labé Lionnoise publiées par P. C. Boutens (1928). He had a retentive memory for verse and could quote long passages from his favorite poets. There is many a line in his poetry that echoes a remembered note of one of those earlier singers. Hence many and various influences combined in the training and development of this scholarly and deeply artistic poet. Those memories of foreign verse could not fail to leave their mark upon his own poetic diction. He was a daring innovator and often achieved effects that startled the sensitive by their strange beauty and baffled the unresponsive by their enigmatic phrasing. But even when the sense is vaguely guessed, the verse conveys its meaning by its music. Boutens is the most melodious of singers, and the melody is ever in tune with the mood.

Even so, he never was widely popular. Only his Beatrijs (1908), a modern version of a medieval Dutch legend, met with nation-wide acclaim and was reprinted 32 times in a period of 25 years. When Queen Wilhelmina celebrated the 40th anniversary of her inauguration, Boutens was asked by the government to voice the nation's feelings in a poem that was to be distributed among the school children of Holland. The choice of the eulogist was unfortunate. The children did not understand the poet's meaning. His tendency towards enigmatic utterance incurred for him the charge of living in an ivory tower. But those who accused him of withdrawing from the common life of his fellow men did not know Boutens. He was neither blind nor indifferent to the injustices of the social order, but being a poet he had no better antidote to offer than the beauty of his verse, which might touch and comfort some of the victims of the social disorder. Its evocation of the glories of the Dutch landscape, of pasture, dune, and sea, and clouded sky, must have given solace in the past few years to thousands of Dutchmen who, with Boutens, shared the pain and agony of the Nazi terror. He did not live to see the hour of liberation. He died, in the 72d year of his life, at his home in The Hague, on March 25, 1943.

See: Oberman, "De hoofdgedachte bij Boutens," Onze Eeuw, November, 1919; A. M. Stols, Bibliographie van Boutens' werk (1926–1930); H. Grierson, Two Dutch Poets (1936), Taylorian Lecture; A. J. Barnouw, "Monthly Letter," published by The Netherland-America Foundation, March, 1943.

A. J. B.

Boutroux, Emile (1845–1921, French philosopher), born in Montrouge near Paris, for 30 years (1877–1907) a professor at the Sorbonne, and from 1912 a member of the French Academy, was in a way the man of a single but highly significant book. At a time (1874) when the fortunes of Taine (q.v.), Spencer, and Haeckel were at their apogee, his doctoral dissertation, De la contingence des lois de la nature (Eng. tr., The Contingency of the Laws of Nature, 1916), conspicuously reversed the current trend and established liberty, instead of necessity, as the fundamental law of creation. This work was profoundly original in that it preserved a critical attitude toward pure metaphysics and adopted the methods of positive science—only to deny that the universe could ever be reduced to mathematical or mechanical unity. There are several worlds, all of which enjoy a certain degree of autonomy. The lower spheres of matter condition but do not produce the higher ones of the spirit. Contingency is what defines this flexible relationship. It spells liberty when the order of things is considered from below, and harmony, or continuity, when the same order is considered from above, i.e., from the point of view of the divine will.

Fairly recognizable here is the inspiration of Pascal, to whom Boutroux devoted an excellent little book (Pascal, 1900), and that of Leibnitz, whose Monadology he prefaced and translated (1880). A similar vein reappears in his later essays, such as De l'idée de loi naturelle dans la science et la philosophie contemporaine (1895; Eng. tr., Natural Law in Science and Philosophy, 1914) and Science et religion dans la philosophie contemporaine (1908; Eng. tr., Science & Religion in Contemporary Philosophy, 1909). Early and persistent as it was, this challenge to determinism had important repercussions. Boutroux shaped in no small measure the ideas of a group of mathematicians which included his own brother-in-law, Henri Poincaré. Moreover, despite a professed hostility to pragmatic principles (e.g., in his William James, 1911, Eng. tr., 1912), he definitely foreshadowed the advent of the doctrines of Bergsonism (see Bergson, Henri).

See: Léon Brunschvicg, "La Philosophie d'Emile Boutroux," Revue de métaphysique et de morale, XXIX (1922), 261–283; Mathieu Schyngs, La Philosophie d'Emile Boutroux (1923); Lucy Shepard Crawford, The Phi- losophy of Emile Boutroux as Representative of French Idealism in the Nineteenth Century (1924); Raymond Thamin, "La Vie et les travaux d'Emile Boutroux," Revue internationale de l'enseignement, LXXXI (1927), 129–145, 213–235.

J.-A. B.

Boy, pseud., see Żeleński, Tadeusz.

Boye, Karin (1900–1941, Swedish poet, novelist, and short-story writer), born in Göteborg and who died, apparently a suicide, when she was just past 40, was among the most original and arresting of modern Swedish authors. As a personality she was intent, moody, tautly emotional, rigorously honest; as an artist she was by instinct simple and direct, though her subtle analytical temperament led her not infrequently to employ literary-technical devices which suggest certain strong affinities with modern expressionistic trends in the graphic arts. It was perhaps the rare combination of deep emotionalism and sharp critical intelligence in the same artistic personality that brought about the inner crisis which resulted in her early death. Her last novel, Kallocain (1941), reveals clearly enough that she had come to look upon certain developments in modern life (particularly political developments) with such passionate disillusionment that she could not continue to live in a world which at so many essential points inevitably did violence to the deepest and most sensitive of individual values. Her earliest work, two volumes of poems entitled Moln (1922; Clouds) and Glömda land (1924; Forgotten Land), reveals a young poet of undeniable technical skill, but one who is inspired by what might seem to be a somewhat overstrained youthful idealism. Her later poetry, contained in the volumes Härdarna (1927; Hearthstones) and För trädets skull (1935; For the Sake of the Tree), maintains with no essential change the austere, rigorous idealism of her earlier verse, though this later poetry has in it much more of the substance of an immediate actual life, and it is moved by a passionately warm feeling for mankind. That which is most characteristic of her best poetry is the note of a fine, dignified personal reserve giving way to a vigorous humanitarianism under the pressure of an overwhelming sense of responsibility to a suffering mankind.

Besides her verse, Karin Boye has written two volumes of short stories as well as five novels. The spirit of high seriousness characteristic of Karin Boye's poetry is just as centrally present in her prose fiction, and in the novels, in fact, her brooding analytical preoccupations come into even sharper relief than in most of her poetry. The novels of the early 1930's—Astarte (1931), Merit vaknar (1933; Merit Awakens), and Kris (1934; Crisis)—are strongly stylized and schematic in form, in part because of the sharp focus on particular moral and psychological problems typical of these stories, in part because of the author's conscious effort to employ contemporary expressionistic literary techniques. The two later novels, För lite (1936; Too Little) and Kalloccain, manage more successfully to avoid the purely schematic and the abstract, telling the central tale more naturally and directly, though they, too, are concerned primarily with psychological and moral problems of a highly complex kind. För lite is a strangely gripping tale which illustrates with probing, moody power how a once promising literary figure lives a weary shadow life of evasiveness and frustration because of his inability to rise creatively above the petty domestic fate which is his. Kalloccain is Karin Boye's contribution to the literature of flaming protest against modern totalitarian politics, written at a time when totalitarianism was everywhere victorious in Europe.

A. G.

Boylesve, René (pseud. of René Tardiveau, 1867–1926, French novelist), took his pen name from his mother's family name. He was born at La Haye-Descartes, in the château country of Touraine, and rarely has a writer's work shown greater debt to the region of his childhood and adolescent experience. Boylesve was by temperament an aristocrat, by birth a bourgeois familiar with peasant life. His work expresses the several aspects of his complex, enigmatic personality, but it is generally agreed that his novels of provincial life in the Touraine region are his major achievement. All of these romans provinciaux draw directly upon the author's reservoir of memories from his solitary childhood (his mother died when he was four) and his adolescence, spent in Tours with aged grandparents save for an interlude of study at ecclesiastical schools in Poitiers. After a strict Catholic upbringing, Boylesve went to Paris and enrolled in the school of law at the University of Paris, pursuing his studies in rather dilatory fashion, actively participating in the advance-guard literary life of the capital. Of his early association with the symbolist movement and such experimental periodicals as the Revue blanche, slight trace remains in Boylesve's mature writing. Never a man of any school, he relied little on theory or credo and wrote out of his personal experience, though always with an ineradicable discretion and objectivity. The key to his literary point of view lies in his epigraph to his best novel, La Becquée (1901), wherein he defines the novelist's role as that of the social historian of manners blended with the insight of the poet. His first published novel, Le Médecin des dames de Néans (1896), reveals his great absorption with provincial manners and customs, but also discloses a remarkably subtle lyric gift suggestive of the emotional lucidity of Proust. This study in frustration, of the triumph of mediocrity over poetry, has an expansive lyrical style which Boylesve later abandoned for a tone of severe sobriety and classical restraint, largely because of the merciless pruning of his work by the editor of the Revue de Paris, Louis Ganderax.

The provincial novels of Boylesve, as indeed all his work, proceed from studies of character, usually of one dominant person whose life involves others in ever widening circles of experience. Plot counts for little, the development spreading from the central character to tableaux in which the painter's technique seems the basis of Boylesve's composition. Despite his love of music, his work shows little of the modern thematic development and the abandonment of linear treatment. In La Becquée he portrays a strong woman determined to preserve the family tradition and the family property, despite the weaknesses or capriciousness of the individual fledglings under her wing. Austere, devoted to duty, inflexible where family interest clashes with individual wish, she dies with no sense of real victory, with only the knowledge that for a time at least she has stemmed the tide of individual disorder and chaos. Her mother-bird protectiveness derives not from instinct but from a long traditional consecration to property and to the family. L'Enfant à la balustrade (1903), a sequel to La Becquée, is again a study of the pettiness and narrowness of provincial life, in which even the strongest characters are forced into compromise if they wish to survive. The earlier Mademoiselle Cloque (1899) is another instance of a study in frustration, with an acid portrait of a church quarrel in Tours, wherein the noble, idealistic Mlle Cloque is defeated by the forces of opportunism and hypocrisy. Related to these in content is La Jeune Fille bien élevée (1909), a mordant satire despite its suave presentation of the values of small-town life, values in which the tradition of a "good marriage" force unhappiness on a profoundly emotional and gifted young girl. Madeleine jeune femme (1912), a work crowned by the French Academy, to which Boylesve was elected in 1918, is a sequel to La Jeune Fille bien élevée, continuing the unhappy Madeleine's career in the disturbed and changing Paris of the turn of the century. Here again disillusion is the lot of the heroine still in love with beauty, nobility, and love. Such disenchantment is the almost unvarying mood of Boylesve, a mood reinforced by his work in two other fields: the charming, and licentious, series Les Leçons d'amour dans un parc (1902, 1924, 1925) and the novels of straight analysis, such as Mon Amour (1908), one of the impressive diary novels in the French language. This courageous, undramatic pessimism is tempered by his poetic sensitivity, but the three factors of a solitary childhood and adolescence largely spent under feminine supervision, an ample family legacy, and a wealthy marriage to a socially inclined family all combine with Boylesve's native reserve and delicacy to make his world one of limited, albeit intense, experience.

See: E. Gérard-Gailly, Notes sur René Boylesve (1937); J. Voilquin, L'Œuvre de René Boylesve (1938).⁴

L. T.

Bracco, Roberto (1862-1943, Italian dramatist), was born in Naples and lived almost continuously in that city, whose warm exuberance he loved and personified. After attending local secondary schools, he obtained a position in the custom house and then drifted into journalism. As a young reporter he wrote poems in Neapolitan dialect, sketches, and short stories; he then became a musical and dramatic critic—one of the best, indeed, of his time in Italy—and endeavored, among other things, to explain the somewhat exotic beauty, to Italians, of Wagner and Ibsen. He contributed abundantly to local newspapers, such as the Corriere di Napoli, and also to the Capitan Fracassa of Rome, then the outstanding literary periodical, and later became the editor of Napoli and Piccolo.

In 1923 he was elected deputy from Campania on the anti-Fascist ticket. Because he upheld with honest tenacity his own convictions and those of his electorate, he was dismissed in 1926 and subjected to repeated persecution and assault; presentation of his plays was forbidden, as well as the sale of his books. He ended his life in poverty. He was married late and had no children.

In 1887 he had been asked by the famous Italian actor Ermete Novelli to write a curtain raiser; this casual request launched him into the drama. At first he wrote merely short, entertaining farces, such as Non fare ad altri . . . (1886), Lui-lei-lui (1887), Un'Avventura di viaggio (1887). He soon saw the opportunity, however, of portraying on a larger and more serious scale the drama of society. His first long play was Una Donna (1893), followed by L'Infedele (1894). His abundant and varied output totals one volume of verse, three volumes of essays and lectures, four of short stories, and a dozen volumes of plays. He also wrote, in 1887, a libretto, Le Disilluse. Many of his plays were translated into several languages.

His drama is based on contemporary life. At times he treated ordinary situations, such as the well-worn triangle, and such social problems as the rights of women and the new claims of the laboring class in Italian democracy. But he also attacked more subtle and even spiritual problems. He followed the tradition which, developed by Ibsen (q.v.) and in Italy by Giacosa and Butti (qq.v.), became known as Teatro del pensiero or "Drama of Ideas." The main characteristic of this genre was that it preferred to treat problems of the spirit rather than of temporary customs or circumstances. Bracco, however, went much farther and, in his later and best work, undertook to delve into problems imbedded in the subconsciousness of his characters. He did this with the conviction that, very often, human actions are based on motives so deeplying that the person most involved is unaware of them, and that, as he once said, "Drama should be able to express the profoundest and most occult vibrations of the soul." In his "Drama of the Subconscious," he treated, with poetic vision and profound analysis, with an ever-warm compassion for humanity, and with touches of humor, plays of a quality that grip the average theatre audience and that also have a new and subtle technique.

This drama he developed gradually in a series of works: Il Trionfo (1895), Tragedie dell'anima (1899), La Piccola Fonte (1905), I Fantasmî (1906), Il Piccolo Santo (1909), L'Amante lontano (1916), and I Pazzi (1922). Of these, the first is somewhat experimental and hardly convincing; the last, which was Bracco's favorite, presents a situation too unusual to be generally appealing. Among the others, La Piccola Fonte, the most imaginatively poetic, seems to oppose the selfish, carnal, superman attitude of D'Annunzio's Gioconda. Il Piccolo Santo is Bracco's masterpiece and the most remarkable of his studies of the subconscious. In his "Nota" to this play he gives a clear exposition of his intent and method. Among his comedies, Il Frutto acerbo (1904) is perhaps the most richly humorous, with the farcical jocosity of so many of his short stories.

The loftiness of his serious plays, his expert familiarity with the stage, his understanding of both the humor and the misery of life, and the fact that he advanced Italian drama, with both popular and literary success, towards new interpretations of mysterious humanity place Bracco at the very top among Italian dramatists of his time.

See: L. MacClintock, The Contemporary Drama of Italy (1920); P. Parisi, Roberto Bracco (1923); R. Altrocchi, "Bracco and the Drama of the Subconscious," North American Review, CCXXIV (1927), 151-162. For a complete list of his works see Bracco, Il Piccolo Santo, ed. by R. Altrocchi and M. Bloch (1929).

R. Al.

Braga, Alberto (1851-1911, Portuguese dramatist and short-story writer), was born in Oporto. He settled in Lisbon, where he became secretary of the Instituto Industrial. Such dramas as Irmã (Sister) and A estrada de Damasco (The Road to Damascus) won him but little fame. He is best known for his contos, short stories and sketches which are characterized by a simplicity of style and theme. He chronicles, often in a nostalgic fashion reminiscent of the Spaniard Antonio de Trueba, episodes of the countryside of northern Portugal. His mood is generally melancholy and is hardly relieved by occasional ventures in lighter vein. He possessed definite artistic qualities which can readily be seen in his Contos da minha lavra (1879; Short Stories of My Own Making), Contos de aldeia (1880; Village Stories), and Contos escolhidos (1892; Selected Short Stories).

See: A. F. G. Bell, Portuguese Literature (1922), pp. 325-326; F. de Figueiredo, História da literatura portuguesa, 2d ed. (1923), pp. 230-231.

G. I. D.

Braga, Teófilo (Joaquim Teófilo Fernandes) (1843-1924, Portuguese literary critic and historian, poet, and polemist), outstanding in politics as the first head of the short-lived Republic of 1910, lives on in literature as one of the earliest humanitarian poets in Portugal and the first man to have attempted a systematic history of Portuguese literature.

Teófilo Braga came from Ponta Delgada, the little capital of the Azores. Although handicapped by poverty and the early death of his mother, he possessed such energy and capacity for work that he made his own way, beginning as a printer's devil. At that time he adopted the name "Teófilo," after the Faust-like clerk who had sold his soul to the devil. In 1861 Braga went to Coimbra to study. There he fell under the spell of Antero de Quental (q.v.), also from Ponta Delgada. He became one of the brilliant young men around Antero who, imbued with the philosophy of Hegel and Comte, proclaimed the primacy of science and fought the older generation as "ultraromantic." During this violent war of pens, called the "Coimbra question," hot-blooded Braga, the pale prodigy, who seemed to know everything at the age of 20, attacked the meek but pretentious poet Castilho savagely, making many enemies. He thus failed to obtain the professorship he coveted at Coimbra and had to content himself with a similar position in Lisbon (1872). Further bad luck befell him when his two children died a short time apart and when he himself was struck with blindness in his old age. Yet nothing could break his spirit. On the eve of his death, at the age of 81, he was still planning a "philosophic history of Portugal" in 15 volumes.

Braga had two ambitions as a writer—to fulfill the dream of his elder friend Gomes Monteiro by writing a complete and complex history of Portuguese literature in 32 volumes and to surpass Victor Hugo by composing a gigantic epic on the progress of humankind. Unaided, he battled against the odds of his buoyant temperament and deficient education, of poor or inaccessible source material, and of the apathy reigning in the predominantly illiterate nation for which he labored. Consumed with ambition and heedless of friendly advice, he rushed one volume after the other to the press, with the result that honesty compelled him to revise his hasty hypotheses time and again. Three times he attempted a synthesis of Portuguese literature according to Comte's positivist system (1875, 1885, and 1909-1918). But whereas the pessimism derived from German philosophy had led him in 1870 to conclude that as an "artificial" nation the Portuguese had never had a truly national literature, he later (1909) worked to refute this very idea, seeing in the Portuguese language and literature moral forces that kept the nation alive. Increasingly dominated by an ardent nationalism, he tried at all costs to link the present-day Portuguese to the ancient Lusitanians and considered it the task of the arts, literature, politics, and even of science to make Portugal conscious of her racial heritage, her "lusismo." The latest versions of his theories on "lusismo," on Portuguese lyrics, the Mozarabs, the Amadis novel, the personality of Gil Vicente, may be found in História da literatura portuguesa (2 vols., 1909-1914; History of Portuguese Literature) and its continuations, Os seiscientistas (1916; 17th-Century Writers) and Os arcades (1918; The Arcadians). As modernas idéias na literatura portuguesa (2 vols., 1892; Modern Ideas in Portuguese Literature) reveals what he thought about the writings of his contemporaries.

While antagonism against institutions such as the monarchy and personal animosity against fellow writers such as Castilho often biased his judgment, love for the people inspired him to collect and interpret popular literature. In 1867 he began a series of still useful monographs with História da poesia popular portuguesa (History of Portuguese Popular Poetry), Cancioneiro popular (Popular Songbook), and Romanceiro geral (General Ballad Book), adding Cantos populares do arquipélago açoriano (1869; Folk Songs of the Azores), Floresta de vários romances (1869; Sylva of Several Ballads), and Contos tradicionais do povo português (2 vols., 1883; Traditional Tales of the Portuguese People) and summing up his studies on folklore in O povo português; nos seus costumes, crenças e tradições (2 vols., 1885; The Portuguese People; Their Customs, Beliefs, and Traditions).

His own poetry was mostly written in the eloquent alexandrine meter. Five years after Hugo's La Légende des siècles he began his epic on humankind, Visão dos tempos (1864; Vision of the Ages), hailed as a new departure in poetry. But these "sonorous tempests" did not stand the test of time, nor did his short stories and dramas. He has merit, however, as an editor of great writers (Camões, Almeida-Garrett, and Bocage) and of works of his personal friends (João de Deus, q.v., and Antero de Quental).

In spite of their inaccuracy, Braga's teachings bore some good fruit. His enthusiasm was contagious. After him, fellow workers, such as Adolfo Coelho and Michaëlis de Vasconcelos (q.v.), and students, such as Hernani Cidade and Fidelino de Figueiredo (q.v.), cultivated the field of literary history which he, the uncouth pioneer, had roughly—all too roughly—cleared for them.

See: T. Braga, Quarenta anos de vida literária (1908); Quinquagendário de Teófilo

Braga, 1858-1908 (1908); F. de Figueiredo, História da literatura realista (1914).

G. M. M.

Brahm, Otto (pseud. of Otto Abrahamson, 1856-1912, German theatrical director, journalist, and literary historian), was a leader of the Berlin group of the German naturalistic movement (see German naturalism). He was born in Hamburg. Turning to literature after a brief business career, he studied at the universities of Berlin, Strassburg, and Jena. The greatest influence on his intellectual development was that of Wilhelm Scherer of the University of Berlin. After various journalistic positions, Brahm was dramatic critic (1881-1885) for the Vossische Zeitung, where he was closely associated with Theodor Fontane (q.v.). From 1855 to 1890 he was an editorial contributor to Die Nation. In 1889 he became cofounder and director of the Freie Bühne in Berlin, and, in 1890, editor of the Freie Bühne für modernes Leben.

As M. G. Conrad had introduced Zola (q.v.), Brahm, in the later naturalistic period, introduced Ibsen to the German public and stage. His reviews, his direction of the Freie Bühne, the Deutsches Theater, and the Lessing Theater, as well as his personal contacts with the literary group in Berlin left an impress on contemporary literary theory; his critical genius and the peculiarly effective nature of his activities in the press and theatre made his influence on contemporary literary development of the greatest importance. His function in the history of naturalism was to produce dramatic criticism of an exceedingly high order, filled with a vivid realization of the needs and meaning of the contemporary scene and a keen awareness of the role of literature, especially the drama, in an age of complex social problems and new scientific theories. He also discovered and presented the works of several of the younger naturalistic dramatists and created a theatre technique along naturalistic lines. His reviews were collected after his death by his friend Paul Schlenther under the title Kritische Schriften (2 vols., 1913-1915). Brahm wrote, among other literary historical works, Heinrich von Kleist (1884), Henrik Ibsen (1887), and Schiller (Vol. I, 1888; Vol. II, 1892, incomplete).

See: G. Hirschfeld, Otto Brahm; Briefe und Erinnerungen (1925); M. Newmark, Otto Brahm, the Man and the Critic (1938).

W. H. R.

Brandes, Georg Morris Cohen (1842-1927, Danish critic and biographer), was born into a cultivated middle-class family and into the cultivated middle-class city of Copenhagen. Its culture did not as yet foster free inquiry, the official mind at least being weather-stripped by an amalgam of orthodox Lutheranism and political conservatism, but an urban 18th-century spirit still thrived of which Brandes always remained the inheritor, except for a period in youth when he felt the impact of Søren Kierkegaard. "Yet God preserve me from him, or I shall never be able to live," he wrote in his diary. The opposite of a mystic, but not unlike a castigating prophet in his passionate seriousness, Brandes soon chose what to him was life—the study of creative literature, both psychologically and aesthetically. With his warm, dynamic personality and essentially ethical preoccupation, this widened into what Harald Høffding later was to call Brandes's "fight to liberate and develop the uniqueness of individual personality."

Individual personality expressing its uniqueness in art had his brilliant championship, even in the case of people as unlike Brandes as Selma Lagerlöf, whom he launched, or Hans Christian Andersen, whose portrait is exquisitely done in the book Danske Digtere (1877; Danish Writers), one of several books of masterly literary portraits. But the fight for liberation in those days had to be against nearly all accepted ideas. His chief work began in 1871 with the first of the lectures to be published as Hovedstrømninger i det 19de Aarhundredes Litteratur (6 vols., 1871–1890; Eng. tr., Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature, 1901–1905). Previously he had been to Paris, where he had met and known Taine, Renan (qq.v.), and John Stuart Mill, acquiring exactly the weapons he longed for, as well as a French clarity of style. He returned to be a "strong, flexible blade" attacking the reaction of the 19th century, and the "Main Currents" lectures, although most vividly about literature, were directed against whatever he saw as holding the human spirit in bondage, the topics being émigré literature, romanticism in Germany, reaction in France, naturalism in England, the romantic school in France, and young Germany. These lectures went on, with interruptions, until 1890, helping to deprovincialize all Scandinavia. The joy and hatred stirred up by them were unprecedented. The joy resulted in a new Scandinavian realism in literature. In Det moderne Gennembruds Mænd (1883; Men of the Modern Awakening) Brandes describes this and portrays some of the authors he had encouraged and helped to inspire, among them Björnson, Ibsen, Jens Peter Jacobsen, Drachmann (qq.v.), Schandorph. But the hatred resulted in a union of clerical and conservative authorities which prevented his getting the professorship in aesthetics at the university, for which he was supremely equipped.

In bitter disappointment he went in 1877 to live in Berlin, where he remained until 1883. From there he wrote the monographs on Esaias Tegner (1878), Benjamin Disraeli (1878; Eng. tr., Lord Beaconsfield, 1880), and Ferdinand Lassalle (1881; Eng. tr., 1911). Though he was successful, the Berlin stay was exile for him, and when a number of anonymous Danish admirers offered him a professor's salary, he returned home, this time with leadership demanded of him; the former sodden state had been well leavened, partly by his own ideas. The new Danish radicalism was much aided by his pen. He stood for no compromise. As he wrote to Björnson, "If a deserter or a half-way dishonest writer doesn't lose the sympathy of at least some of his previous associates, you put a premium on slackness and success-hunting." This quality in Brandes, which could make him cry out "Clerical or anticlerical, no other question matters!" roused a similar opposition, which, however great his fame and power at home and in Europe, irked him almost into intolerance of the religious as well as the clerical. Urban he was and remained, and the rise of the Danish farmers with their Grundtvigian ideas (about mass education and folk high schools) was no great pleasure to him. He began to feel isolated. Hence his sympathy for Nietzsche (q.v.), whom at the end of the 80's he discovered and lectured on, thus incidentally affecting the work of Strindberg and Hamsun (qq.v.). Even the professorship which he received in 1902, with the victory of Danish democracy, did not soothe him. He began to write of misunderstood greatness, producing his William Shakespeare (1895–1896; Eng. tr., 1898), considered the finest example of his power of luminous interpretation. His autobiography was published in three parts (1905–1908). In a spurt towards the end he published the popular biographies, Goethe (1915; Eng. tr., 1924), Voltaire (1916; Eng. tr., 1930), Caesar (1918; Eng. tr., 1924), Michelangelo (1921). For these he drew largely on his extraordinary memory of a lifetime of reading.

With Voltaire he had much in common, especially the clear fiery anger at injustice, oppression, and hypocrisy, but he was personally frugal, "his furniture was books," and he was capable of devoted friendship. What fitted Brandes for his work as educator-critic was a quality one of his teachers very early discerned in him: he had the freshest, most direct understanding of poetry and art, with a form of presentation which revealed the poetry in his own soul, a requisite for the true aesthetic.

See: H. H. Boyesen, Essays on Scandinavian Literature (1895); E. Förster-Nietzsche, Fr. Nietzsches gesammelte Briefe (1904), pp. 265-330; E. W. Gosse, Two Visits to Denmark (1911); V. Andersen, Det nittende Aarhundrede anden Halvdel, Vol. IV (1925) of C. S. Petersen and V. Andersen, Illustreret dansk Litteraturhistorie, pp. 158-205; O. Seidlin, "Georg Brandes, 1842-1927," Journal of the History of Ideas, III (1942), 415-442.

S. T.

Brecht, Bert (Bertolt) (1898-, German dramatist and ballad writer), was born in Augsburg, Bavaria. His literary ability found early recognition in the award of the Kleist prize (1922). He left Germany in 1933 because he was strongly opposed to Hitlerism. Eventually sojourning in Russia, he edited with Lion Feuchtwanger (q.v.) and Willi Breidel a short-lived anti-Nazi magazine, Das Wort (Moscow, 1936-1939). He came to the United States in 1941.

With his first dramas, Trommeln in der Nacht, Baal, and Im Dickicht der Städte, all performed in 1922, Brecht established himself as one of the more important exponents of post-war expressionism, and indeed he was hailed as "the apostle of a new dramatic era." For some time Brecht shared this unique reputation with Arnolt Bronnen (originally Bronner, 1895-, a convert to Nazism), whose dramas Vatermord (1925) and Ostpolzug (1926) enjoyed great, though transient, success.

Brecht's early dramas differ in two respects from those of his immediate predecessors, which had been either realistic or expressionistic. Stylistically, they are characterized by a queer mixture of realistic and expressionistic elements and by an odd attempt to adapt the technique of the ballad to that of the drama. Philosophically, they are pervaded by a new kind of realism. This new realism is in marked contrast to old-type realism (Ibsen, the young Gerhart Hauptmann, qq.v.): its purpose is to combine the rational with the irrational, to depict life in all its incongruities, from determinable, scientifically proved facts to the undeterminable, demoniacal powers of fate. Yet in his propaganda plays, or "Lehrstücke," as he calls them, Brecht attempts to in-doctrinate the reader with his own political convictions (e.g., Die Rundköpfe und die Spitzköpfe, performed in Copenhagen in 1936, Eng. tr., Round Heads, Peak Heads, 1937; published in Gesammelte Werke, Vol. II, 1938).

Brecht, so far, has scored his greatest theatrical success with the Dreigroschenoper (1928), an adaptation of John Gay's The Beggar's Opera (1728). To English literature he is also indebted for his drama Leben Eduard des Zweiten von England (1924), for which he draws on Marlowe. The milieu of his comedy, Mann ist Mann (1927), is the United States, as it is of his Die Heilige Johanna der Schlachthöfe (written in 1922, published in 1938).

After emigrating from Germany, Brecht published his novel, Dreigroschenroman (1934; Eng. tr., A Penny for the Poor, 1937). Mother (1935), a play with music, is based on Gorky's (q.v.) novel of the same name. Brecht's Gesammelte Werke, in two volumes, printed in Czechoslovakia and published in London, appeared in 1938. They contain copious and detailed commentaries ("Anmerkungen") by Brecht himself. Subsequently, he wrote a number of vigorous one-act plays, radio scripts, and poems against Hitlerism. Most of this material is collected in Furcht und Elend des Dritten Reiches (New York, 1945). Several of the playlets, such as The Informer, The Jewish Wife, and In Search of Justice, had also been included in a book, The Private Life of the Master Race (1944; in English only), which Brecht calls a "documentary play." This work, written in a partly expressionistic, partly naturalistic style, portrays with much objectivity the trials and tribulations of the German people under Hitler's yoke. Brecht's ballads are collected in the Hauspostille (1927), in Lieder, Gedichte und Chöre (1934), and in Svendborger Gedichte (1939). Most of his ballads are written in the vein of François Villon and Frank (Benjamin Franklin) Wedekind (q.v.), while a few are obviously patterned after the good old "Moritat," naïvely popular examples of the memento mori tradition, loose in rhyme and macabre in content.

See: K. Thieme, "Des Teufels Gebetbuch," Hochland, XXIX (1932), 397-413; C. Tolksdorf, John Gays "Beggar's Opera" und Bert Brechts "Dreigroschenoper" (1934); S. Tretyakov, "Bertolt Brecht," International Literature, V (Moscow, May, 1937), 60-70; "Gegenwärtiges Theater," Mass und Wert, II (1939), 831-844; E. R. Bentley, "Bertolt Brecht and His Work," in Brecht, The Private Life of the Master Race (1944), pp. 117-136.

G. K.

Bregendahl, Marie (1867–, Danish novelist), born in Fly, was 35 years old when she began writing novels dealing with the souls and the lives of the people in the rural part of Jutland, Denmark's mainland. At that time she, herself a daughter of the soil, had seen much, thought much, had married Jeppe Aakjær (q.v.), who already had secured an outstanding place in Danish literature of the period, and had been divorced from him. On the bleak background of West Jutland's storm-swept and sand-blown fields, with the thundering music of the North Sea in her ears and with a slowly and painfully acquired experience of life, she had found her special milieu and, in a peculiar sense, made it her own. Her first story, Ved Lars Skrædders Sygeseng (1902; At the Sickbed of Lars the Tailor), was soon followed by Hendrik i Bakken (1904; Hendrik on the Hill) and En Dødsnat (1912; Eng. tr., A Night of Death, 1931), powerful, poignant sketches etched in that detached and dispassionate manner which betrays profound sympathy. These shorter novels became, as it were, the introduction to Marie Bregendahl's cycle, Billeder af Søndalsfolkenes Liv (6 vols., 1914–1923; Pictures from the Life of the Sea-valley People), and to Holger Hauge og hans Hustru (2 double vols., 1934–1935; Holger Hauge and His Wife); these two massive novels are her principal works.

Within a frame of rustic life, of political and social clashes and ferment, Marie Bregendahl emphasizes the irrevocability of fate, the futility of resisting it, the mournful necessity of having to submit to what must be. In nearly all cases emotions and events are closely affiliated with the meager soil and harsh climate of that part of the Danish landscape where she is intimately at home. With Marie Bregendahl, plot is not the essential factor, nor yet style—hers is not always flawless—but the probing of human souls, the sympathetic understanding of deep tragedies and little happinesses.

See: H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Literature from Brandes to Our Day (1929); Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871–1933) (1934).

G. St.

Bremond, Henri (1865–1933, French historian of religious ideas), offered a unique blending of religious enthusiasm and of literary, non-theological affinities. No one in the long list of modern ecclesiastical authors has produced anything comparable to this erudite writer's Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en

France (11 vols., 1916–1933; unfinished). Born in Aix-en-Provence in a house of pious Roman Catholic traditions, Bremond entered the Society of Jesus, in which other members of his family were prominent; he spent nearly 10 years in England and Wales and came back to France with broader views. His retirement from his order in 1904, his faithfulness to his modernist friend George Tyrrell in 1909, suggested, without casting any doubt upon Bremond's orthodoxy, the evolution from dogma to feeling and, so to say, from Bossuet to Fénelon. He had met Maurice Barrès (q.v.) in Athens and had also visited Fogazzaro (q.v.). Two collections of essays, both entitled L'Inquiétude religieuse (1901, 1909), and numerous contributions to the Etudes and the Correspondant proved his definite interest in "choice souls," Newman (1905) and Fénelon (1910) exemplifying the foremost among them. When he was able to give up as a livelihood teaching in Jesuit schools, he devoted most of his time—hampered, however, by poor health—to his lifework, the presentation of religious currents in French literature. In his view an element of mysticism, transcending the matter-of-factness of life, was the indispensable basis for rich, substantial, and vital feeling. It was this conviction which led this man of sunny Provence to take sides in favor of romanticism, in its spiritual sense, and to supplement his learned studies by works of contemporary interest such as De la poésie pure (1926), Prière et poésie (1926), and Racine et Valéry (1930).

As a kind of spiritual adviser of young men of letters, his role during his brief stays in Paris and his contact with circles connected with the French Academy (to which he was elected 1923) made him for a certain time a well-known figure in the world of letters (see interviews and articles in Nouvelles littéraires). But he always went back with satisfaction to his winter quarters near Pau and to a life of meditation and research: this "Catholic Sainte-Beuve," as he was called, could not easily dispense with some kind of cell.

See: M. Martin du Gard, De Sainte-Beuve à Fénelon: Henri Bremond (1927).

F. B.

Breton, André (1896–, French poet, novelist, and critic), has been since its beginning the great theorist and director of surrealism. The son of modest Norman shopkeepers, Breton was, at the start of the First World War, a medical student, interested especially in mental diseases. As an intern at Nantes in 1916 he met Jacques Vaché, that legendary figure of dada and surrealism, whose complete contempt for society and systematic attempt to turn his life into an extended hallucination had an overwhelming effect on Breton. The work of Rimbaud (q.v.) had already deeply attracted Breton, and the result of this dual influence was a theory of life as well as art which combined an extravagant scorn of all accepted values with a corresponding exaltation of the importance of the subconscious. The first of these characteristics was shared by the movement called dada, which after originating in Zurich in 1916, under the direction of Tristan Tzara, invaded Paris in 1919; and it was only natural for Breton and his friends Philippe Soupault and Paul Eluard (qq.v.), having already founded the review Littérature (1919), to associate themselves with dada.

In the early battles of dada Breton played a leading role, taking full part in such demonstrations as that held in the Salle Gaveau, May 26, 1920, at which the audience pelted the speakers with raw beef; he produced the only important books that can be connected with the movement, Les Champs magnétiques (1921), a volume of unconscious writing done in collaboration with Soupault, and Les Pas perdus (1924), a collection of critical and autobiographical essays. The essence of dada was negation, a refusal to express or discover any meaning in art or society, and whether it is regarded as a serious affair or as a gigantic parody on all contemporary thought, it is obvious that it was self-destructive. Breton realized this fact more clearly than did Tzara and broke with him in 1921, the rupture being accompanied by the usual demonstrations and counterdemonstrations.

A short period of quiet followed, broken in 1924 by Breton's Manifeste du surréalisme: Poisson soluble and the organization in the same year of the review La Révolution surréaliste. The leading collaborators with Breton at this time included Soupault, Benjamin Péret, Louis Aragon (q.v.), Eluard, Robert Desnos, and René Crevel. In the years that immediately followed, Breton was active as a critic and theorist in Légitime Défense (1926) and Le Surréalisme et la peinture (1928) and as a creative writer in Nadja (1928), one of the most remarkable books in modern literature, the strange, deeply moving story of a love affair between Breton and a woman, Nadja, of marked psychic tendencies. The history of the movement by no means ran smoothly: Breton became more and more inclined to emphasize investigation of psychiatric states and the world of dreams and to look with disfavor on those adherents who were not prepared to embrace surrealism completely, with the result that many former associates, including Desnos and Soupault, were expelled from the group by the Second Manifeste du surréalisme (1930). The question of surrealism's relations with the Communist Party was also much debated; in 1930 the title of the official review was changed to Le Surréalisme au service de la révolution; but the Communists continued to regard the apparent frivolity of the surrealists with suspicion, with the result that Aragon, the most politically conscious of the group, left surrealism for Communism in 1932, as did Eluard in 1938. Breton continued throughout this period to combine theory and practice, producing Les Vases communicants (1932), a study of dreams, and, in collaboration with Eluard, L'Immaculée Conception (1930), notable for its attempt to simulate voluntarily various types of mental disease. Breton's short essay, Qu'est-ce que le surréalisme? published in Paris in 1934, appeared in English in London in 1936 as What Is Surrealism? In spite of internal dissension, the movement received new recruits, notably Salvador Dali and Nicolas Calas, and extended its influence to England and to America, its headquarters at present, with Breton still dominating it, both personally and in his works, Point du jour (1934), L'Amour fou (1937), and Fata Morgana (1942).

Since Breton's own work is so closely connected with surrealism, it is hard to evaluate him without assessing it. Both Eluard and Aragon surpass him in literary ability, and in spite of the merits of Nadja, it is as the controlling force of a school that he must take his place in literary history. Surrealism is spun of many yarns and is far from a sudden aberration of French literature. Its way had been prepared by such men as Apollinaire and Jarry, to say nothing of Rimbaud and Lautréamont (qq.v.) As a literary practice, it is in large part a logical development of the tendency of French poetry since at least the time of the symbolists (see French symbolism) to interest itself in the subconscious, to become more "pure," to use more startling metaphor, to depend less on logical meaning than on the juxtaposition of widely divergent images for the sake of an effect felt not by the conscious mind. Nor can the influence of cubism be overlooked, particularly its device of rendering a scene by abstracting its significant elements and recombining them, with possible deformation, into a work of art whose arrangement is purely formal. But surrealism, Breton has always insisted, is not merely an aesthetic theory; it is a philosophy of life. It desires a complete revolution of man's modes of thought—and, it naturally follows, of society as well. The interpretation of the world provided by the intellect does not correspond to anything essential in the true nature of man or the world, and surrealism proposes to replace it by the liberation of the potentialities of the subconscious. The two elements which enter into this position are the spirit of revolt and despair that affected the entire Western World after the First World War (comparable in many ways to the spirit of the romantics in the 1830's) and the desire to escape from a materialistic, scientific world which holds no mystery (also characteristic of much 19th-century poetry). The pure spirit of revolt is more typical of dada than of surrealism; in spite of its political tendency toward the left, surrealism has stressed, as it grew, rather the second element. It is not particularly in nature as the 19th century saw it, however, that surrealism finds an escape, but more often in the trappings of the modern city—factory chimneys, busses, and advertisements, neon signs and wax mannequins, transformed into a fantastic universe by the liberated subconscious. It is likely that surrealism's ultimate value, and Breton's, will reside in this liberation and the stimulus it gave to so much modern literature, whether it called itself surrealism or not.

See: Marcel Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933); Guy Mangeot, Histoire du surréalisme (1934); David Gascoyne, A Short Survey of Surrealism (1935); Herbert Read, ed., Surrealism (1936); New Directions, 1940 (annual volume); G. E. Lemaitre, From Cubism to Surrealism in French Literature (1941).

C. W., Jr.

Březina, Otokar (pseud. of Václav Jebavý, 1868–1929, Czech poet), is the leader of the Czech symbolist movement and possibly the greatest of all recent Czech lyric writers. He was born in Počátky (southern Bohemia), the son of a poor shoemaker, and was a school-teacher in different towns of Moravia. Březina died in Jaroměřice, where he had resided since 1901.

Recently some of the early poetry and prose of Březina, dating back to his school days, has been unearthed. But his first collection of poetry, Tajemné dálky (Mysterious Distances), was published only in 1895 when he was nearing 30, and then within six years he added four more small collections. A volume of essays followed in 1903. After that Březina stopped writing. Late in his life he was interviewed by visitors and friends, and they, especially the Catholic poet Jakub Deml, gave accounts of his later views which excited much disappointment and controversy; he seemed to be characterized chiefly by a disgruntled provincial nationalism. But Březina must be judged on the basis of his poetry, which appeared in five small booklets.

Tajemné dálky is a work of youthful pessimism, only superficially touched by a still largely aesthetic mysticism. The themes are fin de siècle, the bitterness of frustration, the sense of guilt, the tragedy of love and friendship, the attraction of death which appears as a distant savior and comforter. In a few poems personal sorrows like the early death of his parents are hinted at, but on the whole solemn tones of prayer prevail. The intricate clusters of images, of which many are drawn from Catholic liturgy, the strangely farfetched, extremely effective rhymes, the use of alexandrines which point to a reading of Baudelaire (q.v.), make even this first book unique in Czech poetry. But the truly great Březina begins to emerge only with Svítání na Západě (1896; Dawn in the West), though this collection in turn represents only a transition to Větry od pólu (1897; Polar Winds), in which Březina appears as a highly original symbolist poet. The early pessimism has almost disappeared and is replaced by a cosmic optimism which has nothing of the shallow belief in progress in it, but is rather the final insight of a mystic who has reached an acceptance of all existence as part of the divine pattern. God's mysterious will works through the striving and the evolution of all created things towards cooperation and unity with Him. Březina, in a highly personal way, manages to combine the insight of all mystics, of whom he was an ardent student, with a monistic optimism which shows traces of reading in Emerson and even Nietzsche (q.v.). In these two collections Březina also found his most personal style: free verse, with many dactyls and anapaests, sometimes rhymed, of enormously long lines; clusters of magnificent metaphors which seem to burst one from the other; hymns and dithyrambs which are sometimes put into the mouths of imaginary speakers including "the sun, the earth, the waters, and the mystery of fire." The images from the liturgy have disappeared and are replaced by metaphors drawn from the sciences or ordinary activities such as winegrowing or farming. The next collection, Stavitelé chrámu (1899; Builders of the Temple), represents some backsliding into pessimism. Doubts and uncertainties have arisen in the poet's mind: the suffering of all creation, including inert matter, is voiced in curious poems, and symbolic types such as "prophets," "martyrs," "blind men," "madmen," join their voices in a stupendous oratorio of the whole universe. The last and possibly greatest collection, Ruce (1901; Hands), represents a return to certainty and belief. The stress is here stronger than before on the conception of man's cooperation with God and humanity's unity, which is conceived of as including the living, the dead, and the unborn. The innumerable visible and invisible hands, like a magical chain, of the title poem carry out the mysterious laws of His eternal will. One poem sings the "roundelay of hearts," another foresees redeemed man for whose sake "it is joyous to live," and another evokes the time when the "delivered" earth will be extinguished and the mighty current of eternity will roll on. Some of the poems return to traditional stanzas and closed rhyme forms, a change which continues in 13 later scattered poems where Březina even returns to personal problems. The cycle came to an end and the poet imposed silence upon himself, surely because he realized that he had expressed all he had to say. The volume of essays, Hudba pramenů (1903; The Music of the Springs), planned as a commentary to his poetry, is rather a paraphrase on a lower stylistic level of his main ideas of art as service to God, of the hidden economy of the universe, of justice and the masses. The highly ornate and metaphorical diction is not illuminated by the same glow of imagination and the same visionary power which uphold even the longest of his poems.

In Březina's work modern Czech poetry has reached its peak, a peak where the air is rarefied and sometimes difficult to breathe. Březina's contacts with ordinary reality are slight, and his social message has little in common with contemporary movements: it breathes the spirit of all mysticism and possibly of general Christianity. His grandiose visions sing the glory of God and the mysteries of the universe in a timeless exaltation.

See: M. Marten, Otokar Březina (1903); F. X. Šalda, Duše a dílo (1913); J. Staněk, Otokar Březina (1918); P. Selver, Otokar Březina; a Study in Czech Literature (1921); E. Saudek, Pod oblohou Otokara Březiny (1928); A. Veselý, Otokar Březina (1928); G. Picková-Saudková, Hovory s Otokarem Březinou (1929); J. Deml, Mé svědectví o Otokaru Březinovi (1931); A. Pospíšilová, Otokar Březina (1936);

P. Fraenkel, O. Březina; genese dila (1937). There is a German translation of Březina's poetry by O. Pick and E. Saudek (1920), and one in Italian by E. Lo Gatto, Venti dai poli e I Costruttori del tempio (1930).

R. W.

Brieux, Eugène (1858–1932, French dramatist), was born and reared in one of the working-class districts of Paris, where his father was a carpenter. His limited early education was later complemented with wide reading. He was already interested in the theatre at the time of his stay at Rouen as a journalist; but his first plays worthy of attention were produced by Antoine (q.v.)—Ménages d'artistes (1890) and especially Blanchette (1892), the latter making him known to the public at large. From then on Brieux's literary production was regular and even more than plentiful (40 plays). He was elected to the French Academy in 1910.

If, like most of the playwrights of the Théâtre Libre where he made his début, Brieux has a tendency to unveil with a sometimes cruel realism selfishness and pettiness, particularly of the bourgeoisie, he does it without the bitter irony and pessimism of Becque's (q.v.) disciples. Indeed Brieux is something of a missionary. He denounces tirelessly the moral degradation of the individual by other men, by institutions, or by social habits and prejudices, pointing out the ultimate disastrous consequences—and doing this in the mood of a reformer.

Blanchette is about popular education. La Couvée (1893) presents a problem dear to Brieux, that of the intervention of parents in the lives of their children. When these parents, influenced by a more or less disguised egoism, try to impose their will on their children, especially where it concerns marriage and the dowry, Brieux's indignation bursts forth. There are similar themes in Les Trois Filles de M. Dupont (1897), one of his best plays, and in La Petite Amie (1902). In plays like La Française (1907), La Femme seule (1913), and Pierrette et Galaor (1923) Brieux is an ardent defender of women and girls, and in his desire to protect their rights he may seem to go so far as to uphold free union and the illegitimate child. Yet Brieux is at heart a very conservative moralist: if he seems to favor anti-social solutions, it is because for him society as it exists now leaves no alternative. In fact, it is the family he defends in Le Berceau (1898), in which he attacks divorce when there are children, and in Les Remplaçantes (1901), in which he protests against the practice of wet-nursing. Brieux is somewhat in conflict with himself in Maternité (1913), divided between arguments about preventing the birth of unwanted children and the realization that abortion is an antisocial practice. La Robe rouge (1900), another outstanding play, develops two themes, the crushing of the individual by the powerful machine of the law and the degradation caused by greed and ambition in a judge; the author demands reform in criminal legislation.

Brieux has been criticized for oversimplifying very complex social problems. He is no deep thinker, nor even always coherent. When he wanders into a world which he does not know very well, the world of science in L'Evasion (1896) or the gallant society of La Régence (1927), his talent weakens; and when he studies the problem of religion in La Foi (1912), his views appear shallow. He has not always avoided rhetoric and melodrama. He does sometimes excel in the portrayal of humble folk, whom he may have had particularly in mind when he said: "I have wished that the amount of suffering upon this earth might be diminished a little because I have lived."

A large number of the plays of Brieux have been translated into English and several were produced in New York.

See: P. V. Thomas, The Plays of Eugène Brieux (1915); A. Presas, Brieux; portrait littéraire (1930).

A. C. L.

Broch, Hermann (1886–, Austrian novelist, philosopher, and playwright), was born in Vienna. The publication, late in his life, of an amazing prose trilogy (Die Schlafwandler, 1930–1932; Eng. tr., The Sleepwalkers, 1932) surprised especially those who had known him as mathematician, engineer, and director of a Viennese textile concern. The work is a striking example of a new type of European cultural portraiture in which scientific speculation and poetic imagination are combined to represent the incoherent variety of contemporary experience. In what Broch calls the poly-historic form of the novel he blends many creative devices, and at least in this resolute attempt to find an adequate medium for the complexity of rational and irrational impulses he belongs in the distinguished company of Joyce and Gide (q.v.). In the first volume of the trilogy (Pasenow, or Romanticism—1888) the stagnation and disintegration of the spiritual life is revealed beneath the thin ice of a deceptive romantic ideology. The central figure of the second volume (Esch, or Anarchy —1903) represents the drift from a pseudo-bourgeois clerkdom to the despair of a godless and valueless life. Huguenau, or Realism—1918 finally leaves no doubt of the collapse of all organic coherence and shows, in a more discursive fashion (see the intercalated reflections upon "The Decay of Values"), the escape into substitute forms of belief. This remarkably complex triptych is Broch's central achievement. A drama (Die Entsühnung, 1934), another novel (Die unbekannte Grösse, 1933; Eng. tr., The Unknown Quantity, 1935), and several short stories and essays (e.g., "Eine leichte Enttäuschung" and "Das Böse im Wertsystem der Kunst," both appearing in Die neue Rundschau, Jahrgang XLIV, Bd. I, pp. 502–517, Bd. II, pp. 157–191, and the pamphlet, James Joyce und die Gegenwart, 1935) reiterate the existential elements in Broch's philosophical position. His latest work, Der Tod des Vergil (1945; Eng. tr., The Death of Virgil, 1945), is an unusually stirring prose poem which interprets the visions of Vergil and depicts the age from whose bloodshed and convulsions Christianity was soon to be born.

Since coming to America in 1938, Broch has been awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship for 1941–1942, membership in the American Institute of Arts and Letters, 1942, and a Rockefeller Fellowship for Philosophical and Psychological Research at Princeton University, 1942–1944.

See: Fritz Lehner, "Hermann Broch," Life and Letters To-day, Vol. XV (1936), No. 6, pp. 64–71.

V. L.

Bródy, Sándor (1863–1924, Hungarian novelist, short-story writer, and playwright), was born in Eger and died in Budapest. His education was superficial. Yet when he raised his voice he attracted many readers and critics, because in relationship to Hungarian literature his voice sounded fresh and his manner of communication seemed new. In fact Bródy was a romantic naturalist who made the mistake of thinking that he was the protagonist of French realism in Hungary. Many readers felt that he went beneath the surface of modern life, and they liked it. It is safe to say that if Bródy had not colored his stories with experiences of poverty, the response of the readers, themselves often poor, would have been less enthusiastic. As the editor of Fehér Könyv (White Book) and of Jövendő (Future). Bródy recorded the problems of his time with journalistic flexibility. Both magazines expressed the personal whims and convictions of the editor.

Bródy had a prolific pen. He wrote carelessly, but with spontaneity, impressing even readers and critics who might have been in disagreement with his views or literary manners. Generally his work indicates an attempt at the understanding of truth in its social and sensual implications. In a sentimental, seemingly frank fashion he made use of the material that the unfairness of modern conditions offered. The social causes of modern formlessness were unknown to him or only partly understood; his intense subjectivity prevented him from concentration upon specific problems in need of solution. He liked to generalize and preferred rambling wisdoms to truth, which would have required prolonged effort to comprehend. He liked to speak as an eyewitness, but frequently his own bitter-sweet-gay emotionalism interfered with objectivity in an almost tyrannical fashion. Because of inadequate self-criticism, he did not know or did not care to know the difference between good and mediocre writing; as a consequence much of his work is today on the unused shelves of libraries or in the dusty basements of bookstores. Bródy's promise was not fulfilled. Nevertheless he is entitled to recognition—if only because the vitality of his personality made him for a long time an influential figure in Hungarian literature and because his romantic naturalism paved the way to a freedom of expression on subjects ignored by writers before him. His first important book of short stories, Nyomor (1884; Poverty), remained one of his significant works; Az ezüst kecske (1898; The Silver Goat) is considered his best novel; A dada (1902; The Nurse) and Tanítónő (1908; The School Marm) are his best plays. His book on Rembrandt has been translated into English under the title Rembrandt; a Romance of Divine Love and Art (1928).

J. R.

Bröger, Karl (1886–, German poet and novelist), was born in Nuremberg, where he has spent much of his life. Of humble origin, Bröger is chiefly known for his contributions to Arbeiterdichtung (1929), poetry drawing its subject matter and imagery from the lives of the industrial workers. Bröger's reputation rests mainly upon his lyrics, which are characterized by simplicity, melodiousness, and restraint of style, and express sympathy for the urban proletariat. While vaguely "socialist" in conviction, Bröger is an idealist rather than a materialist, and cannot be classed as a Marxist.

(For his development up to the First World War see his autobiographical novel Der Held im Schatten, 1920.) In 1914 he supported the war, though in no chauvinistic spirit, and served in the infantry. His poem "Bekenntnis," written in that year, was one of the most popular of German war lyrics. His war experiences are reflected in the volumes of poetry Kamerad, als wir marschiert . . . (1916) and Soldaten der Erde (1918) and in the realistic and vivid novel Bunker 17 (1929; Eng. tr., Pillbox 17, 1930). Impressed by the horror of the war, Bröger turned increasingly to the ideals of pacifism and universal brotherhood. He was a leader of the Youth Movement. Under the Weimar Republic he gained increased recognition among the writers of the "left." Bröger edited the anthology Jüngste Arbeiterdichtung (1925). The scope of his own writing broadened to include the legend in Die vierzehn Nothelfer (1923) and the historical novel in Der Guldenschuh (1934). His novel Nürnberg (1935) shows the impressionable poet as a supporter of Hitler.

H. C. H.

Brunetière, Ferdinand (1849–1906, French professor and critic), born in Toulon, became the outstanding literary judge in France following the death of Taine (q.v.). He was a leading professor at the Ecole Normale Supérieure after earlier being refused admission as a student to this exclusive institution, and he was also for many years director of the Revue des deux mondes. His work attracts attention by its very mass—some 30 volumes published during his lifetime, not to mention many uncollected and posthumous articles. His career, indeed his life, was almost in its entirety that of a literary critic. The substance of his criticism is found in his Etudes critiques sur la littérature française (8 vols., 1880–1907) covering four centuries of French literature. Brunetière was in many ways out of harmony with his age; he yearned for certainty and was dogmatic at a time when, under the influence of science, most of his contemporaries in philosophy, religion, and literature thought and wrote in terms of the relative and the experimental. Yet he himself did not escape the all pervading atmosphere, and he attempted to apply to literary history the new theory of evolution. Assimilating the genres or types in literature to the Darwinian species in the biological world, Brunetière maintains that each genre is born, constitutes itself, is modified, and finally disappears or is transformed into another type, just as with other living organisms. There is, therefore, no spontaneous generation in literature. Hence the importance of adhering closely to the historical method in dealing with literary genres: transition periods should be studied carefully, for it is then that literary types assume new forms. When a professor at the Ecole Normale Supérieure, Brunetière exposed these theories in a course, later published in book form as L'Evolution de la critique (1890). The author's plan envisioned a vast work which would treat all literary genres according to the same method; he had time to execute only part of his project, Les Epoques du théâtre français (1892) and L'Evolution de la poésie lyrique (1894).

Other activities of Brunetière were less purely theoretical. He considered it his duty to wage a relentless war on those whom he called "the enemies of the French soul," especially the literary naturalists (however inconsistent this may seem in a would-be scientific critic) and the romanticists. Art, he thought, should serve a moral or at least a social purpose; the proponents of "art for art's sake" drew biting invective from him; the subjectivism and lack of restraint of the romanticists fared little better. His admiration for 17th-century French classicism, on the other hand, appears excessive. The mind which he brings to criticism is hardly free and open; his preestablished conception of life and of the universe made him singularly narrow. This is true especially of his later articles after his conversion to Catholicism (1900). A moralizing tendency is evident in much of his writing, and in his later works this becomes sheer religious propaganda for the Catholic cause. Studies on Christian apologetics and religious polemics fill almost entirely his last years.

René Doumic (q.v.), one of Brunetière's disciples, takes malicious pleasure in drawing up an impressively lengthy and varied list of his master's adversaries. Many of Brunetière's victims were perhaps more than partially right when they accused him of lacking finesse and tact, of being bellicose and vitriolic; his "ego contra" attitude too often bespeaks the pedantic pessimist. In spite of genuine defects, Brunetière's work remains that of a conscientious, erudite scholar; his theory on literary evolution helped to make the study of literature more living and dynamic; his power of generalization enabled him to build countless "palaces of ideas" which he presented in an invariably dialectic and discursive style. He is forever trying to convince. The austerity and tenseness of his criticism are fatiguing, and readers find themselves condemning his didactic manner and even disagreeing with many of his fundamental theories, but few will withhold their admiration for his qualities of order, clarity, intellectual penetration, and, at times, robust common sense.

See: A. Darlu, M. Brunetière et l'individualisme (1898); V. Giraud, Brunetière (1907); G. Fonsegrive, Ferdinand Brunetière (1908); E. Faguet, Ferdinand Brunetière (1911); E. Hocking, Brunetière (1936).

N. J. T.

Bryusov, Valeri Yakovlevich (1873–1924, Russian poet, critic, novelist, and translator), was born in Moscow into a wealthy merchant family. After graduating from the famous Polivanov Gymnasium, he matriculated with the historico-philological faculty of the University of Moscow. While still in his teens Bryusov resolved to become a littérateur. In 1894–1895 he published at his own expense three booklets entitled Russkiye simvolisty (Russian Symbolists), which contained translations from and imitations of some of the more startling examples of Western modernist poetry. By deliberately shocking public taste and critics steeped in the traditional themes and forms of poetry, Bryusov became notorious overnight. Discovering thereupon that no Russian periodical would publish his verse, he undertook a serious study not only of Western modernist poetry but also that of such classical Russian authors as Pushkin, Tyutchev, and Lermontov.

By the end of the 19th century his perseverance won him recognition as a serious critic. In 1899 the publishing house for modernist literature, "Scorpio," was established, and Bryusov was asked to act on its editorial board; later he was virtual director of its policies. By 1904, when he had organized Vesy (The Balance), a periodical devoted to symbolist literature, Bryusov became the acknowledged head of the Moscow symbolists. His literary reputation was so well established by 1908 that his verses and prose were welcome even in the traditional "thick" periodicals, and from 1910 to 1912 he even had charge of the literary department of Russkaya mysl (Russian Thought). With the outbreak of war in 1914, Bryusov went to the front in the capacity of a war correspondent. He enthusiastically welcomed the October Revolution of 1917 and in 1919 became a member of the Communist Party. Throughout the early years of the Revolution Bryusov tirelessly worked in the various projects of the Department of Education of the Soviet government; he founded the Literary Institute in Moscow in 1921.

Both in his poetry and in his prose Bryusov appears a classicist of Russian symbolism. His verses, often cold, appear because of their formal perfection "chiseled in marble" or "cast in bronze." Although Bryusov at one time subscribed to the symbolist dictum that poetry was born of magic, yet at heart he was too much of a rationalist to accept fully such a notion. Symbolism to him was a literary style rather than philosophical interpretation of life. Bryusov's influence on symbolist and non-symbolist poets alike has been very great. Much of the "literary hooliganism" of such futurist poets as Mayakovsky (q.v.), Burlyuk, and Khlebnikov (q.v.) was anticipated in Bryusov's collections, Russkiye simvolisty; many a symbolist poet was indebted to Bryusov for his editorial suggestions and for his penetrating critical comments. Such writers as Alexander Blok and Andrei Bely (qq.v.) regarded Bryusov as their teacher in poetic form.

Bryusov's literary output has been voluminous. Ideologically it reflects the influence of French and Belgian symbolists (see French symbolism)—of Baudelaire, Verlaine, Mallarmé, Rimbaud, Maeterlinck (qq.v.), and, after the turn of the century, especially of Verhaeren (q.v.). Bryusov's books of verse, Chefs d'œuvre (1895), Me Eum Esse (1897), Tertia Vigilia (1900), Urbi et Orbi (1903), Stephanos (1906), Zerkalo tenei (1912; A Mirror of Shadows), Posledniye mehty (1920; Last Wishes), Mig (1922; Moment), Dali (1922; Distance), Mea (1924), reflect the development from a passionate egocentrism toward an impassionate objectivity. His Opyty (1918; Experiments) comprises verses of varying worth that illustrate every kind of meter and verse known to prosody. Bryusov's prose includes two semihistorical novels, Ognenny angel (1903; The Fiery Angel) and Altar pobedy (1913; Altar of Victory), and a number of short stories. His Dalekiye i blizkiye (1912; The Distant Ones and the Near) is a collection of penetrating critical essays on Russian poetry. Bryusov's translations include Verlaine's Romances sans paroles (1894); Verhaeren's Hélène de Sparte (1909) and his poems (Stikhi o sovremennosti, 1907, Poems of Modernity; Sobranie stikhotvorenii, 1911, Collected Poems); Maeterlinck's Pelléas et Mélisande (1907); D'Annunzio's Francesca da Rimini (1908); a number of poems by Oscar Wilde; and a collection, Frantsuzskiy liriki XIX veka (1909; French Lyrics of the 19th Century). Bryusov also wrote a number of critical works devoted to Pushkin. His Dnevnik, 1891–1910 (1927; Diaries, 1891–1910) and a volume of memoirs, Iz moyei zhizni (1927), are valuable documentary evidence of an era of intellectual turmoil and seeking.

See: Ellis (pseud. of L. L. Kobylinski), Russkiye simvolisty (1910); P. S. Kogan, ed., Valeriyu Bryusovu (1924); G. Lelevich, V. Ya. Bryusov (1924).

O. M.

Budantsev, Sergei Fyodorovich (1896–, Russian novelist, dramatist, and short-story writer), was born on an estate in the former Government of Ryazan, graduated from a Gymnasium in 1915, and, after a year at the University of Moscow, visited Persia (1916–1918); later he worked for newspapers in Astrakhan and Baku. He had been contributing to the provincial press since 1913, and in 1923 he brought out his Myatezh (The Revolt), a typical civil war novel, depicting the triumph of the Red sailors over the Socialist Revolutionaries in a Volga town. A more considerable work is Sarancha (1927; The Locusts), with its complex plot, deepened characterization, and convincing description of life and intrigue in the Turkestan steppes. His Povest o stradaniyakh uma (1931; A Tale of a Suffering Mind) aroused considerable controversy, for instead of dealing with contemporary Russia, the author had elected to explore the eternal problem of the meaning of human life as it appeared to a young Russian scientist of the 60's.

Budantsev's plays are less known, but his stories have attracted attention and represent a real contribution to Russian literature. Like his novels, they often center about the conflict of sharply differentiated psychological types; they are carefully composed and are written in an expressive language which makes the most of details. These stories have been gathered in several collections (Yaponskaya duel, 1927, The Japanese Duel; Rasskazy, 1929, Stories; Lyubov k zhizni, 1935, Love of Life); the best appear in Budantsev's Izbrannoye (1936; Selected Works). The earliest deal with personal tragedy and social injustice among Asiatics ("Zhena"; The Wife); of the later stories, some give a penetrating analysis of ordinary Soviet citizens ("Vesenniy pesn"; Spring Song), while others, which show the transformation of intellectuals, are psychologically weaker ("Inzhener Vyazemski"; Engineer Vyazemski).

See: G. Gorbachyov, Sovremennaya russkaya literatura (1928); "Budantsev," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vol. I (1929); G. Struve, Soviet Russian Literature (1935), pp. 142–145.

P. A. P.

Bulgakov, Mikhail Afanasyevich (1891–1940, Russian novelist and dramatist), was born in Kiev, graduated in 1916 from the medical school of the university there, and remained in that city during the following troublous years of the Revolution and civil war, when Kiev changed hands some 10 times. Arriving poor and unknown in Moscow in 1921, he wrote fantastic and satirical stories later collected in Dyaboliada (1925; The Deviliad). His two-volume novel, Belaya Gvardiya (1925; The White Guard), dealt not unsympathetically with the Turbins, a charming family of the old Russia, undergoing in Kiev the same terrible experiences that Bulgakov had suffered. By condensing this story and in one case combining two characters into one, Bulgakov turned his novel into a play, Dni Turbinykh (1926; Eng. tr., The Days of the Turbins, 1934). This was beautifully acted by the Moscow Art Theatre and was also produced in England and America; it is often considered the best written of all Soviet plays. It brings in all the different forces then in conflict in Russia—the followers of the tsar, the followers of the Ukrainian hetman, the invading German armies, the outlaws under Petlura. The Bolsheviks themselves never appear, but at the end of the play when they are heard approaching and singing the “Internationale,” one of the characters says with evenhanded justice: “To some this is a prologue and to some it is an epilogue.” The play has been much discussed and has continued to hold the stage.

Bulgakov also wrote Zoikina kvartira (1926; Zoe's Apartment), a comedy making fun of the difficulties of Soviet life, and Bagrovyy ostrov (1928; The Purple Island), a fantastic allegory on Soviet censorship. For the Moscow Art Theatre he dramatized (1932) Gogol's novel Mertvie dushi (Dead Souls). For the same theatre he acted as “dramaturge” or selector and arranger of the repertoire. He attempted a sequel to his story about the Turbin family which represented the White Guard officers flying to join the forces of Denikin fighting against the Red armies in the south. This was called Beg (1936; Flight). From then on he turned to earlier history and literature. In Molière (1936) he dramatized the life of the great French playwright of the 17th century. Don Quixote (1940) dramatizes the novel of Cervantes, Pushkin (produced in 1943 after Bulgakov's death) the last days in the life of the great Russian poet of the early 19th century.

See: Gleb Struve, Soviet Russian Literature (1935), pp. 145–152; Moskovski Khudozhest- venny Teatr v illyustratsiyakh i dokumentakh (1938).

H. W. L. D.

Bulgarian literature. Prior to the independence of Bulgaria in 1876, the literature of that country had been didactic or revolutionary in character. Authors such as Father Paisi (1722–?) and Khristo Botev (1848–1876) were more interested in educating their people and rousing them to a knowledge of their past and present than in producing literature as ordinarily defined.

The first real man of letters was Ivan Vazov (q.v.). For 50 years he worked in all forms of literature, lyric and epic poetry, short story, novel, and drama, and made himself the leader of a national literature in the best sense of the word. Originally romanticist under the influence of Victor Hugo, he set forth realistically and optimistically the struggles for the liberation and the development of the Bulgarian people. At the same time there developed a group of writers such as Todor Genchov Vlaykov (1865–), Georgi P. Stamatov (1869–), Anton Strashimirov (1872–), Stoyan Mikhaylovski (1856–1927), and Aleko Konstantinov (1863–1897), who pictured in a realistic manner Bulgarian village life with its various manifestations of virtue and of evil, but who believed that with the development of better conditions the good would finally conquer the evil.

As national stability grew and Bulgarian social and political life became better organized, it was only natural that a tendency should arise to bring Bulgarian literature nearer to European models. The leader in this movement, which at first involved an opposition to Vazov and his school, was Pencho Slaveykov (1866–1912). He was the son of the prerevolutionary poet, Petko Rachev Slaveykov, and after some education at home went to Leipzig in 1892 and remained there until 1908. There he came under the influence of German writers, especially Goethe, Heine, and Nietzsche (q.v.), and sought to translate into Bulgarian the ideals of modern literature as he understood them. Yet he did it largely through Bulgarian themes in such works as Epicheski pesni (1907; Epic Songs), Son' na shtastie (1907; Dream of Happiness), and Korvava pesn' (1911–1913; Song of Blood). He was the first Bulgarian aesthete and deliberate artist and from his influence developed most of Bulgarian modernism. In the same direction worked two of his younger contemporaries, Peyo Kracholov Yavorov (1878–1914), who leaned heavily upon Russian and French symbolists (see French symbolism) in resolving the discords in the human soul, and Petko Yu. Todorov (1879-1916), who introduced Ibsen (q.v.) into Bulgaria and reworked many Bulgarian folk themes in a modern psychological manner. Among prose authors in this period, the outstanding name is Elin Pelin (pseud. of Dimitar Ivanov, 1878-), whose short stories reveal Bulgarian life under the impact of modern civilization.

The old optimistic life vanished with the First Balkan War in 1912, when Bulgaria failed to recover Macedonia, and with the heavy losses of the Second Balkan War in 1913. There followed the disastrous entrance of the country into the First World War on the side of the Central Powers, and all these defeats together with the hope of securing territory which all classes of the population believe rightfully theirs led the nation into the Second World War on the side of the Axis, despite the democratic character of the people. All this has had its reflection on modern Bulgarian literature, which since 1912 has shown signs of interest in mysticism, especially the medieval cult of Bogomilism, in symbolism, and in a great development of the historical novel inspired by ancient Bulgarian history. The outstanding poet of this period was Dimcho Debelyanov (1887-1916), who fell in the First World War and who left a small collection of poems which by their quality secured his fame. They number barely 50 but they have made a deep impression upon the Bulgarian literary world. To the same generation belong Ivan Grozev (1872-) with his themes drawn from the supernatural world, and Todor Trayanov (1882-); they are the recognized leaders of the symbolists with a real sense of the problems of Bulgaria, as may be seen e.g., in the latter's Bulgariski baladi (1921; Bulgarian Ballads) and Pesen' na pesnite (1921; Song of Songs). Other outstanding symbolists are Nikolay Raynov (1888-), a professor of the history of art at the Art Academy, with his Bogomilski legendi (1912; Bogomil Legends), and Nikolay Liliev (1885-) with his superb mastery of the music of verse and his yearning for solitude.

In prose Iordan Iovkov (1884-1938) holds the first rank with his stories of peasant life, especially those about his native province of Dobruja. He was an accurate observer and a good student of psychology and had an excellent command of form and style, so that some of his works, such as Staroplaninski legendi (1927; Legends of the Staroplanina), can be counted among the best products of Bulgarian literature. His early death was one of the great losses of the modern period. Dobri Nemirov (1882-) is another master painter of village life, as in Bratya (1927; The Brothers) which presents conditions at the time of the liberation of the country. He has also worked in the field of the historical novel, e.g., Angeloglasniyat (1938; The Angel-voiced Singer). Georgi Raychev (1882-) is the leading psychological novelist and his Grekh (1923; Sin) is one of the finest of his works. In general, however, it is fair to say that Bulgarian authors have handled far more satisfactorily the problem of village life and village reaction to modern culture than they have subjects related to the capital or to the leading provincial cities such as Plovdiv. Mention should be made of Angel Karaliychev (1902-) who has gravitated from stories of peasant life to stories of children.

For many years Bulgarian writers were grouped around two literary periodicals, the Hyperion, organ of the symbolists, and the Zlatorog (Golden Horn), which united those artists who were seeking especially for perfection of form. This second ideal has been supported by critics such as Dr. Kiril Khristich, editor of Mysl (Thought), Vladimir Vasilev, Konstantin Galabov, Bozhan Angelov, and Iordan Badev.

Since the beginning of the 20th century women have played a prominent part in Bulgarian literature. Dora Gabe (1886-) won a high reputation before the First World War and has since then devoted herself mainly to poems for children. Elisaveta Bagryana's collection of lyric poems, Vechnata i svyatata (Eternity and the Saint), which combine abstract aestheticism and true feeling, were published in 1927. Anna Kamnova (1894-) is the leading woman prose writer.

In a somewhat different vein is Dimitri Shishmanov's (1889-1945), Blenove kray Akropolu (1938; Shadows on the Acropolis), a series of fictionalized studies on the relations of the ancient and the modern worlds which attracted considerable attention as a type of intelligent sophistication that had not previously appeared in Bulgarian literature. Shishmanov has also written a number of successful novels and dramas.

When we reflect that Bulgarian literature has existed as an independent art only since the liberation of the country, and when we take into account the stormy history of this century, we realize how much Bulgarian writers have achieved. They have acclimated themselves to nearly all the forms and movements of more recent times and have succeeded in leaving their own imprint upon each form that they adopted. Their greatest strength is undoubtedly in the description of peasant life, presented in all periods of its development and in a variety of literary forms.

See: Bulgarski pisateli, Vols. I–VI (1929–1930); D. Shishmanov, A Survey of Bulgarian Literature (1932); Iordan Badev, Skitsi na zhivite, (1934).

C. A. M.

Bull, Olaf (1883–1933; Norwegian lyric poet), born in Christiania, might justly be called the Keats of Norway: he was a dreamer, a pure artist, a passionate lover of truth and beauty, a master of concrete imagery, and a matchless workman who patiently wrought into imperishable form the full wealth of a pensive, restless spirit. He is the one Norwegian poet who was at once (Digte, 1909; Poems) recognized as a genius and whose writings bore from birth the stamp of deathlessness. His "Ode to a Grecian Urn" is a poem called "Metope" (1927), wherein melancholy over the fragility of life is woven into a vivid setting which preserves in the "young, eternal alabaster of poetry" a mood like that of Keats's "still unravished . . . quietness." His themes were those of all great lyric writers—nature, love, beauty, death, and the poet's self. He sang the nature of Christiania, particularly the northern spring in its earliest, most auspicious moments, vivifying every nuance of color and light among the shadows. In love he sought the ideal beauty that is glimpsed but never won, dwelling much on memory, concretely and presently imaged, in which he found the true eternity. His goal was to experience poetically the entire universe, and he pursued it by delving deeply into history, biology, geology, and other branches of learning, as well as by direct, acute perception of the outer world. This goal required an intense objectification of his experiences, expressed in life by a completely bohemian, asocial existence, in poetry by a constant veiling of the immediacy of experience in allusion, myth, or poetic imagery. He also hid behind a self-ironic humor which can often be utterly charming. In his last years poems of a less esoteric nature, showing a warmer contact with nation and society, came into being (De hundrede aar, 1928, The Hundred Years; Ignis ardens, 1932), but in the midst of this new and fruitful development his life was cut short by disease. Bull is generally named in one breath with Norway's masters of lyric verse, Wergeland, Björnson (q.v.), Vogt (q.v.). He lacks their social stature and their urge to action, but he shares their cosmic feeling and daring imagery and exceeds them in chiseled perfection of form. Some of his most unforgettable poems deal with the laws of fantasy and the poet's difficult art, which he once described as "festively forging parted thoughts together." His published poems are only a fraction compared with what he himself rejected, and not one of them was ever revised after publication. His sense of form extended beyond rhyme and rhythm into the very sound texture of his lines, which he wove together in a rich but subtle assonance. The aristocratic form of his poetry won him admirers among the fastidious rather than the multitude. It is occasionally overloaded with imagery and allusion to the point of unclarity, but is always imaginative, tender, yet virile in its unflinching view of the world. In form and spirit he has much in common with the French symbolists (see French symbolism), especially Paul Valéry (q.v.), and he has learned from Bergson (q.v.), but his own singular genius is apparent in every line.

See: T. Aurell, et al, "Olaf Bull," Samtiden (1922, 1930, 1933, 1939); K. Elster, "Three Lyric Poets of Norway," American-Scandinavian Review, XIII (1925), 653–665; J. Knutzen, "Motiver i Olaf Bulls produksjon," Nordisk tidskrift, V (1929), 281–296.

E. H.

Bunin, Ivan Alekseyevich (1870–, Russian novelist, short-story writer, and poet), 1933 winner of the Nobel award, is the most distinguished artist of contemporary Russian letters. In an external sense he belongs to the tradition represented by Aksakov, Leo Tolstoy (q.v.), Goncharov, Turgenev (q.v.), and Chekhov (q.v.); in style and content his work is a culmination of that tradition, broken abruptly by the 1917 Revolution. In a more fundamental sense, however, he is a unique and original figure, closely akin to many of the newest voices in literature, not merely the end of an epoch.

Bunin was born in Voronezh, of landowning nobility, whose ancestors included the poet Zhukovsky. His childhood and youth were spent in rural Central Russia in the atmosphere of a declining gentry. He was educated at the Yelets Gymnasium and the University of Moscow. He made his debut in literature with a volume of poems (1891) and a prose volume (1892), besides several brilliant translations, notably of the poems of Byron,

Tennyson, and Longfellow (The Song of Hiawatha). In 1903 he was awarded the coveted Pushkin prize, which placed him in the front rank of Chekhov's successors. In 1909 the Russian Academy of Sciences elected him one of 12 honorary members (corresponding to the "Immortals" of the French Academy). During this period Bunin traveled extensively in Italy, Turkey, the Balkans, Greece, North Africa, the Near and Far East. Though associated with the Znanie group of young realists led by Gorky, Bunin avoided affiliation with either political or literary innovators. For this reason and because his first work was largely poetry, he did not acquire fame until his novel Derevnya (1910; Eng. tr., The Village, 1923) was published. A diptych of peasant life, it inaugurated a long series of works indicting the darkness and barbarity of rural existence, particularly before the 1905 Revolution and the Stolypin agrarian reform. Sukhodol (1911-1912; Eng. tr., "Dry Valley," in The Elaghin Affair and Other Stories, 1935), in the same genre, a story of the fall of the house of Khrushchov, and Derevnya belong among the most powerful examples of Russian prose. Ioann Rydalets (1913; Ioann the Weeper) and Chasha zhizni (1914; The Cup of Life), collections of poems and stories in the same vein, were followed by Gospodin iz San Frantsisko (1916; Eng. tr., The Gentleman from San Francisco and Other Stories, 1923), his best-known story noticed especially in the Nobel citation. A miracle of artistic economy, it relates the sudden death of an American millionaire in Capri, its theme that of Ecclesiastes, "Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher, all is vanity."

An intransigent anti-Bolshevik, Bunin emigrated to France (1919), where he has since resided. Roza Ierikhona (1923; The Rose of Jericho) and Solnichnyi udar (1927; The Sunstroke) are collections of stories and verse. Mitina lyubov (1924-1925; Eng. tr., Mitya's Love, 1926), a short novel of rare terseness and insight, is a study of early love with its mingled sensuality and idealism. Zhizn Arseneva; istoki dnei (1930; Eng. tr., The Well of Days, 1933), the first part of a long work, is a novelized autobiography comparable with those of Aksakov and Tolstoy, but more somber and searching. Bozhie drevo (1931; God's Tree), short stories, Osvobozhdenie Tolstovo (1937; The Liberation of Tolstoy), Elle (1938), and Tyomnye allei (1943; Dark Alleys) are his most recent works. Bunin has been widely translated and several volumes of his finest stories appear in English—The Dreams of Chang and Other Stories (1923), Grammar of Love (1934), and The Elaghin Affair and Other Stories mentioned above. Besides the title stories, among the most remarkable are "A Night Conversation" (1911) and "A Goodly Life" (1911), both peasant stories of cruelty and violence, the latter told in the vernacular with extraordinary phonetic accuracy; "Brethren" (1914), the tragedy of a Colombo rickshaw man and a bitter comment on imperialism; "Light Breathing" (1916), about the seduction and murder of a well-born young girl; "Gautami" (1919), an Eastern parable on the acceptance of life; and "The Cicadas" (1925; the dates given are those of the original Russian), an exquisite prose poem embodying his artistic credo.

Bunin evades easy category. As a poet he is allied with the Parnassians, rather than with the symbolists. His conception of life is that of a poet, and this attitude informs all his prose. His understanding is primarily a tragic one, but he affirms the eternal beauty and meaning of life. He has a profound sense of its continuity beyond material experience and of the significance of atavistic memory. The supreme mysteries of love and death are the mainsprings of his creative power. For all the searing social criticism implied in much he has written, his chief concern is with the soul of man, which he reveals with marvelous skill and insight. Bunin should not be read hastily. A painter rather than a narrator or an analyst, he is outwardly objective, though actually his personality is never absent. The structure of his work is elemental, bare, and symmetrical, with few characters and little plot. He has a phenomenal faculty of observation, as if endowed with "eagle's eyes for Day and the owl's for Night," and a gift for creating atmosphere, in which all the sensory equipment serves to convey texture, shape, color, taste, and odor. In his descriptions he chooses always the precise word, for its rhythmic and emotional relation to the sentence as well as for its connotation. Since his effects are often those of style, an adequate translation is almost impossible.

The clinical detachment and the merciless veracity of his work, particularly of his early and middle career, relate him to the great realists. In latter years this phase has increasingly given place to one more lyrical and philosophical. His preoccupation with love and death, as well as the sensuous beauty of his language and the exotic element of his many foreign tales, allies him with the romanticists. In his impeccable restraint, in the symmetry and logic of his form and the perfection of his style, he belongs with the classicists. He has been criticized for his un-contemporaneity, but a less partisan future may revise this opinion. Edmond Jaloux has pointed out the increasing predominance in recent literature of "magic realism," whereby daily experience is made to reveal the signs, the symbols, the poetry of life. Such is Bunin's art, which deals with unchanging verities rather than with the dilemmas, however acute, of a shifting politico-social arena. Controversy aside, he is the acknowledged master of the Russian language and a weaver of tales that for clarity, beauty, and veracity rank with the finest.

See: G. Struve, "The Art of Ivan Bunin," Slavonic Review, XI (1932-1933), 423-436; F. Stepun, "Ivan Bunin," Sovremennyya zapiski, LIV (1934), 195-211.

N. S.

Burte, Hermann (pseud. of Hermann Strübe, 1879-, German dramatist, novelist, and poet), comes from a South German family of artisans and peasants. His work was determined by race consciousness and interest in aesthetics. He spent years in France and England, studying art. The Renaissance, Shakespeare, Byron and Ruskin, Rabelais and French drama, left deep impressions on him. His one-act plays in Drei Einakter (1907) are first attempts, supporting the principle that the world belongs only to the strong and healthy. Love for an English lady inspired the 154 sonnets of Patricia (1910), which also present a broad view of the poet's attitude toward God, the world, and man. Despite the occasional use of immaturely exaggerated language, it is a strong poetic creation. A second collection of sonnets, Die Flügelspielerin (1913), shows the poet greatly improved in discipline and restraint. Returning from abroad, he decided the Germans were sunk in godless materialism, slavishly subject to all currents of foreign thought. He wrote the novel Wiltfeber, der ewige Deutsche (1912), an irate discourse on religion, art, folk, and fatherland, composed in a cyclic arrangement—12 chapters distributed over 24 hours of one day—and written in a language of rhythmic force and beauty. This work, for which Burte received the Kleist prize, tries to show that modern civilization, the ideas of Rousseau and Marx, lead to decay. A change can only come through an anti-Jewish Christianity, through a Nietzschean will to reform, and through a return to life close to the soil. The swastika is hailed, long before Hitler, as the sign of German rebirth. In the dramas Herzog Utz (1913) and Katte (1914) Burte follows in the path of Kleist and Hebbel. Utz goes on from love of woman to work and duty, the way of a true ruler; Katte is a sacrifice to the ultimate welfare of the state. In his play Simson (1917) Burte emphasizes his nationalist-racist attitude by stating that "he who is without folk is without God." In later dramas and poems, though they are mature and well written, he does not strike any particularly new note. He has made an interesting translation of poems of Voltaire, Gedichte (1934).

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 19. Auflage (1928), pp. 1037-1044.

W. K. P.

Busch, Wilhelm (1832-1908, German humorist and illustrator), was born in Wiedensahl, Hanover, the son of a general-store keeper. His uncommon mathematical ability seeming to indicate engineering as his proper vocation, he attended the polytechnic institute in Hanover. However, his passion for graphic art proved to be dominant, and in 1851 he went to Düsseldorf to study painting. Dissatisfied with the trends he found in vogue there, he transferred in 1852 to Antwerp, where he came permanently under the spell of the great realists of the Netherlands—Rubens, Hals, Brouwer, Teniers, Ostade. The decade 1854-1864 he spent in Munich, then the leading art center, but basically no better suited to his temperament than Düsseldorf. In the art colony he soon attracted attention by his incidental productions, caricatures, costume designs, comic drawings, and also humorous and original writings (an operetta, Der Vetter auf Besuch, was performed in the Residenz theater). Thus he came to the notice of Caspar Braun, publisher of the comic weekly Fliegende Blätter. Braun's invitation to contribute coincided with an ebb in Busch's funds (1859); it proved to be the hand of fate that beckoned. For it led Busch into a field which was peculiarly his own and in which his undisputed mastery carried him to a unique eminence in German letters. No other German poet before or since has produced work so abounding in familiar quotations of humorous character; keen observation, an uncompromising realism tinged with pessimism, and a gift for terse and pungent utterance combine in these masterpieces of epigrammatic brevity.

Work for the weekly soon led to the creation of pictorial series (the original of the wordless comic strip) and to even more popular—because quotable—versified stories with appropriate illustrations. The first of these, Max und Moritz (1865; Eng. tr., Max and Maurice, 1871), tapping the inexhaustible theme of the naughty boy, made him a byword in every German household and fixed his literary character, though not quite authentically, for all time. Outstanding among his other picture stories are Schnurrdburr oder die Bienen (1869; Eng. tr., Buzz a buzz; or, The Bees, 1872), Der heilige Antonius (1870), Balduin Bählamm, der verhinderte Dichter (1881), and Maler Klecksel (1883). The last two present humorous aspects of his own frustrations. Genuine poetic talent is revealed in Kritik des Herzens (1871), philosophic acumen in Eduards Traum (1891; Eng. tr., Edward's Dream, 1909) exceptional autobiographic ability in "Was mich betrifft" (1886). Busch's pre-eminence as poet of "superior nonsense" is challenged in the 20th century only by Christian Morgenstern (q.v.).

See: Fritz Winther, Wilhelm Busch als Dichter, Künstler, Psychologe und Philosoph (1910).

B. Q. M.

Busken Huet, Coenraad (1826–1886, Dutch journalist and critic), born at The Hague, studied theology at Leiden and Geneva and became pastor of the Walloon Church at Haarlem in 1851. He incurred the disapproval of his congregation when he published his Brieven over den Bijbel (1858; Letters about the Bible), because the book was too outspoken a confession of his modernism. He resigned from the ministry in 1862 and started on a journalistic career in the editorial office of De opregte Haarlemsche Courant (The Outspoken Haarlem Courant). A series of lectures by Huet on Dutch literature of the last decade of the 18th century attracted the attention of Potgieter (q.v.), who made him a member of the editorial board of De Gids (The Guide). But here soon again his fiery, uncompromising spirit soon came into conflict with the other editors. They forced him out in 1865, and Potgieter, who sided with Huet, went out with him. Huet became editor of De Javabode (The Java Messenger), a daily paper published in Batavia, Java. In 1872 he founded there his own paper, called Algemeen Dagblad van Nederlandsch Indië (General Journal of Netherlands India). But in 1876 he retired from newspaper work and settled down with his wife and son in Paris to devote himself entirely to writing and literary criticism. He was a follower of Sainte-Beuve, of whom he wrote in In Memoriam (1870): "He has been for many of us an apostle, a mentor, a shepherd." Huet was a relentless critic of Dutch letters, but from his Huguenot ancestry he had inherited a mental agility and grace that enabled him to give the damning verdict the flavor of a compliment. His literary essays and book reviews have been collected in Literarische Fantasien en Kritieken (25 vols., 1881–1888; Literary Fantasies and Criticisms). His best-known work is Het Land van Rembrandt (1884; The Country of Rembrandt), a history of Dutch culture which is a lasting monument to Rembrandt's country and to the author himself.

See: J. Tielrooy, Cd. Busken Huet et la littérature française; essai de biographie intellectuelle (1923).

A. J. B.

Busse, Carl (1872–1918, German lyricist, novelist, and literary critic), was born in Lindendorf, Posen. After receiving his doctorate from Rostock University (1898; his thesis was Novalis' Lyrik), he went to Berlin to devote himself earnestly to a literary career, both as a creative artist and as a literary scholar.

Busse became known to a cultured German public through his Gedichte (1892), composed in finished rhythm, distinguished by a sprightly undercurrent of optimism, and characterized by a genuine love of nature. Further collections of poetry followed: Neue Gedichte (1895), Vagabunden (1901), and Heilige Not (1910). The last named, in particular, strikes a note of deep and introspective contemplation. In general, it may be said that Busse's poems are influenced by German romanticism—strongly tempered, however, by the realistic tendencies of Theodor Storm and Detlev von Liliencron (qq.v.). His poetry strives toward a combination of romanticism and poetic realism.

In addition to poetry, Busse wrote novels which, for the greater part, deal with life in his native region, the German-Polish boundary areas. His Schüler von Polajewo appeared in 1900 and was followed by Im polnischen Wind (1906), Das Gymnasium zu Lengowo (1907), Die Hoermanns (1909), and Winkelglück (1918). Busse edited two anthologies, Neuere deutsche Lyrik (1895) and Deutsche Kriegslieder (1915). He wrote an excellent Geschichte der deutschen Dichtung im neunzehnten Jahrhundert (1901) and an impressive Geschichte der Weltliteratur (2 vols., 1910–1913).

G. K.

Butti, Enrico Annibale (1868–1912, Italian playwright and novelist), born in Milan of a well-to-do family, was versatile and temperamental. At the University of Pavia his major interests were physics and mathematics. Abandoning these studies, he transferred to the University of Modena where he took a law degree, though his experience in this profession was very short-lived. A musician of more than average ability, he was one of the more ardent admirers of Wagner and helped secure a sympathetic audience for him in Italy. Butti was wracked by chronic illness, and his literary career was blighted by the presentiment that his days would be brief. In spirit and temperament he was a kinsman of the anemic crepuscolari who, in plaintive and nostalgic tones, sang of the innocent joys of their sheltered childhood. Essentially an idealist, he cherished an inner sympathy for the positivists and rationalists. Their philosophic theories with their social, economic, scientific, and moral implications appealed to his heart; but the social deterioration of his time dampened his faith. This conflict between his yearning for the ideal and the impact of a stern reality accentuated both his pessimism and his habit of introspection.

Such was Butti the man, and the artist in him faithfully reflects these qualities. It is not surprising therefore to find that the predominant note in Butti's novels (L'Automa, 1892; L'Anima, 1893; L'Immorale, 1894; L'Incantesimo, 1897) is a predilection for philosophical musings. The author's incurable preoccupation with ideas still unclarified in his own mind tends to blur his characters and fetter their actions. Turning to the drama, Butti hoped to invest his ideas with dramatic force and elevate the tone of the Italian theatre by neutralizing the influence of the French naturalists and of Antoine's Théâtre Libre (see French naturalism; Antoine). However, his early plays Paolo Ermoli and Il Frutto amaro (both published only in 1912), written in collaboration with Cesare Hanau, as well as Fiamme nell'ombra (1907), were in the prevalent naturalistic manner. That his principal aim was not to entertain but to induce his audiences to ponder the problems of the day is shown in La Corsa al piacere (1900), Una Tempesta (1901), and Lucifero (1903), in which he successively treats the themes of pleasure as an end in itself, the theory of socialism, and the soul's need for religion. These plays reverberate with faint echoes from Ibsen's (q.v.) world, but the drama never attains the white heat of the Norwegian master. Butti's protagonists, like their creator, are disillusioned rationalists; the vision which animates their thoughts and actions is that of a freer and more humane civilization. Unfortunately, in contrast to Ibsen's determined, virile characters, Butti's creatures give up their lofty designs at the first clash with reality, admitting that they have been deceived and defeated. The same theme of man's struggle to break the shackles of reality and his ultimate capitulation to traditional social forms is found in L'Utopia (1894), La Fine d'un ideale (1898), and in Sempre così (1911). The plays which brought him the greatest success were Il Cuculo (1907) and L'Intermezzo (1912), which sounded a gay and cheerful note instead of the somber, thoughtful strains so characteristic of most of his work. Other plays are Il Vortice (1892), Il Gigante ed i pigmei (1903), Tutto per nulla (1906), Nel paese della fortuna (1911), and Il Castello del sogno (1910). This last named, a dramatic poem in four acts, besides epitomizing the author's philosophical creed, contains passages with fresh and arresting images of unsurpassed beauty in which words glow with a new and profound meaning.

See: G. A. Borgese, La Vita e il libro, I (1910), 173-183; C. Levi, Rivista teatrale italiana (1912), pp. 321-337; A. Tilgher, La Scena e la vita (1925), pp. 121-125.

P. P. M.

Buyse, Cyriel (1859-1932, Flemish novelist), was born at Nevele, near Ghent, in the province of East Flanders, the son of a wealthy manufacturer. Originally he worked in his father's weaving mill and for this business spent two years, 1885 and 1886, in the United States. On the ship which took him back to Belgium he wrote his first short novel, De Biezenstekker (The Reed Cutter), which was published in 1890 in De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide, Amsterdam), then the leading periodical in the Netherlands. In 1893 appeared Buyse's first great novel, Het Recht van de Sterkste (The Right of the Strongest). From that time until his death he wrote numerous novels and short stories. His finest, and also best-known, works are Het Leven van Roseke van Dalen (1906; The Life of Rosy van Dalen), Het Ezelken (1910; The Little Donkey), and Tantes (1924; Aunts).

Buyse was an associate founder of the periodical Van Nu en Straks (Today and Tomorrow), and after this was discontinued he established, with Louis Couperus (q.v.) and W. G. van Nouhuys, the literary monthly Groot Nederland (Great Netherland). This is still in existence. In 1932 he was raised to the peerage by the king of the Belgians with the title of Baron van Deurle. Cyriel Buyse ranks as the greatest narrator of Flanders; in his style he shows some similarity to Guy de Maupassant (q.v.). He depicted the life of the farmers and of the middle-class people in the region between the rivers Scheldt and Leie with penetrating accuracy and without compassion.

See: Robert Roemans, Kritische Bibliografie van Cyriel Buysse (1931).

J. G.

C

Caillavet, Gaston Arman de (1870–1915, French dramatist), a Parisian by birth and, one might say, by estate, grew up in the charmed circle of his mother's salon where Anatole France (q.v.) reigned supreme. There he met Robert de Flers (q.v.), with whom he was to form a literary partnership as close and fortunate as that of Meilhac and Halévy a generation before.

Begun under such auspices, the two authors' collaboration could not but retain a distinctively refined quality. Witty, urbane, and tolerant, mildly naughty, mildly romantic, mildly ironical, their librettos (with musical scores by Claude Terrasse, André Messager, Gabriel Pierné) and such light comedies as Les Sentiers de la vertu (1903), Miquette et sa mère (1906), L'Ane de Buridan (1909), and La Belle Aventure (1913; in collaboration with Etienne Rey) recall the exquisite daintiness of a Parisian gown or a champagne supper at the Bois. Primerose (1911) borders more decidedly on the sentimental, whereas Monsieur Brotonneau (1914), their last play, seemed to presage an evolution toward deeper character study. Particularly outstanding, however, is the trilogy Le Roi (1908; in collaboration with Emmanuel Arène), hilariously funny as it records the unedifying escapades of visiting royalty; Le Bois sacré (1910), a broadside directed at those who worship official titles; and L'Habit vert (1912), a humorous caricature of the French Academy. These three plays, more meaningfully satirical, yet brimming with a joie de vivre that is no more, perhaps evoke best the brilliant and subtle atmosphere of the old Parisian boulevard in its twilight.

See: Cesare Levi, Autori drammatici francesi (1923), pp. 275–306; Jeanne Maurice-Pouquet (Mme Gaston de Caillavet by her first marriage), Le Salon de Mme Arman de Caillavet (1926); Francis de Croisset, La Vie parisienne au théâtre (1929).

J.-A. B.

Câmara, João da (1852–1908, Portuguese dramatist and short-story writer), was a member of the nobility who began his literary career in the 70's of the last century by writing one-act plays for the theatre. Through them he acquired skill for the later dramatic works which placed him among the foremost dramatists of the post-romantic period in Portugal.

Besides pretentious historical dramas in verse, such as Afonso VI (1890) and Alcacer-Kebir (1891), he enriched the Portuguese stage with some 10 plays in prose, all of which are essentially realistic and present pictures either of Lisbon life or of that of Alemtejo in southern Portugal. In the Lisbon group he is inclined to depict the scandalous, as in O pântano (n.d.; The Swamp). Works of the Alemtejo group reveal traits which are characteristic of the rugged rural Portuguese stock. In A triste viuvinha (n.d.; The Sad Little Widow) the action takes place in a small town in Baixo Alemtejo, though it might well have occurred in any other small town in Portugal, for it stresses a family trait peculiar to the primitive Catholic society of the country. Os velhos (1893; Old People) is genuinely regionalistic and portrays many splendid but simple folks of Alemtejo.

Though Câmara excels in the drama, he also deserves mention as a storyteller with a certain delicacy of style. His single volume of stories is Contos (1900; Short Stories), and he is at his best in "As estrêlas do cego" (The Blind Man's Stars), a masterly Christmas sketch, a mood of Christmas as diaphanous and airy as the theme of the story. Though he attempted the novel, his works in that field leave much to be desired.

See: C. de Figueiredo, Figuras literárias (1906), pp. 307–308; A. F. G. Bell, Portuguese Literature (1922), pp. 311, 326–327.

G. I. D.

Camba, Julio (1884–, Spanish humorist), was born at Villanueva de Arosa in Galicia. He began to write when still in his teens and has since been on the staff of all the most important Madrid papers, but his work was mainly done abroad. He has lived as a special correspondent in several European and American countries and has given, in a particular type of short article created by him, a humoristic and satirical view of the daily life in those countries. He defined himself, adopting the title of one of his books, as a traveling frog. In his works the life of the modern world is seen through the eyes of a typical Spaniard and a man of rare insight. He writes also about Spain, adopting for that the European view acquired in his travels. Camba's literary value rests on a great originality and a sharply cold intelligence which enable him to perceive the contrasts between different countries and the ridiculous side of life in all of them. He is gifted with unfailing logic in examining and showing the absurdity of all national or human prejudice. Apparently a skeptic and often a cynic who laughs at the useless worries of men, Camba nevertheless reveals in his writings a serious and uncompromising respect for real values. He has dealt at times with fundamental Spanish problems in a thoughtful manner. Like other contemporary writers, he has tried to understand Spain in its similarities to and differences from modern Europe. As Federico de Onís (q.v.) has pointed out, Camba's comic interpretation of Spain in contrast to Europe is closely related to the profound interpretations made by the great Spanish writers of our epoch such as Costa, Galdós, Unamuno, Ortega, Azorín (qq.v.), and others. His best books, made up of collections of his articles, are Alemania; impresiones de un español and Londres; impresiones de un español (both 1916); Un año en el otro mundo (1917) and La ciudad automática (1932), about the United States; La rana viajera (1920); Aventuras de una peseta (1923); Sobre casi todo and Sobre casi nada (both 1928); and Haciendo de república (1934).

See: F. de Onís, "El humorismo de Julio Camba," Hispania, X (1927), 167-175.

A. del R.

Camino, León Felipe, see León-Felipe.

Campana, Dino (1885-1932, Italian poet), was born in Marradi, a small town north of Florence. From early youth he gave evidence of peculiarity and even mental disorder. People of his native town spoke of him as that "strange son of the school superintendent." As a young man he became interested in chemistry and for a time studied at the University of Bologna, but because of his unorthodox ideas and his dangerous experiments he was expelled. Then Campana began a series of wanderings to distant lands in Europe, to the Americas, then again across Europe. He volunteered in the First World War, but no sooner was he made a sergeant in the Italian army than he began to show unmistakable signs of derangement and was promptly discharged. His mental instability finally caused his confinement to the insane asylum of Castel Pucci, where he died in 1932. Campana's life was also a constant struggle with material difficulties. He attempted many trades and endured many bitter experiences. He became a kind of modern Ulysses whose journeys took him to the haunts of gauchos, miners, gypsies, beggars, organ-grinders, stokers, anarchists, and mountebanks.

In Canti orfici (1914; 2d ed., 1928), a collection of poems and his one claim to literary fame, Campana gives expression to the human disappointments that were his and to the spiritual exaltation with which he tried to soothe them. Opposition of pagan and Christian worlds is central in his poetry. Men of letters like Papini and Soffici (qq.v.), who were the first to recognize Campana's worth, immediately discerned a deep and vibrant lyrical form in the "fragments" of the Canti.

P. M. R.

Campanile, Achille (1900-, Italian humorist), was born and has resided chiefly in Rome, where, beginning in the early 20's, he wrote successively for three newspapers—the Idea nazionale, the Tribuna, and the Gazzetta del popolo. On the Gazzetta del popolo he occupied the especially created post of humorous correspondent. He contributed also to the humorous paper Travaso delle idee, to the magazine 900, founded by Bontempelli (q.v.) and Malaparte (pseud. of Curzio Suckert, q.v.), and to the humorous periodical Sette bello, revived and edited under his own direction. In 1925, under the influence of the futurist theatre, he wrote a series of pranks in play form (some were dramatized puns consisting of two speeches apiece), later collected under the title L'Inventore del cavallo (1927). In the years 1927-1934 were published a second volume of short pieces, eight novels, and a volume of semiserious prose sketches. Campanile established with these a humorous genre new to Italy, bringing it to perfection and eventually wearing out his initial rich inventiveness within it. In general his writing might remind American readers of Robert Benchley or of James Thurber, for whose sorties into the impossible a special public has gradually been prepared. But it could remind Italian readers of nothing in their literary past; his work was, as far as this may ever be, an absolutely fresh experience, precipitating an utterly new vein of exuberant, inventive, excruciating funniness into Italian literature. Partisanship for and against Campanile was sharp in the early 30's; a considerable army of admirers arose and were angrily challenged by readers who claimed that human intelligence had been insulted by the publication of such nonsense.

Whatever is solemn by tradition or presumption is material for Campanile's special brand of wit-tickling; his books are a long series of hilarious deflations of stock poses and stereotyped manners, notably lacking in that element of cynicism that characterizes most Italian professional humor. The style is serious and elegant, the events and characters preposterous. The reader is given a view of a choice assortment of human foibles which, first reflected by distorting mirrors, are then allowed the full logical development of the new shape. Conversation, mood, and convention are handled with similar pointed disrespect. And plot is always matched to detail. In Ma che cosa è quest'amore? (1927), e.g., the plot hinges upon the following situation: five men, traveling in a railroad compartment which harbors also a beautiful lady, are individually seized by speculation as to whether or not it would be advisable to try to kiss her when the train enters a tunnel; the train enters a tunnel, no one dares to kiss the lady, nonetheless a kiss and a resounding slap are heard; all five men now devote as much of their futures as the book recounts to discovering who, indeed, received the distinction of that slap. In the unfolding of this drama we are treated to a horse who is a confirmed equine lady-chaser, a distinguished Latinist who achieved his culture as a result of searching his father's library for money hidden between the leaves of books, a petulant sea captain whose crew teases him, a peroxide-blond young man, a professional thinker, and a character known as the Late-lamented Don Ilario Rossi.

It is difficult to make a comparative evaluation of Campanile's books, since in a genre so special every reader forms his own criteria of excellence. Ma che cosa è quest'amore? is one of the best liked and most spontaneous, yet it suffers undeniably from paddings of sheer silliness and from the episodic nature of its construction. Se la luna mi porta fortuna (1928) contains passages which are probably slated for a unique immortality, but it is overlong. Agosto, moglie mia non ti conosco (1930) seems by all means the most spontaneous, the most pointed, and the most amusingly constructed of all these novels. Chiarastella (1934), on the other hand, is certainly the weakest in every respect, giving no hint of the author's real creativity. Cantilena all'angolo della strada (1933), which lies outside the humorous classification by intention, is a series of city sketches and impressions of strictly limited and casual interest.

I. B.

Campoamor, Ramón de (1817-1901, Spanish poet, essayist, and politician), was born at Navia in Asturias. An attack of adolescent mysticism made him seek, unsuccessfully, admission into the Society of Jesus. In Madrid he studied in desultory fashion medicine, biological sciences, mathematics, and astronomy. As a politician he was conservative and a staunch monarchist. Enjoying moderate economic comfort, he lived a pleasant and tranquil life. This had a telling effect on his temperament; he was emotionally well poised, spiritually placid, and intellectually serene. He was a solid, contented, middle-class gentleman without deep urges or disturbing preoccupations.

Fundamental to an understanding of Campoamor is his worship of the intelligence. When the study of science failed to reveal to him the ultimate meaning of life, he turned to meditation of a superficially metaphysical character. With a certain amount of philosophic levity he regarded himself as a thinker and metaphysician. He was encouraged by the attention paid to his controversies with Emilio Castelar (q.v.) on human progress and with Juan Valera (q.v.) on the relation between metaphysics and poetry. A partial record of his intellectual quest is contained in El personalismo (1855) and Lo absoluto (1865), both in prose, and in El drama universal (1869), a pretentious work in verse.

However, Campoamor began his literary career as a poet. In Ternezas y flores (1840) and Ayes del alma (1842) one can already discern his desire to forge a form appropriate to his temperament, a poetic mold different from the rhetorical style of the traditionalists as well as from the verbalism, eloquence, and artificial enthusiasm of the romanticists. It is not necessary to wait until Doloras (1846) and Pequeños poemas (1872-1874) to see that Campoamor is concerned less with emotion, spirit, and nature than with subjective and completely personal impressions of human behavior. Not excluding sentiment altogether, he deals with it analytically and even psychologically. Material phenomena and human values have little worth for him as expository or emotional poetic content; he converts everything into philosophic or metaphysical substance. Faithful to his motto of "art for idea's sake," he rarely paints or sings; he comments on life and draws blueprints of it.

Campoamor reveals no unified outlook on life. Disillusioned about the capacity of the intelligence to grasp absolute truths, he aims to demonstrate the relativity of all human values. His observations are frequently contradictory; hence his apparent pessimism and optimism, skepticism and faith, liberalism and conservatism. His equivocal attitudes confused his contemporaries, and his poetry aroused controversies. In retrospect, however, he appears as a genial thinker who found it more pleasant to view life serenely than to be baffled by its mysteries.

Campoamor believed that he created new poetic values in substance and in form. He claimed originality for the dolora, pequeño poema, and humorada, the molds for his most popular verse. For convenient definition it may be stated that a humorada is a brief epigrammatic composition of sculptural contours; a dolora is, in Campoamor's own words, a dramatic elaboration of a humorada; and a pequeño poema is only an extended dolora. The poetic quality of all these forms is fairly uniform, predetermined by the author's conviction that rhyme and rhythm alone distinguish poetry from prose and that qualities like cadence, imagery, color, and musicality matter less than brevity, contrast, and dramatic style.

Campoamor's phenomenal popularity during his lifetime is understandable. In the equivocal and oft conflicting tendencies of his so-called philosophical reflections everyone found something to confirm his beliefs or doubts, prejudices or convictions. His pseudo-skepticism suited an age that lacked the spiritual energy to sustain long struggles after initial clashes, the more so since this skepticism is cleverly seasoned with sentimentality, mild piety, and surface conformity. Much of Campoamor's verse is inartistic and even unpoetical, and much of his thinking does not rise above the commonplace, but these shortcomings are in part obscured by his broad grace, humor, irony, and homespun wisdom. Few probably were inspired by his poetry of ideas, but none failed to derive momentary satisfaction from it. And an important factor contributing to its popularity is the ease with which it can be memorized because of its epigrammatic form.

Present-day opinion has reacted against Campoamor, perhaps with excessive violence. Even when stripped of poetic values in the light of advanced aesthetic standards, he nevertheless deserves commendation for his independence. He owed nothing to his predecessors and followed no contemporary vogues in poetry. The oft asserted influence of Heine, Hugo, Musset, and Byron can be heavily discounted. Born into a century that valued ideas highly, he sought to express the spirit of his age in philosophic poetry. To condemn the "bourgeois" level of his thinking is to ignore the prominent role of the middle class during the 19th century. Artistically, spiritually, and intellectually Campoamor deserves no worse of posterity than the realistic novelists and dramatists among his contemporaries.

See: E. Pardo Bazán, "Campoamor; estudio biográfico," Retratos y apuntes literarios, Ser. 1, in Obras completas, XXXII, 5-62; H. Peseux-Richard, "Humoradas, doloras et petits poèmes," Revue hispanique, I (1894), 236-257.

H. C. B.

Camus, Albert (1913-, French journalist, essayist, novelist, and dramatist), lived in his native Algiers until 1940. In France during the German occupation, he founded with others the influential underground newspaper Combat, distinguished then and after the liberation by Camus's lucid, outspoken editorials.

Before the war his only published book was Noces (1939), sympathetic sketches of Algerian life. His first important work, the novel L'Etranger (1942; Eng. tr., The Stranger, 1946), depicts a hero similar to those of Kafka (q.v.) as an alien in a universe whose illogic and illusions he does not share. In his sorry life everything is left to chance and he is supremely indifferent to all that happens because he has no scale of values. This attitude became clear when, later in the same year, appeared Le Mythe de Sisyphe. This philosophical essay analyzes a contemporary intellectual malady, the recognition of the absurdity of human life. Starting from the philosophy of Heidegger, Kierkegaard, and Husserl, Camus refuses to accept the existentialist view. He recommends complete lucidity in the face of life's irrationality. His two plays, Caligula and Le Malentendu (both 1944), illustrate aspects of the same problem: the emperor adds to the absurdity of life consciously and the other hero does so unwittingly. Four brief Lettres à un ami allemand (1945) originally appeared clandestinely during the occupation.

Despite the negative attitude of his literary works, Albert Camus has in his editorials taken a positive stand for political purity and social justice.

J. O'B.

Cankar, Ivan (1876–1918, Slovene novelist, dramatist, and poet), was born in the borough of Vrhnika, near Ljubljana, in Slovenia. His father, who had inherited a tiny house, a small field, and his handicraft, was a tailor with a numerous family for which he was not able to provide. When their house burned down the family started moving from one dwelling to another, falling deeper and deeper into misery. The only support of the children was their mother, whom Ivan loved with a tender and almost mystical love all his life. The poverty of his home, combined with many humiliations, and the sublime figure of his mother, whom he called a saint and martyr, left the deepest traces in the mind of the frail and sensitive child. He developed a very early resentment against the “fat,” well-off, practical, and successful people and, on the other hand, a permanent admiration, which endured throughout all the crises of his life, for such purity and simplicity as he found in his mother’s character; the first trait made him appear, at the very beginning of his literary career, experienced and mature; the second kept him idealistically youthful until his end.

From the primary school at Vrhnika, Cankar was sent to the technical high school at Ljubljana, where he graduated in 1896. In the same year he went with a scholarship to Vienna to study architecture, but soon gave up his studies and his scholarship to devote himself exclusively to literary work. He lived mostly in the workers’ quarter of the city where he boarded with the family of a workman while the latter was serving a sentence in jail. Cankar spent 13 years in Vienna writing incessantly; the external monotony of this laborious and hard life was interrupted only once, when in 1907 he entered the electoral contest as Social Democratic candidate in the elections for the Austrian Parliament; he went home for the campaign, although he knew he could not win, and returned after the elections to Vienna. In 1909 he left that city forever, spent a couple of months as guest of the archbishop of Sarajevo with his brother Karlo, who was at that time the archbishop’s secretary, then went to Ljubljana, where during the First World War he was for some time interned by the Austrian authorities as politically suspect. He died there after a fall on the stairs. He had been productive as a writer until his last illness. Cankar was physically weak, disorderly in his habits, always in financial embarrassments, high-minded and generous, in conversation brilliant though often hard and sarcastic, inclined to alcoholism; he was slavishly devoted to his work and fully conscious of its value and importance.

Although Cankar read and enthusiastically admired the Russian, French, Scandinavian, and German literature of his time, it is not possible to compare him with any of the famous literary names of the period; he created literary subjects and forms of his own, in the sphere of the international neo-romanticism of the fin de siècle and after, consciously opposed to the previous French naturalism (q.v.). In his first book, and only volume of poetry, Erotika (1899), which the lord bishop of Ljubljana found morally and religiously dangerous and suppressed as well as he could by buying up the first edition, he is still partly dependent on the older Slovene literature, but in his first book of prose, Vinjete (1899; Vignettes), a collection of short stories, he opened in Slovenia new literary ways.

In the subsequent and astonishingly fertile period, 1909–1913, Cankar’s many books turn on three principal themes, sometimes in tiring repetitions. There are stories about the Slovene artist who is an outcast, a tramp, a nuisance among “decent people,” and a foreigner in his own country: Tujci (1901; Foreigners), V mesečini (1905; In the Moonshine); and the related play, Pohujšanje v Dolini Šentflorjanski (1908; Scandal in the Valley of St. Florian). There are stories about “longing souls,” yearning for happiness in their misery, for beauty in the dirtiness of their lives: Na klancu (1902; On the Slope), Križ na gori (1904; The Cross on the Hill), Hisa Marije Pomočnice (1904; The House of Our Lady of Help); and the play Lepa Vida (1912; The Beautiful Vida). Finally there are satirical tales criticizing Slovene politics, social organization, and literature: Za narodov blagor (1901; For the Nation’s Welfare), Martin Kačur (1906; a “biography of an idealist”), Krpanova kobilica (1907; Krpan’s Mare), Hlapec Jernej (1907; The Farmer’s Man Bartholomew), Hlapci (1910; Servants).

In his last period Cankar wrote principally what may be called feuilletons, in which in fact he reached the peak of his art. There he is, often aware of approaching death, wise, serene, very simple, and expressing himself in a rarely pure and pregnant style. These feuilletons are self-analytical studies and personal confessions, memories, scenes of animal life, symbolical stories dealing with personal and national problems rising from the war (the latter were published as Podobe iz sanj, 1917; Parables from My Dreams); in the same form appeared also the charming fragment of his unfinished autobiography, Moje življenje (1914; My Life).

Cankar's literary work, published posthumously in 20 volumes, is surprisingly extensive in view of his short life and marks a historical epoch in Slovene literature. In close touch with the vivid idiom of his native village, he created a new, expressive, and sonorous language and a new rhythmic style immediately accepted by the younger generation of writers. Through his work Slovene prose became really an art, and the somewhat provincial literature of his country, which could boast of only one name of really international greatness, Preseren, was lifted to the European level. His ideas and genius also decisively influenced the political attitude of the Slovenes in Yugoslavia and materially strengthened their determination to preserve their cultural and idiomatic individuality in the Yugoslav national unity. A number of his works have been translated into Czech, Russian, German, French and English. There are English translations of Hlapec Jernej in njegova pravica (1907; Eng. tr., Yerney's Justice, 1926) and of a number of short stories—"Slovene Idylls" (Slavonic Review, Vol. XIII, 1934-1935, pp. 494-506), "I Know Now, Mother," "Simple Martin" (both in Slavonic Review, Vol. XVII, 1938-1939, pp. 35-41).

See: Ivan Cankar, Zbrani spisi (1926-1936), complete edition with introductions and annotations by Izidor Cankar.

I. C.

Cansinos-Asséns, Rafael (1883-, Spanish novelist and critic), was born in Seville. He studied there until 1901, when he left for Madrid to try his luck in the precarious field of creative writing. Unlike many contemporaries, he has not eked out a living by teaching or government employment. In many respects he has been a lonely figure, despite his numerous activities in founding, and contributing to, such literary reviews as Grecia, Ultra, and Perseo, dedicated to the latest poetical schools that were recruiting disciples in the 20's. As a literary critic he has written for Correspondencia de España and Los lunes del imparcial and since 1925 for Libertad. For his books of literary criticism Cansinos-Asséns was honored by the Spanish Academy with the Chirel prize (1925). The French government honored him in 1926. In the years between 1918 and 1923 he started the so-called ultraista movement in Spanish poetry, a salutary reaction against the modernista currents.

Cansinos-Asséns has been a prodigiously prolific writer. His literary criticism is best represented by La nueva literatura (4 vols., 1917-1927; Los hermes, 1898-1900-1916; Las escuelas literarias, 1898-1900-1916; La evolución de la poesía, 1917-1927; La evolución de la novela, 1917-1927), Los temas literarios y su interpretación (1924), and Literaturas del norte: La obra de Concha Espina (1924). He has composed poetical and critical works on the Spanish Jews—España y los judíos españoles (1919), Las luminarias de Hanukah (1924), Los judíos en la literatura española (1937). He has made translations from books in a great number of languages, including the writings of the Emperor Julian and the complete works of Dostoevski.

Cansinos-Asséns must be named with Unamuno and Díez-Canedo (q.v.) among the critics who have done most in appreciating the contemporary writers of Iberic America. He has not neglected new names, and yet with all his generosity in recognizing unknown writers, he has discerned and accurately appraised the outstanding figures, such as Rubén Darío, Amado Nervo, Blanco Fombona, Herrera Reissig, Huidobro, Capdevila, and Borges. Cansinos has participated fully in the new movement commenced by Spanish cultural circles on behalf of the Spanish Jews. Following the pioneer work of Senator Angel Pulido, he has sung with nostalgia and love the imperishable genius of Sephardic Jewry.

M. J. B.

Cantoni, Alberto (1841-1904, Italian novelist), was born at Pomponesco in the province of Mantua, where he led a quiet, outdoor life among the countryfolk whom he portrayed in his books. He carefully avoided entering the literary arena of his day and was satisfied to know men without being known by them. His works were not extensively read; they did arouse the interest of a few among the younger generation (particularly Pirandello, q.v.) who were to develop a humoristic attitude new in Italian literature. Cantoni died near his birthplace, establishing in his will a fund for the needy.

The novel by which he was to be best remembered, L'illustrissimo, which appeared posthumously in the Nuova Antologia (1905), has been termed the northern counterpart of Verga's (q.v.) I Malavoglia. It pictures the hard life of Lombard peasants, a life which they accept with resignation. A Milanese noblewoman puts her suitor to the test by making him disguise himself as a farm hand and seek employment on his own farm. Thus for the first time he acquires direct knowledge of rural living conditions. Maria, the noblewoman with bucolic illusions, has brought Galeazzo, the landowner, the experimenter, in contact with reality. He has been able to see with his own eyes the evils caused by absenteeism.

Other works of Cantoni, published in his lifetime, are Il Demonio dello stile (1887), Pietro e Paola (1887), Un Re umorista (1891), L'Altalena delle antipatie (1893), Humour classico e moderno (1899), and Scaricalasino (1901). Several short stories appeared in the Nuova Antologia under Cantoni's name, but were repudiated by him later.

The seclusiveness of Cantoni's life is somehow communicated to most of his books. Croce (q.v.) points out that "Cantoni sounds the river of life here and there, from its banks—without ever plunging into it. He awaits the right moment, which, however, fails to come. . . . You will not obtain from him conclusive and coherent thought, going deep to the root of problems . . . he feels life without taking part in it." On the other hand Cantoni was able to draw from his rustic environment, from real life, vigorous characters, expressing the author's ideas with youthful freshness of sentiment. Blending art and criticism, he strove (this was the aim of his humor) "to make intelligent people smile melancholically." Incapable of improvisation, he worked assiduously. He never quite succeeded in giving unity to his works—unity of thought and of ultimate purpose. Literary and social criticism are intermingled throughout his novels.

See: L. Pirandello, "Alberto Cantoni," Nuova Antologia, CC (1905), 233–248; B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 3d ed., III (1929), 217–226.

C. F. W.

Čapek, Josef (1887–1945, Czech painter, novelist, and critic), was the elder brother of Karel Čapek (q.v.). He was born in Hronov (northeastern Bohemia) and studied painting in Prague and Paris. He was active as an art critic, but following the invasion in 1939 was sent to a German concentration camp. He died at Belsen in April, 1945. Josef Čapek has a considerable reputation as a painter; he first belonged to the cubist school, but later developed his own style of playful primitivism. As a writer he collaborated with his brother in early collections of sketches and stories and in Adam the Creator, etc. He himself wrote a utopian play, Země mnoha jmen (1923; Eng. tr., The Land of Many Names, 1926), and several collections of short stories and sketches.

He also produced two short novels: Stín kapradiny (1930; The Shadow of the Fern) is a story of poachers in a suggestive nature setting, while Kulhavý poutník (1936; The Limping Pilgrim) is more a philosophical meditation than an actual novel. His prose has been hailed as an anticipation of surrealism, largely because of his preoccupation with the subconscious. Josef Čapek was also an art critic whose books such as Nejskromnější umění (1920; The Humblest Art) and Umění přírodních národů (1938; The Art of Primitive Nations) expound and defend the art of children, savages, and untrained people.

See: V. Nezval, Josef Čapek (1937).

R. W.

Čapek, Karel (1890–1938, Czech novelist, playwright, and essayist), was the best-known literary figure of liberated Czechoslovakia after 1918. Čapek was born in Malé Svatoňovice (northeastern Bohemia), the son of a doctor. He studied philosophy at the Czech University of Prague and wrote a graduating thesis on pragmatism (published 1917). He became a journalist and was for a time stage manager of the theatre in Vinohrady. Olga Scheinpflugová, a prominent actress, was his wife. He died on Christmas Day, 1938, of pneumonia.

Čapek is best known as a dramatist. R.U.R. (1921; Eng. tr., 1923) and Ze života hmyzu (1921; Eng. tr., The Insect Play, 1923) took the world by storm and were acted with great success in both London and New York. R.U.R. even introduced the word robot (from robotit, to drudge) into the English language. The main idea was very timely in the 20's: a warning against the dangers of a machine civilization. The automatons moving stiffly like dolls, the tense moments of their great revolt against man, testify to Čapek's vivid sense of the stage. It was easy to overlook the flaw in the structure: the way the robots are changed into men of flesh and blood by a sleight of hand. The Insect Play (known in the United States as The World We Live In) is possibly better, though the construction is looser. It is almost a ballet or revue. The idea of presenting butterflies as lovers, beetles rolling balls of dirt as capitalists, ants as militaristic imperialists, is carried through with gusto. There is in the vivid scenes with the ants a perfect prophecy of totalitarianism and its canting slogans. Two other less well-known plays are equally ingenious and effective on the stage: Věc Makropulos (1922; Eng. tr., The Makropoulos Secret, 1925) argues amusingly against the desire for immortality, and Bílá Nemoc (1937; Eng. tr. Power and Glory, 1968) is an indignant play against dictators. The other plays, Adam Stvořitel (1927; Eng. tr., Adam the Creator, 1930), written in collaboration with Josef Čapek (q.v.), and Matka (1938; Eng. tr., The Mother, 1939) as well as two early comedies, are less successful.

But Čapek was not merely a dramatist. He was an extremely ambitious and subtle practitioner of the craft of fiction, a philosopher-poet passionately interested in the problems of truth and justice. His early collections of stories (e.g., Trapné povídky, 1921; Eng. tr., Money and Other Stories, 1929) are still full of youthful pessimism. Life is arbitrary and disconnected, brutal and disconcertingly irrational. The stories are painful and curiously inconclusive. But this was only the first step in his varied career as a writer. Two fanciful romances follow: Továrna na absolutno (1922; Eng. tr., The Absolute at Large, 1927) and Krakatit (1924; Eng. tr., 1925). The weird invention which liberates the Absolute like a gas gives opportunity for much hilarious satire against hypocrisy, while "Kratatit," the deadly explosive which might destroy civilization, becomes the leading theme of an anti-utopian romance. After these two Wellsian pieces, Čapek wrote a number of pleasant, humorous books of sketches and essays and several travel books which give voice to his belief in ordinary man, his sense of the bewildering variety and beauty of the world. His optimism seems sometimes a shade too cheerful, his ridicule of the abnormal and extravagant too complacent. But there is much quiet fun and much insight, especially in Anglické listy (1923; Eng. tr., Letters from England, 1925) as well as in the similar books on Italy, Holland, Spain, and Scandinavia. Čapek's interests veered more and more to practical politics and to popular art forms. His conversations with President Masaryk (Hovory s T. G. Masarykem, 3 vols., 1928–1935; Eng. tr., President Masaryk Tells His Story, 1934; Masaryk on Thought and Life, 1938) are a little classic in popular biography and political education, and his Devatero pohádek (1931; Eng. tr., Fairy Tales, 1933) is a veritable treasure house of pure storytelling. Povídky z jedné kapsy and Povídky z druhé kapsy (1929; Eng. tr., Tales from Two Pockets, 1932) try to create a semiphilosophical mystery story rather on the lines of Chesterton. But the poet and writer of tragedy awakens again in the three great novels: Hordubal (1933; Eng. tr., 1943), Povětroň (1934; Eng. tr., Meteor, 1935), and Obyčejný život (1935; Eng. tr., An Ordinary Life, 1936). Each of these stories tries to tell the same story from a special point of view in order to enhance the variety of its meanings and to suggest the utter mysteriousness of ultimate reality. Hordubal on the surface is a story of crime: a peasant who has returned from America to his home in Carpathian Russia dies under mysterious circumstances. Meteor is made up of speculative reconstructions of the early history of a pilot whose plane has come down in a crash. The nurse, the doctor, and the poet, all tell their story—with the implication that the poet's exact imagination came nearest to the truth. The last volume, An Ordinary Life, is the autobiography of a Czech railway clerk who discovers unexpected hidden selves in his own mind and past. After the great trilogy, Čapek wrote only two books of any length: a new fanciful romance, Válka s mloky (1936; Eng. tr., War with the Newts, 1937), a satire on modern science and pseudo science as well as international politics, and První parta (1937; Eng. tr., The First Rescue Party, 1939), a straightforward, almost balladlike story of a pit disaster. The fragment of an unfinished novel, Život a dílo skladatele Foltýna (1939; Eng. tr., The Cheat, 1941), was published posthumously. It is the story of a young man who marries a rich woman and uses others to build up a fraudulent reputation as a composer.

Čapek is best known for his plays, his visionary romances, and his genial travel books. His finest work is the trilogy of novels which centers around problems of truth and reality and constitutes one of the most successful attempts at a philosophical novel in any language. Čapek has been frequently censured by Czech critics as too international, but a book like An Ordinary Life gives a finely drawn picture of the Czech scene, and there is something very representative and national in Čapek's love of the common man, his genuine faith in democracy and humanity.

See: J. Mukařovský, ed., Výbor z prózy K. Čapka (1934), selections from Čapek's prose; V. Černý, Karel Čapek (1936); René Wellek, "Karel Čapek," Slavonic Review, XV (1936–1937), 191–206; Oliver Elton, Essays and Addresses (1939).

R. W.

Čapek-Chod, Karel Matěj (1860–1927, Czech novelist), is the most prominent novelist of the Czech naturalist movement. He was born in Domažlice (western Bohemia) and became a reporter and journalist in Prague, where he died. Čapek (who later adopted the name Čapek-Chod) is the Zola (q.v.) of Prague—a chronicler of the decay of the Prague bourgeoisie. Čapek's outlook on life is, like that of other naturalists, materialistic and pessimistic. He is a determinist who believes that a malicious fate plays us ugly tricks and thwarts our finest aspirations. Though Čapek has the naturalist's thirst for facts and details, his method is less objective than that of his foreign models: he indulges in the grotesque, uses caricature, and enjoys stylistic juggleries which have an almost Rabelaisian effect. He is not free from vulgarities and trivialities, but has a fantastic vision of the world's tragedy and a rough kind of pity and of humor which make us forget the faults of his loose composition and the lapses of his taste. His vitality and scope put him into the first rank of Czech novelists. His most important books are: Kašpar Lén, mstitel (1908; Caspar Lén, the Avenger), a crime story from the Prague periphery; Turbina (1916; The Turbine), the tragicomedy of the decay of an upper bourgeois family of Prague; Antonín Vondřejc (2 vols., 1917-1918), again a story of decay, this time of a poet forced into the drudgery of journalism; Jindrové (1921; The Jindras), a war novel which centers around a conflict between father and son. Čapek-Chod is also the author of several volumes of short stories.

See: H. Jelínek, Etudes tchécoslovaques (1927); A. Novák, "K. Matěj Čapek-Chod," in Almanach České Akademie, 1928; F. Kovárna, K. M. Čapek-Chod (1936). There are French translations of Antonín Vondřejc and Turbina.

R. W.

Capuana, Luigi (1839-1915, Italian critic and novelist), was born in Mineo, Sicily, the son of a well-to-do farmer. His activity as a writer was long and multifarious, beginning with a dramatic legend in verse, Garibaldi, in 1861 and ending with a comedy, Il Paraninfo, published posthumously in 1919. He lived a very full life. As novelist, critic, poet, playwright, short-story and fairy-tale writer, parodist (especially of his fellow Sicilian Rapisardi, q.v.), student of science (both natural and occult), folklorist, politician (he was twice elected mayor of his native town), teacher (at the Istituto Superiore di Magistero in Rome and later at the University of Catania), amateur photographer, bird fancier, practical joker, and gallant, he never had an idle moment. He was a versatile man, not especially profound. Curiosity and dilettantism are his main intellectual traits. His claim to fame rests mainly on his activity as a critic and fiction writer. In both these capacities he looms large in the history of verismo, the Italian counterpart of naturalism.

His criticism is characterized by an innate good taste which enables him to discern and make appraisals correctly and engagingly in an easy-flowing, urbane prose. He came early under the influence of De Sanctis (q.v.), but this influence was alloyed with the prevailing scientism of his age and his own mental make-up. Zola's (q.v.) naturalism and "experimental" (actually it was "instrumental") novel found in Capuana a warm champion. Later, however, he renounced naturalism and all "isms," going back to the view that in art form is everything. Form and impersonality may be said to be the two main tenets of his critical faith.

When in 1864 Capuana left his native town for Florence in order to drink at the fountain-head of the purest Italian, he did so fully confident that Italy would soon have in him her Shakespeare. By way of apprenticeship, he became dramatic editor of Florence's leading newspaper, the Nazione. But right then he "discovered" Balzac and thereupon bade farewell to Shakespeare and all dreams of dramatic glory. Laying aside forever his historical dramas in verse, he proceeded to try his hand at fiction writing. He was then far from thinking that some day all his dramatic talent would be wasted on a dozen or more naturalistic plays, most of them written in his native dialect for the use of some Sicilian actors, who at the time were enjoying a nation-wide vogue, and for the benefit of his creditors, since Capuana had this much in common with Balzac—he always lived beyond his, and his kin's, means. At any rate, in 1865 he wrote his first piece of fiction, Dottor Cymbalus, a short story in which is already marked that pseudo-scientific background which is to be found in so many of his stories. Then followed a long interlude of critical and political activity, interrupted in 1872 by the appearance of his second short story, Delfina. Not until 1877 did Capuana enter the field of fiction as a full-fledged writer. In that year was published his Profili di donne, a collection of psychological studies which he, as a bachelor and lady's man, felt competent to give. It was favorably received. In 1879 appeared his first novel, Giacinta, composed according to the naturalistic formula. Unfavorably received by the majority of critics, Giacinta was recast by Capuana and then again revised. But the judgment remained negative and continued so when it appeared (1890) as a five-act play. Giacinta was a failure, even though the author won nation-wide notoriety, a failure because naturalism remained for Capuana a formula, a tool, a prop, because it did not act on him, as it did on his friend Verga (q.v.), as a releasing lever, because he used it as a platform rather than as a springboard. Naturalism did not free him from all formalism; he merely substituted another kind, which had little more than novelty to recommend it. The truth of the matter is that Capuana lacked an inner world to which he might give expression. His world was all outside him. His muse was not that imagination which feeds upon an inner world, but the fancy, which loves to sport about with exteriors. His best pages are to be found in those of his works which deal with an outer world into which he has a clear insight—the world of his infancy and youth, the elemental world of his Paesane (1894), the best of his several dozen volumes of short stories, and of his Il Marchese di Roccaverdina (1901), the best of his five novels.

See: A. Pellizzari, Il Pensiero e l'arte di L. Capuana (1919); P. Vetro, L. Capuana; la vita e le opere (1922).

S. E. S.

Capus, Alfred (1858–1922, French journalist, novelist, and dramatist), born at Aix-en-Provence, went to Paris to attain renown. As one of the editors of the Figaro his short, brilliant articles on political subjects attracted much attention. His more important novels, Qui perd gagne (1890), Faux Départ (1891), Robinson (1910), and Scènes de la vie difficile (1921), recall in their classic realism Lesage. Simply though carefully written, they reveal a certain disillusionment and a mild cynicism, but in spite of the melancholy inherent in all his work, they end happily.

Capus views the ordinary man with much indulgence and sympathy. On the stage he portrayed the life of these same people with the same kindly realism, ironic and forgiving. Most of his characters have a Micawber-like trust in a kind Providence or in luck itself which will in the end resolve all difficulties. In Brignol et sa fille (1895) a confirmed optimist escapes the ruin planned by one of his creditors when his daughter happens to fall in love with and marry the nephew of the creditor. La Bourse, ou la vie (1900) and La Veine (1902), one of his most popular and typical comedies, present similar situations. In La Petite Fonctionnaire (1901) a young woman, earning her livelihood in a small, provincial post office, is severely criticized by the local townspeople who are quite overcome when she succeeds in marrying a nobleman of the region. Capus's sympathy for those women obliged to earn their living does not, however, preclude his satire of feminism in other plays. In Les Deux Ecoles (1903) and Les Maris de Léontine (1903) he urges an indulgent attitude in marriage on the part of both parties. His later comedies, while much discussed, met with less success. In general his amusing and optimistic plays preach the doctrine that happiness is the legitimate goal of life, that realities of life, such as food, love, clothes, and money, are perhaps more important to the average man than ideals.

He was elected to the French Academy in 1914 and died at Neuilly-sur-Seine.

See: E. Quet, Alfred Capus (1904).

J. F. M.

Caragiale, Ion Luca (1853–1912, Rumanian playwright), was a self-made man. Son and grandson of traveling players, he had no schooling and engaged in a succession of attempts to earn a living at newspaper, office, and other kinds of work. In 1888 he became director general of the Bucharest National Theatre, after a series of successes with his own comedies. Later he tried to be a merchant, opened a beer garden, edited the humoristic weekly Moftul român (Rumanian Trifle) with brilliancy and verve, and finally, inheriting a fortune from an aunt, voluntarily exiled himself to Berlin, where he spent the last years of his life in comfort and leisure devoted to music.

Caragiale made his debut in 1874 with a poem in the Bucharest Revista contemporană (Contemporary Review). He became famous, however, through his comedies produced in Bucharest and published in Convorbiri literare (Literary Conversations). After several years of inactivity, he gave Năpasta (1889; False Accusation), a peasant drama which reminds one of Tolstoy's (q.v.) Power of Darkness. The play, trying to reach deep-down to the foundations of the nation and the pure language "of the soil," does not in fact equal in craftsmanship the author's comedies. It caused, moreover, numerous polemics and made him weary of the stage. He now gave more attention to prose writing and in one of his short stories, "O făclie de Paște" (1889; An Easter Candle), he rose to the heights of the genre. Another work in prose is his Momente (1901; Moments). After the peasant upheaval of 1907 he published a pamphlet, 1907 din primăvară până în toamnă (1907; 1907 from Spring to Autumn), in which he frankly criticized the ruling classes. From Berlin he sent fables, epigrams, and sketches to Bucharest periodicals.

Caragiale caused the first accurate native accents to resound and the first really living figures to move on the stage of the National Theatre. In his comedies of character and manners (e.g., De ale carnavalului, 1885, Carnival Adventures), he showed the inherent conflict in an oriental society embracing new occidental customs and laws. In O scrisoare pierdută (1884; Lost Letter), one sees liberal politics misinterpreted by a corrupt administration. In Cuconul Leonida față cu reacțiunea (1879; Mister Leonida Faces the Reaction), we behold the retired officeholder, imbued with "republicanism," who explains to his wife that "universal suffrage" means that everybody should receive a high salary and no one pay any taxes. The mirth and laughter of these scenes contain a bitter sediment. And the revolted author actually whipped his contemporaries into sobriety and reform.

See: P. Zarifopol, Introducere la opere de Caragiale (1930).

L. F.

Carco, Francis (pseud. of François Marie Alexandre Carcopino-Tusoli, 1886–, French novelist, poet, and art critic), was born of Corsican parents at Nouméa, New Caledonia, where his father was superintendent of prisons. The violence of the surroundings—the passionate pent-up emotions of criminals, his father's quick temper and ready hand, the exotic scenery, his nurse's gruesome tales—contributed to enrich an algolagnic penchant. When Carco was nine years old, the family moved to the South of France where the countryside developed his sensuous love of nature and delight in physical sensation. At 14, an indifferent student but an avid reader of the poètes maudits, he practiced the technique of versification under the tutelage of Charles de Pomairols. Francis Jammes (q.v.) and Henry Bataille (q.v.) influenced his first poems. The Lycée of Agen witnessed his cultivation of a bohemian personality. During his military service Carco became organizer and theorist of the group of "fantasist poets" whose kinship was one of temperament and viewpoint rather than one of art and technique. He wrote La Bohème et mon cœur (1912; augmented editions, 1922, 1929; complete edition, 1939) under the aegis of Villon, Baudelaire (q.v.), and Verlaine (q.v.). The tragedy of their destinies, their sordid existence (itself helping them to create beauty), their grandeur rising above social opprobrium, exemplify for Carco the individual unfettering himself from the bourgeois and fulfilling his innermost purity of heart. Both the feeling of spiritual affinity and the problem of environment versus artistic personality produced Le Roman de Villon (1926; Eng. tr., The Romance of Villon, 1927); La Légende et la vie d'Utrillo (1927), in the series "La Vie de Bohème" directed by Carco; and Verlaine (1939). Chapters of Nostalgie de Paris (1941) are devoted to Baudelaire.

The Montmartre previous to the First World War, with its bohemian life, its milieu of artists and criminals, of pimps and prostitutes and narcotic addicts, is his special province. An apprenticeship as an art critic for the newspaper Homme libre preceded the publication of Jésus-la-Caille (1914), first of a series in which he defended and explained, sympathetically yet objectively, this marginal society. Les Innocents (1916), Bob et Bobette s'amuse (1919), Paname (1925), are novels of mœurs revealing the moral code of a social stratum whose principles are severe though different, the violation of whose tenets induces the chastisement of the offender. The climax, the result of moral disintegration, comes from within rather than from direct punitive efforts of the external world. Inexorable fate cannot be avoided. It is the phosphorescence illuminating the consciences of these elemental beings who, confused by their own murky sense of maladjustment, suddenly find their world made too complex by problems of the spirit. Instinct, clouded by fear (Perversité, 1925; Eng. tr., 1928) or premonition of doom (L'Equipe, 1919) or an obsession (Rue Pigalle, 1927), succumbs to destiny. Carco lacks the sentimentality of a Charles Louis Philippe (q.v.); objective and dispassionate in his writing (his economy of structure and precise penetration consistently are termed "classical" by critics), yet fundamentally a moralist, he objects to society's habit of condemning men for its own faults (L'Amour vénal, 1924). Nevertheless their degradation aroused in him a feeling of voluptuousness (La Rue, 1930), sublimating his personal emotional complexities. Paul Bourget's (q.v.) influence, inciting him to write L'Homme traqué (1922; Eng. trs., The Noose of Sin, 1923, The Hounded Man, 1924), which won the Grand Prix of the French Academy, enlarged the scope of his subject matter to include the bourgeois and to emphasize the psychological situation. The essential problem remains one of moral collapse in an individual incapable of escaping his fate. Carco has written about 30 books in this vein, the first few replete with argot.

The passing of his youth has evoked in this member of the Goncourt Academy a nostalgia for his bohemian days. His memoirs, important documents for a consideration of French literary and artistic life since the halcyon days of the cabaret Lapin Agile, reveal intimately the nature and heart of this expressionistic painter in light and shadow of subtle moods. He has said of his work that were the atmosphere removed nothing would remain. De Montmartre au Quartier latin (1927; Eng. tr., The Last Bohemia, 1928), A voix basse (1938), Bohème d'artiste (1940), and others show him restrained yet passionate, intelligent though physical, fusing himself with and purging himself by the pain of his protagonists. Francis Carco, the poet vibrantly sensitive to rain and glistening streets, is known as the defender of the voyou and the biographer of the prostitute. A definitive edition of the Mémoires was published in 1942 in Geneva, near which city Carco resided during a part of the Second World War.

See: H. Martineau, "Francis Carco," Divan, XIII (1921), 172-180; A. Thérive, Opinions littéraires (1925), pp. 113-129; Marcel Ormoy et al., "Francis Carco, poète," Divan, XXI (1929), 145-212 (whole number); Y. Gandon, Le Démon du style (1938), pp. 159-168; A. Rousseaux, Littérature du XXIème siècle (1939), I, 21-32.

S. S. W.

Cardarelli, Vincenzo (1887-, Italian poet and critic), was born in Corneto (Tarquinia). Self-taught, he has spent most of his life in Rome where he founded and directed the review Ronda. His chief collaborators were Bacchelli, Baldini, Barrili, Cecchi, and Ungaretti (qq.v.). The Ronda represented a reaction against the undisciplined and disintegrating manifestations of futurism and a return to the literary elegance and moral order of the classic writers. Leopardi became Cardarelli's chief idol and master. In Viaggi nel tempo (1921) and Il Sole a picco (1929), two of Cardarelli's most characteristic works, there is revealed however a certain tormented, moralistic, and somewhat haughty literary style which showed that Leopardi was emulated more as a teacher of letters than of ideas.

See: Pietro Pancrazi, Ragguagli di Parnaso (1919-1920) (1920), pp. 119-126.

P. M. R.

Carducci, Giosue (1835-1907, Italian poet, orator, scholar, and critic), was born in the village of Val di Castello in Tuscany and had his schooling in Florence and Pisa. After brief periods of service as a teacher in San Miniato and Pistoia he was appointed, in 1860, to the professorship of Italian literature in the University of Bologna, a position which he held until his retirement in 1904. The years of the first half of his life were the culminating years of the Risorgimento, and man of letters though he was, he was passionately concerned for the liberation and unification of Italy and for her establishment in the ways of democracy. The successive phases of the struggle and the unhappy vicissitudes of the newly made Italy are reflected in his writings. Like so many other Latin and Italian poets, he was a master of satire; and his satiric power found plenty of targets in the weaknesses and failures which delayed completion of the national effort and in the inefficiency and corruption of the years that followed that completion. Yet he lived, and lived intensely, not only in the exciting life of his own day, but in the whole vast pageant of classic and Italian history and in the eternal simplicities of human toil and joy and sorrow. These ranges of thought and feeling give breadth and depth and universality to his verse—which is illumined always with beauty seen and rendered, and marked always by flawless artistry.

The successive volumes of his poems are Rime (1857), Levia gravia (1868), Poesie (1871), Nuove Poesie (1873), Odi barbare (1877), Nuove Odi barbare (1882), Rime nuove (1887), Terze Odi barbare (1889), and Rime e ritmi (1899). The second, third, and seventh of these volumes contain old as well as new material. While there are beautiful and striking poems in the three earliest volumes, it was with the fourth, Nuove Poesie, that Carducci first established himself on the nobler heights of poetry, in a mastery which he thereafter maintained to the end.

He has been called the poet of history, and he well deserves that title. He must often have stood on Italian summits dominating landscapes that quiver with the life of generations; and it must be from such experience that he derived the recurring phrase by which he expresses his visualization of the past: "I stand upon the mountain of the centuries." From that mountain he directs his vision over the varied land of time and legend that lies below, discerns men and scenes that glow with rich significance, and then, as creator—guided always by a strong sense of epic destiny—evokes those men, those scenes, for the modern world.

Yet he is even more essentially the poet of that basic moral bond per la quale (as Dante puts it) tutti a tutti semo amici. His favorite word is pio, which he uses to express the willing consciousness of interwoven life. Such phrases as il pio travaglio and la giustizia pia del lavoro are characteristic; and in the most famous of his sonnets he calls even the ox pio, as being a willing partner with man. His profound morality is vigorous and aggressive. Often it finds vent in satire; often it exalts wise sacrifice; oftenest it pervades his praise of normal love and toil. Its most perfect and stirring expression is to be found in "Il Canto dell' amore," in which it appears in splendid synthesis with the other major elements of his poetry.

His "long study and great love" of the Greek and Latin classics furnished him with poetic material, held him to fine standards of poetic craftsmanship, and in the latter half of his life led him to extensive and successful experimentation in what he called "barbaric" metrical forms. If the several types of the classic ode are read without regard to the rules of scansion, but with full acceptance of normal verbal stress, the resulting rhythmic patterns differ from the familiar ones, but they are none the less interesting and distinctive. Carducci in his odi barbare worked out such patterns in Italian verse, fashioning Italian equivalents for many classic strophes; and the new forms proved to be a perfect vehicle for Carducci's mature poetic genius.

He was often called upon for public addresses; and he never failed to endue his public utterance with a substantial content and a masterly prose form which make his orations worthy companions to his poems. Noblest of all is his oration (1882) on the death of Garibaldi, in which the soaring inspiration reaches a height unsurpassed in ancient or modern oratory. With all his activity in the fields usually regarded as creative, he was no less active—and, in a sense, no less creative—in the fields of scholarship and criticism. The fruits of such labors are to be found in many volumes devoted to literary history and criticism, and in many editions of Italian writers, to which his notes and prefaces give permanent worth. The most notable of his longer studies is that in which he treats "Dello svolgimento della letteratura nazionale"; his editions of Petrarch and of Politian are his most valuable achievements as editor; and his two volumes on Parini constitute the most impressive monument of his indefatigable industry. He proved once and for all that there is no necessary incompatibility between the functions of poetry and of scholarship. His works are collected in a 30-volume National Edition published in Bologna in 1939–1940 by Zanichelli. Much of his poetry has been translated into English.

He was made a senator in 1890 and received the Nobel prize in literature in 1906, the year before his death.

See: G. Chiarini, Memorie della vita di Giosue Carducci (1907); A. Jeanroy, Giosue Carducci, l'homme et le poète (1911); B. Croce, Giosue Carducci (1927).

E. H. W.

Carner, Josep (1884–, Catalan poet), sums up all of the nonconformity of the generation which, abandoning romantic and archaeological patterns, was identified with countless attempts at poetic renovation. With him Catalan poetry attains the full flowering of the Renaixença, and it is he who effects the fusion between the literary language and the findings of the philological section of the Institut d'Estudis Catalans, until that time without benefit of the voice of an apostle. A language which has suffered the literary prostration of centuries does not recover without pain—as is evident in all the works of the Renaixença. But Carner is a very great artist in language as in other respects, and although in his poetry certain archaic forms are still perpetuated, his work represents, from a linguistic point of view, a most important revolution. Indeed the Catalan linguistic reintegration has been called a literary miracle.

Josep Carner was born in Barcelona, where he received his primary and secondary education in a private academy. He studied law as well as philosophy and letters at the University of Barcelona. His poetic initiation came early; when he was only 12 his first verses were published, and at 15 the journal Renaixença, of such great influence in the evolution of Catalan letters and in reviving the patriotic spirit, was regularly accepting his productions. In Primer llibre de sonets (1905; First Book of Sonnets) and Fruits saborosos (1906; Delicious Fruit) one sees Carner's great promise as a renovator. He had already produced two books of prose, L'idil li dels nanyos (1904; The Idyl of the Dwarfs) and Deu rondalles de Jesus infant (1905; Two Serenades to the Child Jesus), of similar importance in the literary evolution of Catalan. There followed, in verse, Segon llibre de sonets (1907; Second Book of Sonnets), La malvestat d'Oriana (1910), and Verger de les galanies (1911; The Garden of Gallantry), while in the pages of the daily paper Veü de Catalunya he created a new style of political journalism. Monjoies (1912; My Jewels), which shows Carner as the fully matured artist, was followed by Auques i ventalls (1914; Easter Prints and Fans) and La paraula al vent (1916; The Word in the Wind). In 1916 he was elected a member of the Institut d'Estudis Catalans, the highest cultural honor in Catalonia. At that time his literary activity was extraordinary; in addition to composing poems, articles, and essays for numerous publications, he directed the journals Empori (Emporium) and Catalunya and translated Prosa catalana into Spanish, to make known in Spain outstanding manifestations of the Renaixença; in this volume he collected short stories of Ixart, Vilanove, Caselles, and others and the Jacobé of the master Joaquim Ruyra (q.v.).

In 1921 Josep Carner embarked upon a diplomatic career, but continued to maintain his place in the world of Catalan literature. From this time, many of his works, published in Barcelona, were written in the foreign countries to which his responsibilities as a diplomat took him. Among the works of this period are L'origen entre les canyes (1924; The Breeze among the Canes), La inútil ofrena (1924; The Useless Offering), Les bonhomies (1928), El cor quiet (1931; The Quiet Heart), El veire encantat (1933), La primavera el Poblet (1935; Spring in Poblet). In prose La creació d'Eva i altres contes (1925; The Creation of Eve, and Other Short Stories), and Les planetes del verum (1921) are noteworthy. Among his numerous translations is the Pickwick Papers of Dickens (1933). For the stage he prepared Verdaguer's (q.v.) poem, "Canigó," translated Molière's Le Malade imaginaire and Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, and wrote an original dramatic work, El giravolt de maig (1929; The May Pinwheel).

At the time of the invasion of Catalonia, Carner, residing in Brussels as first secretary of the Spanish embassy, had been named minister plenipotentiary to Bucharest, but did not go there. After a short stay in Paris he went to Mexico and now lives in the capital of that country. His literary activities have continued through the medium of the journal Revista dels Catalans d'Amèrica (Mexico City, 1939) and of Full Català, a publication which he founded in collaboration with J. M. Miquel i Vergés, Pere Matalonga, and Ferran de Pol. His latest work, the poem Nabí, published in Buenos Aires in 1941, was conceived in Hendaye, where he wrote a fragment of the first canto. The originality and force of the poem are outstanding; a poetic objectivity shows how unchanging have been certain characteristics of Josep Carner throughout his evolution. In Mexico City he holds a chair in the university and is a professor in the Centro de Estudios Históricos of the Colegio de Mexico.

See: J. Folguera, Les noves valors de la poesia catalana (1919); J. M. Miquel i Vergés, prologue, in Carner, Nabí.

J. M. M. i V.

Carossa, Hans (1878–, German prose writer and poet), was born in Tölz, Bavaria. Both his father and his grandfather were physicians. Carossa himself studied medicine and practiced in Passau, Nuremberg, and Munich. In 1916 he joined the German army as Bataillonsarzt during the battle of the Somme, but was shifted shortly afterward to the Rumanian front, where he served until the last year of the war. Back on the Western front at the time of Ludendorff's last offensive, he was wounded and sent home. After the war he continued his practice in Munich for a time, then returned to the country.

The combination of physician and poet, not infrequent in German letters, as witness Schiller, Kerner, Döblin (q.v.), Schnitzler (q.v.), and others, is of particular interest in Carossa. While the family doctor is not exactly in the romantic vanguard of scientific discoverers, he is in most intimate touch with those human values which are the function of literature. Carossa, profiting by the keen observation of the scientist, has made abundant use of such material with the minimum of fiction. His first prose work, Doktor Bürgers Ende (1913), represents a modern twist to the Werther theme: a young physician, driven to despair by the suffering of his patients, kills himself when he fails to save his fiancée from death. Carossa drew on his own profession again in Der Arzt Gion (1931; Eng. tr., Doctor Gion, 1933); indeed, Gion being dialectic for Jean or Hans, the book is confessedly about Carossa himself. In this post-war narrative, which is laid in Munich and has to do with the disruptive effects of the war, the author works, not with political matters or shifting social classes, but with some half-dozen individuals, cases such as any doctor might have had at this period. They are silhouetted against the backdrop of the time with unforgettable effect both for the characters and for the background. Gion and the much weaker Geheimnisse des reiferen Lebens (1936) are Carossa's nearest approach to the novel. His out and out autobiographical works, Eine Kindheit (1922; Eng. tr., A Childhood, 1930), Rumänisches Tagebuch (1924; Eng. tr., A Roumanian Diary, 1929), Verwandlungen einer Jugend (1928; Eng. tr., Boyhood and Youth, 1930), Führung und Geleit (1933), and Das Jahr der schönen Täuschungen (1941), cover the chief events of a life that, with the exception of his participation in the war, was not pitched high with excitement. From Goethe on down to the present, German literature has tended more and more to the idea that confession is the truest form of self-expression. Carossa, in spite of his comparatively uneventful career the autobiographer par excellence, is a classic fruition of that tenet. His confessions are the product of modesty and of that clairvoyance which honesty of intellectual dealing can achieve. They are also noteworthy for the author's reflective strolls along the byways of his narrative.

The doctor appears to be under tribute to the poet. Carossa's amorality despite his mystic bent, his objective judgment of the problems of life, his impartiality toward friend and foe, all derive in some measure from his medical discipline. But there is also a high ethical content in Carossa's writings, a positive Weltanschauung that makes them clear and luminous among those of his troubled contemporaries. In contrast to the negation that has characterized so much of European art and letters for the last half century, here is one who bears witness to the art of living without being tormented.

In Führung und Geleit, the most formless but most revealing of his works, Carossa mentions many of his fellow writers. His attitude toward them is always one of shy admiration, which, if we may take him at his word, has amounted to an obsession in some cases. The imitation which that would imply is, however, not apparent in his writings, which are characteristic of no one but Carossa and fall into no school. His style, a model of grace and seeming simplicity, is warm and appealing.

Carossa is wont to think of himself primarily as a lyric poet. His output, which has been brought together in a rather slender volume (Gesammelte Gedichte, 1938) is of a high order. For one who has written so largely of himself, Carossa's poems are surprisingly objective. They are colored with a straightforward symbolism and are most effective when, as in "Die Fremde auf meiner Bank" and "Der Blinde," the observed is held up against the invisible and imponderable. Sympathy with suffering inspires many of his lyrics, but his choice figures and classic style sometimes seem at variance with the realistic theme. Such poems as "Empfängnis," "Mysterium der Liebe," "An das Ungeborene," among others, fail to strike fire, no doubt because the doctor sees love too much as a complication of physiology.

See: Buch des Dankes für Hans Carossa (1928); M. Machate, Hans Carossa (1934); A. Hauéis, Hans Carossa (1935); F. Klatt, Hans Carossa (1937).

H. W. P.

Casares, Julio (1877–, Spanish lexicographer and critic), was born in Granada. A student of modern languages, he can translate, it is said, 18 of them, and he is chief of the Language Division in the Spanish Foreign Office. He is also the author of French-Spanish and English-Spanish dictionaries. In the international field he was one of the most active members of the Committee on Intellectual Cooperation in the League of Nations. His work as a linguist consists mainly of newspaper and magazine articles about Spanish words and manners of speech; these contributions are less in the domain of scientific philology than examples of skillful vulgarization as practiced by a man of sound and vast learning. Some of the most important were collected in Crítica efímera (2 vols., 1918–1919). Casares entered the Spanish Academy in 1919, reading on the occasion the address Sobre el nuevo concepto de un diccionario de la lengua (1921); since then he has been a permanent collaborator in the work of that body, especially as a contributor to the new editions of the dictionary. As a literary commentator he is the author of Crítica profana (1915), a volume which attracted special attention for its defense of Castilian purism against the foreignism and stylistic innovations of the modernist writers.

See: M. Bacarisse, "Dos críticos," Revista de libros, IV (1920), 11–14.

A. del R

Castelar, Emilio (1832–1899, Spanish statesman, political philosopher, historian, critic, and novelist), was born in Cádiz, cradle of Spanish parliamentarianism, and won fame as Spain's most brilliant parliamentary orator. He made his political début at a rally in Madrid in 1854 with an extemporaneous speech and was at once acclaimed as a magnificent orator and an ardent defender of democracy. His eloquence attracted many listeners to his classes at the University of Madrid, where from 1858 he held the chair in Spanish history, and to his celebrated lectures at the Ateneo, later collected in La historia de la civilización en los cinco primeros siglos del cristianismo en Europa (2d ed., 4 vols., 1865). As a historian he showed predilection for broad themes of cultural or ideological synthesis, as in his Historia del movimiento republicano en Europa (9 vols., 1875) and La revolución religiosa (4 vols., 1880-1883). In the latter work he reveals his own deep religious feeling as a Catholic but, at the same time, his sympathy and tolerance for the great figures of the Reformation, and it was for religious tolerance, for freedom of worship, that he fought in some of his most impassioned addresses before the Cortes. John Hay, who heard him, said: "His speech is like a torrent in its inconceivable fluency, like a raging fire in its brilliancy of color and terrible energy of passion." Castelar also kindled public opinion in the articles he wrote for Soberanía nacional and Discusión and especially for Democracia, an anti-Bourbon newspaper of which he was the editor. His popularity began to wane as his political views became more conservative; as fourth and last president (from September 6, 1873, to January 3, 1874) of the short-lived First Spanish Republic, he was obliged to take strong dictatorial measures, which were not always in harmony with his principles, in order to establish order. In 1888 he withdrew from the political arena and spent his last years in writing and in traveling in France and Italy, the two countries to which he was most devoted throughout his life.

Castelar was a prolific writer. In addition to his political addresses, newspaper articles, and historical works, he wrote a number of novels, from the exceedingly sentimental Ernesto (1855) to the somewhat more successful historical novel Fra Filippo Lippi (3 vols., 1877-1878). His best writing, however, is to be found in his less ambitious and more personal works (e.g., Recuerdos de Italia, 2 vols., 1872-1876) in which travel impressions are intermingled with historical, literary, and artistic reminiscences. In a style that is far less rhapsodic and flowery than that of his public speeches, he conveys his deep emotion on first seeing the Sistine Chapel, or he evokes a historical moment, a landscape, or a great spiritual figure, as in "San Francisco y su convento de Asís." Castelar was the most celebrated Spaniard of the latter part of the 19th century in Europe and in America as well. For years he contributed regularly to the leading newspapers of Spanish America, where he was so widely read that, as Rubén Darío could write on his death, his fame reached virtually every village and hamlet.

See: B. Jarnés, Castelar, hombre del Sinaí (1935).

E. F. H.

Castelo Branco, Camilo (1825-1890, Portuguese novelist), first great figure in modern Portuguese fiction, was born in Lisbon, of Trás-os-Montes stock. As the illegitimate child of a romantic love affair, his life was destined to be a current of tumultuous passions, accentuated by a psychopathic constitution. Spontaneous, original, sensual, he showed a curious duality of childish joy and deep melancholy, of tenderness and sarcasm, of kindness and egoism, which was later to produce a brilliant, unequal, and disorganized work. He was an orphan at an early age, a widower almost in his adolescence, an irregular student, a brilliant and scandalous bohemian, imaginative and fantastic, with mystic reactions which nearly led him into the priesthood. All these phases contributed to a melodramatic life which included imprisonment—once for kidnaping, once for adultery—and a bitter and blind old age ending in suicide.

Castelo Branco, author of a hundred volumes, poetic, dramatic, critical, and novelistic, owes his fame to his work in the last-named category. He inaugurated the novel of passion which, with the rural novel, is the bridge between Portuguese historical and realistic fiction; he marks the transition between two epochs and two currents. The Portugal of his earlier years was experiencing the changes which followed civil war; the youth of the period lived in an unrestrained romantic dedication to violence and scandalous love affairs. This atmosphere and his imitation of Sue, Paul de Kock, Soulié, and D'Arlincourt provide the ingredients of his first novelistic works. Anatéma (1851; Anathema), Os mistérios de Lisboa (1853; The Mysteries of Lisbon), and O livro negro do Padre Diniz (1855; The Black Book of Father Diniz) are samples of the gloomy genre with its nocturnal assassinations, gallows, mysterious origins, storming of convents, and the like. But he soon abandoned this sensational manner. At about that time he came in contact with Balzac, for whom he never lost his admiration. Onde está a felicidade? (1856; Where Is Happiness?), Um homem de brios (1857; A Man of Valor), and O que fazem as mulheres (1858; What Women Do) are the first products of his matured genius and place him on the road to fame. His own imprisonment for adultery (1861) produced another definite change in his work, in that it caused him to bring his own passions and misfortunes to the novel. During his incarceration he wrote Amor de perdição (1862; Love of Perdition), the most beautiful of his works dealing with passionate love, a veritable autobiographical confession. He retired to village life, harassed by daily necessity, and produced with amazing fecundity, becoming more and more the realist. In Novelas do Minho (1875; Novels of Minho), stories of country life in the North, he now gave an objective view of rural primitivism, as opposed to the rose-tinted idealization of the ordinary writers of the rural novel. Even so his romantic formation, his excessive temperament, inclined toward sarcastic, caricatural deformation, his active creativeness, were bound to place him in conflict with the monotonous, platitudinarian writing of formal realism. He was at the height of his fame when Eça de Queiroz (q.v.) introduced the realism of Flaubert and Zola (qq.v.) in his first novels. Castelo Branco rebelled against the pseudoscientific methods of the experimental novel by publishing Eusébio Macário (1879) and A corja (1880; The Rabble) as parodies of this technique. Here he attempted to ridicule the new formula and as a result became involved in a violent polemic with the proponents of the new tendency. However, what had begun as literary scoffing ended in a sort of acceptance, indicative of his capacity for assimilation. Thus in A brasileira de Prazins (1882; The Brazilian Girl from Prazins) can be detected, beneath his ordinary passionate intensity, a descriptive objectivity and structural balance, unknown in his previous work.

Castelo Branco is the most important representative of the literature of his generation. The over-all significance of his work—58 novels—is comparable in some respects to that of Balzac or Pérez Galdós (q.v.); his portrait of the Portuguese society of the period is a permanent record, fixed for all time with emotion and high relief. He limits himself, however, to a single emphasis: love is made the motor center of human personality. He shows a boundless inventive genius and clever analysis of all the shades of amorous passion. Perhaps his most outstanding quality is the rich native texture of his language, “pure marble from the national quarry,” a result of multifarious contacts in the course of his eventful life and of a profound knowledge of classic writers. Although he protested that he was not a “lapidary of words,” his greatest interest was in style and vocabulary, and this brought about an occasional sacrifice of psychological truth to linguistic brilliance. Inclination to dramatize, emotional intensity, exuberant imagination of action, virulent deforming sarcasm, succulent richness of his prose—these are the most distinguishing characteristics of the novels of Castelo Branco. One limitation, inherent in his temperament, was his inability to disengage himself from his writing; he mixes in the action and takes sides with or against his characters, whom one moment he exalts and the next satirizes cruelly, especially those of the commercial middle class. When he abandons his impetuosity and his sincere emotionalism, he attains a great verisimilitude and naturalness, particularly in the depiction of the humble life of the North, permeated with childhood recollections.

Castelo Branco's work as a dramatist and a poet, although admirable within the frame of its romanticism, is inferior to his novelistic production. A volume of poems, Nas trevas (1890; In the Darkness), composed when he was blind, reveals at times a direct and impressive grief. In 1885 he was made a viscount. In 1889 he received a life pension; this he enjoyed only a short time. His spiritual and physical suffering, the insanity of his son, the conviction that his blindness was incurable, and his hereditary, suicidal pessimism can be said to have loaded the pistol with which he took his life a year later.

See: A. Pimentel, O romance do romancista: Vida de Castelo Branco (1890); T. Braga, As modernas idéias na literatura portuguesa (1892), I, 240–285; F. de Figueiredo, História da literatura romântica portuguesa, 1825–1870 (1913), pp. 201–227.

E. G. D.

Castro, Américo (1885–, Spanish scholar and critic), born in Brazil of Spanish parents, was taken while a child to Granada, where he had his early education and in 1904 finished his studies for the degree of licenciado in literature. For two years (1905–1907) he followed courses in Paris at the Sorbonne, and from that time Castro entered into the living currents of continental European culture. As a result of his studies and travels abroad, he acquired great skill in spoken French and German, in which languages he has lectured with distinction. On his return to Spain he identified himself with the work carried on in the Institución libre de enseñanza, founded by Francisco Giner de los Ríos (q.v.). If he owes his spiritual vision to Don Francisco, he is also a faithful disciple and collaborator of Ramón Menéndez Pidal (q.v.), who organized at the Centro de Estudios Históricos the program for a disciplined approach in all research connected with the history and culture of Spain. Like Navarro Tomás (q.v.), Solalinde, Alfonso Reyes, and Onís (q.v.), Castro was one of the editors of the Revista de filología española, and it was in this famous review that some of his memorable work appeared, such as his Algunas observaciones acerca del honor en los siglos XVI y XVII in 1916.

Through the Centro de Estudios Históricos and other government agencies, Castro has contributed to the reformation of educational practices and to the diffusion of Spanish culture by training foreigners who came to Spain to study and particularly by placing young Spaniards in the great institutions of learning throughout the world. Besides teaching at the University of Madrid, where he had the chair in the history of the Spanish language, and writing monographs, essays, and books on various subjects, Castro has energetically popularized the findings of Spanish scholars and critics by writing in the Sol of Madrid and in the dailies of Buenos Aires. Again like many of his contemporaries, he has lectured at Berlin, Oxford, the Sorbonne, and the universities of the United States and the Argentine. It was in Argentina that he helped Amado Alonso (q.v.) found the Instituto de Filología. A liberal in politics, he supported the second Spanish republic, which out of gratitude and admiration sent him to Germany as Spanish ambassador. After 1936 he left for America; he stayed in Buenos Aires for a year and then removed to the United States, where he taught two years at the University of Wisconsin and one at the University of Texas; he has more recently become a professor at Princeton.

Castro's varied and multiple contributions can be classified under four headings: erudite essays on philology (e.g., Fueros leoneses, 1916, in collaboration with Onís, and an annotated translation of Meyer-Lübke's book on Romanic linguistics, 1914); interpretative essays, on St. Theresa, Lope de Vega, the Spanish theatre, the Don Juan legend, and other outstanding themes and figures of Spanish literature (Lengua, enseñanza y literatura, 1924; Santa Teresa y otros ensayos, 1929; the introduction to El burlador de Sevilla, 1922, which gives a synthetic vision of the Spanish comedia); highly original essays (El pensamiento de Cervantes, 1925, the ambitious nature of which created a deep stir among European and American scholars and critics); provocative essays which purport to reach the cultured public at large (La peculiaridad lingüística rioplatense y su sentido histórico, 1941).

Castro belongs to the generation of university professors who have combined with their scientific pursuits a sense of the Spanish problem, namely, what meaning is to be given the grandeur that was Spain and her present inchoate state. He is not only a sober investigator in the fields of philology, literature, and culture, but also an acid critic of the dead hand of Spanish traditionalism. At the beginning of his career he showed some of the negativism of the demolishers, but as political fetishes failed, Castro soon discovered the positive elements in the unique culture of Spain.

See: Dámaso Alonso, review of El pensamiento de Cervantes in Revista de la Biblioteca, Archivo y Museo del Ayuntamiento de Madrid, III (1926), 385-388; C. A. Pastoor, "Américo Castro," Universitario, IV (1927), 13-27; Anderson Imbert, "Américo Castro," Sur, VII (1937), 86-88.

M. J. B.

Castro, Eugénio de (1869-1944, Portuguese poet), was born in Coimbra, to a family of a very ancient academic and literary tradition. In Lisbon he alternated studies in the liberal arts with newspaper work; later he entered the diplomatic corps and finally became a teacher. After international recognition of his writings and admission to the Portuguese Academy—at the age of 27—Castro was appointed professor of Romance philology in the faculty of philosophy of the University of Lisbon (1914) and then at the University of Coimbra (1916), of which institution he became director.

The earliest literary compositions of Eugénio de Castro, very youthful indeed, showed great verbal talent, along with ingenuousness and a strong poetic temperament. A first trip to France initiated him into the contemporary poetry of that country; this meant for Castro a somewhat involved mixture of Baudelaire (q.v.), Gautier, Leconte de Lisle (q.v.), Verlaine (q.v.), Mallarmé (q.v.) and Maeterlinck (q.v.) and "art for art's sake." This also meant for him a reaction against the politico-social servitude of Portuguese poetry with its clamorous oratory. Eugénio de Castro and António Nobre (q.v.) were to restore Portuguese poetry to aesthetic integrity (see Portuguese literature); Nobre, of a deep and morbid sentimentality, changed the poetic substance, Castro, healthy both mentally and physically and with an elegant sense of balance, renovated principally the media of expression.

Upon his return from this first trip to France, he produced Oaristos (1890), the first cry of revolt. In the preface-manifesto he declared with provocative aggressiveness that, "with two or three shining exceptions, contemporary Portuguese poetry is based on some few handfuls of feeble and decrepit commonplaces"; he deplored the "Franciscan poverty" of current verse and announced his intention of trying new ways of metrical expression. Oaristos and Horas (1891; Hours) offered a poetry of aristocratic, formal splendor, Verlainian in tone, polyphonic and rich in imagery. Fashioned only for os raros, incomprehensible indeed to the uninitiated, it nevertheless opened a new cycle in Portuguese poetic form. In keeping with his contention—advanced in Oaristos—that two thirds of the words in the language lay ignored in the dictionaries, Castro revived a whole archaic, aristocratic, and liturgical vocabulary, replete with brilliant and magnificent images, in a veritable festival of the senses. This refining of the lexicon was accompanied by a new typographical presentation which called for the use of a profusion of capital letters and for special care in the composition of the printed page. Eugénio de Castro is a virtuoso, relying not on the intrinsic meaning of words but on the innumerable possibilities of musical and visual manipulation. At the same time he made no attempt to express the inexpressible with the suggestive verbal penumbra of a Mallarmé; rather, he endeavored to express more richly what is already known.

The later evolution of Castro showed that there remained in his temperament much of the classicist, devoted to clear as well as beautiful forms. Castro and his nefelibatas (cloud treaders)—a word which he used and which degenerated into a nickname for the group—took from symbolism its technique and external processes, rather than its essential aesthetic substance. In 1896, to be sure, he returned to France to be consecrated as the leader of Portuguese symbolism at a banquet in his honor, presided over by Catulle Mendès (q.v.). And he became identified with the most outstanding elements of the international artistic movement; French and Italian critics introduced him to the world. The Mercure de France received and protected him. He exerted an influence on Spanish and Hispano-American modernism and came to be the best-known and most translated Portuguese poet. But beneath the symbolist, the lover of opulent Parnassian graces, the devotee of cosmopolitan and universal art, there throbbed a spirit at once profoundly Portuguese and classical. Little by little he evolved in the direction of a more sober classical art—he knew, admired, and translated Latin and Greek classic authors and Goethe—until he finally moved into the current of the national poetic tradition. Already in Sagramor (1895), a dramatic poem, a Faustian incarnation of the tedium vitae, are seen a certain rejection of the decadent style and less interest in freakishness and brilliance of rhyme. This work stands in contrast to Belkiss (1894), a lyrical prose narration influenced by Maeterlinck which recounts, in a language of Asiatic sumptuousness, the amorous peregrinations of the queen of Sheba through a utopian and legendary Orient. A nereida de Harlem (1896; The Nereid of Harlem), O rei Galaor (1897; King Galaor), and Salomé (1896) continue to show much of the pomp of the earlier manner. Saúdades do céu (1899; Longings for Heaven), whose title indicates a national preoccupation, preceded the poem Constança (1900), which marked radical withdrawal from his former art. Castro's identification with the amorous and doleful soul of Portugal and its landscape, through the crepuscular figure of the scorned queen, the rival of Inês de Castro, is complete; the channels of his poetical creation and his means of expression are in the most authentic Portuguese. Miguel de Unamuno (q.v.) said of Constança that it is "a symbol of Portugal itself."

From 1900 to the period following the First World War, Castro alternated his old Parnassian taste, never abandoned completely (O anel de Policrates, 1907, The Ring of Policrates; Camaféus romanos, 1921, Roman Cameos), with a preference for Pre-Raphaelite themes from the national middle ages (O cavaleiro das mãos irresistíveis, 1916; The Knight of the Irresistible Hands). His final phase is one of definite devotion to national folk themes, to the Neo-Garrettism that Nobre had initiated in 1892. Without losing its exquisite technique, Castro's poetry gained in depth of sentiment. In a refined and sober language he also sang in his later years of the sadness and joys of family life. The gentle, philosophical pessimism apparent in all his previous work becomes a resigned and indulgent Christian sadness. Cravos de papel (1922; Paper Carnations), Canções desta negra vida (1922; Songs of This Somber Life), Descendo a encosta (1924; Coming Downhill), Chamas duma candêia velha (1925; Flames of an Old Lamp), and Últimos versos (1938; Last Verses) are examples of this final phase of tender and intimately Portuguese verse.

The younger poets, who have surpassed him, owe much to Castro. To him is due in great measure the return of Portuguese poetry to dignity, as well as a new cultivation of form and pure aestheticism. He completely renovated the poetic instrument. To this must be added the fact that his recognition in the Latin world gave international voice and prestige to the little-known contemporary Portuguese literature.

See: M. de Unamuno, Por tierras de Portugal y de España (1911), pp. 5-13; A. F. G. Bell, Studies in Portuguese Literature (1914), pp. 225-232; Rubén Darío, Los raros (1918), pp. 245-265.

E. G. D.

Castro, Rosalía (1836?-1885, Spanish poet and novelist), born at Santiago de Compostela in Galicia, was the daughter of Doña Teresa Castro, who was a member of a noble family, and of an unknown father. The air of melancholy which pervades all her writing may well be related to this circumstance. Educated with great care, she early showed remarkable talents for the arts, especially for drawing, music, and singing, and composed her first poems at the age of 12. In poor health, she spent the winters either at the Pazo de Lestrove, ancestral home of the Castros, or at a modest house in the vicinity of Padrón, whose countryside she was to exalt with home-loving devotion in all her poetic work. She moved to Madrid at the age of 20, established relations with the writers of the capital, and became associated with Ventura Ruiz Aguilera, the poet, with Eulogio Florentino Sanz, translator of Heine, and with Gustavo A. Bécquer (q.v.). In 1857 was published, in Museo universal, her first poem in Galician, a paraphrase of the popular song "Airiños, airiños, aires . . ." (Little airs, little airs, airs . . .), reflecting her anguish and loneliness. That year also marks the appearance of her first book, La flor, a short and unimportant work in Spanish. The following year she married the Galician historian Don Manuel Murguía, one of the best prose writers of his time, accompanied him on his travels through Spain as an archivist, returned several times to Galicia but without happiness, suffered family misfortunes, and finally died in her home at Padrón, July 15, 1885.

Rosalía Castro wrote three books of poetry, Cantares gallegos (1863), Follas novas (1880), and En las orillas del Sar (1884; Eng. tr. of selected poems, Beside the River Sar, 1937). The first two are in Galician, the third is in Spanish. The efforts to revive a regional language which had enjoyed such an illustrious past coincide in Galicia with the Provençal and Catalan literary and cultural revivals; they culminate indeed in this poet, who appropriates all the smooth grace and musicality of the Cancioneiros and the Can-tigas of Alfonso the Wise. She adds her own quality of grief, which is not simply an ephemeral product of the mal du siècle but such an absorbing and sincere sentiment that it transcends the world that surrounds her, through a mystic yearning and restlessness of the spirit. This grief becomes the very substance of her life; once when she thought herself free of it, she was tortured by its absence. Her mysticism should be interpreted in the light of this tragic attitude, as is sagaciously pointed out by Unamuno (q.v.) in his Andanzas y visiones españolas. At times she trembles with a religious fear reminiscent of Baudelaire (q.v.); she shows a heroic, tortured religiosity sublimated by remorse. Rosalía typifies the pantheistic interpretation of the saudade, the search for perfect communion with the earth which engendered us, with the entire landscape. Some of her poems, with their simple evocative geographic nomenclature, anticipate a poetical idea successful in later Spanish poetry (Unamuno, Machado, Lorca); at other times the poet gives clear shape to the things her eyes behold, re-creating them and vivifying them in a rich system of symbols.

Rosalía Castro is above all the poet of Galicia. In her are all the rebellion, the longings, the complaints, the historical consciousness and aspirations of this Spanish region. It was the Generation of '98—Unamuno, Azorín, Díez-Canedo, Juan Ramón Jiménez (qq.v.)—that revealed her to the rest of Spanish-speaking Spain. During her lifetime the Catalan and Provençal poets had translated and admired her, and the latter even invited her to preside over one of their celebrated Jocs Florals, an honor which the poet's modesty would not permit her to accept. Modern criticism sees in her much more than a forerunner of the metrical innovators of modernism; she is considered a real precursor of poets such as Rubén Darío, Gutiérrez Nájera, Amado Nervo, and Antonio Machado (q.v.). Federico García Lorca (q.v.) refers to her reverently in one of his Poemas gallegos. Her personality is beginning to be disassociated from such figures as Bécquer, Trueba, and Heine, with whom listless critical routine had too long connected her.

Her works in prose—two early novels, La hija del mar (1859) and Flavio (1861), the novel Ruinas (1864), and two exotic tales, El caballero de las botas azules (1867) and El primer loco (1881)—have suffered an unjust neglect. The shorter stories especially present with originality certain of the disconcerting problems found in the modern psychological novel. Her rhetoric, very typical of her period, is somewhat artificial. But a quality of fantasy and illusion, in the manner of Bécquer, suggests the tradition of the best Spanish romantic prose.

See: C. Barja, En torno al lirismo gallego del siglo XIX (1926), pp. 67-91; A. Cortina, "Rosalia Castro de Murguía," Humanidades (1930), pp. 161-193; R. Otero Pedrayo, Discurso de ingreso na Academia Galega (1931); S. Griswold Morley, "Preface," in Castro, Beside the River Sar (1937).

R. M. L.

Català, Victor (pseud. of Catalina Albert i Paradis, 1873-, Catalan novelist and short-story writer), was born in L'Escala. This little village, a picturesque fishing port, is surrounded by an imposing nature which harmonizes the beauties of the sea and the wildest mountains. The landscape of deep contrasts and the rough people of the district have exerted a marked influence on Victor Català's literary vocation. At first she took part in the poetic competitions which were held each year in Barcelona (Jocs Florals, developed from those celebrated in Toulouse and from those of the late Middle Ages in Barcelona), and although her poetic works did not pass unnoticed, the real field in which she triumphed was in the cultivation of the narrative genre. Her best works are in Drames rurals (1902; Rural Dramas), a series of stories or short novels in which she paints, with a marked predilection for the darker hues, different aspects of the simple folk of the country. Her pronounced realism exerted a great influence on a number of important later prose writers. There followed Caires Vius (1907), which showed that the literary manner of Victor Català was not a passing caprice or a literary pose, but was grounded in her thought and in her sensibility. The novel Solitud (1905; Solitude) was a great triumph; it was awarded the Fastenrath prize in the Jocs Florals and immediately translated into French, Spanish, Portuguese, English, German. The pattern of contrasts and the interplay of the most sublime and the most perverse instincts constitute the essence of this great realistic novel. La mare balena (The Mother Whale), a collection of stories, was followed by the three-volume work Un film (A Film).

The work of this Catalan novelist shows great daring not only in the choice of subjects but in the courageous manner of handling them. The new realistic view of life—and the startling fact that the author was a woman—disconcerted the public. But her literary boldness prevailed and a whole group of Catalan novelists followed in her footsteps, creating a type of rural novel with robust figures and rugged scenes full of grandeur. Prudenci Bertrana (q.v.) was one of her outstanding followers. Other writers exaggerated this wild depiction of the country scene, and for some years Catalan literature was marked by a novel thoroughly rustic in which the characters spoke in the manner of peasants (at times an attempt was made to obtain this effect by the facile recourse of vulgarisms). The devotees of ruralismo were legion, if not always distinguished. There has also been in some quarters vigorous resistance to this vogue, but in any event Victor Català gave a great lesson in sincerity. Whatever direction may be taken by the young Catalan novelist of recent years, her influence will make itself felt as an ardent and deep-felt message of literary integrity.

She has recently been living in retirement in her little village of L'Escala, in that silence which weighs upon all Catalan writers, unable to write in their language under the regime of General Franco.

See: T. Garcés, "Coversa amb Victor Català," Revista de Catalunya (Barcelona), 1926; A. Schmechberger, Conteurs catalans (1926).

F. de P.

Catalonian literature, after highly honorable achievements in the Middle Ages and especially in the 15th century, went through a long period of decadence—related to loss of political independence—and at the end of the 18th century Antoni de Capmany had declared the Catalan idiom "dead for the republic of letters." But precisely at this time was born Antoni Puig i Blanch (called Puigblanch, 1775-1842), now rightly considered the initiator of a revival (Renaixença) of Catalan writing which has had results reaching down to the present day. Two epic poems which he probably wrote between 1815 and 1820 seem to have circulated in manuscript among the students of the University of Cervera, with copies of a Gramàtica y apologia de la lengua cathalana, published in 1814 by another precursor, De Josep Pau Ballot (1747-1821). These documents deeply influenced contemporary youth.

In 1815 a student, Bonaventura Carles Aribau (1798–1862), was already writing his first poetry in Catalan; somewhat later, in 1833, was published Aribau's famous "Oda a la patria," solemn and noble, the theme of which is homesickness for the native land and melancholy recollections of her lost grandeur. With this poem a romanticism began in Catalan literature which was a first stage of the Renaixença. From 1833 to 1859 certain foreign influences were important (Scotch philosophy, the archaeological manner of Walter Scott, Manzoni, the German romantics), although the poet Joaquim Rubio i Ors (q.v.) proclaimed literary independence in the prologue of his book of verse, Lo gayter del Llobregat (1811). Catalan poetry was at that time marked by noble melancholy, profound idealism, and a restrained style which are the sources of its particular charm. These characteristics are especially apparent in the poems of Manuel Milá y Fontanals (q.v.) and of Josep Lluís Ponç i Gallarça (1823–1894).

Two important events then occurred, almost simultaneously. In 1858 the Majorcan Marian Aguiló (1825–1897) took up residence in Valencia, as the librarian of the university, and became a true apostle of rejuvenation through his faith in the unity and destiny of the Catalan-speaking countries. His enthusiasm stirred two energetic disciples, Vicente Wenceslao Querol (q.v.) and Teodor Llorente (1836–1911). Aguiló was in favor of a literature national to its very depths, removed from all foreign influence (it was to be neither classical nor romantic, as he said). Querol and Llorente laid the foundations of a real Valencian school, distinguished by the autochthonous character of its themes and the noble simplicity of its style. Querol, when he called his poetry "rimas catalanas," marked the literary unity of Catalonia, Valencia, the Balearic Islands. Aguiló exercised a parallel influence in his native country, where soon appeared a Majorcan school. Although there had been precursors in Valencia and in Majorca and the other Balearic Islands, it is indubitable that the great impulse which, in a common desire for revival, cemented all the countries of Catalan speech is to be traced to his crusading spirit.

In 1859 the Jocs Florals of Barcelona, which had been founded by a Catalan monarch of the 14th century, were reestablished. They represented a tendency to perpetuate, in fixed forms, the subject matter of a somewhat stylized medievalism. The enormous social influence they exerted is undeniable; their anachronistic pomp aroused the interest of "good society" in Catalan poetry. Most of the poets who began to write in the tradition of the Jocs Florals are forgotten. Victor Balaguer (1824–1901) is one of the exceptions. He was a fiery and declamatory poet, fond of Victor Hugo, enamored of Italy; he had been there at the time of the war for national unity, in which he saw an object lesson for the Catalan-speaking countries since, as he said, just as the Lombards, the Tuscans, etc., form the Italian nation, just so the Catalonians, the Valencians, the natives of the Balearic Islands, etc., form the patria lemosina.

The great figure of Catalan poetry of the 19th century, Jacint Verdaguer (q.v.), the son of humble peasants, was still, in many respects, a romantic. Rich Catalan nature held no secrets for him; he was thoroughly familiar with the names of herbs, birds, and minerals in all the dialects (Ampurdanian, Majorcan, Leridan, Valencian), since he made repeated excursions through this country. Mountains and rivers became living beings to him. His genial intuition gave him a feeling for primitive periods; it was as though he had lived in those times and known their heroes. His genius was predominantly epic in character. His two epics, La Atlàntida (1877) and Canigó (1885), have been translated into almost all of the literary languages of Europe and some of Asia; one of his charms consists of a highly personal style, characterized by an almost savage energy, which suggests admirably the primitive and barbarous character of the themes (the prehistoric epoch in L'Atlàntida, the 9th century in Canigó). Verdaguer, specifically with his Canigó, really sums up Catalan romanticism.

Although in this period there was developed the historical novel in the manner of Sir Walter Scott, by and large the only prose of that time which has really survived is in the humorous and costumbrista writings of Robert Robert (1840–1905), whose talent, at once tender and ironical, is reminiscent, though in a more subdued tone, of Dickens. The theatre, already somewhat developed by precursors, attained the dignity of true dramatic poetry in this romantic period with the dramas of Frederic Soler (Pitarra) (1839–1895).

Angel Guimerà (q.v.) sounds a new note. His tragedias add to Catalan literature—which already boasted, in Verdaguer, an epic genre of great span—another of the great literary genres, the tragic poem. Although by preference he looks for his themes in the Middle Ages, as did the romantics, he handles them in a realistic manner and in a very personal style, distinguished by a concision frequently approaching brutality. He seeks deliberately the unadorned substantive. His sentences are disorderly, hard, hesitating; they give, at times, the sensation of a mere rough draft, of something drawn with force but incomplete, like certain statues of Rodin. His prose drama Terra Baixa (1896), widely translated and produced (Eng. tr., Marta of the Lowlands, 1914), has been reverently presented by a proletarian wing of the theatre for its social message. In his Poesies (1887) he frequently treated macabre themes with a horrifying exactitude of detail.

Joan Maragall (q.v.), whose talent was a cultivated one, has become very popular in his country as the author of landscape poetry. He contemplates nature as would a good bourgeois on vacation, and in this is to be found the secret of his extensive success. At times he interwove philosophical ideas (particularly those of Nietzsche, q.v.) into his verse, especially in "Comte Arnau" which, according to the author's purpose, was to be the incarnation of the superman. This won him the admiration of Unamuno (q.v.), who was responsible for the renown that Maragall obtained in Castile and in the Hispanic-American countries. His "Cant espiritual" is very beautiful, a sort of realistic credo in which the author expresses his candid admiration for the universe as perceived by the senses and deplores the fact that death has to deprive us of them.

The seed sown by Marian Aguiló now bore fruit in the already mentioned Majorcan school, with its classical, Mediterranean style. Costa i Llobera (q.v.) is the Majorcan poet par excellence—circumspect, sober, devoid of sentimentalism, impeccable, strong, serene, and an admirer of Horace; even in meter he follows the models of antiquity. Another poet of great talent belonging to this school is Joan Alcover (q.v.), whose elegies, nobly moving, are a model in the genre. Along with Verdaguer and Guimerà, they are the Majorcan poets who again carried the Catalan language to literary heights.

The spirit of realism naturally favored the development of the novel. Narcís Oller (q.v.) is considered, more or less correctly, as a disciple of Zola (q.v.), who made him known in France. Among other initiators of Catalan realism are Josep Pin i Soler (1842–1927); Joaquim Ruyra (q.v.), author of short stories and short novels, whose delightful style won him the admiration of classic writers; Prudenci Bertrana (q.v.); and Victor Català (q.v.), whose novel Solitud (1905) is esteemed by the Catalonians as a masterpiece. New dramatic authors, notably Santiago Rusiñol (q.v.) and Ignasi Iglésies (q.v.), abandoned the verse drama and cultivated a type of prose comedy which enjoyed a great popular success. Exaggeration of realism even led to the belief that dramatic poetry had died, its place taken by a dialogued prose where the chief ambition was to reproduce, like a phonograph, the conversations of real life.

During this period the philologist Pompeu Fabra (1868–), since exiled in France, carried out his labors directed toward the fixation and purification of the Catalan language. His first grammatical studies appeared in the last quarter of the 19th century, his voluminous Gramàtica de la lengua catalana in 1913. His orthographic system was officially adopted by the Institut d'Estudis Catalans.

In 1914 the Spanish state granted a semblance of autonomy to Catalonia (considered in a strict geographical sense, without Valencia and the Balearic Islands), which was organized with the name Mancomunitat under the presidency of Enric Prat de la Riba (1870–1917). He showed himself to be a most devoted patron of Catalan culture, and with this official stimulus a new literary movement, headed by Eugenio D'Ors (q.v.), took over the directing role in the intellectual life of the country. But this movement, while characterized by an unflinching intellectual spirit and by a devastating criticism of realism and all that had preceded it, showed scorn of the national literature of the preceding century and at times an almost slavish admiration for certain foreign schools (in particular French symbolism, q.v.); as a result the literature of that moment had scarcely any roots in the national soil. On the other hand it was able to profit by the judicious reforms in the literary language which had been effected by Pompeu Fabra, although it is questionable whether what was gained in the direction of purity of language was a sufficient compensation for what was sacrificed in native genius. There was even a loss in a territorial sense, since the new literature, as distinguished from the former, tended to limit itself to a geographically circumscribed Catalonia.

A multitude of lyric poets then made their appearance, two of whom continue to be admired, Josep Carner (q.v.) and Carles Riba. Carner was the poet of the comfortable and elegant life of the bourgeoisie of the beautiful environs of Barcelona; he was likewise the poet of the coquettish modistes and pretty neighborhood girls. More recently an exile in Mexico, Carner is now the dean of Catalan literature. The Hellenist Riba, recently an exile in France, is above all an intellectual, a university man, often an impediment for his poetry; his Estances, however, is profound and subtle and continues to exert a great influence on the younger generation.

The reaction against the realistic prose theatre was carried out by Josep Maria de Sagarra (q.v.). He is the most original and at the same time the most popular of the writers of his period; his dramatic poems, of a highly nationalistic tone, enjoyed a noisy triumph on the stage. Unquestionably endowed with genius in his own way, he even undertook an epic poem, El Comte Arnau (1928), the first six cantos of which show an astounding vigor and simplicity; unfortunately the last four drag painfully. He has also written various novels, the impudent style of which is charming. The language of Sagarra, extremely rich in native idiom which lend it an inimitable flavor, attains this spontaneous beauty vainly sought in dictionaries and grammars.

Thousands of novels also appeared. The novelist Joan Puig i Ferreter, later an exile in France, introduced to his country the great Russian authors of the 19th century. His Camins de França, standing apart from all literary schools, is a collection of highly personal confessions.

In 1931 Catalonia, without Valencia and the Balearic Islands, was organized into an autonomous Generalitat; in 1939 it was invaded by Franco's army. Recent times have seen an implacable persecution of the national culture, which reached the point where aged writers were shot and depositories of Catalan books were burned. Such a brusque interruption in the literary history of the country has come about that one can rightfully consider the year 1939 as one of those dates which mark the end of a period. The present literary generation is condemned to silence in its own country; one can deduce something of the spirit that animates it from what is produced by that portion of the group which exiled itself voluntarily and is now in free countries. These look forward to another stirring revival of the national spirit, with unity for the Catalan-speaking countries.

See: Manuel de Montoliu, Manual d'his-

torica critica de la literatura catalana moderna (1922); Jean Jacques Achille Bertrand, La Littérature catalane contemporaine, 1833-1933 (1933).

J. S.

Cecchi, Emilio (1884-, Italian art critic, journalist, and essayist), began his literary career with the Florentine group of the Leonardo and the Voce, but revealed his real personality with the Ronda at Rome in the post-war period. He spent 17 years in acquiring that dexterity of expression for which he is now justly esteemed. During those years he wrote Kipling (1911) and Studi critici (1912). Like many Italians of his generation, he freed himself through the idealism of Croce and Gentile from the sumptuousness of D'Annunzio (qq.v.) and from a positivistic conception of life. But he was not a thinker or a man of action, and what remained after this philosophical house cleaning was a sensitive view of the world in delicate colors and a mind capable of examining the universe through a veil of sophisticated culture. Anglo-Saxon readers especially are likely to enjoy his humorous way of expression. He is in the main an essayist and some models of his studied prose can be found in certain modern English writers whom he admired and translated, such as Stevenson, Belloc, and Chesterton.

Since the publication of Pesci rossi (1920) revealed him to sophisticated readers, his typical modules have been articles which have served as magazine ornaments and for that characteristic Italian institution, the third page of a newspaper. Be it a criticism of modern or ancient art, a sketch of a street scene, a portrait of a writer, a moral situation, he likes to close himself within the limits of two or three thousand words, starting with a studied simplicity, then prancing around the reader like a Red Indian dancer with that enigmatic smile that makes one wonder if he intends to end with a laugh or with a scalping. This pose earned him the nickname of prankster from critics. His sentences are measured, rhythmical, and he alone knows how many long travels, how many readings, what protracted pipe smokes, went into the finding of a cadenza or a joke, an unexpected resemblance, or the reversal of a commonplace. He is not a spontaneous author but a great worker; and like every personality founded on sensibility, and not on ideas or on a faith, he is at his best when a change offers him new and exciting material which he knows how to absorb without being dominated by it. Editors were shrewd enough to offer him several opportunities to travel. Qualche Cosa (1931) is an account of a trip to Holland, Messico (1932), of a visit to Mexico, and Et in Arcadia ego . . . (1934), his impressions of Greece. He came twice to the United States, once as a professor in the summer school of the University of California at Berkeley, and went even to the Portuguese African colony of Mozambique. He has written only the first volume of a much discussed history of English literature, Storia della letteratura inglese nel secolo XIX (1915). His other books are collected pages or essays—La Giornata delle belle donne (1924), L'Osteria del cattivo tempo (1927), Corse al trotto (1936). To the great amazement of the professionals, he wrote many illuminating pages on old and on contemporary painters: Note d'arte a Valle Giulia (1911), La Pittura italiana dell' ottocento (1927), Pietro Lorenzetti (1930), Giotto (1937). From his pen has also come America amara (1939), which has had six printings; this is a collection of articles on the civilization of the United States, severe but fair.

Above all Cecchi loves his trade and feels for it an ascetic reverence. If he has a morality, it is the morality of form ("you can write in any manner, but not without a manner"); and he is not averse to a political order provided it guarantees the writer the intimate freedom of his room. Like a teacher of good penmanship, he is not interested so much in the meaning of the phrase as in the style. It is quite obvious that he likes to indulge in jokes, and many of his articles or essays were written only for the final jest in them or for some intermingled or recondite quip recounted with jaunty unconcern. Sometimes he pokes fun even at the job of writing, but not too much or his whole world would crumble in ruins about him.

See: A. Gargiulo, "Emilio Cecchi," Nuova Antologia, CCCXC (1937), 36-47; P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento, revised ed. (1939), pp. 192-197.

G. P.

Čech, Svatopluk (1846-1908, Czech poet and novelist), is usually contrasted with Vrchlický (q.v.) as the representative of a definitely nationalistic tradition in poetry. Actually, both in poetic technique and in the ideology of liberalism the two poets were similar, though Čech preached a highly spiritual Pan-Slavism and was far more strongly influenced by Russian romantic literature (Lermontov, Pushkin). Čech was born in Ostředek near Benešov (southeast of Prague), the son of a steward on an estate. He studied law and practiced it for a time, but soon devoted himself only to poetry and the editing of literary journals. Trips to the Caucasus and to Denmark were of importance in his formation. He died in Prague.

Čech's main field was epic poetry, though his talent was rather that of a rhetorical, meditative, and descriptive poet. His best work is in the fresco-like epical poems on themes from Czech history. Adamité (1873; The Adamites) depicts the most radical sect of the Hussites who flouted all social and sexual conventions; Žižka (1879) centers round the greatest warrior of the Hussites; Václav z Michalovic (1880), possibly his best poem, is drawn from the period of oppression after the Battle of the White Mountain (1620); and Dagmar (1883) tells the story of a Bohemian princess married to a Danish king in the Middle Ages (here the background is the conflict between Teuton and Slav). All these poems are filled with generous enthusiasm for a future of universal freedom and democracy and are written in magnificent, rather heavily decorative style. Čech's ideas are even better expressed in his artistically less successful allegories, Evropa (1878; Europe) and Slavie (1882), which present a discussion of communism versus democracy and of Pan-Slavism versus the conflict between the Slavic nations, the poet siding with slow progress and humanity. Čech was most successful in his own time with his political poems. Jitřní písňe (1887; Morning Songs) and especially Pisňe otroka (1895; The Songs of a Slave) are effective declamation pieces which under thin disguises attack Austrian rule and give voice to the poet's indignation against national and social oppression. A brief epical poem, Lešetínský kovář (1883; The Blacksmith of Lešetín), depicts in sharp colors the conflicts between the older homely tradesmen and the encroaching German capitalism.

But it would be a mistake to think of Čech merely as a historical and political poet. He wrote also several humorous and whimsical fairy tales in verse, agreeable and sentimental idyls of Czech country life (e.g., Ve stínu lípy, 1879, In the Shade of the Linden Tree), and a whole collection of poems (Modlitby k Neznámému, 1896; Prayers to the Unknown) which give expression to a high-minded agnosticism. His prose is less important: it includes many stories, sketches, travel books, two novels, and a very popular series of satirical utopian romances which describe the adventures of a Prague Philistine on the moon and in the 15th century (Výlet páně Broučkův do měsíce, 1886, The Excursion of Mr. Brouček to the Moon; Nový epochální výlet pana Broučka tentokrát do patnáctého století, 1888, A New Amazing Excursion of Mr. Brouček, This Time into the Fifteenth Century).

Čech was personally a shy and solitary romantic, who was saved from egoistic pessimism only by his political enthusiasms and his faith in the future victory of humanity and democracy. His ideas and his rhetorical pathos appealed to his contemporaries, who exalted him to the highest rank among Czech poets, but his influence has been on the wane since the advent of critical realism and symbolism.

See: V. Flajšhans, Svatopluk Čech (1906); F. Strejček, O Svatoopluku Čechovi (1908); Arne Novák, Svatopluk Čech; dílo a osobnost (2 vols., 1921–1923). There are German translations of Adamité, Dagmar, and Pisně otrocka.

R. W.

Cejador, Julio (1864–1927, Spanish scholar and critic), born in Saragossa, entered very young the Society of Jesus, which he left in 1900 to become a secular priest. While still a Jesuit, he studied in France and traveled in the Orient, amassing a considerable amount of erudition in Semitic and Indo-European languages, humanistic studies, and modern literatures. In 1914 he was appointed professor of Latin at the University of Madrid. A tremendous worker, he composed more than 50 large volumes on classical and modern philological matter, constantly engaged in polemics on linguistic and literary points, and never let his pen rest. He expounded certain extravagant theories on the unity of the origin of human languages and on the Basque origin of Castilian. His main contributions to the field of Spanish literature, probably the soundest part of his work, are studies on the language of Cervantes, collections of proverbs and traditional poetry, editions of the Arcipreste de Hita (Juan Ruiz), Quevedo, and others, and the Historia de la lengua y literatura castellana (14 vols., 1915–1922). A lack of critical balance and scientific spirit, a questionable literary taste, and the haste in which most of his books were produced invalidate to a great extent his work; it contains, nevertheless, a considerable mass of facts and useful data. He is also the author of novels and autobiographical books.

See: R. F. Giusti, Critica y polémica, IV (1930), 157–161.

A. del R.

Céline, Louis Ferdinand (pseud. of Louis Ferdinand Destouches, 1894–, French novelist), has lived a life like that of Bardamu and Ferdinand, the best known of his characters. Born in Paris, of obscure Breton stock, he took a medical degree and became a practicing physician in Paris. Many legends surround him. The known facts are that he has traveled widely in Africa and America and has worked as a ship's doctor, as a hand in a Detroit factory, as a research man for the Rockefeller Foundation. When his first novel was published, he was on the staff of a workingmen's clinic at Clichy, devoting himself, for little or no pay, to the ailing humanity which he reviles in his novels.

Opinions vary as to whether Céline's work has achieved more than a succès de scandale, yet even critics who dismiss him as a cheap pornographer admit that as expressions of absolute misanthropy his novels are monumental. The hero of Voyage au bout de la nuit (1932; Eng. tr., Journey to the End of Night, 1934) stumbles through a life of darkness from one human catastrophe to another. Despite occasional illuminations of decency, love, and human kindness, there is no light at the end. In Mort à crédit (1936; Eng. tr., Death on the Installment Plan, 1938) the hero (significantly his name is Ferdinand) witnesses the decomposition of everything he touches. Science, love, religion, stand revealed as cruel shams; in this darkness there is not even a glimmer. Céline's conclusion is that the race is divided between the maliciously evil and the insane.

Céline, like Gide (q.v.), had hoped that Russia would find a better way of life: a trip there (see Mea Culpa, 1937; Eng. tr., 1937) dispelled the hope. Thenceforward his only recourse was to fascism. Bagatelles pour un massacre (1938) is a wild diatribe against Jews, and Ecole des cadavres (1938) a hymn of hatred of the "degenerate" French. Céline's crude violence, his nihilistic style, the complete filthiness of his vocabulary, are coupled with a fierce sincerity. A plausible analysis would be that his personality, too sensitive to bear the spectacle of daily suffering in the hospital, finds relief in a literary rejection of the flesh which as a physician Céline feels powerless to heal.

See: L. Trotsky, "Novelist and Politician," Atlantic Monthly, CLVI (1935), 413–420; G. Truc, "L'Art et la passion de M. Ferdinand Céline," Revue hebdomadaire, Année XLVII (1938), Tome VII, pp. 550–565.

W. M. F.

Cena, Giovanni (1870–1917, Italian poet, novelist, and editor), was born at Montanaro Canavese in Piedmont. A kind heart plus sincerity are not sufficient to produce a writer —especially not a natural and simple one: this is what is learned from reading the works of this honest and well-intentioned soul who in the 90's cut something of a figure in Italian literature. The son of indigent parents, greatly oppressed by misery and maladies, he succeeded, by a rare and lucky stroke, in winning attention through a book of poems, Madre (1897), and later a social novel, Gli Ammonitori (1904; Eng. tr., The Forewarners, 1908). By this time he had become editor of the authoritative Italian magazine Nuova Antologia. Wishing to spare others the terrible sufferings of his youth, which had almost made him turn anarchist, he dedicated all his extra time to the education of the poor. He founded private schools for the children of peasants near Rome who had been left by their landowners and by the government in a state of permanent starvation, debasement, and ignorance and under the continuous threat of malaria. They won recognition for him among those who had kind hearts in Italy. These schools have been studied as pedagogical models and were responsible for some of the ideas adopted by Lombardo-Radice in the reform of the elementary school under Gentile.

In the verses of Cena are found, with very few exceptions, only ashes taken from other hearths, residues of other styles. There is nothing simple, nothing genuine, nothing artistically felt, nothing original. Even artificial stones which had fallen from the pasteboard crown of D'Annunzio (q.v.) reappear among his prose works. Gli Ammonitori was intended as an admonition to the upper classes of the dangerous social situation in the 80's; today it reads like a depressing mixture of dull autobiography and prosaic morality. Nothing better can be salvaged from his letters and critical reviews. In his times the work of Cena had a temporary significance, but it hardly survives an epoch (1880-1900) when social problems predominated.

See: A. Momigliano, Impressioni di un lettore contemporaneo (1928), pp. 66-72; G. Lombardo-Radice, Pedagogia di apostoli e di operai (1936), pp. 177-204.

G. P.

Čep, Jan (1902-, Czech novelist), is the most gifted among the Czech "ruralists." He was born the son of a poor peasant cottager in Myslechovice near Litovel (northern Moravia) and studied English and French at the University of Prague but without taking a degree. He became reader in a large publishing house and has done much translating, from Joseph Conrad, Bernanos (q.v.), Pourrat (q.v.), and others. Čep, unlike the other "ruralists," Josef Knap, František Křelina, and F. V. Kříž, is a highly spiritual person who struggles for religious certainty and peace. He depicts usually "the return of the native" who, broken by urban civilization, goes back to his rural home, to the soil, and finally to religion. Čep seems to have been influenced by the early work of Jaroslav Durych (q.v.), with whom he shared a sense of the value of the Catholic tradition. There is a strong individual tone, however, in his highly sensitive style—ranking with the best in modern Czech prose—in the magic of his lyrical metaphors, in the refined melancholy which broods over all his little sketches, stories, and fictitious diaries and journals. A certain monotony of themes and lack of invention have prevented Čep from reaching a wider public, but he is one of the most cultivated and genuine of recent Czech writers. His stories are collected as Zeměžluč (1931; Bitter Herb), Letnice (1932; Whitsuntide), Děravý plášť (1934; The Tattered Coat), and Modrá a zlatá (1938; Blue and Gold), and there is a fairly long novel, Hranice stínu (1935; The Boundary of the Shadow), as well as a shorter piece, Přibuzenstvo (1938; Relatives).

See: K. Sezima, "Jan Čep," in Mláď (1936).
R. W.

Cernuda, Luis (1904-, Spanish poet), was born in Seville. He studied law in the university of that city and then went to Madrid, where he lived some years. Later he served as an instructor in Spanish at the University of Toulouse. He was identified with the group of poets devoted to the cause of the Spanish republic during the civil war. More recently he has lived in England and has taught Spanish at the University of Glasgow.

His first verse is collected in Perfil del aire (1927), a volume that already shows the purity of his poetic vocation despite the occasional faltering note. Here is a poetry of true romantic lineage, of the purified romanticism personified by the poet Bécquer (q.v.). The romanticism of Cernuda is deeply felt and also at times reflective, intellectualized. In a second book, Donde habita el olvido (1935), his romantic spiritual life is refined to the point of attaining the finest and most delicate shades. Through a pure affinity of temperament, and not owing to any external cause, he leaves the zones of traditional Spanish romanticism and comes into contact with such romantic elements as are represented by Keats and Hölderlin. His world is one of pre-realities and phantoms peopling but not satisfying his solitude. In Cernuda the classic Spanish sentiment of solitude is repeated with the most modern subtleties and variations. Presentiment, reality, and forgetfulness confuse their limits in a poetic atmosphere which partakes of all three elements. This poetry materializes in verbal form perhaps the strongest immaterializing, spiritualizing force of contemporary Spanish lyric. The purity of his poetic vision is matched exactly by his language, which is light, elegant, and at times deliberately pale. One finds nothing heavy, dull, or abject in this poetry which, above all else, aspires to be essentially poetic.

La realidad y el deseo is the title he has given to the two editions of his complete works, the first of which was published in 1936 and the second in 1940. In the last part of his work the artist leans more toward concrete, exterior realities in time and space. Here his poetry seems to gain in force, in noble serenity and breadth. In London in 1943 was published Cernuda's Oknos, el affarero, a collection of prose poems which evoke places and moments of his life in Seville and which are excellent examples of the melancholy charm of nostalgia. During recent years journals have published some of his essays in the field of poetic criticism. Here Cernuda brings to bear the same high purpose and interpretative acumen that characterize his poetry.

See: P. Salinas, Literatura española siglo XX (1941), pp. 333-348.

P. S.

Chamson, André (1900-, French regional novelist and essayist), was born in Nîmes, Gard, of a family of peasant origin, and was brought up in the severe Protestant tradition of the Cévennes region, which forms the background and inspiration of his best work. He studied in the lycées of Alès and Montpellier, received his degree in history at the Sorbonne, and then took the full course at the Ecole des Chartes, in completion of which he wrote a thesis on the geography of his native region. From this point he has pursued a double career as a novelist and as a student of art, archaeology, geography, and history. Roux le bandit (1925; Eng. tr., Roux the Bandit, 1929), his first novel; Les Hommes de la route (1927; Eng. tr., The Road, 1929), his best-known work; Histoires de Tabusse (1928); and Le Crime des justes (1929; Eng. tr., The Crime of the Just, 1930)—all draw a vivid, somber picture of his native region. In Héritages (1932) he approaches a more complex world, and La Galère (1939) makes a sharp indictment of corrupt French politics. His political essays, L'Homme contre l'histoire (1927), La Révolution de Dix-neuf (1930) and Rien qu'un témoignage (1937), express the point of view of an "advanced democrat." Like so many French writers of the time, Chamson has devoted much attention to contemporary political problems and was associated with the left-wing Association des Ecrivains et Artistes Révolutionnaires. He has also held political posts. He was chief assistant in the Daladier cabinet in 1934 at the time of the February 6 riots and, being an ardent supporter of the Front Populaire, was made assistant curator of the National Museum at the Palace of Versailles under the Blum government, a post which he held until the fall of France. For three years (1935-1938), in association with Jean Guéhenno and Andrée Viollis, he edited the progressive weekly, Vendredi.

André Chamson must be numbered among the minor writers of the time, though his quality is authentic. He lacks the originality and color of Jean Giono (q.v.), the strength and passion of C. F. Ramuz (q.v.). Nevertheless his sober if uninspired style, his intimate knowledge and poetic understanding of the Cevenole peasantry and countryside, his feeling for the common people, joined to his comprehension of history and of contemporary political and social problems, have earned him a place among the novelists and essayists of the period whose work is strongly flavored by the primitivism of regions relatively untouched by modern life. With its note of revolt and heresy reflecting his people's historic struggle for freedom of conscience, his work is simple and austere. As a Protestant he carries on a valuable minority tradition in French literature.

See: Fritz Lehner, "André Chamson," Deutsch-französische Rundschau, Vol. III (1930); A. Rousseaux, Ames et visages du XXe siècle (1932); John Lehmann, New Writing in Europe (1940).

H. M. C.

Chapygin, Aleksei Pavlovich (1870-1937, Russian novelist and short-story writer), was born in a village in the former Government of Olonets and was apprenticed to an icon painter in St. Petersburg. His depressing early stories (1905-1910), dealing with the city poor, were collected in 1912 (Nelyudimye; The Misanthropes), when Chapygin had already turned to his native North, with its enduring traditions and mystic outlook. The primitive peasants of that region were then little known, and his Bely skit (1914; The White Hermitage) and Po zverinoi trope (1918; Along a Wild Animals' Trail) attracted attention. In the tales of the Soviet period, Chapygin shows the people he knew so well undergoing the impact of the new social forces. The candid account of his life in Zhizn moyá (1930; My Life) and Po tropam i dorogam (1931; Along the Trails and Roads) contributed to the understanding of his works by disclosing their decidedly autobiographical inspiration.

Meanwhile, in his historical novel Razin Stepan (3 vols., 1926–1927), a somewhat theatrical elaboration of his earlier manner, Chapygin had explored the minds of the 17th-century Muscovites, a task for which his life had eminently qualified him; and there is evidence of long study in the rich dialogue, as well as in the reinterpretation of Razin's role in accordance with Soviet ideology. Gulyashchiye lyudi (1936; Free Folk), a prologue as well as a sequel to Razin Stepan, also deals mainly with peasant uprisings, but is distinguished by a relative simplicity of language. Both novels combine epic sweep with minute detail, and, in spite of the brutalities described, they reveal the author's optimism and testify to his faith in the common people.

See: V. Dynnik, "A. Chapygin," in Pechat i revolyutsiya (1928), Book II, pp. 125–134; B. S. Walbe, Aleksei Pavlovich Chapygin (1938).
P. A. P.

Chardonne, Jacques (pseud. of Jacques Boutelleau, 1884–, French novelist), was born at Barbezieux, Charente, of a French father and an American mother. He received his early education at home from tutors and later attended school in Barbezieux. He was a sensitive and passionate child and early showed a leaning toward literature. However, he did not start on a literary career until he was 35. He has related the memories of the happy days of his childhood in two books of familiar essays, Le Bonheur de Barbezieux (1938) and Chronique privée (1940). At the age of 18 he went to Paris, where he attended the university and obtained a law degree. He was married in 1910 and in the same year became a member of the P. V. Stock publishing firm, which he long headed. In 1915 his health failed, and he was sent to Chardonne, a village near Vevey, Switzerland, to recover. It was during this convalescence of five years that he began his first book, a novel, L'Épithalame (1921; Eng. tr., Epithalamium, 1923). This novel concerns itself with the spiritual problems of married love. Only in marriage, thinks Chardonne, do men and women reveal the secrets of their hearts and show their full and complex personalities. He deals with the same theme in Eva (1930; Eng. tr., Eva; or, The Interrupted Diary, 1930) and Claire (1931) and in all his other works. His outstanding achievement is the cyclical novel, Les Destinées sentimentales (1934–1935), in which he presents not only the sentimental problems of husband and wife, but also a faithful picture of French family and business life and of French provincial society.

Chardonne ranks high among the French novelists of today for his fine portrayal of characters, for the restraint and beauty of his style, and for the moral worth of his message.

See: M. Martin du Gard, "Opinions et portraits: Jacques Chardonne," Nouvelles littéraires, December 5, 1931; A. Rousseaux, Ames et visages du XXe siècle (1936).
R. B.

Charon, see Linde, Otto zur.

Chartier, Emile (pseud. Alain, 1868–, French essayist and philosopher), is known as Chartier—just plain Chartier—to numberless generations of students in the lycées of Lorient, Rouen, and Henri IV in Paris, as well as to his fellow alumni of the Ecole Normale Supérieure. But to the general public he is the Alain of thousands and thousands of "Propos" which he contributed beginning in 1906, first to the Dépêche de Rouen (1906–1914), then to the Libres Propos (a weekly edited by himself, 1921–1924), the Revue des vivants, Revue européenne, Europe, Alsace française, Navire d'argent, Nouvelle Revue française, etc. The typical propos is a short, aphoristic piece of 50 or 60 lines, strewn with concrete or poetical images, pointing, like a fable or parable, to a practical lesson. Though the propos as a genre belongs to the art of the "columnist," Alain's essays constitute definitely superior journalism, and through them he enters the long line of French moralists who for centuries meted out to the reader pleasant and digestible pills of worldly wisdom. Roughly one fourth of these sketches were collected in volume form, sometimes under loose titles such as Les Cent et un Propos d'Alain (5 vols., 1908–1929), Les Propos d'Alain (2 vols., 1920), Propos sur l'esthétique (1923), Propos sur le christianisme (1924), Propos sur le bonheur (1925), Propos sur l'éducation (1932), Propos de littérature (1934), Propos de politique (1934), Propos d'économie (1935), sometimes under a more significant heading, indicative of a system. Thus a glance at the remainder of Alain's lengthy bibliography reveals his sustained interest in militant pacifism (Mars, ou la Guerre jugée, 1921, Eng. tr., Mars; or, The Truth about War, 1930, followed in 1939 by Convulsion de la force and Echec à la force); in democracy and politics (Eléments d'une doctrine radicale, 1925; Le Citoyen contre les pouvoirs, 1925); in aesthetics (Système des beaux-arts, 1920, completed by Vingt Leçons sur les beaux-arts, 1931; La Visite au musicien, 1927, and Entretiens chez le sculpteur, 1937); in psychology and philosophy proper (Quatre-vingt-un Chapitres sur l'esprit et les passions, 1915; Lettres au Docteur Mondor, 1924; Sentiments, passions et signes, 1926; Esquisses de l'homme, 1927; Entretiens au bord de la mer, 1931; Les Dieux, 1934; Les Saisons de l'esprit, 1937; Minerve, ou De la sagesse, 1939); in philosophical exegesis and literary criticism (Les Idées et les âges, 2 vols., 1927; Introduction aux Passions de l'âme de Descartes, 1928; Idées: Platon, Descartes, Hegel, 1932, reprinted in 1939 with an additional study on Auguste Comte; Stendhal, 1935; Avec Balzac, 1937; commentary, 1929, on Charmes by Paul Valéry, q.v., and another, 1936, on La Jeune Parque by the same author). In a class by themselves stand Histoire de mes pensées (1936) and Souvenirs de guerre (1937).

There is no mystery to the selection of Chartier's pen name. It was chosen in obvious remembrance of his 15th-century homonym, the famous poet, Alain Chartier. From one Norman to another, the greeting appears natural enough. One wonders, however, whether the medieval Alain, polished courtier and much traveled diplomat that he was, would have thought of writing: "I do not just happen to be from Normandy. I am Normandy itself." Such is Emile Chartier's boast—and a fair one indeed. Around Mortagne, his native town, among the hedgerows and the bushes, he found the old "Chouan" spirit still intact and took it as his own. It is an earthy spirit, intent upon real things, sober, unafraid, diffident. With Alain it becomes the "radical" spirit or the faculty, rooted in one's conscience, to resist power—outwardly if power is illegal, inwardly (with due physical obeisance) if power is legal, but to resist in both cases, for all power, according to Alain, is arbitrary in character, and it is of the essence of any power, political or not, to be "regal," to overreach itself, to corrupt and be corrupted. If democracy, for instance, commands his stout respect, it is not that democracy is good government—there are no good governments as such; it is because democracy devised the best means of curbing the excesses of government and setting up the citizen against the powers that be.

A fitting epigraph to Chartier's creed would be found in the sentence, "The minute we think, we should learn how not to die." To live, then, is to be awake. To be awake is to react. Acceptance of ready-made ideas means surrender. Total conformity means death. Is it at all surprising that youth responded to such a stirring call? In fact, Alain's prestige radiated far into academic and literary circles. He was revered and heeded by his disciples as few lycée professors have ever been. To be sure, a few older students, such as André Maurois and Henri Massis (qq.v.), were stimulated rather than deeply marked; but Jean Prévost (q.v.), some 15 years their junior, was fated to represent the Chartier tradition at its sturdiest. This gifted writer joined the French Forces of the Interior during the Second World War and perished in 1944 at the hands of the Germans, thus demonstrating in exemplary fashion that "resistance" in the Alain sense is something other—and something more—than "conscientious objection."

See: Jean Prévost, Albert Thibaudet, Ramon Fernandez, Jean Schlumberger, and Pierre Bost, "L'Œuvre d'Alain," Europe, XVI (1928), 129–152; Anonymous, Alain, professeur (1932); Denis Saurat, "Alain," Nouvelle Revue française, XXXIX (1932), 760–766.

J.-A. B.

Châteaubriant, Alphonse de (1877–, French novelist), was born in Rennes and, except for occasional visits to Paris, has spent most of his life at the Château de la Motte Saint-Sulpice in Vendée. A member of the country nobility, he approached literature with typical detachment and reserve and has preferred the studious and tranquil life of the province rather than the intellectual stimulation of the capital.

Châteaubriant was already 34 when, in 1911, his first novel, Monsieur des Lourdines (Eng. tr., The Keynote, 1912), was published. Here is related the moving story of an old country gentleman compelled to sell family estates to pay off debts contracted by a prodigal son, whose extravagances ruin his father's life and bring about his mother's death. Poetic language, subdued emotion, and an admirable plot at once revealed the author of this book as a writer of unusual talent. Unspoiled by success, Châteaubriant waited 12 years before offering the public his next novel, La Brière (1923; Eng. tr., The Peat-Cutters, 1927). This work sets forth a somber but powerful picture of the primitive life of the people of La Brière, a region of peat bogs situated in the most remote section of Brittany, near the mouth of the Loire. The writer has analyzed so convincingly the fears and superstitions of the Briérons and drawn such masterful descriptions of their drab and gloomy countryside that one soon has the impression of reading about people and places long familiar. In La Brière Châteaubriant's artistic temperament has found its most perfect expression. La Réponse du Seigneur (1933), the author's third novel in 22 years, is the story of a gentleman of the old school, a descendant of the Templars and the last of his family. In his fondness for moralizing, the hero preaches throughout the book a long sermon on the need of a close union of the human soul with the Divinity. This novel falls far below the standards which the author had set himself in Monsieur des Lourdines and La Brière.

Châteaubriant has produced two other notable books, La Meute (1927) and Au pays de Brière (1935). La Meute, a collection of six short stories, affords an excellent illustration of two divergent aspects of the author's personality. The first three stories contain character sketches of country gentlemen drawn with complete objectivity and detachment. The rest of the book is written in an entirely different spirit. The reader is taken into a world of poetry and dream, at times reminiscent of the atmosphere found in the plays of Maeterlinck (q.v.). Au pays de Brière is a series of notes describing the few months which the author had spent in La Brière years before. Written in an emotional and subjective style which contrasts strangely with the studiously sober and impersonal style of his previous work about the same region, it displays rare qualities of comprehension and sympathy and presents the country in a mellow and intensely poetic light.

No one would have expected Châteaubriant even temporarily to forsake literature for political propaganda. It is a cruel irony of fate that such a great artist, as the result of a trip to Germany, should have written in 1937 La Gerbe des forces (Nouvelle Allemagne), an ill-timed and unjudicious praise of National Socialism. In 1938 appeared Les Pas ont chanté, a novel based upon memories of Châteaubriant's childhood; this book lacks the originality and the interest that characterized his earlier works.

J. M. C.

Chekhov, Anton Pavlovich (1860–1904, Russian short-story writer and dramatist), the son of a small grocer, a former serf, was born in the little port of Taganrog, on the Sea of Azov. He had to work for the family from his early years, and the tuberculosis he contracted while a medical student at the University of Moscow may have been partly due to overexertion coupled with inadequate nutrition. Shortly after graduation, in 1884, he discovered that the stories he had been writing as a means of subsistence had come to mean more to him than the medical profession. He jestingly remarked that while he regarded medicine as his lawful wife, literature was his irresistible mistress. In 1886 the first collection of his comic tales was published in book form, and that date may be considered as the beginning of his complete dedication to literature. Within the 20 years of his writing activity he composed over a thousand stories, five full-length plays, and about half a dozen one-act plays. One interlude in his career deserves mention. In 1890 he journeyed to the convicts' settlement on Sakhalin Island, and the following year saw the publication of Sakhalin, the record of his visit there. Although his first play, Ivanov, was produced in 1887, his fame as a playwright came to him only at the end of the century, when the Moscow Art Theatre adopted Chekhov and built its own success on the masterly performances of his plays, beginning with Chaika (The Sea Gull) in 1898, following it with Dyadya Vanya (Uncle Vanya) in 1899, Tri sestry (The Three Sisters) in 1901, and ending with his swan song, Vishnyovy sad (The Cherry Orchard), shortly before his death. The Moscow Art Theatre meant much to Chekhov, in more than one way; in 1901 he married one of its most gifted actresses, Olga Knipper.

Chekhov's literary art is apparent in his short stories as much as in his plays; the latter must be seen on the stage to be fully appreciated. There is little action or external dramatism in any of his work, for Chekhov is mainly concerned with bringing out the inner experiences and reactions of his characters. Hence the effectiveness of his plays depends not on traditional acting but on the ability of the actors to live their parts with so deep a sincerity as to infect the audience with their subtly suggested moods and emotions. Chekhov's plays are justly defined as the theatre of mood or atmosphere. This definition might be applied to his stories as well. In most of them plot is reduced to a minimum, often there is no sharply discernible beginning or end, but one is made witness to a momentary yet unforgettable flash of life in its perpetual flow. What makes Chekhov's stories dramatic and what renders his plays enduring literature is the simple dialogue, free from verbosity and blatancy, in which everyday words are so skillfully chosen and placed as to convey the deepest emotion and tragedy. The curtain usually drops on such simple utterances as "If we could only know!" or "It does not matter" (The Three Sisters). In "Skuchnaya istoriya" (1889; A Dreary Story) the climax of the professor's tragic loneliness and futility is made to be felt in the words, "Let us have lunch, Kate," which he speaks in reply to her anguished question as to the meaning and purpose of life. In his life and in his work Chekhov detested the garish and loud. He observed the ordinary and commonplace, and he knew how to sift the significant from the vulgar and mean, how to bring it to light without using obvious italics. We come to understand, and therefore to like, most of Chekhov's characters, taken from all walks of life and representing Russia on the eve of the 1905 Revolution. His men are largely failures, weak of will and resolution, incapable of action, most often seeking an outlet in moaning and whimpering, in drinking and gambling, or in suicide. His women, as in the case of Turgenev (q.v.), are by comparison stronger and nobler and are kept going by an aptitude for dreams and aspirations. In all events, Chekhov endows his characters with such essential humanness that because of our kinship we feel unable to condemn them. Chekhov's medical training enabled him to diagnose men impartially and objectively, and his mortal malady raised him to a philosophical toleration of human frailties. This impartiality and tolerance he imparts to his readers. But another message is also suggested by this unpartisan artist indirectly—hatred for ugly conditions. By implication we are told not to condemn his miserable and stupid characters, since their faults are not inherent but conditioned by the environment. One sentence in a story by Chekhov became the revolutionary slogan of Russian society in 1904–1905: "One must not live such a life!" The Russian masses translated Chekhov's message dynamically: they destroyed the ugly conditions of life, they changed life itself.

Chekhov's work has been widely translated into English.

See: W. Gerhardi, Anton Chekhov (1923, in English); A. Derman, Tvorcheski portret Chekhova (1929); P. Kogan, A. P. Chekhov (1929); N. A. Toumanova, Anton Chekhov, the Voice of Twilight Russia (1937).

A. K.

Chiarelli, Luigi (1884–, Italian playwright), born at Trani, started his literary career as a journalist, but soon turned to the theatre. He became famous with La Maschera ed il volto, first presented at the Argentina Theatre in Rome on May 31, 1916. Previous plays, Vita intima (1909), Pasqua delle rose (1910), Astuzia (1910), La Portantina (1911), Extra Dry (1912), and Il Record (1913), had attracted little attention.

In La Maschera ed il volto, Chiarelli's chief merit lies in having presented a very ancient subject in a very new and extraordinary dress. A betrayed husband intent upon wreaking vengeance on an adulterous wife—in accordance with the traditional code—suddenly finds he cannot kill her. But he remains conventional enough to affirm that he has done so, and sending his wife out of the country, he stands trial. His acquittal is followed by a series of fantastic complications. A body is found and identified as his wife's, the wife returns to congratulate him on his acquittal, he is likely to go to jail for pleading guilty to a crime not committed, his own pride and his wife's pride become deeply involved. The pair finally take flight together, in the hope of dislodging themselves from an absurdly ritualistic world. Chiarelli is clever in his satire of social fetishes and offers an agreeably shocking amalgam of humorous and tragic incidents. The adjective "grotesque" was applied to the play by clamorous critics, and by many as a paradoxical compliment, and Chiarelli's name was permanently attached to the grotteschi movement in the Italian theatre for which the play is the point of departure.

Chiarelli himself continues with the formula in his subsequent plays. In La Scala di seta (1917), Chimere (1920), La Morte degli amanti (1921), Fuochi d'artificio (1923), and Jolly (1928), he aims again to show the fundamental conflict between appearance and reality, mask and face—but never again with quite the same success. The main action of La Scala di seta concerns the inherent antagonism between Roberto, imbued with an unswerving sense of honesty, and Désiré, a vain and silly dancer with extraordinary political ambitions. Désiré actually becomes minister, and then while glibly talking to a huge gathering of people about justice and liberty, instinctively breaks into a dance as the unthinking crowd applauds. Chimere shows an even more conscious striving for grotesque effects. The play is redeemed in part by the creation of a "truthful madman" whose cynical quips and caustic humor invest the otherwise trite scenes with a pseudo-philosophical tone. In La Morte degli amanti, the grotesqueness is supposed to reside in the fact that Eleonora, having conceived love as a romantic and fatal passion in the grand style, tries in vain to arouse her husband's jealousy.

Other plays of Chiarelli are: Le Lacrime e le stelle (1918), K-41 (1929), Carne bianca (1934), Una Più Due (1935), and Pulcinella (1939).

See: G. Ruberti, Storia del teatro contemporaneo, III (1928), 769-772; A. Tilgher, Studi sul teatro contemporaneo (1928), pp. 120, 129. P. P. M.

Chiesa, Francesco (1871-, Italian Swiss poet and novelist), whose works are entirely in Italian, was born at Sagno in the Ticino canton of Switzerland. A graduate of the University of Pavia in jurisprudence and for years director of the canton liceo of Lugano, he had his first verse published in 1897. His poetry, chiefly contained in the volumes La Cattedrale (1903), La Reggia (1904), Calliope (1907), and Consolazioni (1921), is that of a strict classicist and is much admired for its formal perfection, although it has been censured for a lack of any deep feeling. Chiesa is better known for his prose works. His novelle and stories, Istorie e favole (1913), Racconti puerili (1920), and Vite e miracoli di santi e profani (1922), established his reputation as a writer of prose. With his novels Tempo di marzo (1925), Villadorna (1928), and Racconti del mio orto (1929), he has gained a wide recognition for the creation of an original style, which is mobile, built of a constant play of psychological and moral analyses and of moments of lyricism more commonly found in poetry. These last works, in spite of their titles, are hardly novels at all. What they contain as plot has almost no outline, and their substance is rather a weave of successive psychological and moral experiences on the part of the protagonist. In Chiesa's narrative the event is almost always inward and spiritual. He deserves the recognition he has attained—the more so in that his style is strikingly unique in Italian prose. It has qualities more commonly found in French, for example in Anatole France (q.v.), though in this respect there is no visible trace of imitation.

See: E. Cecchi, Studi critici (1912); A. Momigliano, Impressioni di un lettore contemporaneo (1928).

C. S. S.

Chirikov, Yevgeni Nikolayevich (1864-1932, Russian dramatist and journalist), was born in Kazan into the local gentry. In his youth he served several jail sentences for political activity. He studied jurisprudence and medicine at the University of Kazan and in 1887 was expelled for participating in student disturbances and exiled to the provinces. He began his literary career in 1885 and by 1894 had become a regular contributor to the well-known God's World and Russkoye bogatstvo (Russian Wealth). In 1903 he joined Gorky's (q.v.)

Knowledge group. After the Revolution of 1917 Chirikov emigrated abroad, where he joined the anti-Soviet camp of Russian intelligentsia.

In such stories as Invalidy (1897; The Invalids) and Chuzhestrantsy (1899; Foreigners) Chirikov portrays life in provincial Russia and the struggle between the supporters of the Populist ideology and the Marxists. Chirikov's better-known dramas include Yevrei (1905; The Jews), Koldunya (1909; The Witch), Lesnyie tainy (1911; Forest Mysteries), and Tsar Prirody (1910; Tsar of Nature), which were popular in Russia in the early 20th century.

See: A. Derman, "E. N. Chirikov," in S. A. Vengerov, ed., Russkaya literatura XX veka, II (1914), 75-89.

O. M.

Cicognani, Bruno (1879-, Italian novelist), was born in Florence, the son of a magistrate. His mother, Giulia Nencioni, was the sister of Enrico Nencioni, who was a friend of Carducci (q.v.) and himself a writer of distinction. It may be said that Cicognani has inherited the gifts of both parents; he has been a magistrate in his native city for years and has managed at the same time to write several books of great merit. His first work, La Crittogama, was published in 1909; the date is noteworthy as showing that even at that age he found time for literary composition though he was not a professional writer. The work itself is of no particular importance. The volumes Sei Storielle (1917), Gente di conoscenza (1918), and Il Figurinaio (1920) are of a very different nature. In these the writer's literary skill and gift for psychological analysis are already well developed; his personality has taken shape and, especially in the pages of Il Figurinaio, he reveals himself as a true artist and a man of definite individuality. Cicognani at this period was a good deal of a naturalist in his taste for sharp realism, strong phraseology, and rather sordid subjects. Yet even here one is conscious of the two sides of his nature: he is a combination of the keen, scientific, even remorseless student and of the sincerely religious and warm-hearted human being. In La Valia (1923), certainly one of the best novels about the modern generation, these qualities are beautifully blended, though the choice of subject is again a little repugnant and the book leaves a somewhat bitter taste in the mouth. In Villa Beatrice (1932) is found the same strength and the same humanity, with the humanity being the predominant strain. The novel is no less convincing than La Valia.

for all that; in this study of a frigid woman Cicognani unites all the apparatus of modern realism with an emotional and religious understanding. Both of these books reveal also another characteristic of the author, his robust campanilismo (localism): he is a Florentine and every square, every alley, every corner of his native town is real and dear to him—and, it might be added, every conceivable Florentine type. This element is probably the basis of both the realism and the feeling in his art; it may be said to be the essence of the man. As Cicognani has become older he has grown away from fiction and devoted himself to painstaking and charming descriptions of the Florence of his childhood and youth. Such books as L'Omino che à spento i fochi (1937) and L'Età favolosa are rare in any language; perhaps in some ways they may be compared to Anatole France's (q.v.) re-evocations of his boyhood, but they have a Florentine sharpness and color of their own. Cicognani's Tuscan style is impeccable; he has all the virtues of the traditional Tuscan writers without any of the affectations of some of his contemporary fellow townsmen. His language is precise, yet full of warmth, smooth and graceful, yet sturdy and unpretentious. An Italian critic, Moscardelli, has well said of Cicognani that he is not a writer by profession; he is a writer davvero (by authentic instinct).

See: N. Moscardelli, Anime e corpi (1932), pp. 217–224; P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1934), pp. 43–53; A. Rommel, Bruno Cicognani, der Mensch und der Künstler (1938).

T. G. B.

Clarín, see Alas, Leopoldo.

Claudé, Paul (1868–, French poet, dramatist, and essayist), born in the village of Villeneuve-sur-Fère en Tardenois, on the fringe of the old province of Champagne, was the son of a middle-class official and the descendant of a peasant family. He was a brilliant pupil of the Lycée Louis-le-Grand in Paris, where he acquired an excellent knowledge of classical literatures and of philosophy. He soon revolted against his education which he considered pagan and sterile; he rediscovered Catholicism on Christmas night, 1886, in the cathedral of Notre-Dame in Paris and has been ever since an ardent mystic and believer. In 1898 he passed the examination for the French diplomatic service. He was a visitor in the symbolist cénacles, but never shared the bookish worship of literature as divorced from life which was then typical of many men of letters. He admired Mallarmé, Verlaine (on whom he wrote a long poem in 1922), and, above all, Rimbaud (qq.v.) whom, paradoxically enough, he revered as his religious as well as his literary master. From 1893 to 1934 he lived mostly far from France, first as consul in the United States, China, Germany, and Italy, then as minister in Rio de Janeiro and as ambassador in Tokyo, Washington, and Brussels. His career as a traveler in distant lands increased his conspicuous originality. Since his retirement he has lived in the country, in the province of Dauphiné, and has devoted much of his time to prose writings of a religious character.

Claudé is very widely cultured; he is conversant with Greek and Latin sacred and profane writers, with the Bible, with English poetry, and has displayed a penetrating insight into Dante (Ode jubilaire, 1921, on the 600th anniversary of Dante's death), Spain of the 16th century (Le Soulier de satin, 1929), the soul of Japan (L'Oiseau noir dans le soleil levant, 1927) and that of China (Connaissance de l'est, 1900). This last work, a fine series of poems in prose, introduces us to a deeply significant kind of exotic literature. The sources of Claudé's inspiration, however, are not primarily literary, but religious. To his robust and mystical Catholic faith, the world appears as instinct with divine presence and as a harmonious whole singing the glory of God. The task of the poet is to echo that music and to interpret that divine order. Claudé's impersonal and cosmic lyricism sings the beauty of creation, now with impassioned rhetoric and magnificent imagery, now with the tender humility of a naïve prayer. Instead of the traditional alexandrine line, in which his inspiration has always felt cramped, Claudé has substituted a varied rhythm reminiscent of biblical verse. His most ambitious and probably his greatest lyrical poetry is to be found in Cinq Grandes Odes (1910) and in Cette Heure qui est entre le printemps et l'été (1913; reprinted as La Cantate à trois voix, 1931). Two other volumes, Corona Benignitatis Anni Dei (1914) and La Messe là-bas (1919), also contain moving lyrics of a more humble and familiar character.

Claudé's powerful and synthetizing genius was naturally attracted by the dramatic form, in which his creative imagination, his architectonic gifts, and his profound sense of the inner conflict in man, torn between matter and spirit, were to find full play. Some of his dramas suffer from a formless lack of discipline or from an excessive and monotonous abstraction, such as La Ville (1890), Le Repos du sep- tième jour (1901), and Le Livre de Christophe Colomb (1930). L'Otage (1910) is a well-built tragedy on a purely human plane, but too rigorous in its harsh logic. Two early dramas, Tête d'or (1889) and L'Echange (1893), the second of which has an imaginary American setting, contain brilliant flashes of strange lyricism and passages of sublime beauty. Claudel's two masterpieces, which rank among the few masterpieces of world drama since Shakespeare and Racine, are L'Annonce faite à Marie (1910, originally written as La Jeune Fille Violaine) and Partage de midi (1906, privately printed), a burning drama of human passion which ends in a hymn of divine love.

Claudel is no less admired as an essayist and as a prose writer. Besides a treatise of abstruse and unorthodox metaphysics, Art poétique (1906), and a subtle volume of unconventional sociological discussions, Conversations dans le Loir-et-Cher (1937), he has written some illuminating views on poetry and aesthetics in Positions et propositions (1928-1934) and beautiful religious, poetical, and humorous meditations in several periodicals (Nouvelle Revue française, Mesures) and in Figures et paraboles (1936). His French translation (1896-1920) of the Aeschylean trilogy of the Oresteia and his numerous commentaries on the Scriptures bear witness to the versatility and originality of a strange genius, one of the greatest in contemporary French literature. Many of Claudel's works have been translated into English.

See: J. de Tonquédec, L'Œuvre de Claudel (1917); E. Sainte-Marie Perrin, Introduction à l'œuvre de Claudel (1926); J. Madaule, Le Génie de Paul Claudel (1933) and Le Drame de Paul Claudel (1936).

H. P.

Claussen, Sophus (1865-1931, Danish poet, novelist, and journalist), was born on the island of Langeland, the son of a peasant farmer who rose to be a member of the Danish House of Representatives and served valiantly as such for 30 years. He received classical schooling in Copenhagen. After a sojourn of many years in France and Italy he returned in 1911 to Denmark.

Claussen, probably the most esoteric poet of the Danish school of symbolism and neo-romanticism, was deeply influenced by Baudelaire (q.v.). He crusaded against conventions, clothed his ideas frequently in paradoxes as well as in symbolism. His most original results were achieved in his poems. Pilefløter (1899; Willow Flutes) contains the little masterpiece "Røg" (Smoke), which draws upon the modern industrial world—the symbols (rails, smoke) shifting and re-forming repeatedly. During the next 25 years Claussen put forth some 10 collections of poems. Various thoughts recur again and again: Pan is thus at times the young creative genius, newly sprung from the earth, with whom the poet identifies himself, or Pan is the great generating spirit of nature. Claussen has a neo-romantic conception of the poet's calling; through intuition the poet divines beforehand what science later works out laboriously. The paradoxical "Atomernes Oprør" (The Revolt of the Atoms) constitutes a solemn warning against world dissension. Claussen's Eros is usually a Don Juan in quest of the ideal, but one who definitely extracts honey out of each situation. The writer's style is capricious, perhaps most perfectly so in the lyrical prelude Frk. Regnveir (1894; Miss Rainy Weather). The essays, Løvetandsfnug (1918; Dandelion Down), Foraarstaler (1927; Spring Discourses), give clear, invaluable information on the trends of the times and on Claussen's own aesthetic theories, e.g., his conviction that art, science, and religion represent parallel efforts to express the inconceivable, the true, the eternal. The author's novels, inlaid with lyrical travel descriptions and sprightly adventures generally in France and Spain, are less important than the poems and the essays.

See: H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Literature from Brandes to Our Day (1929); Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934).

C. K. B.

Clemenceau, Georges (1841-1929, French statesman), born in Mouilleron-en-Pareds, Vendée, deserves a place in literature not only under the heading of parliamentary eloquence or political journalism (his articles at the time of the Dreyfus affair were collected in no less than seven volumes), but on account of other wide literary interests and almost limitless capacities. He wrote essays and short stories (La Mêlée sociale, 1895; Le Grand Pan, 1896; Au fil des jours, 1900; Aux embuscades de la vie, 1903; Figures de Vendée, 1903); tried his hand at the novel (Les Plus Forts, 1898; Eng. tr., The Strongest, 1919) and the drama (Le Voile du bonheur, with incidental music by Gabriel Fauré, 1901; Eng. tr., The Veil of Happiness, 1920); turned biographer (Démophile, 1926; Eng. tr., 1926) and art critic (Claude Monet: Les Nymphéas, 1928; Eng. tr., Claude Monet: The Water Lilies, 1930); assessed in somber and sarcastic tones the disappointing results of a decade of "peace" (Grandeurs et misères d'une victoire, 1930; Eng. tr., Grandeur and Misery of Victory, 1930); and left a huge philosophical testament entitled Au soir de la pensée (2 vols., 1927; Eng. tr., In the Evening of My Thought, 2 vols., 1929). Faithfully reminiscent of his intellectual dawn, Clemenceau's twilight is that of a 19th-century positivist who found it possible in theory as well as in practice to reconcile pessimistic materialism with humanitarian ideals.

See: Gustave Geffroy, Georges Clemenceau; sa vie, son œuvre (1919); Jean-Albert Bédé, "Paris et Clemenceau," Renaissance, I (1943), 391-406; Geoffrey Bruun, Clemenceau (1943).
J.-A. B.

Cocteau, Jean (1891-, French poet, dramatist, and novelist), absorbed at a tender age the earlier teachings of André Gide (q.v.) and has ever since been "pursuing his own youth." Every conceivable mood or mixture of moods colored in turn this fervent quest. On many occasions there stands revealed a tormented Cocteau almost tragically aware of human weakness, groping for certainty, afraid of love, afraid of life, afraid of death. Le Potomak, a fantastic medley of cartoons, prose, and verse composed in 1913 and published in 1919 ("definitive" ed., 1924), was an exploration of the subconscious, attended by gloomy forebodings. The haven of religion tempted him for a while but, after having secured the good offices of that experienced savior of souls, Jacques Maritain (q.v.; see Lettre à Jacques Maritain and the latter's Réponse à Jean Cocteau, 1926), the neophyte flippantly recanted and thumbed his nose at his spiritual director. "Artificial paradises" offered him no better escape (see Opium: Journal d'une désintoxication, 1930; Eng. tr., Opium: The Diary of an Addict, 1932). Thus fortune had it that, despite Cocteau's low critical opinion of his youthful indiscretion, he did ultimately revert to the inspiration of Le Potomak (La Fin du Potomak, 1940).

More readily remembered, however, will be the sophisticated and exuberant Cocteau, the Prince Charming who, especially in his prime, so captured the fancy of Parisians that they felt powerless to resent his conceit and eccentricities. He became the astute magician and purveyor of his own publicity, whose tricks were legion, whether he permitted an exclusive night club to use the name of one of his works (Le Bœuf sur le toit) or decided, one fine morning, to refurbish Jules Verne's old Tour du monde en 80 jours and translate it into action (see Mon Premier Voyage, 1937; Eng. tr., Round the World Again in Eighty Days, 1937). He became, too, the incomparable promoter of new styles and new fashions, whose word in matters of taste was almost law as he sponsored with equal ease the painting of Pablo Picasso and Giorgio de Chirico, Igor Stravinsky and the Ballet Russe, the music of Erik Satie and the "Groupe des Six" (Georges Auric, Louis Durey, Arthur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, Francis Poulenc, Germaine Tailleferre), the first appearances of American jazz, the clown act of the Fratellini brothers, the motion pictures of Charles Chaplin. The story of Cocteau's own modernistic ballets (e.g., Parade, score by Erik Satie and scenery by Picasso, 1917; Le Bœuf sur le toit, ou The Nothing Happens Bar, score by Darius Milhaud, 1920; Les Mariés de la Tour Eiffel, score by the entire "Groupe des Six," 1921) and later of his theatre, is one of gradual progress and ultimate triumph built on a sure knowledge of how and how far the "strong honey" of novelty may be made palatable to the general public. In this Cocteau was helped immeasurably by the fact that he himself is a product of the bourgeoisie bourgeoise. This prodigal son of a wealthy notary, born in Maisons-Laffitte, a prosperous community near Paris, conceals within his nimble mind an ample provision of atavistic shrewdness or even conservatism. It is significant, for instance, that on aesthetic grounds he should call for "order through anarchy" and label himself a "member of the classical left."

The definite pattern of Cocteau's arabesques emerges clearly from his poems (Poésie 1916-1923, 1924; Opéra, œuvres poétiques 1925-1927, 1927; Mythologie, 1934; Allégories, 1941) and his critical essays (e.g., Le Rappel à l'ordre, 1926, Eng. tr., A Call to Order, 1926; Essai de critique indirecte, 1932). Often enough he is ranged with the "literary cubists," that is to say, with a group of writers who, mostly through direct acquaintance, underwent the influence of Pablo Picasso. They transfer to literature that painter's contempt of traditional rhetorics, of perspective, of anthropomorphic reality. By treating language as he does his "cubes" they achieve a deformation of speech whereby certain elements ordinarily associated are dissociated, or vice versa. The result is a new, synthetic image suddenly flashed on the screen of the poet's consciousness. Admittedly this image may turn out to be little more than a play on words. At best, however, it is counted upon to shock its creator into a brief mystical trance, thus affording him a glimpse of Beauty asleep in the "meadows of inner silence."

This art poétique was substantially that of Max Jacob, André Salmon, and Guillaume Apollinaire (qq.v.), all three Cocteau's elders in point of age and performance, all three authentic bohemians and far less hampered than he by artificial constrictions. Cocteau's not inconsiderable role will have been, in the last analysis, to exploit their ideas on a grand scale. Taking a leaf from Baudelaire (q.v.), he conceives of all art as poetry and of verse as but one of the wires through which the mysterious "fluid" may pass. Thus he will call his criticism "poésie critique" and his ballets "poésie chorégraphique." Except for Portraits-Souvenir 1900-1914 (1935), references to his "poésie autobiographique" have been made above. The "poésie de roman" includes Thomas l'imposteur and Le Grand Ecart (both 1923; Eng. tr., Thomas the Impostor and The Grand Ecart, both 1925) and Les Enfants terribles (1929; Eng. tr., Enfants terribles, 1930), a novel of troubled adolescence which many consider Cocteau's masterpiece. The "poésie de théâtre" boasts modernistic adaptations of Sophocles, Shakespeare, and, most recently, Tasso (Antigone, with scenery by Picasso and Renaissance costumes by Jean Hugo, 1922; Roméo et Juliette, 1924; Œdipe-Roi, 1928, unperformed; Renaud et Armide, 1943), as well as an original, one-act tragedy, Orphée (1926; Eng. tr., 1933). It includes such diversified subjects as La Voix humaine (1930), a one-character playlet consisting exclusively of a telephone conversation; La Machine infernale (1934; Eng. tr., The Infernal Machine, 1936); Les Chevaliers de la Table Ronde (1937); Les Parents terribles (1938); Les Monstres sacrés (1940); La Machine à écrire (1941; dates given for Cocteau's plays are those of first performance). Finally, Cocteau's "poésie cinématographique" (Le Sang d'un Poète, 1933; Tristan et Iseult, after 1940; Eternel Retour, 1944), together with his "poésie graphique" (Dessins, 1923; Vingt-cinq Dessins d'un dormeur, 1928; Soixante Dessins pour "Les Enfants terribles," 1934), completes the extraordinary picture of an extremely versatile artist.

See: Pierre Dominique, Quatre Hommes entre vingt: Montherlant, Morand, Cocteau, Drieu La Rochelle (1924); Marcel Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933), pp. 290-308 and passim; Edith Sitwell, A Poet's Notebook (1943), passim; Claude Mauriac, Jean Cocteau, ou la Vérité du mensonge (1945).

J.-A. B.

Coelho, José Francisco de Trindade, see Trindade Coelho.

Colette, Sidonie Gabrielle (pseud. Colette Willy, 1873-, French novelist), born at Saint-Sauveur-en-Puisaye in Burgundy, was raised in the country and developed a keen understanding of it and a profound love of nature. After her marriage to Henry Gauthier-Villars, a music critic, she lived in Paris among artists and newspapermen. For six years after 1906, the date of her divorce, she acted as a music-hall dancer and mime. A second marriage, to Henri de Jouvenel, brought her back to the literary world, where she rapidly established herself as a distinguished novelist and newspaperwoman.

Her work is essentially subjective. A reflection of her childhood and of her first years of marriage can be found in the Claudine series, Claudine à l'école (1900), Claudine à Paris (1901), Claudine en ménage (1902), Claudine s'en va (1903), which she wrote in collaboration with her husband and signed with his penname, Willy. This collaboration stopped in 1904, and from 1904 to 1916 Mme Colette published under the name Colette Willy her remarkable Dialogues de bêtes (1904), followed by Sept Dialogues de bêtes (1905), and several of her most famous books, La Retraite sentimentale (1907), Les Vrilles de la vigne (1908), L'Ingénue libertine (1909; a reprint of two novels, Minne and Les Egarements de Minne, published with Willy's signature in 1904 and 1905). Three volumes were inspired by her life in the music hall, La Vagabonde (1910), L'Envers du music-hall (1913), L'Entrave (1913). From 1916 (La Paix chez les bêtes) to 1921 Mme Colette signed "Colette (Colette Willy)," and from 1921 on simply "Colette." This latest period marks the climax of her career. La Fin de Chéri (1926) provided a pathetic ending to Chéri (1920). In La Maison de Claudine (1923) and in Sido (1929) Colette draws a delightfully candid picture of her childhood. In Mes Apprentissages (1936) she recalls her life with Willy and the début of her literary career. La Naissance du jour (1928), La Seconde (1929), Duo (1934), Bella Vista (1937), Chambre d'hôtel (1940), Julie de Carneilhan (1941), and Le Képi (1943) are among her latest productions.

The world of Mme Colette is the world of the senses. Her characters follow their instincts with a sort of fatalistic resignation. They are slaves of their impulses, and having no spiritual interests to support them, they drift along in helpless loneliness. These sad specimens of humanity are presented by Colette with a subtle psychological insight and in a style which is unanimously praised for its originality and its power of suggestion. Her descriptions and understanding of animals and nature are unequaled in French contemporary literature, and Mme Colette will always remain one of the greatest stylists of her time.

See: Fernand Keller and André Lautier, Colette; son œuvre (1923); Paul Reboux, Colette, ou le Génie du style (1925); Jean Larnac, Colette; sa vie, son œuvre (1927); Claude Chauvière, Colette (1931).

M. E. C.

Collett, Camilla (1813–1895, Norwegian author and feminist), was born in Kristiansand. As the sister of the poet Henrik Wergeland, she belonged to a highly gifted family and was herself possessed of rare beauty, wit, and charm. In 1841 she married Professor Jonas Collett, who died in 1851, but whose influence on her career was very important. He encouraged her to write and sympathized fully with what became the leading purpose of her life—the emancipation of women. At that time no opportunities for education or paying work were open to women, and they were moreover bound by the most rigid conventions of “womanliness.” It was the violence done their emotional life that seemed to Camilla Collett to lie at the heart of the problem, and this was the subject of her first book, Amtmandens døtre (1855; The Governor’s Daughters). It was not only the first cry of feminism but the first modern novel in Norway, and, though imperfect in construction, was so vibrant with noble indignation that it has retained its vitality to this day. It was followed by short stories, sketches, and recollections of her parental home. From 1872 Camilla Collett devoted her authorship entirely to the cause of women. Her most original contribution was Fra de stummes leir (1877; From the Camp of the Silent), a series of trenchant reviews in which she essayed to show how a degraded conception of women pervaded all literature, from books intended for bread-and-butter misses to the works of Byron, Goethe, and Dumas fils. Even Ibsen (q.v.) came in for castigation. In his early heroines, notably Solveig in Peer Gynt, she saw the incarnation of a sorry old feminine ideal which she called on Ibsen to destroy rather than exalt. Jonas Lie (q.v.), almost alone, won her approval for his self-reliant heroines. Camilla Collett was a personal friend of the Ibsens, and the change in Ibsen’s portrayal of women has been traced in part to her influence. Jonas Lie was also indebted to her.

See: A. Collett, Camilla Colletts livs historie (1911); I. Grøndahl and O. Raknes, Chapters in Norwegian Literature (1923).

H. A. L.

Coloma y Roldán, Luis (1851–1914, Spanish novelist), born in Jerez de la Frontera, in the province of Cádiz in southern Spain, studied law in the University of Seville and then entered the Company of Jesus in 1873.

Padre Coloma occupies a minor position in the group of so-called Spanish naturalists who modified the excesses of French naturalism (q.v.) by putting it more in tune with Spanish realistic feeling. His literary production is limited to two novels, a series of stories, and some historical writing. His principal work is the novel Pequeñeces (1890), a satire of the aristocracy of Madrid during the period of the restoration of the house of Bourbon. This novel enjoyed an immediate but not enduring success; the author shows skill in a colorful portrayal of society, but the characters are overdrawn and the language too subject to foreign influences. The other novel is Boy (1910). Coloma’s writings of a historical nature include Retratos de antaño (1895) and Jeromin (1905–1907).

See: José A. Balseiro, Novelistas españoles modernos (1933).

E. G. L.

Comisso, Giovanni (1895–, Italian novelist), was born in Treviso. He fought in the battle for Fiume on the side of Gabriele D’Annunzio (q.v.). In Al vento dell’Adriatico (1928), he describes his adventures at Fiume and reveals in his literary style strong traces of D’Annunzian sensualism. After the First World War, Comisso went to sea, sailed the Mediterranean, and visited many ports along the Adriatic; in Gente di mare (1929) he tells of these experiences. The book is noteworthy for its pungent style and the author’s delicate sensitivity to the objects that attract him. In Comisso’s writings there is hardly a trace of plot. What strikes the reader is the intense, impressionistic, but somewhat adolescent curiosity of the author concerning the world about him.

See: Pietro Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1931), pp. 237–242.

P. M. R.

Conrad, Michael Georg (1846–1927, German critic, novelist, and editor), was born in Gnodstadt in Franconia. After studying philology, he taught in German schools in Geneva and, for five years, in Naples. His writings during this period were devoted to political and pedagogical subjects and to Freemasonry. In 1876 he gave up his teaching career for one of journalism and literature. Leaving Italy, he went to Paris where he became personally acquainted with Zola (q.v.), whose literary activities he discussed in a series of journalistic articles published in German papers, thus becoming with Oskar Welten a pioneer theorist of German naturalism (q.v.). His best critical essays were published in this period: "Der Grossmeister des Naturalismus" in Parisiana (1880); "Zola und Daudet" in Französische Charakterköpfe (1881); "Kritische Zola-Studien" in Madame Lutetia (1883). In these articles Conrad, with characteristic enthusiasm, portrays Zola as a courageous and idealistic moralist, a creative novelist of the first rank, and an incisive and fearless critic and defends his scientific and aesthetic theories against the bitter attacks directed against him by contemporary German criticism. Conrad returned to Munich in 1882 and in 1885 founded the first of the naturalistic journals, Die Gesellschaft, which gave the growing literary radicalism a rallying point; he gathered around him the various elements of the naturalistic group. With the rise of the Berlin Freie Bühne Conrad's influence declined. Two later critical and autobiographical works are important for an understanding of the naturalistic period in Germany, Von Emile Zola bis Gerhart Hauptmann (1902) and Emile Zola (1905).

Conrad's activity as novelist—extending from his early stories Lutetias Töchter (1883) and Totentanz der Liebe (1884) through a novel of Munich life, Was die Isar rauscht (1887), to a fantastic novel of the future, In purpurner Finsternis (1895), and a story of the Bavarian king Ludwig II, Majestät (1902)—was of lesser importance in the development of modern German literature. In his later career Conrad sat one term in the Reichstag as deputy for the Demokratische Volkspartei (1893).

See: O. Stauf von der March, Michael Georg Conrad (1925).

W. H. R.

Conradi, Hermann (1862–1890, German poet and novelist), of middle-class parentage, grew up a delicate, sensitive child whose ill-health deepened his bookish interests and morbid introspection. By 1880 his poems and critical essays were already appearing in newspapers.

His acquaintance with Heinrich and Julius Hart (q.v.), whose Kritische Waffengänge (1882–1884) gave a critical account of contemporary German literature, was fruitful for his own literary development. In 1884 he settled in Berlin, one of the new literary centers, and soon was writing feverishly. With Wilhelm Arent, who financed the venture and signed as editor, and Karl Henckell (1864–1929), whose extended productivity (poems of nature, love, social injustice) is preserved in five volumes of Gesammelte Werke (1923), Conradi published an anthology of contemporary lyric poetry, Moderne Dichter-Charaktere (1885). In his introduction he castigated the trivial, shallow, and conventional poetry of the day and expressed the need for a modern literature with new form and new content. He envisaged another era "of great souls and deep feelings." In Conradi's remaining years there were published in quick succession a volume of stories, Brutalitäten (1886); a collection of lyrics, perhaps his best work, Lieder eines Sünders (1887); two pathological novels of the "Übergangsmensch," Phrasen (1887) and Adam Mensch (1889); and his psychological evaluation of the age, Wilhelm II. und die junge Generation (1889).

An early death cut short a career that gave promise of greater achievement. Conradi was potentially among the most talented of his generation, but left nothing of lasting value. In his work are indications of a deeper understanding of the problems of his age and of a more serious striving for an artistic ideal than he is usually credited with, but his general immaturity and his exaggerated style are fatal limitations. Feeling deeply, but unstable and constantly in conflict with himself and the world, he is perhaps the most articulate representative of his group; intoxicated with his own importance, rebellious and indignant yet inextricably bound to the past, opposed to naturalism (see German naturalism) but reflecting many of its characteristics, he saw the conflict and confusion of the times and longed for a vaguely felt but never clearly expressed ideal. He sensed the tragic futility of his unhappy, tempestuous life and characterized himself as "a son of his age, but not its savior" who "like a meteor is lost in the night."

See: P. Ssymank, "Leben Hermann Conradi," in Conradi, Gesammelte Schriften, ed. by P. Ssymank and G. W. Peters, I (1911), xix–ccliv; V. B. Kellett, "Hermann Conradi; a Study and Interpretation of the Uebergangsmensch" (unpublished dissertation, Univ. of Michigan, 1943).

W. A. R.

Conscience, Hendrik (1812–1883, Flemish novelist), was born in Antwerp. His significance for his native Flanders is not to be measured by literary standards alone, since his work has also political and moral implications.

The son of a minor Napoleonic official, who had come from France to help in the construction of the French invasion fleet, and of a Flemish mother, Conscience became the herald of a renewed national Flemish feeling in Belgium. While Flemish as a language was officially neglected in a centralized Belgium that had finally attained independence, his romantic masterpiece De Leeuw van Vlaanderen (1838; Eng. tr., The Lion of Flanders, 1855–1857), dealing with the defeat of the French aristocratic army by the Flemish municipal militias at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in 1302, gave his readers the realization of their former cultural greatness and of their democratic achievements through the ages. All his life he was to be the national hero and the symbol of Flemish intellectual rebirth. It was said of him that "he taught his people to read." He indeed provided them with a great number of historical novels in the tradition of Sir Walter Scott. In these books the dripping sentimentality is nearly always compensated for by a clever and impressive handling of mass movements. His descriptions of battles and of isolated encounters live up to the best models of contemporary fellow romanticists. His psychological analysis is weak, and the pictures of his heroes, and especially his heroines, are schematic and unsatisfactory. They are painted in the traditional black-or-white formula, but this deficiency endeared them all the more to less demanding country readers. With all its defects—faults in the construction as well as consistent weaknesses in the expression—De Leeuw van Vlaanderen became a romantic classic, not only in Belgium but in many other countries.

Among the more than a hundred volumes he wrote, many are devoted to pictures of rural felicity. Conscience was an ardent lover of nature, a sentimental botanist. To him the country and its most minute details were the symbols of God's goodness and greatness. It inspired him to a continued gratefulness. The melancholy landscape of the Kempen, north and east of Antwerp, provided the themes for a number of charming and idyllic short novels: De Loteling (1850; Eng. tr., The Conscript, 1864), Rikke-Tikke-Tak (1851; Eng. tr., Ricketicketack, 1856), Baes Gansendonck (Boss Gansendonck). A sincere idealist, he had no fault to find with the peasant folk and their rustic simplicity. He was more critical, although still in a mild fashion, when dealing with provincial town life. He castigated the parvenus in Siska van Rosemael (1844; Siska of Rosemael) and objected to the adventurers of his day who left the good old country for San Francisco in 1849. The hero of Het Goudland (1854; The Land of Gold) is an exemplary failure.

Conscience wanted to be a moral writer and prided himself upon the fact that by his writings "he never made a maiden blush." It can be added that neither did he ever bore them, which is an even greater achievement. He dealt but little with the social problems of his days. Although he was conscious of their importance, they did not push him to revolt. He was always a conciliatory and charming figure and enjoyed an enormous popularity. His works were translated into many languages, including, in addition to those already mentioned, the following English and American titles: Sketches from Flemish Life (1840); The Progress of a Painter (1852); The Good Mother (1852); Tales of Flemish Life (1854); Tales of Old Flanders (1855); Tales and Romances (6 vols., 1855–1857); The Poor Gentleman (1856); The Miser (1856); Tales (6 vols., 1857); The Headman's Son (1861); The Village Innkeeper (1867); The Happiness of Being Rich (1869); Tales (5 vols., 1889); Popular Tales (6 vols., 1902–1906).

Victor Hugo and Dumas père praised him highly. In the original Flemish his books suffer from a lack of linguistic sensibility and from an overabundance of Gallicisms which he never completely overcame.

See: Emmanuel de Bom, Hendrik Conscience (1912); Anton Jacob, Briefwisseling van, met en over Hendrik Conscience (2 vols., 1913–1922); Eugén de Bock, H. Conscience en de Opkomst van de Vlaamsche Romantiek (1919).

J.-A. G.

Copeau, Jacques (1879–, French theatrical producer and critic), was born and educated in Paris. He spent a year in Denmark, managed a factory in the Ardennes, and sold modern paintings in a Paris gallery before discovering his vocation. As drama critic for the Ermitage (1904–1906) and the Grande Revue (1907–1910) he wrote severe, prophetic articles, collected in Critiques d'un autre temps (1923). One of the founders and original editors, in 1909, of the Nouvelle Revue française he later became the editor in chief of that periodical (1912-1914).

In 1911 the staging of his adaptation of Dostoevski's (q.v.) The Brothers Karamazov at the Théâtre des Arts of Jacques Rouché brought him into contact with Dullin (q.v.), who with Jouvet (q.v.) was to second and to continue his revitalization of the French theatre. In the autumn of 1913 he opened the doors of the Théâtre du Vieux Colombier, in the street of the same name in Paris, with a brilliant company of young actors whom he had been training in the countryside. This repertory theatre, animated by a youthful enthusiasm and a disgust for the bombast and conventions of the commercial theatres, inaugurated a new era of simplicity and sincerity. With a more imaginative sense of the theatre than Antoine (q.v.) and a more consistent taste than Lugné-Poe (q.v.), Copeau effected a revolution, turning the French stage definitively away from the realistic reproduction of life and the confusion of the arts to an authentically poetic interpretation of life. During the first season (1913-1914) a broad repertory, extending from Molière and Shakespeare to Jules Renard (q.v.) and Paul Claudel (q.v.), from Musset and Henry Becque (q.v.) to plays by the young Ghéon, Roger Martin du Gard, and Schlumberger (qq.v.), taught Parisian audiences how varied and exciting an "art theatre" could be. In less than a year Copeau had created a community of dramatic workers that can be compared only to Stanislavsky's Moscow Art Theatre. But the war interrupted his effort to create "a refuge for future talent." Fortunately, however, the American financier Otto Kahn and the French government enabled his well-trained company to play in French at the Garrick Theatre in New York (1917-1919), where they set an example for such American groups as the Theatre Guild. Returning to Paris in 1920, the Vieux Colombier enriched its repertory with such important creations as Cromedeyre-le-Vieil by Jules Romain, Le Plaisir du hasard by René Benjamin, Saül by André Gide, and Le Paquebot Tenacity by Charles Vildrac (qq.v.). In October, 1920, Copeau realized his ideal of establishing a school for the study of all aspects of the dramatic art. The loss of Dullin in 1919 and of Jouvet in 1922, who left to found their own theatres, and Copeau's increasing absorption in his school, while impoverishing the Théâtre du Vieux Colombier itself, only served to spread its influence. Copeau had accomplished his task, for the seed had taken root; and when the theatre closed in 1924 he took a small and young group back to the country

"to start all over again from the beginning."

Through his own work and through his disciples Copeau has continued to infuse new life into the French theatre, and most of the groups of the 20's and 30's can be traced directly to him. Named one of the four metteurs en scène of the Comédie Française in 1936, he became director of that official theatre in 1940. He occupies a place among such outstanding artists of the modern theatre as Adolphe Appia, Gordon Craig, Max Reinhardt, and Constantin Stanislavsky.

See: W. Frank, The Art of the Vieux-Colombier (1918); Copeau, Souvenirs du Vieux-Colombier (1931); R. Brasillach, Animateurs de théâtre (1936).

J. O'B.

Coppée, François (1842-1908, French poet, playwright, and novelist), was born in Paris, the son of a modest official at the Ministry of War; he could not afford to complete his university studies and himself found employment in the same ministry. He remained there until he was appointed assistant librarian of the Senate (Palais du Luxembourg), two years later becoming archivist of the Théâtre Français. In the meanwhile he had succeeded, thanks to Mendès (q.v.), in joining the group of young poets called Parnassians. His election to the French Academy in 1884 allowed him to live, with his mother and sister, on the income from his writings. He had had a great disappointment in love, the aristocratic mother of a young Scandinavian girl having considered the match a mésalliance. His philosophy was for a number of years that of an agnostic; a severe illness brought him back to the creed of his younger years. The history of this conversion is related in the preface to La bonne souffrance (1898). When Coppée joined the ranks of the anti-Dreyfusards, there resulted a painful estrangement from many of his old friends.

Coppée is known in France chiefly as a poet. He contributed to the successive issues of Le Parnasse contemporain (1866, 1869, 1877), but, while he may well be regarded as a Parnassian so far as the metrical form of his poetry is concerned, the epithet does not fit his philosophy. Far from being "impassible" he is, on the contrary, sentimental. Pity for the suffering poor is the fundamental theme of all that came from his pen. This is borne out by the very titles of his works—Intimités (1868), Les Humbles (1872), Deux Douleurs (one-act drama, 1870), Contes tout simples (1894). He carried the sentimental note into his Contes en vers, which were very popular at the time

(e.g., "La Grève des forgerons," "Le Petit Epicier de Montmartre"). He also left several volumes of Contes en prose, for which he was, during many years, better known in the United States than for his poetry.

He had achieved sudden fame in 1869 when the Odéon theatre staged a little one-act play in verse, Le Passant, the two characters of which (Zanetto and Sylvie) were enacted by the two most applauded French actresses of the day, Mme Sarah Bernhardt and Mme Agard. He wrote other one-act plays, Le Luthier de Crémone (1876) and Le Pater (1876—a drama of the days of the Commune, which had been suppressed by the censor), as well as two great political dramas, Severo Torelli (1883) in five acts and Pour la couronne (1895) in three acts. This last was received with great acclaim.

Since his death Coppée's prestige has greatly diminished. His sympathy for the underprivileged has been termed insincere, and his style has sounded bombastic to the cynics of a later generation. Yet, while such a critic as Lalou has not a good word to say of him and speaks of his "detestable sentimental simplicity," Zola (q.v.) praises him for having raised the banner of "naturalism in poetry." That Coppée was accepted as a great writer in his day is beyond a doubt, and it seems improbable that the harsh judgments of more recent critics will be regarded as final by posterity.

See: M. de Lescure, François Coppée; l'homme, la vie et l'œuvre (1889); L. Le Meur, La Vie et l'œuvre de François Coppée (1932).

A. Sz.

Corazzini, Sergio (1887–1907, Italian poet), was born in Rome. He died there of tuberculosis at the age of 20 after a brief period of precocious literary activity from 1904 to 1907. He belongs to that group of "twilight" writers (i crepuscolari) which included his friends Aldo Palazzeschi, Marino Moretti, and Fausto Maria Martini (qq.v.).

Corazzini's first poetry shows especially the influence of D'Annunzio's (q.v.) Poema paradisiaco, of Pascoli (q.v.), and of the French symbolists (see French symbolism). His interest, like Pascoli's, is centered upon the humble things of everyday existence; for Corazzini they are symbols of a monotonous suffering, the visible silence that is the reality of every day and in view of which he rebels against the grandiose passionate world of poets like D'Annunzio. Corazzini's earliest lyrics express this suffering in a tone of bewilderment and childlike simplicity, as in "Dolore" in Le Dolcezza (1904), and "A Carlo Simoneschi" in L'Amaro Calice (1905). In his later poems, Libro per la sera della domenica (1906), this sadness becomes ironic. Sometimes his emotion loses contact with any specific situation, and the poet's suffering dominates what is otherwise a spiritual void. The abstract emotions Melancholy, Hope, and Despair are the actors; the scene is the poet's state of mind. This poetry, unrheterical in intent and technique, draws its dramatic force from a paradox. Abandoning hope as illusory, the poet finds life meaningless. As suffering is futile, so is the expression of it. Hence the poet should become indifferent, an attitude which would actually render self-expression unnecessary. Thus, aware of his spiritual exhaustion and impotency and not capable of a total indifference, Corazzini turns his irony against himself. Some critics consider Corazzini's poetry as the final expression of the decadence present in the works of D'Annunzio and Pascoli. For others he forms part of that literary twilight after the sun of D'Annunzio has set. It cannot be denied, however, that his state of mind is not merely personal but had meaning and reality for many of his generation; it is echoed by many and finally receives a comprehensive treatment in the poetry of Gozzano (q.v.).

See: G. Cuchetti, Un Antesignano dei crepuscolari (1929); C. Pellizzi, La Letteratura del nostro secolo (1929), pp. 314–316; W. Binni, La Poetica del decadentismo italiano (1936), pp. 127, 131, 139.

S. C. P.

Corbière, Tristan (pseud. of Edouard Joachim Corbière, 1845–1875, French poet), was born at Coat-Congar in Brittany. His father, the son of a naval officer, served in the navy, founded several short-lived newspapers, and wrote many books before marrying, at 50, a girl of 18 and becoming the director of the Morlaix branch of a Le Havre steamship company. Young Corbière attended school at Saint-Brieuc and Nantes. At 16, his health seriously impaired, he returned to Morlaix, afterward settling at Roscoff. It was there that, except for a three months' sojourn in Italy, a short trip to Palestine, and less than four years in Paris, he spent the rest of his life. He died before reaching his 30th year.

The fate of Corbière has been a curious one. A central figure in modern French poetry, he has been called the successor to Villon, the brother of Verlaine (q.v.), the predecessor of Laforgue (q.v.), yet Les Amours jaunes (1873) remained virtually unknown until Verlaine devoted to it a chapter of his book Les Poètes maudits (1884).

Corbière's poetry takes its place between the romantics and Baudelaire (q.v.). The romantics, contemporary with the rise of industrialism, often made of poetry an escape and, Corbière thought, created a fictitious nature. Corbière did not like Hugo at all. His poetry was in direct opposition to the great romantic's gentle, poetic melancholy in Les Contemplations. A startlingly sardonic note rings through his work. He caricatures the rhetorics of romanticism and the set romantic feelings. Corbière's sailors are realistic and alive, never shadowy, artificial heroes like Hugo's.

Baudelaire, aware of the unreality of the work of the romantic school, had turned to introspection. His reaction against the anti-intellectualism of the romantics had led to an abuse of the intellect. Here too, in Corbière's opinion, there was a loss of contact with the outside world. Corbière tried to counteract both tendencies by a genuine return to nature, by going back to the simple primary emotions, by contact with unspoiled sensibility. In reasserting the importance of the life of instinct common to all men, he tried to restore man's confidence in man, to give its proper place to something that was in danger of being denied. His attachment to instinct, the earth, and the sea is an expression of his belief in human nature.

Corbière's poetry may be viewed as a plea for the integrity of man. He believed that the experiences arising out of the changing world were real, as were the old unchanging impulses and needs. If the new feelings are to be seen in their true perspective, he argued, they must be treated as modifications of the great primary emotions and related to them.

See: Paul Verlaine, Les Poètes maudits (1884); Rémy de Gourmont, Le Livre des masques (1896); René Martineau, Tristan Corbière (1925); Alexandre Arnoux, Une Ame et pas de violon, Tristan Corbière (1929).

P. B.

Coromines, Pere (1870–1939, Catalan prose writer), a refugee in America, was the first Catalan author to die here after the exodus of 1939. In his last impressions, written in France and Argentina, Coromines saw in the Catalan dispersion something similar to that of the Hebrews; from that fact comes the title of his posthumous notes, unfinished and issued fragmentarily by the publishing branch of the journal Catalunya of Buenos Aires, Diari de la Diàspora (Diary of the Diaspora). He was born in Barcelona to a family from Ampurias; in that city he obtained his secondary education and pursued studies in law. From his university years date his first contacts with the common people whom he would have liked to inculcate with his theories, a combination of romantic anarchism and an almost mystic goodness. A misunderstanding of his motives brought upon him a death sentence from which he escaped almost miraculously. Upon leaving the fortress of Montjuic, where he had been imprisoned, he produced his first book, Les presons imaginàries (1899; The Imaginary Prisons), the title of which was an indication of the author's idealism. The earnest desire for goodness which constituted the guiding star of his whole life was proclaimed in 1911 with the publication of his Vida austera (Austere Life), a work which won him the acclaim of critics, a kind of "modern effort in the search for saintliness."

Pere Coromines also played an active role in politics; he was one of the founders of the old Esquerra catalana (Catalonian Left), an organ of Catalanism; his journalistic campaigns, carried on through the medium of Poble Català (Catalonian People), are a model of enthusiasm—and not exempt from grave errors in political tact. After many years of a resulting ostracism, during which he dedicated himself to practicing law and to his literary tasks, he returned to active political life with the establishment of the republic in 1931. He was one of those who drew up the statute of autonomy of his country and among the first consejeros that the government of Catalonia had. All of his work is stamped with a deep Catalan spirit, and even in the philosophic themes he attains a popular tone always in good taste. In addition to the works already mentioned, the following, from an extensive list, should be noted: Les hores d'amor serenes (1912; The Serene Hours of Love); Les gràcies de l'Empordà (1919; The Graces of Empordà); Cartes d'un visionari (1921; Letters of a Visionary); Estudi sobre el pensament filòsofic dels jueus espanyols a l'Edat Mitjana (1921; Studies concerning the Philosophical Thought of the Spanish Jews in the Middle Ages); A recés dels Tamariu (1925; In the Shadow of the Tamarind Tree); a trilogy, En Tomàs de Bajalta—Silén (1925), Pigmalió (1928), and Prometeu (1934); Interpretació del vuit-cents català (1937; Interpretation of the Catalan Penny). Under the title El perfecte dandi (The Perfect Dandy), which is the title of the first story in the book, the journal Catalunya of Buenos Aires issued in 1940, after his death, some of Coromines's unpublished writings. He belonged to the Institut d'Estudis Catalans, the most important cultural institution of Catalonia, and was head of the scientific section. Some of his works have been translated into French, Italian, and Spanish. In his last essays, left in manuscript in Buenos Aires, one feels the deep homesickness that was oppressing him, offset only by the unshakable faith in the resurrection of his country.

See: "Advertiment," in Coromines, El perfecte dandi; J. Pous i Pagès, "Pere Coromines i el seu temps," Revista de Catalunya (Barcelona), No. 97, March, 1940.

J. M. M. i V.

Corradini, Enrico (1865-1931, Italian playwright, novelist, and founder of Italian nationalism), was born at Samminiello, near Montelupo, in the province of Florence. After graduation from the Royal Institute of Advanced Studies of Florence he began a literary career, attracted by the rising glory of D'Annunzio (q.v.). In 1892 Corradini founded a literary review entitled Germinal, by means of which he sought to contribute to the efforts that were being made to renovate Italian culture. At first he did not meet with success as a literary journalist and was forced to teach in order to earn a livelihood. Dissatisfied with his teaching, Corradini soon attempted to form a new literary group, larger and more vigorous than the preceding one. The attempt was successful through a combination of fortunate circumstances: the intelligent liberality of his father, the audacity of a young publisher, the unselfishness and courage of the group, and, most of all, the sympathy and support given by D'Annunzio. As he was more inclined toward journalism than the others, Corradini became the director of the review, which, founded in 1896, took the name of the Marzocco. Indefatigable and conscientious in his efforts to assure the success of the new enterprise, Corradini never received any compensation for his work as director. Adopting as its motto multa renascentur, the Marzocco sought to reaffirm the lasting values of the spirit and culture of Tuscany. The unprecedented success of the Marzocco gave Corradini the opportunity to train himself in criticism and to develop a robust, sincere, and personal style which later became a permanent characteristic of all his political writings.

Corradini's early critical studies of literature and the theatre evince his desire to lead the Italian theatre back to bourgeois models and more especially to those set up by Ibsen and Maeterlinck (qq.v.). His dramatic short story Dopo la morte (1894), on which D'Annunzio based his Gioconda, shows the author's desire to portray strong emotional conflicts. In his novels Santamaura (1896), La Gioia (1897), and La Verginità (1898) and even in his dramatic composition La Leonessa (1899), Corradini shows the influence of D'Annunzio, but more in form than in spirit. His power to portray characters with deep dramatic significance may best be studied in the plays Giulio Cesare (1902; Eng. tr., 1929) and Carlotta Corday (1908). In Giulio Cesare, considered the best of his literary works because of its style and depth of thought, the author presented the hero of Rome as a character of intrinsic value in the history of Italy.

Important as is the place of Corradini in Italian literature and criticism, in the life of his country he occupies a much more significant position as the founder and leader of the Italian nationalist movement which, in November, 1903, resulted in the establishment of the review Regno. With its vigorous nationalist program the Regno soon attracted several promising young men, including Giovanni Papini, Giuseppe Prezzolini, and Giuseppe Antonio Borgese (qq.v.). The articles Corradini published during this period are collected in two volumes, La Vita nazionale (1907) and L'Ombra della vita (1908). In February, 1905, Corradini abandoned the Regno, but several years later resumed expounding his nationalist ideas in the Idea nazionale, a review established in 1911 under his directorship.

In addition to two patriotic novels, La Patria lontana (1910) and La Guerra lontana (1911), in which the author dealt with problems of political importance, Corradini also wrote during this period works in support of Italy's expansionistic program. A synthesis of his political philosophy is contained in L'Unità e la potenza delle nazioni (1922) and Discorsi politici (1923). Of interest too are his Diario postbellico (1924) and Fascismo vita d'Italia (1925). In his Riforma politica d'Europa (1929) Corradini developed a "biological theory" of the state and individual. A revised edition of Giulio Cesare appeared in 1926. He also wrote a new theatrical piece, L'aurea leggenda di Madonna Chigi (1931), which enjoyed much success on the stage.

See: P. L. Occhini, Enrico Corradini; scrittore e nazionalista (1914) and Enrico Corradini e la coscienza nazionale (1915); U. d'Andrea, I Precursori: Enrico Corradini (1928); C. Pavoni, Enrico Corradini nel giornalismo e nella vita nazionale (1930).

H. R. M.

Correia de Oliveira, António (1879–, Portuguese poet), was born in São Pedro do Sul, Beira, lived there until he was 19 years of age, and then moved to Lisbon, where he tried to follow a career in journalism—without great success. His friendship with the distinguished orator António Cândido brought him, along with a government post in the capital, opportunity to devote himself almost entirely to the writing of poetry. He has been very productive.

In his first works especially (Ladainha, 1897, Lamentation; Auto do fim do dia, 1900, Auto of the Day's End; Alívio dos tristes, 1901, Relief for the Sad; Cantigas, 1902, Couplets; Raiz, 1903, Root; Ara, 1904, Altar), one can perceive clearly the popular inspiration of his work. Tentações de S. Frei Gil (1907; Temptations of S. Frei Gil), Cravos (1910; Carnations), and the collections A minha terra (1915–1917; My Native Land) and Nossa pátria (1920; Our Country) have a certain freshness of language and a quality of simple emotion which have impressed many readers. Although he comes within the realm of Parnassianism and symbolism, nevertheless in some of his later works the rhetorical influence of Eugénio de Castro and Guerra Junqueiro (qq.v.) is very apparent. It is in this dualism, which at times assumes an extremely decadent appearance and at others is characterized by a too naïve folklorism, that one finds the reason for the divergent evaluations of his literary work. On the one hand is a middle-class preference for couplets and ballads which he has improved upon and returned to the common treasure of the people, on the other hand the aversion and scorn felt by the more modernistic literati. Traditionalism, popular religiosity, regionalism, and even a certain pedagogical morality and patriotism of primary school type are probably not—except to a great and authentic poetic talent, such as Correia de Oliveira does not possess—the best sources of inspiration for poetry today.

In 1937 he visited Brazil, where he was received with academic honors, the greatest respect and admiration, and the overflowing affection of the Portuguese colony of Rio de Janeiro. A result of this visit was the publication of Pátria vossa (1938; Your Country), poems full of fervor for that republic. In 1940 História pequenina de Portugal gigante (A Little History of Gigantic Portugal) was added to the author's series of patriotic exhortations for children.

See: M. A. Vaz de Carvalho, Cerebros e

corações (1903); A. da Veiga Simões, A nova geração (1911).

R. M. L.

Cossío, José María de (ca. 1895–, Spanish critic), is a reader of taste and a lover of poetry, rather than a professional writer. He has for many years spent much of his time in the province of Santander, alternating between long hours of reading in the Biblioteca de Menéndez y Pelayo (see Menéndez y Pelayo) located in the city of Santander and his residence in the "Casona de Tudanca," the house made famous in one of Pereda's (q.v.) novels. Cossío is also well known as a competent enthusiast on the subject of bullfighting. All his critical work, which includes several books and a number of erudite articles in learned reviews, is in some way connected with his personal tastes and is marked by a rich erudition and the freedom of interpretation born of a fine sense of poetic value and a nonprofessional critical attitude. It deals mainly with the history of Spanish poetry. Among other books, he is the author of Los toros en la poesía castellana (1931; Vol. I, Estudio, Vol. II, Antología), Romancero popular de la Montaña (1933), La obra literaria de Pereda; su historia y crítica (1934), Poesía española: Notas de asedio (1936), Siglo XVII: Espinosa, Góngora, Gracián, Calderón, Polo de Medina, Solís (1940), and El romanticismo a la vista; tres estudios (1942). He has been working for a number of years on a history of bullfighting, in several volumes (Los toros, Vol. I, 1943, Vol. III, 1944).

A. del R.

Cossío, Manuel Bartolomé (1858–1935, Spanish educator and art historian), born in Haro, Logroño, a fervent disciple of Giner de los Ríos (q.v.), devoted most of his life to the reform of public school education in Spain. He taught for almost 50 years—at the Institución Libre de Enseñanza, at the University of Madrid, and at the Museo Pedagógico Nacional, of which he was director from 1883 to 1929. He developed a new kind of teacher, for whom teaching became a creative art and who used the modern intuitive method of awakening the child's sensibility instead of cramming his head with words. Cossío's ideal that opportunities of university education be brought to the rural masses found realization in the Misiones Pedagógicas, traveling schools that along with teachers carried paintings, recordings, and books to the most remote Spanish villages. In his lectures and articles, fragments of which were published under the title De su jornada (1929), he constantly pointed out the needs of Spanish education in the light of observations he had made during his extensive travels all over Europe and the United States. In addition to his educational activities Cossío explored and evaluated Spanish art, the popular as well as the fine arts. In his monumental study, El Greco (1908)—the product of many years of study and countless excursions with his students—he revealed to the world the extraordinary genius of the Toledan painter and the meaning of his work as an authentic expression of the soul of Spain.

See: Revista de pedagogía, September, 1935 (entire issue devoted to Cossío); J. B. Trend, Origins of Modern Spain (1934), pp. 192–207.
E. F. H.

Costa, Joaquín (1846–1911, Spanish jurist, historian, and political philosopher), born in Monzón, Huesca, was one of the precursors of the Generation of 1898; with his crusade for the regeneration of Spain he did much to orient Spanish political thought at the beginning of this century. After the disastrous defeat of 1898, he made impassioned speeches all over the country in an effort to arouse his compatriots from their lethargic indifference. At the Ateneo, in his famous lectures later collected in Oligarquía y caciquismo (1901), he made a lucid and ruthless analysis of the pseudo-parliamentary regime, showing how it had brought only misery, servitude, and ignorance to the Spanish people, and concluded that the whole oligarchical system must be extirpated by means of a rapid “surgical operation.” Costa had a gift of phrase, and many of his pithy mottoes and metaphors at once gained common currency, e.g., his formula “la escuela y la despensa” (school and pantry), which was his terse way of saying that it would take nutrition and education to transform the Spaniard, or his “cirujano de hierro,” the surgeon of iron that was to be tutelary dictator until real representative government should be possible. His rallying cry “Desafricanización y europeización de España” became the shibboleth of a whole group of thinkers and writers. Curiously enough Costa, the apostle of Europeanization, was also the untiring investigator of Spain’s most ancient traditions. In fact, his political speeches and essays occupied but a small fraction of his life. Most of his effort was spent in digging away at mountains of documents, with characteristic Aragonese diligence and tenacity, and in writing long erudite works on such varied themes as custom as the source of law, in La vida del derecho (1876) and El derecho consuetudinario de España (1885); the political ideals of the Spanish people as expressed in their popular poetry, in La poesía popular española y mitología y literatura celtohispanas (1881); the evolution of Spanish political institutions, in Estudios jurídicos y políticos (1884); Spanish cultural origins, in the highly original Estudios ibéricos (1891–1894); agrarian problems, in Colectivismo agrario en España (1898)—a work that, incidentally, still offers much that remains of universal interest today.

See: C. Aparicio, Joaquín Costa, el gran fracasado (1930).

E. F. H.

Costa i Llobera, Miquel (1854–1922, Catalan poet, prose writer, and sacred orator), was born in the beautiful city of Pollença on the island of Majorca, of a well-to-do family. He moved to Barcelona and then to Madrid to study law, a career which he abandoned for lack of real vocation. In 1874 he competed in the poetic contests, the Jocs Florals, in Barcelona. Later he retired to his native city where he devoted himself leisurely to literature; in 1885 his first volume of poems, Poesies, was issued. Then he went to Rome to study in the Gregorian University, was ordained a priest in 1888, and the following year received the degree of Doctor of Sacred Theology. Travels through Italy gave a permanent classical stamp to his tastes and manner of thinking. Returning to his native island, he again devoted himself to literature in his native tongue and again took part in the poetic contests of Barcelona. He was named mestre en gai saber (master troubadour) in 1902 for having won first prize in each one of the three essential subjects in the celebration of the Jocs Florals—in songs to faith, to love, and to native country. In 1909 he was named canon of the cathedral of Palma de Mallorca. De l'agre de la terra (From the Bitterness of the Earth), Tradicions i fantasies (Traditions and Fantasies), and Visions de Palestina (Visions of Palestine), appeared in 1897, 1903, and 1908 respectively. His crowning work is, without doubt, the volume of poetry entitled Horacianes (1906; Poems in the Manner of Horace), in which formal perfection and inspiration were happily joined.

The work of Costa i Llobera, although not voluminous, has exerted a wide influence on Catalan literature in general and in the development of the so-called Majorcan school, which aimed at formal perfection and felt admiration for the most varied forms of classicism. Costa i Llobera is a poet who is all soul, without indeed a trace of humor or irony, who gives himself up completely to the power of a full-blown emotion. His songs seem to spring tirelessly from a soul full of serenity, as though lost in contemplation of the inexhaustible beauties of the country of Majorca. The reading of the poetic works of Costa i Llobera, and in particular of his Horacianes, carries those who can enjoy him in Catalan to magnificent emotional heights. The vital quality of his poetry is comparable to what we enjoy in the great Greek and Latin poets who were his teachers, especially in Horace. Costa i Llobera has enjoyed a European reputation, and his works have been translated into Czech, Hungarian, German, Swedish. An edition of his complete works was published in 1924 by the Il·lustració Catalana in four volumes.

See: M. de Montoliu, Estudis de literatura catalana (1912); A. Plana, Antologia de poetes catalans moderns (1914); C. Giardini, Antologia dei poeti catalani contemporanei, 1845-1925 (1926).

F. de P.

Coster, Charles de, see De Coster.

Couperus, Louis (1863-1923, Dutch novelist), was born at The Hague, but spent his childhood in Java, where his father held an important position in the government service. He was trained to be a high school teacher of Dutch, but although he obtained the certificate that made him eligible for appointment, he never taught. His first novel, Eline Vere (1889), scored an immediate success and won for him a prominent place among Dutch writers of fiction. The story is a subtle analysis of the case of a weak, inconstant, aimless woman who feels herself the prisoner of her heredity. In Noodlot (1890; Fate), his second novel, the characters are again the helpless victims of an inexorable nemesis. In Metamorphosis (1889) Couperus told in fiction form the story of his own growth as an artist and of the genesis of his early novels, Eline Vere, Noodlot, Extase (1892), Majesteit (1893), and Wereldvrede (1895; World Peace). Among his other novels of life at The Hague the most outstanding is De Boeken der kleine Zielen (1901-1903; the four volumes comprising this work, published separately in translation, were collected in 1932 in one volume with the title The Book of the Small Souls), a story of the type and on the scale of The Forsyte Saga, which it antedated by 20 years. From the portrayal of this modern scene he turned to the study of antiquity. In De Berg van Licht (1905; The Mountain of Light), Xerxes (1919), and Iskander (1920) he painted the portraits of three dominant characters of different periods of ancient history: Heliogabalus, the young emperor whose perversities bring about his downfall; Xerxes, the victim of his own ambitions; and Alexander the Great, who is defeated by the vices of the peoples he subdued. But though the scene and the period have changed, the author's philosophy remains the same. He sees in man a will-less creature of his past and his environment. Couperus is not a moralist. He accepts life as an artist enamored of its colors and sounds, he plays with people's destinies as he plays with the language, handling them either with graceful nonchalance or distorting them into something forced and unreal. He possesses a saving sense of humor. In Van en over Mijzelf en Anderen (1910; Of and concerning Myself and Others) he smiles with gentle irony at his own idiosyncrasies. These delicate sketches of mocking self-revelation are among his most precious contributions to Dutch literature. Nearly all the works of Couperus have been translated into English and published in the United States.

Couperus, in his early work, was a follower of Flaubert and Zola (qq.v.). Yet the artist in him was out of sympathy with naturalism. His creative faculty functioned differently from Zola's. The latter set to work like a scientist, armed with a competent card index and with the blueprint of his story in front of him. Couperus let himself be guided by intuition and the inspiration of the moment. Each life he portrayed was lived by himself. He identified himself with each of his characters.

Couperus lived the greater part of his life abroad. "I do not feel that I am Dutch," he wrote, "although I love my native language, the richest, the loveliest that I know. . . . I feel myself to be an Italian who has been away from his country for a very long time, but who knows immediately on his return who and what he is: a Mediterranean who has pined away in the dim, chilly North." The Javanese blood in his veins had need of sunshine and warmth and blue skies. The outbreak of the First World War forced him to leave Italy. He returned to the dim, cold North and died at Velp near Arnhem in 1923.

See: J. de Graaf, Le Réveil littéraire en Hollande et le naturalisme français, 1880-1900 (1938), pp. 125-140 and passim.

A. J. B.

Courteline, Georges (pseud. of Georges Moineaux, 1860–1929, French novelist and dramatist), was born in the city of Tours. He received his secondary education at Meaux and Paris. Though he was an undisciplined pupil, he gave proof of great creative ability. Finding him incapable of sustained work, his father made him enlist in a cavalry regiment. Georges hated army life and was discharged for poor health at the end of 14 months. He then entered the civil service as a clerk. The job, though tedious, afforded him much time for writing poems and short stories which were published in various periodicals. His first success came with the publication of Les Gaîtés de l'escadron (1886) and Le Train de 8h. 47 (1888), both based on his recollections of the humdrum barrack life of peace times. Later, in Messieurs les ronds-de-cuir (1893), he ridiculed the civil service and the stultifying routine of bureaucracy. In Boubouroche, a short play based on the story of a gullible lover and his clever mistress, first represented at the Théâtre Libre in 1893, Courteline turned his satire against womankind.

A writer of great talent, a pessimist with a Moliéresque flair for comedy that appeals both to the few and to the many, Courteline was from the first extremely popular. Many of his novels and stories lent themselves to successful adaptations for the stage that increased his popularity still further. His later years were plagued with illness; in 1925 one of his legs had to be amputated. Official honors were then bestowed on him. In 1926 the French Academy awarded him a literary prize of 15,000 francs, the Goncourt Academy elected him a member, and the French government made him a Commander of the Legion of Honor. He died on June 25, 1929, after a second amputation.

See: J. Vivent, Les Inspirations et l'art de Courteline (1921); J. Portail, Georges Courteline, l'humoriste français (1928).

V. Gu.

Creangă, Ion (1837–1889, Rumanian popular story teller), was born in the village of Humulești, district of Neamț, about 100 kilometers from Jassy, ancient capital of Moldavia. He was the son of "Stephen, son of Peter the Cobbler" and of "Smaranda, born of David Creangă of the village of Pipirig," and the first of eight children. Creangă preferred the name of his maternal grandfather, adopted it, and made it famous.

He attended the village school, then went to Târgu-Neamț and Folticeni schools, entered and graduated from the Jassy seminary, and became a deacon in 1859. He also took courses at the normal school in Jassy, began teaching, and renounced the priesthood. He joined the Junimea (Youth) society and contributed his popular tales and his Amintiri din copilărie (1880; Childhood Reminiscences) to Convorbiri literare (Literary Conversations). There he met Eminescu (q.v.), with whom he formed a lasting friendship. He spent most of his time in the midst of the people whose language and lore he so successfully assimilated.

The stories he wrote were as ancient as the Moldavian land, and he possessed a genius for enclosing old and quaint sayings and expressions "of the soil" in the structure of his prose. Native and foreign critics agree that Creangă belongs with Andersen, the Grimm brothers, and especially Charles Perrault, whom he resembles in artistry. One finds in the works of these story tellers the same repetition of old tales in a simple popular language, the same life, the same little people, and the same healthy humor. Creangă differs from his predecessors in his realism, and especially in his use of popular proverbs, where he has no equal among European story tellers.

See: J. Boutière, La Vie et l'œuvre de Ion Creangă (1930).

L. F.

Croce, Benedetto (1866–, Italian philosopher, critic, scholar, historian, editor, and publicist), born at Pescasseroli, Aquila, is the descendant of a wealthy family of landowners in the Abruzzi and of magistrates under the Bourbons in Naples. He was educated in a private Catholic school restricted to children of families of good social standing. He escaped death in the earthquake of Casamicciola (1883), in which most of his family perished. Together with his brother, who had remained in Naples, he was educated by his uncle, Silvio Spaventa, a well-known conspirator in the Risorgimento who after 1860 became an outstanding political figure of united Italy. Croce enrolled in the faculty of law of the University of Rome but never graduated, attending only the courses given by Antonio Labriola, a teacher who awakened many young minds of Italy. Croce made use of his financial independence to dedicate himself to the study, first, of local history (editing the magazine Napoli nobilissima, 1892–1907), then of Marxist theories (Materialismo storico ed economia marxistica, 1900; Eng. tr., Historical Materialism and the Economics of Karl Marx, 1914), then of philosophy and history. He was not very active in the earlier years in the field of politics. His fame was already established when Premier Sonnino made him a senator (1910). After the First World War, Giolitti, the last hope of a confused and embittered Italy, appointed him minister of public instruction, and Croce served from June, 1920 to July, 1921. In this capacity he proposed to Parliament, but without success, a bill which introduced the state examination (Le Riforme degli esami e la sistemazione delle scuole medie, 1921), later a part of the famous Gentile Reform. Croce, who is married and has had four children, has always resided in Naples. He is a member of several Italian academies—among which the Pontaniana is particularly to be remembered because in its Atti Croce published the first drafts of his most important works. From this academy he withdrew because of Fascism. Oxford (1933) and other universities have bestowed on him the degree of doctor honoris causa.

Croce is the great unheeded man of Italy. It remains a puzzle and a paradox why this powerful thinker—the most outstanding Italian since 1900, whose widespread influence is recognizable and found active even in the minds of his opponents—did not exert a greater influence on his own people at critical moments of their history. In 1914 Italy went to war against Germany in spite of admonitions of a neutrally minded Croce, and in 1940, once more against Croce's warnings, sided with Germany. In other matters too his hold on Italians, in spite of his eminence, has been insignificant. The example he has set in matters of methodical work, the lessons he has given as to the necessity of placing humanity above the nation and of being moderate in victory and hopeful in adversity, his modesty in action, his aversion to pomp and rhetoric, his high regard for civic duties, have all had singularly slight effect on his contemporaries. In social matters Italians chose to imitate D'Annunzio (q.v.), the charmer, and in politics followed the domineering Mussolini.

Outside of Italy Croce is known particularly in two connections, for his influence as a philosopher of art and for his opposition to Germany and Fascism. Thus limited, an appraisal of him is true to the same extent that a plan representing only two sections of a great and elaborate building would be true. The wings cover a wide expanse: Marxism, philosophy, law, history, criticism, politics, the history of painting and religion, ethics (e.g., Filosofia della pratica: Economia ed etica, 1908; Eng. tr., Philosophy of the Practical: Economic and Ethic, 1913; Frammenti di etica, 1922; Eng. tr., The Conduct of Life, 1924).

Croce's scores of volumes reveal an accomplished specialist and, at the same time, a universal thinker. Serious matters are often combined with anecdotes and witty remarks. The book reviews and notes published by him in his bimonthly Critica (1903–1944) show him at his best in the fields of polemical writing and of brilliant criticism.

Croce has made two clear résumés of his own aesthetics (Breviario di estetica, 1913; Eng. tr., The Essence of Aesthetic, 1921; and an article, "Aesthetics," first in English in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, 14th edition, and then in Italian, Aesthetics in nuce, 1929), which give the impression of a perfectly definite, almost axiomatic writer. But if one follows the efforts and development of his thought through his original writings, he is seen to be groping with his problems and making his way only gradually towards the light of truth. He became a philosopher through an active feeling of dissatisfaction with his hard labor of erudition. His system was the fruit of studies of art and history—this must be remembered; and his fundamental conception of "intuition" was twice revised (particularly in L'Intuizione pura e il carattere lirico dell' arte, 1908). Although criticisms of opponents provoked these changes, their insertion did not mean the acceptance of the objections, but rather a further free development of his own initial thought.

It is well known that his system is related to the idealistic school of philosophy; i.e., for him the world is Spirit and only Spirit. Spirit is one in its manifestation. Multiplicity is taken account of by Croce's theory of circularity whereby one moment or aspect, which always mirrors the entire unity, passes into the other and yet retains its distinctiveness, to the point that each moment has to be studied separately if a knowledge of its function and of its place is to be acquired. There are four moments or aspects, two theoretic and two practical: aesthetics, or knowledge of the individual; philosophy, or knowledge of the universal; economic, or action for individual aims; and ethics, or action for universal aims. Essential works are Tesi fondamentali di un'estetica come scienza dell' espressione e linguistica generale (published first in Atti dell' Accademia Pontaniana, 1900, as a separate volume, 1902; Eng. tr., Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic, 1909), Lineamenti di una logica come scienza del concetto puro (1905; Eng. tr., Logic as the Science of Pure Concept, 1917), and Filosofia della pratica (1908; there are several subsequent editions with important changes).

A dry summary gives but the faintest idea of the richness and the originality of Croce and none at all of the terseness, the clarity, the brilliancy of his writing. His style is very limpid; one may agree or disagree with him, but one always knows what he means. He is direct: he goes straight to his point without rhetorical paddings or ornamental digressions. His prose is an example of intellectual probity and purity, and its beauty is enhanced by a rhythm which seems to be born of the joy of thinking and of discovering. In his minor pieces he is often aggressive, ironic, and hard. His mood is consistently controversial. He has repeatedly asserted that all philosophy must be considered from a controversial viewpoint, and this is, in fact, the impression his writings give.

Croce's philosophy proceeds from Vico (La Filosofia di Giambattista Vico, 1911; Eng. tr., The Philosophy of Giambattista Vico, 1913) and Hegel (Ciò che è vivo e ciò che è morto della filosofia di Hegel, 1907; Eng. tr., What Is Living and What Is Dead of the Philosophy of Hegel, 1915), but includes De Sanctis's (q.v.) idealism. His Vico, however, is purified of all sociological heaviness, and his Hegel is cleansed of all Prussianism. De Sanctis, too, has been clarified, made smoother and more coherent. Croce is thus a very powerful reviver who has made of Vico, Hegel, and De Sanctis, not to mention other minor luminaries, true living personalities for contemporary Italian thought.

Croce has more importance as a philosopher of art than as a literary critic, but his criticism is remarkable (Ariosto, Shakespeare e Corneille, 1920; Eng. tr., Ariosto, Shakespeare and Corneille, 1920; La Poesia di Dante, 1920; Eng. tr., The Poetry of Dante, 1922; Alessandro Manzoni; saggi e discussioni, 1930; Giosue Carducci; studio critico, 1927; La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 4 vols., 1914-1915; 5th vol., 1939; 6th vol., 1940). He has also written essays on English, Spanish, French, German, and even Scandinavian authors, and an anthology of interesting judgments could be collected on others, even in the fields of Latin, early Christian, and Russian literatures. One feels that he is at his best when he comments on poets of the imagination (Ariosto, Shakespeare, Goethe) and at his worst when he deals with extreme lyricism (Leopardi or Baudelaire, q.v.). His trend is decidedly antiromantic, and he has shown no mercy for the modern decadent literature in Italy. All told his criticism has exercised a profound renovating influence in Italy (see Italian criticism).

He has not always been a friend of democracy nor an adversary of Germany; it would even be correct to say that by his sharp and devastating thoughts on democracy, Freemasonry, pacifism, internationalism (Pagine sulla guerra, 1919) Croce, in spite of himself, paved the way for Fascism. His idea of freedom has no connection with what Americans understand by this word. By freedom Croce means that "liberty" of the human mind whereby man strives to actualize those faculties which raise him above the immediate utilitarian interests of the individual person. It is a freedom which is also an obligation: a liberty to do everything that tends to give to the human soul the dignity which an ethical development has bestowed upon humanity. Such liberty easily becomes identical with coercion by parents, teachers, and the state authorities. In politics his liberalism is the doctrine of those who are able to think historically and, therefore, in a certain sense, are above all parties. He has shown in his historical works a tendency to justify all governments and institutions: the Bourbon dynasty in southern Italy (Storia del regno di Napoli, Bari 1925), the Spanish Inquisition, and the dictatorship, veneered with democracy, of Giolitti in pre-war Italy (Storia d'Italia dal 1871 al 1915, 1927; Eng. tr., A History of Italy, 1871-1915, 1929). He respects heroes, but he is definitely opposed to revolution and sudden changes. His admiration and respect are reserved for efforts that develop in a ponderously slow rhythm over extended periods of time.

He has an aristocratic liking for unpopularity and has often found himself on the side of minorities; he was the most influential man of culture who in 1914 advocated neutrality for Italy. Likewise he showed till 1925 a certain tolerance towards Fascism (when it could be considered merely in its anti-Communist aspects). But as the movement gained ground he became first silent and then more and more critical. If he did not openly attack Fascism itself (which would not then have been possible), he assailed similar manifestations of the past or of other countries in such a manner that everyone understood to what and to whom he referred. Such was his authority that, whether out of a sense of chivalry, through fear of public opinion abroad, or for some other reason, Mussolini allowed him to continue publishing his Critica and many of his major historical works (especially remarkable is the Storia d'Europa nel secolo decimono, 1932; Eng. tr., History of Europe in the Nineteenth Century, 1933, a defense of the idea of freedom considered as the soul of that century). The survival of an active Croce between 1922 and 1943 in Italy was a thing that would not have been possible in Germany, Russia, or Spain. When Fascism came to an end, the figure of Croce glowed with the light of a solitary preserver of freedom and dignity; but while Italians paid homage to his idealistic figure, they did not follow his political advice, and it seems that his hopes for a strong liberal party in Italy have not aroused enthusiasm. Collections of his articles on politics and ethics and on recent events have been published in the United States but are not especially to be recommended either because their introductions are weak (Germany and Europe; a Spiritual Dissension, tr. with introduction by Vincent Sheean, 1944) or because they lack notes which would enable the Anglo-Saxon reader to understand the historical situations that called them forth (Politics and Morals, tr. from the Italian by Salvatore J. Castiglione, 1945).

In considering Croce's development it may be said that the direction of his personality has been toward a universal conception of the world; and in more recent years the study of and the translations from Goethe (Goethe, 1919; Eng. tr., 1923; Nuovi saggi sul Goethe, 1934) are perhaps significant of this trend. In his bitterness concerning recent developments in Europe he has always kept a margin for human considerations and sometimes even for a humorous remark. The reflections he published on Fascism bear this Olympic imprint, as does the moderation in his advice to the political winners in Italy.

Although Croce remains consistent in his philosophical denial of a personal God and of the immortality of the soul, his interest in religious problems and figures has grown, especially as regards the period of the Reformation. He has always believed (like Vico) in a providential power organizing history and entrusting to each man a task which he must actualize for universal ends.

See: G. Castellano, Benedetto Croce (1924; 2d ed., 1936); K. Bossler and others, L'Opera filosofica storica e letteraria di B. Croce; saggi di scrittori italiani e stranieri e bibliografia dal 1920 al 1941 (1941). These two books contain an almost complete bibliography of the works of and on Croce.

G. P.

Croisset, Francis de (pseud. of Franz Wiener, 1877–, French playwright), was born in Brussels. He is known as the author of numerous light comedies, at times objectionable from a moral point of view. These plays, written in a lively style, are typical of the so-called théâtre du boulevard, in which sophisticated and witty dialogue makes up for thinness of content. Only in L'Epervier (1914) did Croisset attempt to draw a character study, the portrait of a society adventurer reminiscent of Abel Hermant's (q.v.) famous vicomte de Courpière. Among his other plays should be mentioned L'Homme à l'oreille coupée, also called Une Mauvaise Plaisanterie, banned by the censors in 1900; Chérubin, three acts in verse, rehearsed at the Comédie Française in 1901 but presented only in 1908 at the Théâtre Femina; Le Bonheur, mesdames (1905); and Le Cœur dispose (1912).

In collaboration with Emmanuel Arène, Croisset wrote Paris-New-York (1907). With Maurice Leblanc he adapted for the stage the well-known detective story Arsène Lupin (1908), and, after the death of Gaston de Caillavet (q.v.) in 1915, he became the collaborator of Robert de Flers (q.v.) in Le Retour (1920), Les Vignes du Seigneur (1923), Romance (1923), Les Nouveaux Messieurs (1925), Giboulette (1926), Le Docteur Miracle (1930). Croisset has also written a volume of poems (Nuits de quinze ans, 1898), novels (La Féerie cinghalaise, 1926; Nous avons fait un beau voyage, 1930), essays and dramatic criticism (Pour la langue française, 1924; Nos Marionnettes, 1928; L'Invasion au théâtre, 1929; La Vie parisienne au théâtre, 1929; Le Souvenir de Robert de Flers, 1929). A collection of his aphorisms and wittiest repartees was published in 1930 in a volume entitled L'Esprit de Francis de Croisset.

See: L. Maigue, "Une Trilogie de jeunes," Grande Revue, March 15, 1906, pp. 453–472.
M. E. C.

Crommelynck, Fernand (1888–, Belgian dramatist), was born in Brussels. His mother was French. His father belonged to a family of modest bourgeoisie connected with theatrical life, and one of his uncles was a famous vernacular actor. Crommelynck received a complete stage training very early, and he probably learned more from the theatre itself than from school or college. Before the outbreak of the First World War, three plays of Crommelynck had already been staged in Brussels, Nous n'irons plus au bois (1906), Le Sculpteur de masques (1908), and Le Marchand de regrets (1913). These early works show his extraordinary skill for creating morbid atmospheres and characters (like the sculptor of masks or the "spleen seller," the dealer of antiques in a small Flemish town) who live, love, hate, and die in the midst of strange surroundings, suggesting the presence of ghosts and witchcraft. Le Sculpteur de masques was an inspiration for the French dramatist St. Georges de Bouhéliér's Le Carnaval des enfants.

Le Cocu magnifique, presented in Paris (1921), brought Crommelynck suddenly into the full light of European glory. The play, entitled by the author a lyrical farce, is an extremely accurate and ruthless study of a lover's jealousy. The protagonist is represented on the stage by two actors, one of whom, Estrugo, is but a shade of the other, a kind of interior Iago, always appearing in time to renew the suspicions and doubts of the husband about his wife's faithfulness. Le Cocu magnifique ranks among the most representative plays staged in Europe between the two world wars and has been translated into many languages. Despite the development of the scandalous plot, the play is saved by the stupendous dramatic atmosphere that pervades it and also by the poetical intensity of the dialogue.

Before 1921 Crommelynck earned his livelihood as an actor. The tremendous success of Le Cocu magnifique enabled him to devote all his time to the writing of plays. With his wife and children he left Belgium and went to live in Saint-Cloud, near Paris, in the house that had belonged to Emile Verhaeren (q.v.), and which the Crommelyncks shared with the poet's widow. Les Amants puérils (1923) was not as successful as Le Cocu magnifique. Tripes d'or (1930) was a social satire, depicting the vanity of wealth and capitalistic grandeur. This play, translated into Russian, was produced in Moscow with great success. Crommelynck's lyric impetus triumphed again with Carine, ou la Jeune Fille folle de son dme (1934), in which the passion of a pure and chaste girl is analyzed. Carine prefers death rather than see her dream of love blemished. The locale of the play is a French provincial chateau, the time is autumn, and the chateau guests are all clad in red hunting coats. Une Femme qui a le cœur trop petit (1934) and Chaud et froid (1936) were the last works of Crommelynck produced before the Second World War.

Glittering with splendid images, Crommelynck's language is often overweighted with ornamentation. As a whole, it is artificial. The skill with which he surrounds a scene in an atmosphere of mystery and unusual tenseness is on occasion reminiscent of the Elizabethans. He has given to the contemporary theatre a lyrical expression thoroughly novel and sometimes deeply moving.

L. K.

Curel, François de (1854–1928, French dramatist), born at Metz, through his father was descended from a noble family of Lorraine and through his mother from a family of steel magnates, the Wendels. Curel was originally destined for an industrial career, but his plans were altered by the refusal of the German authorities to allow him to participate in the management of the family interests. He decided to devote his enforced leisure to writing. His career as a dramatist began with the sending to Antoine (q.v.) of three plays, all of which were accepted by the founder of the Théâtre Libre. From then on, writing only when inspiration prompted him, Curel lived the life of a wealthy nobleman, dividing his time between his Paris residence and his Lorraine forest, the majestic beauty of which he has described in unforgettable terms. He became a member of the French Academy in 1919, succeeding Paul Hervieu (q.v.).

The conflicts between ideal and reality, between humanity and animality, between sentiment and instinct, dominate Curel's theatre. One of his first plays, Sauvé des eaux (1889), which became in successive versions L'Amour brode (1893) and La Danse devant le miroir (1913), is a study of the passion of two people in search of an ideal love which, when they are confronted by reality, seems inaccessible. The heroines of L'Envers d'une sainte (1892) and L'Invitée (1893) also called upon love to satisfy their need for an ideal—and were cruelly disappointed; their proud and tormented souls are analyzed with pitiless lucidity.

After these dramas about love, Curel turned to the "theatre of ideas." But realizing how deficient in dramatic appeal ideas may be in themselves, he always denied that he had intended to use the theatre for the discussion of abstractions; ideas interested him for "the storms which they raise in the soul." It is indeed to an idea, that of the perpetuity of the race in an aristocratic family, that the characters in Les Fossiles (1892) sacrifice their happiness, just as Albert Donnat, in La Nouvelle Idole (1895), sacrifices a young girl and himself to an idea, that of the progress of science, the "new idol." The industrialist Jean de Miremont, in Le Repas du lion (1897), swears to devote his life to a program, the improvement of conditions among the working classes; and the main character in Le Coup d'aile (1906) sacrifices his family to his haunting and mad desire for power and glory. The violent internal conflicts in the minds of such heroes of Curel have produced plays of powerful dramatic interest. In La Fille sauvage (1902), on the other hand, the dramatic quality of the story of this girl savage gradually brought into contact with civilization is really subordinated to the author's views on the development of humanity, which constitute the main interest of this work.

During a long period when Currel remained aloof from the theatre, his dramatic genius underwent remarkable changes. A new comic vein, made up of gaiety and irony, appears. The conflicts which had inspired Currel's first dramas now emerge again. Autobiographical details increase. The author has more and more a tendency to put himself on the stage in the guise of various characters which clearly embody at least some aspects of his own personality.

La Comédie du génie (1918) is less a play than an ironic and somewhat disillusioned account of the intellectual and professional adventures of a dramatist in whom it is easy to recognize Currel himself. L'Ame en folie (1919) is an entertaining comedy on the conflicting hereditary tendencies in human nature. The ironic Ivresse du sage (1922), while exposing opinions on human selection compared with animal selection, makes fun of a philosopher who claims to be free of the tyranny of the flesh. Terre inhumaine (1922) shows us how war brings back in the human race the bestial traits which civilization seemed to have crushed; and, when peace comes, the hero of La Viveuse et le moribond (1925) succeeds only with difficulty in suppressing the primitive animal resurrected by the war. In his last play, Orage mystique (1927), behind an amusing comedy plot Currel attempts to analyze the creation of characters by a dramatist, a subject already studied in his answers to Binet in L'Année psychologique (1894).

Currel had no great success with theatre audiences, except in the case of L'Ame en folie. Ordinarily, while highly praised by the critics, his plays surprised and interested rather than pleased the public. Never mediocre, Currel is irregular as a dramatist. Capable of attaining greatness, he is at times disconcerting for his awkwardness. He dared to bring ideas upon the stage, and homage must be paid to the nobility of his thoughts and his perfect intellectual honesty.

See: P. Blanchart, François de Currel (1924); E. Pronier, La Vie et l'œuvre de François de Currel (1934); A. Lévêque, "François de Currel: Observations sur la création dramatique," Publications of the Modern Language Association of America, LII (1937), 550-580.

A. C. L.

Curros Enríquez, Manuel (1851-1908, Spanish poet and journalist), was born at Celanova in Galicia and from an early age took part in heated liberal and republican campaigns. He studied law, and as a result of the September Revolution of 1868 he moved to Madrid, where he edited Imparcial, Porvenir, País, and other literary and political newspapers and journals. With the publication of his first book the bishop of Orense brought legal action against him, and he was convicted of irreverent attacks against the Catholic religion and the ministers of the Church. A higher court absolved him, and his personal popularity and that of his work became very great. In America especially, in the colonies of Spanish emigrants, there was a succession of editions and expressions of devotion and esteem. He became a Treasury official in Orense and in 1894 moved to Havana, Cuba, where he was editor of the Diario de la marina. After his death in Havana, his body was moved to Galicia, where monuments and statues have been erected to him.

Aires d'a miña terra (1879), his first work and the volume which caused his denunciation by the Church, contains the best of his poetry. Three poems in particular were responsible for the official protest. In "Mirando o chau" (Looking at the Ground) God observes his work, the creation, viewing it with the just and liberal spirit of Curros; the poem, admittedly an imitation of Béranger, has attacks on the degenerate church, venal administration of justice, social inequality, hypocrisy. "A igrexa fría" (The Cold Church) depicts licentious ecclesiastical life within sight of the ruins of a monastery. "O divino sainete" (The Divine Farce) is a parody of Dante in the traditional tercets of the medieval Galician lyric, in which the poet, accompanied by priests, monks, and fanatics and led by the poet Añón, visits the pope and urges him again to live real Christianity and abandon luxury and pomp. Outstanding in this and similar verse of Curros are extraordinary energy of satire, civic virility, and a flowing naturalness of language, agile and flexible as a whip.

Perhaps the most intense lyrical power of Curros, however, is found in a somewhat different type of verse in the same book. The beautiful Marian legend, "A Virxe d'o Cristal" (The Virgin of the Crystal), could be taken for one of the Cantigas de Santa María of Alfonso the Wise. Highly dramatic is the "Nouturnio" (Nocturne), a dialogue between a miserable old man and the haunting croak of a toad, his only companion, which ends in an angry threat against heaven; equally vivid are the poems on emigration and homesickness and those that recall family tragedies. The "complaint" of Rosalía Castro, the vague Celtic argumentation of Pondal (qq.v.), have become in Curros a violent revolutionary protest.

See: "Homenaje en honor de Curros Enríquez," Boletín de la Real Academia Gallega, May, 1915; César Barja, "En torno al lirismo gallego del siglo XIX," Smith College Studies in Modern Languages, Vol. VII (1926), Nos. 2-3, pp. 112-124.

R. M. L.

Czech literature (see also Slovak literature). A word about background is particularly necessary for the understanding of recent Czech literature. The Czechs, who are geographically the westernmost of the Slavs, have always had stronger literary and cultural relations with Western and Southern Europe than with the Slavic East (Russian literature became an important influence only during the 19th century). The fine poetic tradition established as early as the 14th century and already Western in quality was interrupted by the Hussite wars and their consequences: Czech literature then became for a long period largely an instrument in the intellectual and social struggle of the nation against Rome. The Czechs, like the Germans, did not have a proper Renaissance. When the old Bohemia came to an end with the defeat of the Bohemian army in the Battle of the White Mountain (1620), an absolutist Hapsburg regime was established and the country was re-Catholicized by force; Bohemia was deprived of its upper classes, cut off from the West, and became, with notable exceptions, a stagnant peasant community. Late in the 18th century, the Czechs began to "awaken," i.e., ideas of the general European Enlightenment began to penetrate into the country and contacts with the West were re-established. The revival passed through fairly distinct stages: a philological stage in which the Czech language was revived and poetic diction rejuvenated; a poetical one when, early in the 19th century, poetry in the neo-classical and later in the romantic manner was created; and finally, the political stage which led to the abortive revolution of 1848. In 1861, with the reemergence of the Czech nation from a new period of absolutism and oppression, the process of literary revival was accomplished. The romantic movement, which had been particularly strong, inspired as it was by nationalism and enthusiasm for folk poetry, now belonged to the past. One great figure survived until 1876—the historian of Bohemia, František Palacký, born at the end of the 18th century. But new critical and realistic forces were becoming vocal in these last decades. By 1870 the leading literary figures, Jan Neruda, Vítězslav Hálek, and Karolina Světlá (qq.v.), exemplified the struggle between the dying romanticism and the emergence of realism. Especially Neruda's terse ironical poetry, inspired by modern scientific ideas, and his humorous prose, lovingly depicting the small people of Prague, anticipated an unromantic future.

Czech literature between 1870 and the First World War was predominantly middle class in social origin and ideology. The old aristocracy, as far as it survived, had turned away from its nation and played no role as a producer or patron of literature. The upper bourgeoisie of wealth and Austrian officialdom were largely German, and the few Czechs who penetrated there had little interest in the literature of their own tongue. The middle class, which produced and consumed Czech literature, was recruited constantly from the peasants and sometimes from the factory workers. But authors who can be described as proletarians or peasants were rare. Practically no literature was written in any dialect, and Prague was almost the only literary center. The majority of authors made their living as teachers, small officials, clerks, and in many cases as journalists and editors, and found their public among the same intelligentsia—the students, doctors, and lawyers scattered over the country. Among those of high literary standing only Jirásek (q.v.) can be described as widely popular. Most books were published in small editions, cheaply produced, though there was a limited public for expensively printed books. One notable feature of Czech literature is its close relation with scholarship. When an independent Czech university was reestablished in Prague in 1882, much of the intellectual life of the nation centered round this institution. Masaryk, Vrchlický, Šalda (qq.v.), and Beneš were university professors. Even very technical scholars—especially philologists such as Jan Gebauer (1838-1907), who watched over the development of the language, literary historians such as Jaroslav Vlček (1860-1930) and Arne Novák (q.v.), and historians such as Josef Pekař (1870-1937) and Josef Šusta (1874-1945)—commanded national attention and took part in contemporary affairs.

Theatrical life was very limited. Actually only the National Theatre, rebuilt in 1883, was a great stage with fine actors, to which only later was some competition offered by the Municipal Theatre of Vinohrady, a suburb of Prague. The provinces were of little importance to the stage. These social conditions changed somewhat as a result of the First World War and the establishment of the independent republic. Czech literature expanded considerably in mass; the reading public suddenly increased, not only because education awakened in the lower classes a hunger for literature, but also because Czech was again read widely in Slovakia and by the reclaimed minorities. The growth in the number of newspapers and frequently short-lived periodicals was startling. A state-supported expansion of public libraries was added to stimulate a general democratization of literature. Now a whole "proletarian" movement of poets emerged, few of whom, however, were of strictly proletarian origin, and a group of very self-conscious "ruralists" who preached a return to the soil and opposed the centralization of literature in Prague. Thus the earlier, almost absolute monopoly by the middle class and by Prague was, at least partially, broken after 1918. Two new universities, those of Brno and Bratislava, were founded, and academic life spread considerably, without, however, preserving its role of national leadership. The Prague National Theatre also ceased to be the only stage of great artistic pretensions. Small experimental theatres in Prague were centers of excellent stagecraft, and theatres elsewhere, in Brno, Moravská Ostrava, and Bratislava, took serious part in the development of the drama. All told, there was after the war a most impressive expansion—with the concomitant dangers in a break with tradition, in commercialization and nivellization, though these processes scarcely went so far in Czechoslovakia as they did in the West.

Czech literature stands at the crossroads of practically all cultural influences: proximity to Germany, the Slavic language, strong sympathies with the West and Western political ideology have all had their effect. German influence in the early 19th century was considerable, anti-German though the outlook of most writers was. Kindred Slavic literatures played an important and for a time a major role. With the 1870's a flood of French influences arrived, largely through the work of Vrchlický and his school. The "decadents," critics such as Šalda, and, after the First World War, many exponents of the newest movements in poetry were in a large measure dependent on literary fashions in Paris. Only after the war did contacts with the Anglo-Saxon world become more intimate, though Masaryk's orientation had been largely English and American since 1880. Karel Čapek (q.v.) especially can be described as sympathetic to the usual Anglo-Saxon mentality. German influences declined at this time; only a group of German writers from Prague—Rilke, Kafka, Werfel (qq.v.)—commanded attention. Scandinavia influenced the drama through Ibsen (q.v.) and, to a lesser degree, the novel. The relation with the other Slavic literatures was again more intimate. But Polish and Yugoslav literature remained largely the interest of scholars, and Russian literature alone had any popular appeal. Russian romanticism (exemplified in Pushkin) was important for many older (Čech) and even certain much younger poets (Hora); the Russian novel (especially the work of Dostoevski, q.v.) commanded a wide reading public and influenced numerous writers. Recently, too, a section of the public has shown strong interest in the new Soviet literature, mostly for political reasons. On the whole, the amazing flood of translations from all literatures and all authors, good and bad, increased after 1918 and showed how avidly the Czech reading public wanted to escape its narrow national limits. Czech literature, like every other small literature, is always confronted with the problem of individuality and nationality. Possibly writers in the post-war years have gone too far in incorporating the general Western cultural pattern into Czech literature. A closer examination shows, however, that a genuine attempt has been made to express something individual and peculiarly Czech. A study of the main figures of Czech literature reveals a great number of original authors who managed to be at once Czech and in some measure universal.

In the late 1870's new figures arose, to dominate Czech literature for some 20 years. In the 90's a new generation matured which revolted very sharply against the preceding group, and similarly, just after the First World War, another new generation enforced a break with the past. So at least three fairly well defined periods of recent Czech literature can be distinguished: from about 1876 to 1894, a period in which rhetorical, decorative poetry fundamentally romantic in outlook prevailed; from 1894 to 1918, when naturalism and symbolism triumphed; since 1918, a time when different movements, vaguely lumped together as "modernism," have dominated the literary scene. One can draw the distinctions on the basis of generations another way. In the first period writers born in the 1840's and 1850's were leaders. In the early part of the second period the generation born in the 60's and 70's made itself felt; just before the First World War a new and less clearly defined group became vocal, writers born in the late 70's and in the 80's who are known as "the lost generation." Post-war literature from 1918 on was dominated by those born in the 90's and in the early 20th century. Of course, there were survivals and anticipations, and within each generation there was conflict. Poetry is the leading genre in Czech literature, and the different periods are most clearly demarcated by its prestige and success. The novel has had a less clear evolution, and the drama, though most successful abroad, was definitely of minor literary importance. Criticism became very influential only after the 1890's.

The early beginnings of realism were interrupted by a new great wave of oratorical poetry which, in technique and outlook, corresponds roughly to that of the great English Victorians. The two leading figures were Jaroslav Vrchlický and Svatopluk Čech (q.v.), protagonists of the often contrasted "cosmopolite" and "patriotic" movements. Vrchlický and his numerous followers and imitators were grouped around a quarterly, Lumír, edited by J. V. Sládek (q.v.), a fine poet and the translator of Shakespeare into Czech; Čech's work had first appeared in an almanac called Ruch (1868). The two groups are thus called "Lumírovci" and "Ruchovci," respectively. Actually, however, the contrast between these opposing schools is superficial. Vrchlický stressed the contacts with France and Italy, while Čech was more pro-Russian in his outlook; but in the history of poetry they must both be classed as splendid rhetoricians, in the style sometimes of Hugo and sometimes of the French Parnassians. Ideologically they were also basically similar. Both were good Czech patriots, liberal democrats, believers in progressive evolution, cosmic optimists. Much of their splendid and dazzling work has lost its appeal today, but Vrchlický will survive not only as a virtuoso of all forms and themes, but also as an intimate lyrical poet, who late in life found his way back to a simple, chaste, and even terse style. His historical importance can scarcely be overrated. He definitely broke away from dependence on German romantic models and "opened the windows" to Europe. His enormous activity as a translator of poetry is in itself a major achievement. Somewhat later, in loose association with the "Lumírovci," there appeared another major writer, Julius Zeyer (q.v.), who can best be compared to the English Pre-Raphaelites. He is a nostalgic neo-romantic, an aesthete with Catholic and medieval sympathies, a decorative artist with a rather tenuous hold on reality.

While poetry revived romanticism, the novel became more and more realistic and purely descriptive in its techniques. The historical novel, which had been popular among the Czechs, emancipated itself slowly from the model of Sir Walter Scott and achieved real artistic success in the careful work of Alois Jirásek and Zikmund Winter (q.v.). Jirásek, who was a genuine student of history, became a great favorite of the masses and a powerful stimulus of national and historical consciousness. The novel of peasant life also assumed new forms in the late 19th century. It became more sociological, more exact, less prone to idealize the peasant. The nostalgic portrait of Babička (1855; Grandmother) by Mrs. Božena Němcová (1820–1862) had been the classic of the genre. Now Josef Holecěk (q.v.) created a great cycle of novels depicting the Czech peasant with realistic technique and preaching a conservative agrarian ideology, rare in a time dominated by 19th-century liberalism. Mrs. Teréza Nováková (q.v.) brooded in her novels over the peasants' moral and religious struggles, in the spirit of an earnest investigator of manners and social problems, and numerous other competent writers, such as Karel V. Rais (1859–1926), Alois Mrštík (1861–1925), and Jan Herben (1857–1936), specialized in different regions of the country and in different approaches to the problem of the peasant who was still felt to be the backbone of the nation.

In the 90's a revolution was brought about in Czech literature. The prevailing style and ideology of both the "Lumírovci" and the "Ruchovci" were criticized and condemned by a new generation, which was, however, very sharply divided within itself. One stream of revolt can be described as realist and naturalist; the other, as symbolist and impressionist (there was also a small group of Czech "decadents" who, in practice, were nearest to the symbolists). The realist movement had its intellectual spokesman in Tomáš Masaryk. His importance, especially in his later years, far transcends the field of belles-lettres, but he profoundly influenced literature by his sharp criticisms of the German intellectual tradition, his distrust of rhetoric, of romanticism, and of optimistic liberalism. Masaryk's literary criticism was, on the other hand, too purely moralistic to influence directly the practice of poetry. J. S. Machar (q.v.), with his skeptical, satirical, and even dry mind, returned Czech poetic diction to the terse colloquial tradition—interrupted since Neruda—though later in his life Machar surveyed world history poetically in the spirit of an anti-Christian, Nietzschean individualist. Petr Bezruč (q.v.), the great poet of Czech nationalism, is stylistically related to Machar. His monumental Slezské písně (Silesian Songs) cultivate an austere rhetoric which gives tragic expression to the poet's longing for justice and his hatred and anger for the oppressor. A younger poet, Viktor Dyk (q.v.), is also primarily a political poet, a fervent nationalist. He cultivated concise, hard, sharp, even epigrammatic forms and with Machar presents a strongly intellectualistic trend among Czech poets. Karel Toman (pseud. of Antonín Bernášek, 1877-) is another fine poet who, though standing by himself in many ways, must be classed with Dyk, for he too cultivates concise, monumental forms. But he is far more impersonal and matter-of-fact and seems to have no ideology except an instinctive social revolt and a love for his home and nation.

The novel, in accordance with the triumph of naturalism in the West, turned away from history and the countryside to study the town and the bourgeoisie in the light of the positivistic creed. In Czech literature there were, however, few orthodox naturalists; among them Karel Matěj Čapek-Chod (q.v.) stands out because he escaped photographic naturalism and rose to write grotesque visions of Prague and the life of its bourgeoisie. Josef K. Šlejhar (1864-1914) is rather a gloomy mystic in the wake of Dostoevski (q.v.), and Ignát Herrmann (1854-1935) is a popular genre painter of the small people of Prague.

Czech drama was slow to emancipate itself from romanticism. The closet dramas of the poets were largely failures on the stage, which had to survive on mediocre realistic comedies and florid historical dramas. The change came only when Jaroslav Hilbert (q.v.) produced good imitations of Ibsen and later wrote moralistic criticisms of history and Czech society for the stage.

Naturalism and related techniques were rather one tendency of the time than a unified movement. The more purely poetic movements of "decadence" and of symbolism crystallized far more clearly, but here too, surprisingly, it is difficult to distinguish the lines between brands of neo-romanticism, impressionism, and even tendencies called neoclassic. F. X. Šalda was the most influential critic who consistently opposed both the academic art of the "Lumičovci" and the new materialistic naturalism and advocated a highly metaphorical, symbolistic poetry and an art responsible to society, inspired by an idealistic philosophy.

Šalda's great influence extended into the 1930's, when he still continued to be the spokesman for the newest art movements. Arne Novák judged and surveyed the whole course of Czech literature from a point of view much more conservative and traditional. A new nonnaturalist poetry began to flourish in the 90's. There was even a small group of Czech "decadents" who cultivated the morbid aestheticism of the fin-de-siècle mood with considerable skill and success. Jiří Karásek ze Lvovic (1871-) was the most versatile writer of the group, its critical mouthpiece and organizer, but a proletarian, Karel Hlaváček (q.v.), who died early in life, was its most original artist. Nearer to Šalda's ideals were the two great symbolist poets who began to write in the 90's. Antonín Sova (q.v.) was a sensitive, moody poet whose roots were in an impressionist, introspective, subjective lyricism; it was only in his later years that he turned to symbolism. He also wrote much high-minded, rhetorical poetry envisaging a utopian socialism. Otokar Březina (q.v.), who is usually coupled with Sova, was a far greater and more consistent artist. Březina is possibly the greatest recent Czech poet. He wrote a few volumes of hymns which combine an original Christian mysticism with an ecstatic cosmic optimism, expressed in wonderful cascades of metaphors and majestic free verse. Březina, though he cannot be described as an orthodox Roman Catholic, stimulated the founding of a self-conscious Catholic literary movement; there were several talented poets in this group early in the 20th century, but it is only since the First World War that Jakub Deml (1878-), a poet, and Jaroslav Durych (q.v.), the novelist, have here made original contributions of real distinction. Březina, by the very nature of his rare and sublime art, could not have many direct followers. Among the younger poets prominent before 1918, Otakar Theer (q.v.) is nearest to him, though Theer attempted to achieve very different classical and even sculpturesque effects in free verse. Otokar Fischer (q.v.), an excellent literary historian and translator of verse, is as a poet associated with his friend Theer.

The symbolist movement was, possibly by its very nature, less successful in the field of the novel. Two women stand out, Růžena Svobodová (q.v.) and Božena Benešová (1873-1936). Both tried to overcome the forms of realism and naturalism by highly stylized techniques. Mrs. Svobodová is a very ambitious artist who suffers, however, from preciousness and aestheticism, while Mrs. Benešová is preoccupied with ethical problems. Her depth and earnestness are impaired only by an undeniable coldness of imagination. This could not be said of Fráňa Šrámek (q.v.), also a lyrical poet of distinction, whose impressionist novels glorify sex and adolescent love with lyrical tenderness. In all these novelists, narrative power and composition are weak; the novel with them somewhat approaches lyrical poetry in its effect and aim. This tendency to lyricism precluded the success of these writers on the stage, though several of them (Šalda, Theer, Fischer, Šrámek) tried to return poetry to the theatre.

Many of these writers lived beyond 1918, producing some of their best work in the years after the First World War, and it would be absurd to deny the continuity of Czech literature through the war years. But the literary atmosphere changed after the establishment of an independent Czechoslovak republic. A stream of self-confidence and buoyant optimism flooded the country. The pre-war writers, exclusively interested in the adventures of their own souls, lost their following. Social questions, sentiments common to the masses of mankind, became the central topic. Subjectivism, individualism, anything that savored of "decadence," were swept away in a great flood of communal experience. The old intellectualism disappeared, and many writers embraced a gospel of life in direct opposition to spirit and mind. Freed as they just were from the prison of the war years, they glorified the pleasures of mere existence, the beauty of the simplest and nearest things. Criticism, still led by Šalda, was prolific in producing manifestoes, programs, and many essays which usually either overrated the peculiar art of the critic's liking or indulged in fierce polemics against the enemy. Only a few critics stand out in this period: F. Götz (1894), an untiring defender of every new movement; B. Václavek (1897-1942), the best among the Marxist critics; and A. Vyskočil (1890-), whose outlook is Catholic. Czech poetry, after 1918, went through three rather clearly marked stages which can be labeled "proletarian" poetry, "poetism," and a return to spiritualism. First, a new social radicalism became the keynote of the young poets, inspired by the successes of the Communist revolution in Russia. The most prominent poet of this movement was Jiří Wolker (q.v.), whose early death made him even more than during his life the symbol of the young generation. His poetical technique is traditional. It preserves the lucid simplicity of the folk song and folk ballad. More "modernist" techniques were inspired and practiced by two older poets, S. K. Neumann (q.v.), who had his roots in an anarchic individualism and had sung hymns to sensual love before he came to glorify industrial civilization and the Russian Revolution, and Josef Hora (q.v.), for whom adherence to the "proletarian" movement was only an episode. Later, Hora developed into a melancholy philosophical poet who returned to the tradition of romanticism, but still preserved his own style. The enthusiasm for "proletarian" poetry began to evaporate about 1924. Social conditions seemed stabilized and a period of peace and prosperity in store. There arose a new movement, headed by Vítězslav Nezval (q.v.), which called itself "poetism." This was a new designation for pure poetry devoid of thought and propaganda, for poetry as a play of fancy and association. Nezval was a virtuoso of colorful little pictures, illogical associations, and whole topsy-turvy worlds. Later, his obvious associations with futurism weakened, and he embraced the creed of French surrealism. The reaction against "poetism" came with the general darkening of the international and national horizon. A new group of poets has arisen whose exact achievement and comparative rank it would be difficult to judge at this moment. They have a new spirituality, a new, very abstract style, and a hymnlike rhythm quite different from the little splashes of color and the comic ditties of Nezval. Jan Zahradníček (1905-) and František Halas (1901-) seem to be the most promising of these newcomers. Here are the beginnings of a further development of Czech poetry whose fruits cannot now be predicted. But the Parisian modernism seems dead, and perhaps it is a significant fact that even the poets formerly connected with "proletarian" poetry and "poetism"—Nezval, Hora, and Seifert—have returned to patriotic and philosophic themes.

It is much more difficult to distinguish clear stages in the development of the Czech post-war novel. Certain tendencies of the novel agree with the general trend of literature away from individualism. The old psychological novel disappears almost completely. The old forms of narrative, with a clear chain of events, were largely discarded in favor of forms which tried to grasp a great multitude of events and figures. Experiments in form increased in number, and the themes seemed to cover the universe. The social novel, devoted to a discussion of social problems, has been very much in the forefront of popular attention, but one cannot say that it has achieved great artistic success. Marie Majerová (1882-), a specialist in industrial problems, has a zest and vitality which make us forget her rather crude distribution of light and shade, and there are other competent writers who try to give documentary pictures of social conflicts, largely in the cities. The best recent pictures of the social scene in Czechoslovakia, the novels of Mrs. Marie Tilschová (1873-) and of Mrs. Marie Pujmanová (1893-), are actually revivals or survivals of naturalism. The country has again become the topic of fiction, written in a quite different spirit from the older folklore idyls. The new "ruralists," as they call themselves, have done much for a clearer understanding of the peasant and his struggles. J. Knap (1900-) has been the mouthpiece of the very self-conscious movement, František Křelina (1902-) and J. V. Kříž (1900-) are the best-known names, but Jan Čep (q.v.) is the outstanding artist. He is only loosely related to the group as he has no social axe to grind, but rather struggles for inner harmony with a deep melancholy for which the soil and the country are only a symbolic cure. The war novel, also a special field with very different techniques and outlooks, has had its promoters. Jaroslav Hašek (q.v.) has drawn a grotesque picture of the Austrian Empire in dissolution and created the type of the "go-slow" Czech in his Dobrý voják Švejk (Good Soldier Švejk). But artistically, Hašek is a survival of naturalism, full of low humor and naïve propaganda. The great adventure of the Czechoslovak legions in Russia and Siberia lent itself to different treatment. Rudolf Medek (1890-1940) has written in a heroic spirit novels based on his own experiences, while Josef Kopta (1894-) tried rather, in his Třetí rota (1924; Third Platoon), to describe the soul of the masses in a quiet, kindly way which stresses the human side of the war that is missing both in the heroic Medek and the cynical Hašek.

Among the younger fiction writers, Egon Hostovský (1908-) specializes in novels of horror and crime, presented with great skill; indeed in the recent Czech novel the general level of technique, facility, and knowledge of the subject is high. Four authors seem to stand out most conspicuously as personalities with a clearly discernible development and individual style. Ivan Olbracht (q.v.) began with subtle psychological novels and has since achieved great success with Nikolaj Šuhaj, loupežník (Nikolaj Suhaj, the Robber), a vivid picture of Sub-Carpathian Russia which has rare narrative and epic power. It is difficult to imagine a greater contrast than that between the communist Olbracht and Jaroslav Durych. Durych is a Roman Catholic writer who has, almost singlehanded, revived the Czech historical novel. His great novel on Wallenstein, Bloudění (The Erring Quest), is a large-scale fresco of the Thirty Years' War in baroque taste, inspired by a fervid mysticism and otherworldliness which penetrate his poetry and the rest of his prose as well. Another violent contrast in ideology and style is that of Karel Čapek with both Olbracht and Durych. Čapek is best known as a playwright, in collaboration with his painter-brother Josef Čapek (q.v.). But his best work is in his fiction, especially in a trilogy of philosophical novels which overshadows his other varied writings—his crime stories, his humorous travel books, fairy tales, essays, etc. Čapek felt in harmony with his age, though he criticized the evils of modern civilization in several anti-utopian utopias. There is something genuinely representative in Čapek's love of the small man, in his belief in democracy and humanity. Of a still different mental type is Vladislav Vančura (q.v.), who had nothing of Čapek's optimism. He glories in the merely animal, in the grotesque and repulsive; he became an amazing virtuoso of style and technique who broke with all the traditional forms of the novel. On the whole, the Czech novel after the First World War has presented an astonishingly vivid picture of reality.

Compared to the abundance of good poetry and competent novels, the production of the drama since 1918 seems meager in actual achievement, in spite of the excellent stagecraft of the Prague theatre. The brothers Čapek have made the round of the world's stages with their plays which treat topical problems with great skill. The poetical drama, in spite of ambitious attempts, has failed in this period as everywhere else. Only František Langer (q.v.) has scored lasting success with well-constructed—though hardly profound—comedies and dramas from the life of the Prague bourgeoisie on the outskirts of the city.

See: J. Jakubec and A. Novák, Geschichte der tschechischen Literatur (1907; 2d ed., 1913); A. Novák, Přehledné dějiny literatury české (1909; 4th ed., 1939), "Die tschechische Literatur," in O. Walzel, Handbuch der Literaturwissenschaft (1931), "Czech Literature during and after the War," Slavonic Review, II (1923-1924), 114-132, and "Česká literatura," in Československá vlastivěda, Vol. VII (1933); F. X. Šalda, Moderní literatura česká (1909; 3d ed., 1929) and Krásná literatura česká v prvním desetiletí republiky (1930); H. Jelínek, La Littérature tchèque contemporaine (1912), Etudes tchécoslovaques (1927), and Histoire de la littérature tchèque (3 vols., 1930-1935); F.

Chudoba, A Short Survey of Czech Literature (1924); B. Václavek, Česká literatura XX. století (1935); K. Polák, Československá literatura, 1890–1935 (1936); R. Wellek, "Twenty Years of Czech Literature (1918–1938)," Slavonic Review, XVII (1938–1939), 329–342, and "The Two Traditions of Czech Literature," in A. Kaun and E. J. Simmons, eds., Slavic Studies (1943), 16 essays in honor of G. R. Noyes; P. Selver, Czechoslovak Literature; an Outline (1942).

R. W.

D

Dabit, Eugène (1898–1936, French novelist), was born in Paris, the son of a laborer. He attended school only until he was 11 years old. He worked as an apprentice locksmith, as an elevator operator at the Lamarck station of the Paris subway, as a house painter. At 18 he enlisted in the army and was at the front from December, 1916, to November, 1918. Upon his return he completed his education by attending night school, taking courses in drawing and painting. He discovered Balzac, Flaubert (q.v.), Zola (q.v.), Maupassant (q.v.), Huysmans (q.v.), Proust (q.v.), and Gide (q.v.). The works of Vallès (q.v.) were a revelation to him. He recognized in them the Paris he knew—its joys, its sorrows, its violence, and its force. Huysmans instilled in him an admiration for a vigorous and precise style. In reading Charles Louis Philippe (q.v.), Dabit felt as if he were meeting a friend and a guide who would help him clarify his desires and bring to light his weaknesses. At the time his parents had become the proprietors of a 50-room hotel. Dabit wrote of the lives of those who frequented the place in Hôtel du Nord (1929; Eng. tr., 1931), a realistic novel awarded the Populist Prize in 1931. Overnight he became well known. Advised and encouraged by Roger Martin du Gard (q.v.) and Gide, he wrote a second book, in part autobiographical, Petit-Louis (1930). From then on one or two books appeared every year—Villa Oasis (1932), Faubourgs de Paris (1933), Un Mort tout neuf (1934), L'Île (1934), La Zone verte (1935), Trains de vie (1936). He died of scarlet fever on August 21, 1936, in a hospital in Sevastopol, after having been ill only four days. He had accompanied Gide and Louis Guilloux (q.v.) on a two-month trip to Soviet Russia to attend the funeral of Maxim Gorky (q.v.).

Like many writers born of the masses, Eugène Dabit mistrusted—perhaps a little too strongly—those of his associates who wrote for the masses. He doubted the sincerity of the "populist" school of writers and disliked being classed as one of them. The preface to his last book is typical in this respect; in it he declares that literature, without sacrificing any of its value, should be employed as a weapon against a treacherous and cruel world.

P. B.

Dąbrowska, Marja (née Szumska, 1892–, Polish sociologist and novelist), was born in Rusów, Kalisz district, German Poland. She began to write when very young; at 15 her first story was published in the Gazeta kaliska. She studied much abroad—natural science in Brussels, social conditions in Switzerland, England, and France, the cooperative movement in Finland—and then returned to Poland to marry a well-known social worker and to dedicate herself to the cause of social and economic reform. After a 10-year apprenticeship as a militant publicist, she turned to fiction, making use for this purpose of memories of her own childhood. The result was the impressive saga of Kalisz, Noce i dnie (1932–1934; Nights and Days), which now won for Dąbrowska renown as a literary artist on a par with the fame she had previously enjoyed as a student of social change, thanks especially to an earlier novel, Ludzie stamtąd (1925; The Landless). As a result of her challenging Rozdroże (1937; The Crossroads), a condensed survey of the peasant problem in Poland from the earliest times to the present, together with its sequel, Ręce w uścisku (1939; Hand in Hand), Dąbrowska became the center of a head-on clash between the elements in Poland that desired slow, organic evolution and those demanding immediate change, especially in the relationship of the peasant to the state. In 1939 Dąbrowska turned to the sea as a theme, since the sea was then an important issue in Poland's national life, and produced a drama of the times of King Władysław IV (17th century), Genjusz sierocy (Orphan Genius). This was widely praised for its literary qualities as well as for its applicability to an immediate problem.

See: F. Schoell, "Le Roman-Fleuve de Marja Dąbrowska," Pologne littéraire, 1933, No. 100; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 200–228, 690–692; J. Spytkowski, "Sumienie społeczne," Marchoń, III (1936–1937), 554–556.

A. P. C.

Danish literature has always accorded an important place to the critic. For a full century Denmark was under the dominion of two critics of widely different principles and outlook. Johan Ludvig Heiberg (1791-1860), who was the literary czar before the advent of Georg Brandes (q.v.), was above all else an arbiter of form, and it is noteworthy that he condemned an erratic genius such as Hans Christian Andersen because his style was not according to accepted standards. Brandes, on the other hand, concerned himself with the message of the writer rather than the form. Modern Danish literature may be said to date from 1871 when Brandes began his series of epoch-making lectures on world literature in Copenhagen. He declared that Denmark was 40 years behind the times and needed to be awakened out of her romantic dreaming. To some extent this awakening had already begun. The disastrous war of 1864 had roused the Danes out of their complacency, and in the field of literature the Jutlander Steen Steensen Blicher (1782-1848) and the Jew Meir Aron Goldschmidt (1819-1887) had been forerunners of realism. The brilliance and aggressiveness of Brandes and his faculty for stirring up discussion made him the leader of a movement for which the times were ripe. Momentous as his influence was, it was due less to any positive contribution than to the general effect of liberation. True, Brandes developed a tyranny of his own, and it is surprising how many writers revolted against the spell he cast over them. But even in revolt they owed to him the incitement that helped them to realize their own individuality. The immediate effect of the movement initiated by him was to make Danish writers see the world afresh and coin new expressions for what they saw. This is especially true of Jens Peter Jacobsen (q.v.), the finest spirit in what came to be known as the Modern Awakening (Det moderne Gennembrud). His penetration especially into feminine psychology was something new in Danish literature. His novel Niels Lyhne (1880; Eng. tr., 1919), though ostensibly placed in the time preceding the war of 1864, actually mirrors the currents of thought in the 70's. Niels Lyhne believes in atheism as the salvation of humanity, but "falls" from atheism in a moment of sore trial. A dreamer but essentially sound, he became the model for many later heroes who had nothing in common with him except inability to fit themselves into organized society. Jacobsen's style also had many imitators. As Brandes pointed out, language "needs to be tuned afresh" a few times in a century, and it was Jacobsen who molded the Danish language into a medium fit for modern ideas. He owed some of its oral quality to the example of Hans Christian Andersen, but the richness of color and texture was all his own and has never been surpassed in Danish literature. His prose is often rhythmic. His poetry, which is thoughtful and psychological rather than lyrical, became the inspiration of Stuckenberg (q.v.) and the poets of the 90's.

The finest lyrist of the period and the only poet of rank in the Modern Awakening was Holger Drachmann (q.v.). He was drawn to the new movement by his instinct of revolt and his sympathy for the oppressed. Some of his poems about the sweated trades might have been written under the influence of the Russian Revolution. On the other hand, his nationalism, and especially his feeling for the Danes who had so recently come under the German yoke, drew him to the conservative camp. Drachmann has written also popular plays, short stories, and a long autobiographical novel, Forskrevet (1890; Signed Away). Sophus Schandorph (1844-1922), under the influence of Zola (q.v.), wrote peasant tales in which a somewhat heavy-handed realism is redeemed by a jovial good humor. He may be considered as a forerunner of Henrik Pontoppidan (q.v.), the greatest of Danish naturalists. Pontoppidan continued the line from Brandes and Jacobsen in criticizing the Danes for their addiction to dreams, but while Jacobsen concentrated on one character reflected in a few satellite persons, Pontoppidan filled a great canvas with a variety of figures. His fame rests chiefly on three broadly planned novel cycles which, together with his short stories, form an almost complete picture of Danish life in town and country and of Danish religious movements and politics as seen in the span of a long lifetime. The central work in point of time and importance is Lykke-Per (2 vols., 1898-1904; Lucky Per). Pontoppidan's style matches his thought, manly and vigorous. In contrast to him, the sensitive, neurasthenic Herman Bang (q.v.) had something feminine in his nature. He is most nearly classic in what have been called "tragic idylls," stories depicting the joyless lives of persons—chiefly women—who hang on the fringes of gentility or are victims of social injustice. Under the influence of the French naturalists (see French naturalism) and of the Norwegian novelist Jonas Lie (q.v.), Bang developed an impressionistic treatment and a scintillating style, sometimes marred by mannerisms, but his subjective approach prevented him from attaining the objectivity of the true naturalist. In the spirit of the age he castigated the complacency and weakness of his countrymen in such works as Tine (1889), dealing with the defeat of 1864, and Stuk (1887; Stucco), a novel of Copenhagen in which he describes the sons of those who fought at Dybbøl as a kind of lost generation, unable to lay hold of life either in honest work or in genuine passion. Most of the men of the Modern Awakening were influenced by English and French thought, but Karl Gjellerup (q.v.) pronounced himself a disciple of the Germans. While his contemporaries took their subjects close at hand, he went far afield for exotic themes. His ethical sense revolted against the idea of free love, and he sided with Björnstjerne Björnson (q.v.) in the Morality Feud which shook Scandinavia. Study of Old Norse led him to the common Germanic origins and from those to modern Germany; Schiller revealed to him the glory that was Greece, and from Greek thought he went on to that of India, thus completing the "Aryan" cycle. He finally became an exponent of Buddhism.

Peter Nansen (1861-1918), a writer typical of the 80's, imitates Herman Bang in his impressionistic style but without Bang's human sympathy. The literary and bohemian circles, which Holger Drachmann described seriously in his novel Forskrevet, the new writers dealt with frivolously. The background of their books is the city, but its life of pleasure, never the workaday world. Erotic themes are treated with blasé cynicism. Akin to Peter Nansen were the Copenhagen dramatists, Edvard Brandes (1847-1931), Otto Benzon (1856-1927), Gustav Esmann (1860-1904), and on a somewhat more serious plane Arne Einar Christiansen (1861-). Gustav Wied (q.v.), the author of plays, short stories, and novels, gravitated between naturalism and fantastic caricature. All these writers continued to some extent the traditions of the great 18th-century comedy writer, Ludvig Holberg, but without his didactic purpose. On the whole it must be said that naturalism had become decadent and realism had degenerated into materialism.

The neo-romantic movement of the early 90's, which in Sweden was initiated by Heidenstam and Lagerlöf (qq.v.), in Norway by Hamsun (q.v.), was represented in Denmark chiefly by the poets. As leaders must be counted the three friends Johannes Jørgensen, Sophus Claussen (qq.v.), and Viggo Stuckenberg. Jørgensen was at first an admirer of Brandes and under his influence became a freethinker, but, feeling his spiritual needs unsatisfied, turned to a mystic religion and finally, in 1896, was converted to Catholicism. He has told the story of his conversion in a remarkable autobiography Mit Livs Legende (6 vols., 1916-1919; Eng. tr., Jørgensen, an Autobiography, 2 vols., 1928-1929.) Jørgensen has written limpid and beautiful poems and voluminous prose. His international fame rests on his biographies of Francis of Assisi and Catherine of Siena. Viggo Stuckenberg collaborated with his friend Jørgensen in establishing, in 1893, the magazine Taarnet (The Tower), which was to be the organ of the symbolic school of poetry, but owing to lack of funds was short-lived. In this magazine Stuckenberg began the publication of a dramatic poem, Den vilde Jæger (The Wild Huntsman), which in its medieval mysticism marked a very distinct departure from the literary ideals of the preceding decade. Sophus Claussen is first and last a lyric poet. He and Ludvig Holstein (q.v.) have written nature lyrics inspired by the gentle, idyllic scenes of the Danish islands. The youngest in the group of poets of the 90's was Helge Rode (q.v.), whose lyrics have sometimes been compared to those of Shelley. The best of his poems are contained in a volume which takes its name from a poem entitled Ariel (1914). He wrote also plays, notable for intellectual content rather than adaptation for the stage, but he became best known for his subtle essays, one volume of which significantly is entitled Regenerationen i vort Aandsliv (1923; The Regeneration in Our Intellectual Life). He made himself the leader in a movement which, in pointed reference to the so-called Modern Awakening (Det moderne Gennembrud) he called, in his book of that name, Det sjælelige Gennembrud (1928; The Awakening of the Soul). Jørgensen said of him: "Helge Rode had the courage in 1892 to mention a word that was taboo in the highest intellectual circles; he mentioned God." Helge Rode never, like Johannes Jørgensen, accepted an authoritarian religion, but he vindicated the supremacy of the spirit against the materialistic principles of the age. In his book written during the First World War, Krig og Aand (1917; War and the Spirit), he attempted to show how the intellectual development of the half century from 1864 to 1914, passing through the phases of naturalism, Darwinism, and Nietzscheism, had led directly to the catastrophe. As the only possible salvation of the world he saw a return to religious faith. To the neo-romanticists belong also two poets of a different trend, Sophus Michaëlis (1865-1932) and Niels Møller (1859-1941), who tended to choose subjects remote in time and place in order to get away from the drabness of modern life. The popular poet Laurits Christian Nielsen (1871-1930), with his subjects from folk life, bridged the gap between the poets of the 90's and the writers of the soil who initiated the new century.

The writers of the soil were natives of Jutland, the mainland of Denmark, which, with its harsher natural conditions of heath and sand dune—perhaps also its proximity to the enemy in the South—has tended to develop a folk of sterner stuff than those who live on the islands. Their movement was a protest against the assumption that all literary values began and ended in Copenhagen. It was a reaction also against the introspection of the neo-romanticists and marked a return to a naturalism somewhat akin to that of Pontoppidan (who was himself a Jutlander), though none of the group had his breadth or his multiplicity of types. They may be classified rather as regional writers, each one cultivating his own small strip with minute care. Somewhat broader than the rest is Jakob Knudsen (q.v.), the oldest of the group, though his important literary production does not begin till toward the end of the 19th century. He was originally a teacher and clergyman and was influenced by the great Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard. Knudsen's fiction deals primarily with ethical and religious problems, seen from an unconventional point of view. His most significant work, Den gamle Præst (1899; The Old Pastor), has for its central figure a patriarchal leader in the parish. Johannes V. Jensen (q.v.) in his youth made himself the leader of the Jutland writers in their protest against the sophistication of Copenhagen, and he may be counted as a regional writer in so far as his point of departure has been that region in Jutland where his ancestors had lived for generations. All the harshness and primitiveness of old Jutland is in his masterly Himmerlands-historier (3 vols., 1898-1910; Himmerland Stories), but he has an infinitely wider outlook than the other writers of the group. Travels in America and the Orient gave him a marked sympathy for the Anglo-Saxon people and an admiration for American technical achievements. He developed a racial theory by which he traced a connection between his native Jutlanders and the Anglo-Saxon elements in England and America. The assumption that people who went out from Himmerland were the original Cimbri who attacked the Roman Empire is the basis of his greatest work, Den lange Reise (1909-1920; The Long Journey), a racial epic of six independent novels in which he tells the history of the Northern race from a time so remote that Scandinavia was in the preglacial tropical age, down to Columbus (whom he counts as a Northerner). It is written with a grandeur of conception and a power of imagination never equaled in Danish literature and rarely in any literature. Though based on historical and scientific studies, it is a creative work which does not pretend to keep within the stockade of known facts. Among the older Jutland writers Johan Skjoldborg and Jeppe Aakjær (qq.v.) were definitely enlisted in the service of social reform. Skjoldborg in his novel Gyldholm (1902) described with stark realism the life of the pauperized agricultural laborers upon whose toil the luxury and refinement of the Danish manorial estates rested. Jeppe Aakjær in Vredens Børn; et Tyendes Saga (1904; Children of Wrath; the Saga of a Servant) painted a dark picture of the life of servants on the peasant farms. He continued to champion reform in books that are sometimes marred by too great zeal, but he is wholly the artist in his lyrics, among which Rugens Sange (1906; Songs of the Rye) are best known. Marie Bregendahl (q.v.), in her low-toned stories of peasant home life, has created some authentic interiors and fine types of peasant women. All these peasant writers move among elemental realities as they tell the story of people who grapple with the problems of their harsh, simple lives, exhibiting a grim strength that is impressive. The books describing them may at times be monotonous in their sharply narrowed field, but have the integrity that comes from knowledge and sympathy.

The Jutland writers were rooted in tradition. Martin Andersen Nexø (q.v.), spokesman of the city proletariat, declared of his hero, Pelle, that it was his purpose to create a hero who should "spring naked out of nothing and conquer the world." He vindicates the sacredness of every human life, however poor and obscure, and fulminates against a world that cares nothing for its poorer children. He sees the world as a constant struggle between the oppressed and the oppressor, the exploited and the exploiter. He is unwilling to concede a spark of humane feeling to the upper classes. It cannot be denied that he is often unjust and in particular that he describes as if they still existed conditions and abuses that have long since been reformed in Denmark, defending himself by saying that he is describing the eternal struggle between those who have and those who have not. Since the Russian Revolution he has looked to Communism as the salvation of humanity. Despite his savage theories, there is in Nexø's writing an element of the idyllic which did much to win international fame for his four-volume novel cycle Pelle Erobreren (1906-1910; Eng. tr., Pelle the Conqueror, 1913-1917; combined in one volume, 1930), the story of a poor boy who becomes a labor leader. The feminine counterpart, Ditte Menneskebarn (5 vols., 1917-1921; Eng. tr., Ditte: Girl Alive! 1920; Ditte, Daughter of Man, 1921; Ditte: Toward the Stars, 1922; combined in one volume, 1931), the story of a poor servant girl, is darker and more poignantly moving. Knud Hjortø (1869-1932), a native of the island of Zealand, has written some regional books, but has done his most distinguished work in philosophical and psychological novels. Otto Rung (1874-) writes novels akin to the English and American with a complexity of characters and plot, drawing sometimes on current conditions, as in his Paradisfuglen (1919; The Bird of Paradise), which describes conditions in Copenhagen during the First World War. Harald Kidde's (1878-1918) sensitive and dreamy art was more akin to that of J. P. Jacobsen and was cut short by his early death in 1918. Among women novelists Gyrithe Lemche (1866-) specializes in the solid historical novel, Karin Michaëlis (1872-) excels as an interpreter of feminine psychology, while Thit Jensen (1876-) has turned from vigorous novels of the soil to novels of medieval Denmark. Johannes Anker-Larsen's (1874-) novel De Vises Sten (1923; Eng. tr., The Philosopher's Stone, 1924) was an expression of the religious unrest following the war. Johannes Buchholtz (1882-) writes stories of provincial life full of humor and with a light touch. Jacob Paludan (1896-) is a striking example of the reaction against modern noisy and strident civilization with its destruction of more quiet values. In his novel Fugle omkring Fyret (1925; Eng. tr., Birds around the Light, 1928) he describes a fishing hamlet and its simple people being demoralized by the construction of an artificial harbor—which is itself destroyed by the sea. Later he wrote a series of novels about the time of the First World War and after in Denmark, always seeing modern life from a pessimistic point of view. A departure from the preoccupation with the near and immediate was an almost startlingly brilliant historical novel by a young writer, Nis Petersen (1897-1943), entitled Sandalmagernes Gade (1931; Eng. tr., The Street of the Sandal-makers, 1933) from Rome at the time of Marcus Aurelius.

In the present century a younger group of writers has continued the tradition from the Jutland school, but without the social passion for reform that marked the work of Aakjær and Skjoldborg. The oldest is Thomas Olesen Løkken (q.v.), who was born in 1877, but whose first important work did not appear till after the First World War. His three serial novels about the fate of the farmer Nils Hald pictures the disintegrating influence of wartime speculation on rural Denmark. Klavs Bjerg og Bodil (1923; Klavs Bjerg and Bodil) deals with more primitive types and is a powerful story of the struggle for survival on the sand dunes along the North Sea. In this book, as often in stories of western Jutland, where life is hard, the influence of the pietistic dissenters is felt. Hans Kirk's (q.v.) first novel, Fiskerne (1928; The Fishermen), is a subtle study of the form religion takes in each of the simple people that make up the group. Harry Søiberg's (q.v.) most important work, the three-volume novel De Levendes Land (1916-1920; The Land of the Living) has for its main theme the religious stirrings in a community on the western coast. Marcus Lauesen (1907-), a young writer of South Jutland, found a fresh background for his novels from the Danish-German border. Og nu venter vi paa Skib (1931; Eng. tr., Waiting for a Ship, 1933) describes the decline of an old family of ship-owners whose ships once sailed to China and whose romantic past lent glamour to the little town in South Jutland.

Poetry continues to hold a high place in Danish literature. Valdemar Rørdam (q.v.), a very prolific writer, is akin to the romanticists of the early 19th century. Warmly patriotic, he has been especially the spokesman of the South Jutlanders in their sufferings under German rule. He has written plays and long narrative poems, of which the best known is Gudrun Dyre (1902), but is finest as a lyricist. Hans Hartvig Seedorf Pedersen (q.v.) is a versatile poet who has won popularity by his humorous and sometimes grim ballads, but has written also elegies and poems inspired by his travels around the world. Kai Hoffmann (1874-) is a singer of everyday life and of simple things. Emil Bønnelyche (1893-) is a pioneer of expressionism.

Drama has had fewer votaries. Among the older men, Henri Nathansen (q.v.) had one of the finest talents. Best known is his play Indenfor Murene (1912; Within the Walls) which gives a picture of the Jewish group in Denmark. Nathansen's contention has been that the Jews have tended too much to give up their special heritage, allowing themselves to be absorbed by the gentiles. In a biography of Brandes he reproaches the great critic with being too Danish and too little Jewish. Svend Borberg (1888-) has written a hyper-modern play in Circus Juris (1935), in which he argues that every person has within him several individuals, often at odds, so that one cannot form a just opinion of him merely by his external action. Two playwrights of widely different outlook and choice of subjects, Kaj Munk and Kjeld Abell (qq.v.), have dominated the drama of Denmark in recent years. Kaj Munk, a clergyman who has been influenced by the Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard, likes to recreate the strong men, one might perhaps say the great criminals, of history with a mixture of fascination and loathing. Among them are Herod in his great play En Idealist (1928; An Idealist); Henry VIII in Cant (1934), perhaps his most successful play on the stage; Mussolini in Sejren (1936; The Victory). He pictures his strong men so convincingly that he sometimes makes us think for a moment that he admires them for their wholeness and singleness of purpose, but he always leads them to their downfall. His real hero is the gentle, unworldly Professor Mensch in Han sidder ved Smeltediglen (1938; He Sits by the Melting Pot) who refuses to lend himself to persecution of the Jews. Kaj Munk has himself given the program which he thinks modern drama must follow; if it is to be successful it must learn from the films, where things happen, and must get away from the quiet conversation pieces of the past. Kjeld Abell has also learned from the films. He portrays with a light humorous touch full of grace the common everyday people of his own city, but his humor sometimes hides a bitter satire, as in Melodien, der blev væk (1935; Eng. tr., The Melody That Got Lost, 1939), a comedy about the poor office proletariat, which has been called a communistic vaudeville. Eva aftjener sin Barnepligt (1936; Eva Serves Her Time as a Child) is a delightful comedy about children, ironical on the subject of the joys of childhood. The underlying social theory of Abell's light comedies came out surprisingly in Anna Sophie Hedvig (1939; Eng. tr. in Scandinavian Plays of the Twentieth Century, Ser. 2, 1944), a drama about a gentle, middle-aged woman teacher in a provincial girls' school, who deliberately murders the principal of the school in order to save a pupil from tyranny. The act is justified by the author and in the last scene is linked with all revolt against injustice through the introduction of the execution of a young revolutionary.

See: Villhelm Andersen, Det nittende Aarhundrede anden Halvdel, Vol. IV (1925) of C. S. Petersen and V. Andersen, Illustreret dansk Litteraturhistorie; Hanna Astrup Larsen, ed., Denmark's Best Stories (1928); H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Literature from Brandes to Our Day (1929); Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934).

H. A. L.

D'Annunzio, Gabriele (1863-1938, Italian poet, novelist, and publicist), is the last of recent Italian literary figures of truly European fame and also occupies a significant place in the political and social history of Italy. He is a kind of last sun and such a burning one that he seems to have left apathy and barrenness behind him, as though instead of providing the country's soil with a gentle heat he had seared it and made it arid. His life might be reconstructed by an admirer as if it were a Dantean journey, which from an Inferno of sensual experience (1883-1910), through the Purgatory of his French exile (1910-1915), finally led him by way of his military exploits and the rescue of Fiume (1915-1920) to assumption in a Paradise of the nation's benefactors where he remained until the end (1938). The eye of the critic can discern something true in this ascent, recognizing especially the signs of a growing need to escape from the distressing and boring sensual dilettantism of the early years, provided it also discerns the indelible print left by that sensuality upon the entire life.

D'Annunzio was born into a patriarchal family of "pure Sabelian race" in the charming town of Pescara, near the mountains and on the Adriatic coast, half-way down the Italian Peninsula. From youth he had a certain kind of handsomeness, and his features were illuminated by a smile of ambiguous quality such as appears on the faces of primitive Etruscan statues. His first period was one of precocious conquest. His eloquence already had the fascination that makes women yield and sweeps men into action; he knew glory at an age when others only dream about it, knew love at an age when it is for most only romantic imaginings, and had money in abundance at a time when it is apt to be only a hope. Later he was to see the Italian aristocratic world at his knees, the masses childishly curious about his every gesture, youth imitating him in his external appearance—even austere representatives of the Soviets finally paid him the tribute of a visit. He unscrupulously used everything and everybody. He was able to choose from among the world's pleasures: his luxuries, his entertainments, his various dwellings, and his innumerable love affairs (especially that with Eleonora Duse, which inspired Il Fuoco, 1900; Eng. trs., The Flame of Life, 1900, The Flame, 1906, 1914) became famous in the current annals of literature and scandal. When nearly 40, driven from his Settignano villa by creditors accumulated through a manner of life more extravagant than truly elegant, D'Annunzio left his country and established himself in France (1910), where he took pleasure in writing works for the theatre (Le Martyre de St. Sebastien, 1911) in his own brand of French, conquered with his personal fascination worldly and intellectual elements in Paris, and engaged in his single and highly successful motion-picture enterprise (Cabiria, 1914).

He left France in May, 1915, to play his role in the reaction that swept Italy into war against Austria and Germany. At the end of the war he led the expedition which, in opposition to the Treaty of Versailles, restored Fiume to Italy (the March on Ronchi, September 11–12, 1919). He was later obliged by Giolitti's prosaic firmness to leave Fiume. When Fascism came, he accepted it somewhat hesitatingly and lived a life apart in the disdainful, menacing solitude of the Vittoriale, a museum more than an abode. Fortune, which had protected him since birth, granted him the favor of dying before he could witness his country's ruin.

D'Annunzio's life appears restricted after all to a single desire, the search for a new, stimulating, attractive sensation, and a parallel limitation can be found in his art—whatever the abundance of rhymed and free verse, dramas, novels, short stories, apologetic pieces, descriptions, dialogues, diaries, confessions, proclamations, letters, notes. Concerning the one D'Annunzian tone there is fundamental agreement among the critics; they always come back to this theme of the "senses," in evidence from his very earliest compositions.

Primo Vere (1880), which immediately found appreciation, and Canto novo (1882), which gave him fame, are poems based on the manner of Carducci (q.v.) and Lorenzo Stecchetti (pseud. of Olindo Guerrini, 1845–1916); Il Libro delle vergini (1884) and San

Pantaleone (1886) show him looking towards naturalism and wanting to be an Abruzzian Verga (q.v.), although at the same time borrowing freely from Maupassant (q.v.). But he really detached himself early from all those masters. A very keen eye was accompanied by a profound indifference to human thought and sorrow, and by an ingenuous barbarism which could be felt in his communion with the sea, the earth, and the sky, without any preoccupations of a historical or reflective character, and with a special delight in sexual imagery (in 1883 the Intermezzo di rime, openly aphrodisiac, caused a scandal). Analyses were as precise as they were cruel, descriptions as accurate as they were cold. The subject matter of D'Annunzio's writings was to change, but he never really left this one manner. Some of his masterpieces are already in this earlier work and stand comparison with pages of Le Laudi (1903–1912), especially the first book, or the Notturmo (1921). He always describes. If the scenes are invented, the myth has the precision and the reality of fact; if taken from real life, the description has the enchanted air of the myth. He is forever the painter of bodies and not of souls. The pictures live their own life separate from the ensemble of the book. It is easier to isolate them in the verses and diaries than in the novels, but the result of the reading is consistently this isolation of a page, a detail, a paragraph; the reader is fatally led to neglect the plot, which is pure fiction, to forget the character, who has no life, to skip the thesis, which is artificial. D'Annunzio's art has been compared with that of the Alexandrians and of the Italian Marini; his quality of decadence or excessive romantic individualism is equally the cultural summation of much else, as can be seen from his first novel, Il Piacere (1889; Eng. tr., The Child of Pleasure, 1898). He continues with this kind of magic, but as one Italian critic says, "In all our literature there is no writer of his rank who is equally lacking in ideas." As to subject matter there are various shifts. From 1890 to 1894 he wavers between Russian influences (e.g., the two novels L'Innocente, 1892, Eng. trs., The Intruder, 1898, The Victim, 1914; and Giovanni Episcopo, 1892, Eng. tr., Episcopo & Company, 1896; to which corresponds in poetry the Poema paradisiaco, 1893) and the influence of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche (q.v.) (Il Trionfo della morte, 1894; Eng. tr., The Triumph of Death, 1896), where we can already perceive the desire to escape sensuality through death. His fundamental manner is the same in his several dramatic efforts, composed especially during his friendship with Eleonora Duse: Allegoria della primavera (1895), Il Sogno d'un mattino di primavera (1897; Eng. tr., The Dream of a Spring Morning, 1902), Il Sogno d'un tramonto d'autunno (1898; Eng. tr., The Dream of an Autumn Sunset, 1904). In these as in certain novels he takes up the theme, which was dear to him, of mysterious reincarnations of ancient figures and tragic destinies in modern personages (La Città morta, 1898; Eng. tr., The Dead City, 1902). In La Figlia di Jorio (1904; Eng. tr., The Daughter of Jorio, 1907) D'Annunzio wrote his dramatic masterpiece, which won and still keeps public favor, above all on account of the fairy-like character of the folkloristic background. La Fiaccola sotto il moggio (1905) is an inferior play about lust, and La Nave (1908) is chiefly a drama of collective lust. Francesca (1902; Eng. tr., Francesca da Rimini, 1902) and Parisina (1913) are noteworthy linguistic exercises, and the same may be said of the empty and academic Vita di Cola di Rienzi (1913) and of the philological tour de force already mentioned, Le Martyre de St. Sebastien, a morbid mixture of carnality and exterior Catholicism. The bishop of Paris properly condemned it as blasphemous. Various other attempts to play with Christian thought, especially during the time when D'Annunzio was a neighbor of a M. Bremond in the French Landes (Contemplazione della morte, 1912) are not to be taken very seriously.

Italians of recent years have greatly admired in D'Annunzio the public, military, and patriotic poet (Odi navali, although these were written in 1892), the eulogist of Garibaldi (1901), Verdi (1901), Victor Hugo (1902), and Carducci (1903), the bard of the Gesta d'oltremare (composed for the war in Tripoli, 1912) and later the trumpeting herald of Fiume (1920). In the last period of his life D'Annunzio produced certain fragmentary and diary-like books, where one finds indeed a far lighter, more transparent, and lucid writer (La Leda senza cigno, 1916), and even made use of the futuristic technique (Il Notturmo, 1921), thereby presenting Marinetti (q.v.) with a masterpiece in his own style.

The essence of D'Annunzio's art is really in the third book of Le Laudi, Alcione, written mostly after 1900 and published in 1907. Here are fables and myths seized in their immediate aspects, without the usual artificial interpositions, direct and impressive. "La Pioggia nel pineto," "Bocca d'Arno," "La Morte del cervo," "La Sera fiesolana," are constantly and rightly cited as samples of a D'Annunzio who now displays, on a vaster scale, the power he had previously shown in the "Falce di lume calante" of the Canto novo of 1882. The mature artist and the beginner prove their identity.

The effects D'Annunzio had on Italian life may be traceable to some deep inclination or tradition of the country's ruling classes which has made the so-called "D'Annunzianism" possible, a compound in which it is difficult to say what is the proportion of rhetoric, of affectation, of hardness of heart, of civil indifference, of provincialism, of ignorance, and of arrogance; its analysis would lead back to Petrarch and perhaps even to Cicero. D'Annunzianism was an "Italian disease." Naturally what was first imitated in him was his outward appearance; his necktie, his goatee, his choice of words, his scorn for creditors, his dogs with languorous eyes, his ladies with high-sounding names, his insolent possessiveness, his easy forgetfulness. Then came the more serious deformations, above all the rhetoricism which leads people to think that a thing has been done when it has only been said, albeit in exquisite fashion. In this D'Annunzianism has been lethal to many Italians. Politically, D'Annunzio's influence began in 1915. The famous March on Ronchi of 1919 prevented Fiume from becoming part of the Balkans, but, by provoking the first political revolt in the Italian army, D'Annunzio Balkanized all of Italy and opened the way for the March on Rome of 1922. It has been said that D'Annunzio gave Italy a new aesthetic consciousness, and certainly from his generation dates the conviction, spread throughout Italy, of the beauty of the country and of the importance of this beauty. But perhaps this aesthetic consciousness was gained at the expense of the political consciousness which it had been Carducci's great merit to have aroused.

A complete edition of the works of D'Annunzio has been published by the house of Mondadori at Verona in 49 volumes (1927-1936).

See: G. Borgese, Gabriele D'Annunzio (1909); E. Thovez, Il Pastore, il gregge e la zampogna (1910); G. Passerini, Vocabolario dannunziano (1928); B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 3d ed., IV (1930), 7-70; F. V. Nardelli, L'Arcangelo: Vita e miracoli di G. D'Annunzio (1931; Eng. tr., Gabriel, the Archangel, 1931); A. Sodini, Ariel armato (1931); M. Parenti, Bibliografia dannunziana essenziale (1939).

G. P.

Dantas, Júlio (1876-, Portuguese dramatist, short-story writer, and poet), is well known in his own country as a brilliant, versatile playwright and an untiring teller of amorous stories. He survives as the youngest member of a generation of dramatists and actors to which Lopes de Mendonça, Mesquita, and the brothers Rosa had belonged. Although born at Lagos, his real home is Lisbon, where he received his schooling. In 1899 he graduated from medical school, and at the same time had his first play produced in the capital. From the outset the psychiatrist and the writer were inseparable in him, as is shown by his doctor's thesis, Pintores e poetas de Rilhafoles (1900; Painters and Poets at Rilhafoles), which deals with artists among the insane. As a doctor, Dantas has seen distinguished service in the Portuguese army; as a man of letters, he achieved the distinction of being elected president of the Portuguese Academy of Sciences.

By 1900 four promising works had come from the pen of Dantas, foreshadowing his later career. They were Nada (1896; Nothing), a slender volume of materialist poems, whose originality lay in a combination of revived traditional verse forms with modern, nihilistic obsessions and a shocking anatomical vocabulary; Doentes (1897; Sick People), a collection of short stories, written in collaboration with Manuel Penteado; and two historical dramas, O que morreu de amor (1899; The One Who Died of Love) and Viriato trágico (1900; Tragic Viriatus). Soon thereafter, Dantas was to win great success as the author of plays which engaged all his talents—his sense for inner drama, his skill in supplying picturesque detail, his clinical insight, his sensuous lyricism, his gift of telling anecdotes. While remaining faithful to the nationalist and historicizing spirit of the 19th century in taking many of his plots from Portuguese history, he avoided dealing with great events or passions, to which he preferred frivolous but always entertaining subjects. One such vaguely historical drama was A Severa (1901; Severa), the melodrama which made him famous. In A Severa Dantas succeeded perfectly in creating the enchanted atmosphere of Lisbon's red-light district, the ancient Mouraria, around Count Marialva and the gypsy Severa, two romantic figures beloved by the Lisbonese. The introduction of these two new types on the Portuguese stage showed that the refined archaism of the decadent aristocrat and the slangy vulgarity of the "fado" songstress could be bedfellows. One year later A ceia dos cardeais (1902; Eng. tr., The Cardinals' Collation, 1927) appeared. It marked a turn to the lyrical one-act drama in verse and proved the author's most popular work in and outside Portugal. A tender emotion, saüdade, pervades the play, reaching its highest pitch in the superficial but intense glorification of Portuguese love as the only heartfelt love in the world. Once more Dantas was able to make the lyrical fiber of the Portuguese vibrate when he produced Rosas de todo o ano (1907; Eng. tr., Roses All the Year Round, 1912), the tender story of two women's love for the same scoundrel. Here, as in his witty short sketches and in his tales, he was at his best, flattering the fair sex. When he aimed higher he failed. In vain he tried to introduce the themes of heredity and social justice, under the influence of the Norwegians and the French. When he tackled great drama—and melodrama—it was through adaptations, from António Ferreira, Tirso de Molina, Shakespeare, Rostand (q.v.).

See: F. de Figueiredo, "O sr. Júlio Dantas," in Revista de história, VII (1918), 77-96; Wilhelm Giese, Aspectos da obra literária de Júlio Dantas (1941?).

G. M. M.

Danvila, Alfonso (1876-, Spanish novelist), has had a career in the diplomatic service, which he entered in 1896, and he has been Spanish ambassador to Argentina and to France. Another example of a not uncommon alliance of diplomacy and letters, he first wrote novels of customs with a refined and worldly atmosphere (e.g., Lully Arjona, 1901). He also soon became interested—following probably in the footsteps of his father, Manuel Danvila Collado, a noted historian—in historical studies of the 18th century, and composed monographs such as Luisa Isabel de Orleans y Luis I (1902) and Fernando VI y doña Bárbara de Braganza (1905). From a combination of both his previous fields came what is considered his most important contribution to literature—a series of historical novels about the peninsular war in the early years of the 18th century, with the meaningful title Luchas fratricidas de España (1923-1930), comprising some 14 volumes that begin with El testamento de Carlos II and end with Aún hay Pirineos. Well documented, written in an entertaining narrative style, rich in incident and anecdote, if they do not reach the level of the Episodios nacionales of Pérez Galdós (q.v.) they are not unworthy of that model. They have also the interest of focusing attention on the first moment of the tragic civil strife among Spaniards in modern history.

See: E. Suárez Calimano, 21 ensayos (1926).

A. del R.

Däubler, Theodor (1876–1934, German poet), was born in Trieste, of German parents, and grew up as a bilingual child, equally at home in German and in Italian. One of his grandmothers was Irish. Soon after his final examinations at the Fiume Gymnasium he gave up the striving for a profession and became a vagrant intellectual. In Naples he conceived the plan of his epic poem Das Nordlicht (published at Florence in 1910; a much revised edition was published in Geneva in 1922). Later years in Paris were Däubler's really formative period. Although essentially a lonely soul, he there met and became the lifelong friend of Moeller van den Bruck, who in most respects was his spiritual opposite. Däubler spent most of the year 1914 in Italy. In Germany during nearly the entire period of the First World War, he tried repeatedly and unsuccessfully to become a soldier. After the war his homelessness continued; he traveled in Greece and the Near East and visited Egypt and the Scandinavian countries. In 1928 he became a member of the Prussian Academy of Letters. He died in 1934 in a sanatorium in the Black Forest.

Däubler undoubtedly was a creative poet. Under the influence of superstitious servants he early developed a very personal religion. Das Nordlicht is conceived as an original cosmic myth. Stylistically, Däubler seems to have been thwarted by the almost insurmountable conflict between the Italian desire for harmony and the German tendency towards the baroque. Only in rare poems did he achieve a perfect expression of his own self (see Das Sternenkind, 1917; Die Treppe zum Nordlicht, 1920). His travel diaries are of considerable interest. Däubler exercised his greatest influence through his early enthusiasm for expressionism (Der neue Standpunkt, 1917; Im Kampfe um die moderne Kunst, 1918).

See: S. Heiszel, "Theodor Däubler—ein Schwabe?" Dichtung und Volkstum, XXXVIII (1937), 208–224.

E. R.

Daudet, Alphonse (1840–1897, French poet, short-story writer, playwright, and novelist), was born at Nîmes in Languedoc, the son of a royalist father and a deeply religious mother. Because his father, the owner of a silk manufactory, lost his money, the family moved to Lyons, where Alphonse obtained his early schooling. At the age of 16 he was appointed a monitor in the Collège d'Alais, which position promptly became distasteful to his sensitive and gentle nature. The following year he joined his elder brother, Ernest, in Paris, and there his literary career began with the publication of a collection of verse. Les Amoureuses (1857), while distinctly adolescent, contained a few graceful poems and gave him entrance into several salons where he met men and women of literary importance. He wrote short articles for several newspapers, notably Villemessant's Evénement and Figaro, until he received a sinecure in the private offices of the duke of Morny, the emperor's half brother and president of the Corps Législatif (1860–1865). The duke admired the young Southerner greatly and asked him to collaborate on more than one of the plays he was in the habit of writing with other members of his staff. Still other plays composed at this time with the aid of L'Epine met with indifferent success. Morny granted Daudet frequent leaves of absence in search of renewed health. Thus he made several trips to his native Languedoc and one to Algeria, where he gathered the material for numerous later stories and novels. His marriage to Julia Allard (1867) was a great boon, since she calmed his excitable temperament, served him often as a wise collaborator, and eased his later life of pain and ill-health.

Daudet, under the influence of his close friend Mistral (q.v.) and other members of the Felibrige movement, soon established himself as a short-story writer of Provence, producing Les Lettres de mon moulin in 1866. These portray the author's sensitive nature, his gentle irony, his gift for flashing, brilliantly colored, impetuous prose. There followed a semi-autobiographical work, Le Petit Chose (1868), the first part of which contains many details of his early childhood. In 1872 appeared Les Aventures prodigieuses de Tartarin de Tarascon, a burlesque of the méridional character; as well as the moving tragedy L'Arlésienne. With Fromont jeune et Risler aîné (1874) Daudet began the writing of full-length novels, which promptly made him one of the most widely read and successful authors of his time. In rapid succession appeared Jack (1876), Le Nabab (1877), Les Rois en exil (1879), Numa Roumestan (1881), L'Evangéliste (1883), Sapho (1884), Tartarin sur les Alpes (1885), L'Immortel (1888), Port Tarascon (1890), and Soutien de famille (1898). For the most part the substance of these novels was taken from contemporary life, individuals Daudet knew personally, or events noted in daily newspapers. His habit was to fill numerous notebooks with a vast quantity of heterogeneous material, which he then used at will as he composed. Daudet was more a chronicler of his times than an inventor, reproducing true experiences as he had seen and felt them himself. His chief claim to an established position in French letters lies in his sensibility. His capacity for emotion, so pronounced in his works, set him apart from his master, Flaubert (q.v.), and the members of the later naturalistic school. His characters, likened to those of Charles Dickens, are frequently exaggerated under the stimulus of his great sympathy for humanity. His excellent sense of humor, a quality none too common in French authors of his period, restrained a tendency to irony from becoming bitter or didactic. Many of his works have been translated into English.

See: E. Daudet, Mon Frère et moi (1882)); R. H. Sherard, Alphonse Daudet (1894, in English); Y. Martinet, Alphonse Daudet; sa vie et son œuvre (1940).

A. R. F.

Daudet, Léon (1867–1942, French novelist, critic, and journalist), was one of the most colorful figures in modern French letters and politics. Born and raised in Paris, the son of Alphonse Daudet (q.v.), he moved in artistic and literary circles from childhood, taking for granted his familiar footing with Zola, the Goncourts, and Mistral (qq.v.), looking irreverently at even the old giant, Hugo. He was destined for medicine and studied under Charcot, but the attraction of letters proved too strong, and he entered journalism in 1900, writing at first for the Gaulois and Libre Parole and then forming a lifelong association with the Action française when it became a daily in 1908. A radical, or at least a liberal, in art and politics as a young man, he was led first by his friendship with Edouard Drumont and then by the intellectual spell of Charles Maurras (q.v.) into the royalist camp. His activities for the cause, both as an editor of the Action française and as a politician (he was deputy for Paris, 1919–1924, and was defeated for senator in 1926), not only provided an ample outlet for his boundless exuberance but also dominated his literary production for the rest of his life.

He was not an original thinker in politics—he himself always acknowledged his complete dependence on Maurras; nor as a critic in such works as Etudes et milieux littéraires (1927) and Flambeaux (1929) did he formulate or follow a systematic theory of art. Except for Le Voyage de Shakespeare (1896), his novels are at best second-rate: the handling of a plausible story and the creation of character are beyond him. But he had himself to give, the perceptions and reflections of an aggressive sensualist gifted with a comic sense who was able to pack a great deal into his life; and he found his true form in the memoir, in which he is justly comparable with Saint-Simon. Daudet wrote great French prose, a blend of the classic and the colloquial (the homely, revealing word), as might be expected of a man whose demigods were Rabelais, Montaigne, and Shakespeare. He was unequaled at portraying in a few phrases yet with the utmost vividness a character, a face, or a scene, and he exploited this gift to the full in his reminiscences, Souvenirs des milieux littéraires, politiques, artistiques et médicaux (6 vols., 1914–1921; Eng. tr. of selections, Memoirs of Léon Daudet, 1925), and such books of history as Panorama de la IIIe république (1936) and Le stupide XIXe siècle (1922; Eng. tr., The Stupid XIXth Century, 1928).

Yet Léon Daudet's undoubted merits are offset for all but the most blind followers of the Action française by grave defects. Even for French political journalism, his daily polemics could be described as nothing but insanely violent, often unfair, generally vulgar, and sometimes obscene. Péguy said of the Action française, thinking of Léon Daudet perhaps, that everything about it was 18th century except its manners. Prejudice and hatred run through his work—a literary hatred of Zola and his school, a political hatred of all liberals and radicals, a national hatred of everything German, and an anti-Semitism that has not often been rivaled in France. These prejudices often led him into ridiculous positions as a critic, either of literature, politics, thought, or men: his readers would gather that the work of Flaubert (q.v.), Zola, and the whole school of Médan was without value, that all presidents of the republic were corrupt imbeciles, that Bergson (q.v.) was of no importance as a philosopher. Yet he was capable of showing unexpected appreciations, as when he was one of the first to hail the work of Proust (q.v.). His work remains thus a mixture which will both attract and repel the average reader, by the very fact that it reproduces completely a baffling personality which even his enemies will admit had many of the characteristics of genius. He died at Saint-Rémy de Provence on July 1, 1942.

See: Robert Guillou, Léon Daudet; son caractère, ses romans, sa politique (1918); Edouard Mas, Léon Daudet; son œuvre (1928).

C. W., Jr.

Dauthendey, Max (1867–1918, German poet and novelist), born in Würzburg, Bavaria, was brought up in a Russian home atmosphere by a father with French ancestry and a Russian mother who are described in Der Geist meines

Vaters (1912) and Gedankengut aus meinen Wanderjahren (1913). His philosophy of life he later embodied in Verdensaltet (published in 1893 with his Swedish friend, Gustaf Uddgren, as collaborator), which contains his theory of artistic creation, and in Lied der Weltfestlichkeit (1918), which proclaims the art of finding solace in the beauty and life of animate and inanimate nature. From 1886 until his death he traveled all over Europe, year after year, although often in financial stress, and in 1897 he visited the United States and Mexico. In 1905-1906 he took part in a Cook's Tour around the world. But he always returned gladly to his home town, which inspired many of his poems in Singsangbuch (1907), Der weisse Schlaf (1907), Lusamgärtlein (1909), and Weltspuck (1910). Likewise the novel Josa Gerth (1893) and several dramas (e.g., Frau Raufenbarth, 1911, and the tragedy Die Heidin Geilane, 1912) spring from his life in Würzburg. The atmosphere of Sweden is reflected in Ultra Violet (1893) and Reliquien (1897) and such dramas as Sun (1895), Sehnsucht (1895), Der Drache Grauli (1911), and Maja (1911). Memories of his journeys to Paris, Sweden, and Greece found an echo in Bänkel-sang vom Balzer auf der Balz (1905), and Mexico gave him the idea for his novel Raubmenschen (1911). His play Spielereien einer Kaiserin (1910; Eng. tr., Caprices of an Empress, 1912) had a brief success on the stage. The experiences harvested on his voyage around the world were published as collections of Novellen in Ligam (1909), Die acht Gesichter am Biwasee (1911), and Geschichten aus den vier Winden (1915). Likewise his songs in Die geflügelte Erde (1910) resulted from this tour. In April, 1914, he set out once more on a world cruise, but the outbreak of the First World War prevented his return. In Java he wrote his last collection of songs, Des grossen Krieges Not (1915), and his diaries, on which are based the posthumous works, Erlebnisse auf Java (1924) and Letzte Reise (1924).

During his lifetime Dauthendey was hardly known in Germany, and even today his recognition as a poet is disputed by literary historians and critics. His orgies of light, color, and sound and his eccentric art forms make this impressionistic and exotic writer at least a poeta sui generis.

See: C. Muimm, Max Dauthendey's Sprache und Stil (1925); H. G. Wendt, Max Dauthendey, Poet-Philosopher (1936).

F. S.

De Amicis, Edmondo (1840-1908), Italian essayist, novelist, and short-story writer, was born at Oneglia in Liguria, but spent the greater part of his life in Turin. As an infantry officer in the Italian army he fought in the campaign against Austria in 1866 and took part in the famous battle of Custoza. He wrote many articles for the army newspaper Italia militare, of which he was editor for a time. These articles appeared in book form under the title La Vita militare (1868; Eng. tr., Military Life in Italy, 1882). In his effort to depict a soldier's life, the author seems to have recourse to every conceivable device for drawing a tear: long marches, thirst, disease, sacrifice, insanity, love, death, are all recurrent themes. Because of this volume the poet Carducci (q.v.), always intolerant of the sentimental, termed De Amicis "Edmondo the languorous," long-winded founder of Italian bourgeois prose.

After the publication of a collection of short stories, Novelle (1872), De Amicis retired from the army to devote himself entirely to a literary career. Between the years 1872 and 1879 he visited many countries and wrote his well-known books of travel: Spagna (1872; Eng. tr., Spain, 1881), Olanda (1874; Eng. tr., Holland, 1880, American title, Holland and Its People, 1881), Ricordi di Londra (1874; Eng. tr., Jottings about London, 1883), Marocco (1876; Eng. tr., Morocco, 1879, American title, Morocco, Its People and Places), Costantinopoli (1878-1879; Eng. tr., Constantinople, 1878), Ricordi di Parigi (1879; Eng. tr., Studies of Paris, 1879). The most ambitious works of their kind to be written in Italian, often published in beautifully illustrated editions, translated into many languages, they reached a wide audience. Though over-lyrical in style and full of inaccuracies in detail, these books won popularity because of the author's genuine enthusiasm and his sympathetic interpretation of the customs and peoples of other lands.

Cuore (1886; Eng. tr., Cuore, an Italian Schoolboy's Journal, 1887) was read in every elementary school in Italy until Fascism came into power. It is widely used today in the United States as a textbook in teaching Italian. Cuore is directed to children between the ages of nine and thirteen and is written in finished Tuscan style. True to its name, it goes to the heart. It is sentimental in the extreme, but never undignified. In many touching anecdotes the story brings out the mutual respect that exists between pupil and teacher and cuts through all social prejudices in its portrayal of the deeds and actions of the individual boys. The basic theme of Cuore is that there is something fine and lovable in every child, if only it can be reached and developed soon enough. Quite simply, De Amicis has hit upon a fundamental concept in modern education, but in his hands it is shorn of all theory.

His long novel Sull'oceano (1889; Eng. tr., On Blue Water, 1897) is no more than an extended series of anecdotes depicting the problems and sufferings of illiterate emigrants on their interminable ocean voyage. Il Romanzo di un maestro (1890; Eng. tr., The Romance of a Schoolmaster, 1892) and La Maestrina degli operai (1894; Eng. tr., Won by a Woman, 1897) are both concerned with the idealistic but forgotten young schoolteacher, relegated to a country town and at the mercy of inflated politicians and inept superintendents.

Ever in search of the good in the individual and in society, De Amicis in 1890 openly declared himself a Socialist. Fra scuola e casa (1892) and La Carrozza di tutti (1899), both collections of short stories and anecdotes, reflect the socialistic trend of the author's thinking at this time and are vivid in their defense of the oppressed and in their appeal to human sympathy. But in these and others of his later works the sentiment is laid on too thick, the idealism has become too soft. What in his earlier writings was a genuine gift had now become a too conscious technique.

In 1905 De Amicis's L'Idioma gentile was well received. It was written in a new vein and seemed to furnish simple, concrete answers to the ever-debated Italian questione della lingua. Following in the footsteps of Manzoni, De Amicis's ideas are in direct opposition to those of the philosopher Benedetto Croce (q.v.). De Amicis conceives of language as a tool and urges his readers to love their mother tongue and to perfect their use of it in all its details. Croce, who considers expression intrinsically an individual matter and the idea the main thing, accuses De Amicis of childishness and pedantry. This all too "gentle" volume dissolves under the acute scrutiny of Croce's criticism. The strength of De Amicis lies elsewhere. People who are guided by the heart rather than the mind will no doubt continue to read Cuore.

See: J. H. Brovedani, Edmondo De Amicis; l'homme et l'œuvre (1914); V. Chialant, Edmondo De Amicis, educatore e artista (1911).

M. V. H.

Deauville, Max (pseud. of Maurice Duwez, 1881–, Belgian novelist, war chronicler, playwright, and moralist), was born in Brussels. A doctor by profession, he received early initiation into the world of letters as secretary to the bibliographer Spoelberch de Louvenjoul (q.v.). His first novel, La Fausse Route, appeared in 1907; his subsequent literary activity, averaging more than a book a year, is unusual among nonprofessional authors. In his pre-war fiction he appears as a detached and slightly ironical observer of the human comedy, but his master novel, L'Amour dans les ruines (1910), reveals profound sympathy for its victims. His early plays recall, by their delicate psychology and simplicity of plot, certain of Musset's. The First World War was to bring a profound change. Deauville joined the medical corps at the start and saw active service throughout the conflict. A diary, Jusqu'à l'Yser (1917), won international fame when Jean Norton Cru (see below) hailed it as a literary and documentary masterpiece. It is a chronicle, objective as Caesar's Commentaries. In a different tone are his two following works, La Boue de Flandres (1922) and Introduction à la vie militaire (1923), both written, he says, during the war. Here he gives free rein to his irony; his declared aim is to deflate military authority, and it is hard to believe that the manuscript was not revised after the Armistice. A novel, Jonas (1923), portraying the immediately succeeding years, is in the same spirit, which also marks his later writings. Irony he holds to be the great source of consolation, capable of alleviating the pain in every human heart. Certainly irony often dominates in contemporary literature, and at times one wonders why so much energy is spent in lashing the despicable and incorrigible gang often presented as humanity. How much is pure pose among these authors? This question rarely comes to mind in reading Max Deauville; he possesses an innate sense of decorum, and his sincerity is manifest. His irony is tinged with pity, and if he laughs it is indeed that he may not weep. He is fundamentally an idealist, embittered by his observation of men's folly and using irony as a stoic armor. "Literature," he says, "is the product of the discord between the life we lead and what should logically be ours." Hence in most of his work discreet pity goes hand in hand with satire. A striking example of this may be seen in his theatrical masterpiece, Ecce Homo, pièce en sept tableaux (1931), which is also an original experiment, in both form and matter, in stage craftsmanship. The action is slight; historical color is deliberately sacrificed to accentuate the timelessness of the drama; this, and the mystico-poetic utterances of certain characters, suggest the influence of Maeterlinck (q.v.), but the intellectual intention outweighs the emo-ional. Christ, whose figure dominates the action, does not appear on the stage; the Galileans are called communists, and Roman officers, in khaki uniforms, use the language of modern barracks. Their unawareness of the significance of what is happening under their eyes recalls The Procurator of Judea of Anatole France (q.v.). It may be surmised that the latter's Histoire contemporaine has had some influence on the disillusioned philosophy of Deauville's post-war work. Keenly alive to the varied trends of contemporary thought, he leaves his personal touch on all his work. His style is marked by classic austerity rather than by the search for color characteristic of the Flemings. He is always more interested in the psychological reactions of his characters than in their actions; hence his plots are never complicated. Many of his "stories" are first cousins of essays intended to propound ideas, and monologues with the same purpose often replace dialogue. Had he lived in the 18th century, he would probably have left memoirs and a collection of maxims. Maurice Gauchez hails him as the La Rochefoucauld of our time.

See: M. Gauchez, A la recherche d'une personnalité (1926); J. N. Cru, Témoins (1929); Nervie, 1931, No. 7 (special number devoted to Max Deauville).

B. M. W.

de Bosis, Adolfo (1863-1924, Italian poet), born in Ancona, settled in Rome in his youth and lived there until his death. His early close friendship with D'Annunzio (q.v.) influenced decisively his taste and vocation. Together they were young dandies in Roman society, imitated Wilde and Whistler in manner, and sailed the Adriatic in the spirit of Shelley. Together also, with Giovanni Pascoli (q.v.) as a third, they founded in 1895 the periodical Convito, in which they published their own and their friends' works (e.g., those of Edoardo Scarfoglio, Francesco Paolo Michetti, Giulio Aristide Sartorio). The foreword by de Bosis outlines their common creed: "Facing the present muddy tide of barbarism, there are still some who keep the faith in the Latin race, in the indestructible power of Beauty, in the sovereign dignity of the spirit, in the necessity of intellectual hierarchies and in the creative power of the Word." Having exhausted his friend's capital, D'Annunzio moved on to new adventures; but de Bosis retired into the orderly life of a successful business lawyer and father of a large family.

Of his own verse he published only two volumes, Amori ac Silentio and Rime sparse (issued together in 1922). His poetry expresses a despairing love for art and a strong faith in man's progress and is mostly in the vein of stoic consolation. Strangely enough, it also contains one of the first specimens of "social" poetry, "Ode a un macchinista." His verse has been much appreciated for its melody and for the experimenting with new techniques ("Ode ai convalescenti," "La Sera," "Ode al mare," "Eidola"). The name of Adolfo de Bosis remains linked in Italian literature to that of Shelley, whom he worshiped and translated with rare perfection (Cenci, 1898; Prometheus Unbound, 1922; Lyrics, 1928).

See: G. L. Russo, Adolfo de Bosis (1922); B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 3d ed., IV (1929), 141-156.

G. de S.

de Bosis, Lauro (1901-1931?, Italian poet), was born in Rome, the youngest son of Adolfo de Bosis (q.v.) and Lillian Vernon, an American. He grew up in the aesthetic and romantic atmosphere of his father's circle, which left a deep impression upon him. Philosophy and literature remained his lasting interests, although he received a scientific education and took his degree in chemistry at the University of Rome in 1922. Between 1922 and 1926 he translated into Italian verse the Oedipus Rex and the Antigone of Sophocles, and the Prometheus Bound of Aeschylus. He also translated the abridged edition of Frazer's The Golden Bough (1924). In 1927 he wrote a lyrical drama, Icaro, which received the Olympic prize in Amsterdam in 1928 and was published in Milan in 1930 (Eng. tr., 1933).

Between 1924 and 1930, Lauro de Bosis made several visits to the United States, first as lecturer, then as executive secretary of the Italy-America Society. He also gave a summer course on Italian literature at Harvard. In 1932 was published his The Golden Book of Italian Poetry, an anthology preceded by a remarkable historical essay in which the influence of Croce (q.v.) is very perceptible.

At the beginning of the Fascist movement, de Bosis, like many young men of his time, was attracted by its reform program; but he soon recognized it as a threat to Italian freedom. In 1930, together with Mario Vinciguerra, Renzo Rendi, and others, he founded the "Alleanza Nazionale," an underground organization which published a bimonthly leaflet. During one of Lauro de Bosis's trips to America, the committee, including his own mother, was arrested. Vinciguerra and Rendi received heavy sentences. "My first instinct," he writes, "was to go to Rome and to share their fate, but I realized that the duty of a soldier is not to surrender, but to fight to the end." He learned to fly and on October 2, 1931, piloted a plane over Rome, scattering leaflets addressed to the population. He managed to escape pursuit planes, but vanished at sea on the return flight in the darkness.

On the night before leaving, he wrote his most important document, The Story of My Death (1933), which covers the story of his attempt and carries his message. "No one takes Fascism seriously. Beginning with its leaders, every one counts on its speedy fall, and it seems out of proportion to give one's life to end something that will collapse by itself. That is a mistake. It is necessary to die. I hope that many others will follow me and will at last succeed in rousing public opinion."

G. de S.

De Coster, Charles, (1827–1879, Belgian novelist), was born in Munich; his parents were in the service of a nobleman, who acted as godfather to the child but took small interest in his subsequent career. In all his writings De Coster shows sympathy with the humble people, whom he declares vastly more colorful than the aristocracy. The family soon moved to Brussels, the father died, and Charles was obliged to shift for himself. Artist to the finger tips, he had no interest in bourgeois professions and spent his life in obscure poverty. His ambition was to endow his country with a literary tradition to match its glory in artists of the brush; hence he sought the company of young painters and such men of letters as there were. "I am one of those who know how to wait," he declared, and his long effort toward perfection proves his sincerity. Fame came only after his death, but he had seen his dream fulfilled: his books were illustrated by the most gifted artists of his time. Of his minor compositions, Légendes flamandes (1858; Eng. tr., Flemish Legends, 1920) attracted some attention from the start and has been translated into several languages. Its style is a discreet imitation of Rabelais's; its matter is based on folklore. The author's preference among the legends was for "Sire Halewyn," perhaps because of its brilliant coloring, but most critics agree with Félicien Rops who gave the palm to "Smets Smee," for which he made all the illustrations. The popular verve of the style, the satire of tyrants, and the sympathy for the rugged sagacity of the humble make this legend the precursor of Ulenspiegel.

De Coster's skill in handling Old French brought an appointment in the government archives. He held this post four years (1860–1864), and if his contribution to the editing of ancient laws was not large, the experience was invaluable for the documentation of his masterpiece. Les Aventures de Tyl Ulenspiegel et de Lamme Goedzak appeared in a de luxe edition at the end of 1867. More than 10 years had been spent in its composition. It is written in the slightly archaic style, handled with greater dexterity than in the Légendes, which he regarded as best adapted to reproduce in French the Flemish atmosphere. The author's avowed purpose was to revive yesterday to create tomorrow: "a people is dying," he declared, "when it ignores its past." Peoples whose liberties are threatened by unscrupulous despots, domestic or foreign, have rallied to his book. Ulenspiegel may well claim as his heirs the underground warriors of our day. De Coster was one of the editors of the periodical Uylenspiegel (1856–1864)—and made its devise his own: "I walk up and down on the face of the earth, praising all lovely things and hooting at folly." In Uylenspiegel he chose a legendary and popular hero, keeping many traditional episodes. These, appearing sporadically throughout the book, figure chiefly in the first part where the urchin, Ulenspiegel, is up to all the pranks ever imagined by the imp of the perverse. But when the Inquisition burns his father and tortures his mother he hears the call, for freedom is the essence of lovely things. Throughout the story scenes of horror are set off by jubilant escapades in which the hero outwits and mocks the oppressor much as his descendants did in the Second World War.

The author's thumbnail review of his book can hardly be bettered: "Above all, this is a joyous, artistic, and literary work, of which history is only the frame and of which love, life, and sentiment, beside the grotesque and the satiric, are the elements." He kept his word and offers the greatest variety. At first sight there seems to be little unity; short chapters, each a picture in itself and often suggesting a painting, present a bewildering number of characters, some historical, some fanciful, but as the story progresses the reader becomes aware that the constantly changing scenes constitute an artfully molded panorama. Ulenspiegel and Lamme belong to folklore: the former had appeared in many chapbooks, the latter was suggested by popular woodcuts. They present a pair often compared to Don Quixote and Sancho Panza. Nele, Ulenspiegel's fiancée, offers the delicate aspect of the love scenes. She is inspired by De Coster's own betrothed, Elisa Spruyt, whom we know from his posthumously published Lettres à Elisa (1894). Satiric bias has doubtless entered into the portraits of certain of the historical characters, e.g., Philip II and the Duke of Alva, whose ghoulish figures enhance the contrast between the Spanish and Flemish temperaments, but they leave an indelible impression on the reader. Among the historical sources for Ulenpiegel must be mentioned Van Meteren's Histoire des révolutions dans les Pays Bas, which Charles Potvin declares De Coster had read 10 times; Marnix de Sainte-Aldegonde's Tableau des différens de la religion; and, of special interest to American readers, John Lathrop Motley's histories of the Low Countries. Less tangible but very real inspiration came from paintings of the old masters; the author haunted museums all his life and appears as the direct forerunner of the next generation of pen-painters such as Lemonnier and Demolder (qq.v.). Yet all the study of sources has in no wise challenged De Coster's essential originality; he took his property where he found it, and Ulenpiegel's motto—"I am not body but spirit"—is true in many senses. A new illustrated edition of Ulenpiegel was published in New York in 1943.

See: Charles Potvin, ed., Lettres à Elisa (1894); Joseph Hanse, Charles De Coster (1928); Léon Louis Sosset, Introduction à l'œuvre de Charles De Coster (1937).

B. M. W.

Dehmel, Richard (1863–1920, German poet), the most distinguished representative of the transition from extreme naturalism to classic restraint, was born in Wendisch-Hermsdorf, the son of a forester. The landscape of his poetry is that of Brandenburg, a wide, open plain with huge forests of spruce and pine. In it the city of Berlin rises with its factories, forges, and smokestacks. The poet's own landscape has two divergent aspects, on the one hand giant spruce trees battling with the elements, on the other buzzing telegraph wires and blast furnaces belching smoke and flame. The same dualism is evident in the poet: he is both a realistic naturalist and a visionary seer. On the one hand he exemplifies a daring disregard of conventional forms; every poem is a law unto itself. On the other hand his verse displays a painstaking mathematical exactness that recalls Dante. A pure lyric genius, he will sing his social gospel in melodious verse and preach it in impassioned prose.

We see the same dualism in Dehmel's life. While a pupil in a Berlin Gymnasium he comes into conflict with his orthodox teachers. He is ousted and finishes his preparatory training at Danzig. At the university he studies philosophy and literature, as well as the natural sciences. He writes his dissertation in the field of economics, accepts a secretarial position with a fire insurance company. Not until he has published two volumes of poems does he feel he has the right to resign from his position and to devote himself to literature. In 1889 he married Paula Oppenheimer, with whom he collaborated on a volume of verse for children. Frau Paula, he felt, freed his latent powers and showed him the way to serene clarity. But tumultuous passions are seething in the eloquent prophet of a stern ethical code; his first marriage ends in divorce (1899) and Frau Ida (Auerbach) becomes his second wife. Now Dehmel preaches—and practices—rigorous self-discipline and is among the first to see that this is the gospel of Nietzsche (q.v.). As a young man Dehmel had been rejected for military service because an excess of nervous energy produced an epileptic condition. Well over 40 he becomes a daring Alpine climber and when almost 51 scales Mont Blanc. The same year the pacifist Dehmel forces the army to accept him for service in the trenches. For him human happiness is the joyful will to sacrifice. When the First World War ends in tragic defeat, he urges the formation of an "iron guard" in which only volunteers would be allowed to serve. This last dream of social service he did not realize; the overexertion of the war years had begun to exact its toll. For some time Dehmel had begun to limp. A bloodclot had developed; he knew his chances for recovery were negligible. What did it matter? To a young friend he remarked: "I have not really been a good man (ein guter Mensch), but I believe I have become one." Towards the end he felt he had been privileged to achieve in life what he had long since achieved in his best poetry—the rich harmony of full maturity.

Dehmel's development is clearly visible in his poems from volume to volume; even the titles are significant: Erlösungen (1891), Aber die Liebe (1893), Weib und Welt (1896), Schöne wilde Welt (1913). The first three volumes were carefully revised and radically changed in subsequent editions, the last volume was greatly enlarged. A study of these changes reveals the gradual growth of the poet. There can be no doubt that Dehmel has enriched German lyric poetry with a new and significant note. His lyrics show us man in his threefold life as an individual, as a member of society, and as a bit of cosmic life. There is an astounding variety of form and content. Any careful selection will show this and will also show that the variety of form results from the variety of content. His novel in verse Zwei Menschen (1903) is the work of a great lyric poet. The meager and conventional plot should not blind the reader to its real significance. Of Dehmel's dramas his last seems the most significant. A "cosmopolitical" comedy, it is the summing up of his war experiences: Die Götterfamilie (1921), the fantastic vision of an insane world. A year before his death Dehmel's Kriegstagebuch was published with the meaningful subtitle Zwischen Volk und Menschheit. For him the poet, as the best of mankind in all nations, stands zwischen Volk und Menschheit.

See: J. Bab, Richard Dehmel (1926); H. Slochower, Richard Dehmel, der Mensch und der Denker (1928).

F. Br.

Deledda, Grazia (1875-1936, Italian novelist), was born in the town of Nuoro, Sardinia, and lived there during the formative years of her life. Most of her stories have the island as a background, and her home remained an inspiration to her perhaps to an even greater degree than in the case of other Italian novelists. She wrote her first short stories at the age of 17, and even these early works show the qualities of a born narrator. She has a simple style and the ability to sketch a situation or a character in a few deft phrases. Her stories have action and movement, and she has an eye for realistic detail that makes the Sardinian tales particularly charming. Because she tells of simple folk, peasants or the rural aristocracy—occasionally contrasted with city life to bring out the full flavor—because she has an interest in the troubles of the lowly and the tormented, and perhaps even more because her work is infused with a tragic sense of destiny, Deledda has been occasionally looked upon as a successor to Verga (q.v.). It is a tempting comparison, but it would hardly be a fair one. She is not a "student of life" as Verga is, not a philosopher at all, and if she may be considered an "observer," to use the word of the veristi, she is one whose impartiality is continually marred—or relieved—by the lyric impulse. The great scenes and the great characters in her novels are created more through emotional intensity than by the scrupulous cold-blooded concentration of the true naturalist. The characters themselves, though their problems are more complex, are actually less profound than Verga's peasants. The charge has been made that Deledda follows a formula, that from the beginning of her career to the end her novels always contain the same ingredients: a thwarted or obsessed hero or heroine, a dash of Sardinian violence, and a good deal of local color. There is some truth in the charge, though it is fair to point out that in such late works as L'Incendio nell'oliveto (1918) and La Madre (1920; Eng. tr., The Woman & the Priest, 1922, American title, The Mother, 1923) there is much more attention paid to psychological atmosphere and character study and less reliance on violence and the picturesque. Deledda was such a serious and conscientious artist that Italian critics have been very well disposed to her and anxious to spare her from being pigeonholed as another regionalist. It would be only reasonable to admit that she is, viewing her work as a whole, precisely that, but she has qualities of perception and human sympathy that raise her far above the level of the writer of provincial vignettes. Her characters do indeed follow a pattern; essentially they are all simple, passionate souls, usually under the influence of some obsession, capable of single-minded egoism relieved by moments of rather romantic self-abnegation. Essentially too they are all feminine, the men—witness Anania in Genere (1904), one of her finest novels—even more perhaps than the women. It follows that such novels as L'Edera (1904) or La Madre, where the principal character is a woman, seem considerably more realistic psychologically than the others. When all has been said of her limitations, however, the fact remains that Grazia Deledda has to her credit many well-told tales, sincere and moving, and that her whole career was remarkable and admirable in that she realized her faults and wrote novels of increasing merit as she grew older. If her work, taken as a whole, seems repetitious, it also will appear impressive. Some dozen novels of hers will always stand out as competent and inspiring, and it can be said that she never wrote a bad book, taking the adjective in any of its possible senses. World-wide recognition came to her in 1926 when she was awarded the Nobel prize.

In addition to the titles mentioned above the following should be cited as representing her best work: Il Vecchio della montagna (1900), Elias Portoluu (1903), Nostalgie (1905), Sino al confine (1910), Canne al vento (1913), Le Colpe Altrui (1914), Il Dio dei viventi (1922), La Fuga in Egitto (1925), Annalena Bilsini, (1927).

See: P. Pancrazi, Venti uomini, un satiro e un burattino (1923), pp. 89-101; L. Russo, I Narratori (1923), pp. 153-156; G. A. Borgese, La Vita e il libro, 2d ed., II (1928), 78-85, 138, 313; L. Falchi, L'Opera di Grazia Deledda (1929); M. Mundula, Grazia Deledda (1929).

T. G. B.

De Marchi, Emilio (1851-1901, Italian author of novels and short stories), born at Milan, was a schoolmaster by profession. He had the practical sense of life of the typical Lombard and the didactic inclination of the born teacher. The incurable illness which shortened his life and the loss of a beloved child elicited no complaints from him, but sharpened his sensibility to the hardships of those around him—laborers and farmers and unpretentious citizens of small means like himself—as well as his sympathy with the difficulties and dangers of youth. Many of his earliest publications, such as L'Età preziosa (1887), a work devoted to the guidance of young people in the formative period of life, have an unconcealed educative purpose, and in all his literary work the moral preoccupation is fundamental. It finds aesthetic expression because devotion to duty and love of others are the profoundest feelings of the author and the chief subjects of his thought. Literature, he says, should not be an amusement for the idle, but a help to good living. (For De Marchi's reaction to the vogue of D'Annunzio, q.v., see an illuminating interview with Luigi Venturini in the Rassegna nazionale, March 16, 1901.)

In the best of his short stories and novels the didactic tendency is transcended by the author's creative imagination. Admirably realistic, sympathetic, and humorous are the Storie di ogni colore (1885) and Nuove Storie di ogni colore (1895). Of the novels—Il Cappello del prete (1888), Demetrio Pianelli (1890), Arabella (1892), Giacomo l'idealista (1897), Col fuoco non si scherza (1901)—the masterpiece is Demetrio Pianelli. It is the story of an uncouth, middle-aged government clerk who is dragged out of the poor but peaceful life that he has contrived for himself, into the troubled lives of others, by natural affection and an unconscious sense of duty. Demetrio struggles manfully to save from starvation the children of a supercilious half brother who has committed suicide and left his family nothing but debts. He meets with prejudice, obstinate stupidity, duplicity, and, worst of all, with the passion of love. He falls in love with the beautiful and good but stupid widow who, prejudiced against him by her dead husband, was at first the most formidable obstacle to his task. He defends her against the insidiousness of the influential head of his own office who has tried to make use of her poverty for his own guilty pleasure. Demetrio leaves the way open for her to marry a wealthy friend who is also in love with her. His work is now done: he has saved the children and the woman he loves, but he has lost her and has been transferred to an even more wretched position in the government service. Unconscious of his own heroism Demetrio reflects with resignation on his dreary future, comforted only by the trust and affection of the woman, who now understands him. In this novel there is no preaching and no obvious teaching. It ends sadly as do all the others, for life, in the author's experience, is sad. This is a world in which virtue is not often rewarded, and injustice must be borne with resignation: the good that is in human beings, producing affection and devotion to duty, alone makes it worth while.

De Marchi is a romantic realist, like Manzoni. He is often called a manzoniano because of the moral sentiment which distinguishes them both and because of the many traces in his own work of the influence of Manzoni's I Promessi Sposi. But he lacks the orthodox faith of the latter, as is particularly evident in Giacomo l'idealista, which represents the failure of an optimistic philosophy when brought into conflict with the sad reality of life. He is also without that shrinking from the study of sexual love, which is a peculiarity of Manzoni. For De Marchi the passion of love is so common a misfortune that it demands sympathetic study (Col fuoco non si scherza). He is inferior to Manzoni as a craftsman in the use of language, but superior in that sympathetic understanding of common people which is a characteristic of Italian romanticism.

Besides stories and novels, De Marchi is the author of some contemplative verse, Vecchie Cadenze e nuove (1891), a comedy or two, and critical essays on literature.

See: Benedetto Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, III (1915), 155-162; Nino Sammartano, Emilio De Marchi (1926); Annibale Pesante, Due Manzoni: I. Nievo, E. De Marchi (1930).

J. E. S.

Demolder, Eugène (1862-1919, Belgian novelist and art critic), was born at Molenbeek-Saint-Jean, a picturesque suburb of Brussels. He dabbled in law, received his doctorate, and spent 10 years as a minor magistrate, but his interests were always artistic and literary. He was associated with Edmond Picard's Art moderne and with the brilliant group who created the Jeune Belgique (see Belgian literature in French) from which, feeling his independence cramped, he revolted to found with others in 1895 the rival review, Coq rouge. The same year he married the daughter of the artist Félicien Rops and spent the last third of his life at Essonnes in France (Seine-et-Oise). His thought is not profound, nor is he interested primarily in the creation of character; his personages serve to evoke the atmosphere of a period or of an artistic milieu, but here he gives evidence of wide and accurate scholarship, joined with unequaled sensitivity. His work is first of all an interpretative transposition of plastic art. His friend Albert Giraud (q.v.) remarked that one needed blue glasses to read him. Demolder's first volume, Impressions d'art (1889), is a collection of essays dealing with both ancient and contemporary masters; it contains in germ all that he was to write. In Contes d'Yperdamme (1891) and Récits de Nazareth (1893), he would renew subjects treated by old Dutch painters which seemed to him more real on their canvas than in the Scriptures. Like his masters, he places Nazareth in a Flemish landscape. His one experiment in playwriting, La Mort aux berceaux (1899), inspired by paintings of the Massacre of the Innocents, recalls Maeterlinck's (q.v.) static drama: the forebodings of the mother replace action. In L'Agonie d'Albion (1901), he reproduces in words the satiric caricatures aimed at England during the Boer War. His sympathy here is always with the underdog, but it would be an error to attach much political significance to this amusing skit. The one thing he ever took seriously was his love of art. Reminiscences of his experience as a magistrate may be found in Sous la robe (1897). Doubtless James Ensor's picture, Les Bons Juges, was not foreign to the conception of these memoirs. The humanitarian instincts of the author are strongly marked in Sous la robe; he is not composing a plea for reform, but his native good sense should make the book the vade mecum of police magistrates. Two volumes in which the mature colorist appears at his best are L'Arche de M. Chénus (1904), a series of sketches in which the author portrays himself and his vague pantheistic dreams, and L'Espagne en auto (1906), with its vividly painted landscapes.

Influence of artists is equally strong in Demolder's pure fiction—one volume of short stories, Quattuor (1897), and three novels. His masterpiece, La Route d'émeraude (1899), is a recreation of the century of Rembrandt, whose figure dominates this panorama of artistic life in old Holland. Many incidents are introduced merely to place before our eyes living models of the master: e.g., The Rat Killer, The Night Watch; light effects, so characteristic of Rembrandt, are dramatically used throughout the novel. Minor figures, typical of other aspects of the artistic life of the period, serve for variety and humor. Richepin's (q.v.) attempt to dramatize the story offers but an impoverished skeleton. Les Patins de la reine de Hollande (1901) reveals Demolder's delight in folklore. He always takes his picturesque where he finds it, with no regard for chronology; in Les Patins, among other antitheses is an idyllic love story set off by grotesque antics of the devil. The painter James Ensor, to whom the author devoted a critical essay in 1892, seems to have been the godfather of these diableries. One suspects in reading the novel that Demolder preferred art to life; this impression is reinforced by Le Jardin de la Pompadour (1904), inspired by the 18th-century painters of sophisticated frivolity. Certain scenes seem suggested also by whimsicalities of Rops. Here is indeed a far cry from the robust disciple of Rembrandt and the old Dutch masters, but Demolder has succeeded admirably in evoking the century of fans and beribboned shepherdesses. He always sought variety, and his first essays revealed a remarkably catholicity of taste. Death seized him while he was at work on a novel set in the period of Louis Philippe.

See: H. Krains, Portraits d'écrivains belges (1930), pp. 7-30; B. M. Woodbridge, Le Roman belge contemporain (1930), pp. 149-183; L. Bocquet, La Littérature française de Belgique (1932), pp. 84-96.

B. M. W.

De Roberto, Federico (1861-1927, Italian novelist and critic), although born in Naples, is considered a Sicilian, both on account of the subject matter of his works and the fact that he spent practically all his life in the region of Catania, whence came Verga (q.v.) and Capuana (q.v.). With them he forms the triad in whose writings Italian naturalistic fiction achieved its greatest artistic excellence. He started as a critic with a collection of studies called Arabeschi (1883). A long period of silence intervened before the publication of his second work, Documenti umani (1888), a collection of regionalistic short stories, the title of which already betrays the detached attitude of the historian or sociologist. The youthful critic had turned artist, but his readers immediately perceived that he had taken with him into his art the intellectualism of the critic. Other works of fiction followed one another in rapid succession, in all of which is found the cool self-possession, the cold detachment of the man of science, but none, or not enough, of the warm glow of the artist. Then came his psychological novel L'Illusione (1891), the story of an aristocratic Italian Bovary, which, though reminiscent of Flaubert (q.v.), is none the less a true work of art, for here the author's imagination does not remain inert, but accompanies and enlivens the probing of his heroine's soul. This was followed by De Roberto's masterpiece, I Vicerè (1894), a vast sociological and psychological study depicting, together with a whole eventful epoch, the survival in wealth and power of a princely house amid the degeneration of some of its members and the crumbling of agelong privileges—a survival which follows as the natural consequence of the continuation in other members of the princely house of those predatory instincts which had made it great and the continuation in the people about them of the servile instincts which had kept them subservient. With these two novels De Roberto reached the pinnacle of his art. Thereafter he never again achieved that delicate balance of cold, scientific investigation and imaginative afflatus so frequently met with in the pages of these two voluminous works. The artist succumbed more and more to the psychologist, and his subsequent publications added to the bulk of his production but not to his fame, which, incidentally, owes practically nothing to his activity as a critic.

See: L. Russo, I Narratori (1923), pp. 93–97; A. Gatti, "Federico De Roberto nel romanzo italiano," Nuova Antologia, CDVI (1939), 123–133.

S. E. S.

De Sanctis, Francesco (1817–1883, Italian critic and literary historian), was born in Morra Irpina, Avellino, not far from Naples. As a boy he went to that city to enter the private school of Basilio Puoti, grammarian and "purist." Later, under the protection of this teacher, young De Sanctis conducted a private school of literature of his own (1838–1848). He soon found his own interests in the study of literature to be quite outside Puoti's narrow precepts and was early in rebellion against all that was Arcadian and academic, convinced that a school should remain always open to the responsibilities of the present. This conviction was shared by his pupils, who worshiped him; they joined him therefore in action in the liberal revolution in Naples in 1848. With the triumphant Bourbon suppression, De Sanctis was watched as a dangerous liberal. Late in 1850 he was seized and taken to the prison of Castel dell'Ovo in Naples, where he was held without trial for two and one half years. He was released in order to be sent in exile to America, but he managed to make his way to Turin to join the many other liberals there preparing for the day of unification. In Turin he resumed his teaching and writing on both literature and politics. Called to the chair of Italian literature in the Polytechnic Institute of Zurich in 1856, he soon won a large audience with his excellent lectures. He continued there his study of German philosophy, but kept in close touch with events in Italy. When the long-awaited moment for action came, he resigned his post and hastened to Naples, where the king had agreed to the institution of a parliament (1860). Garibaldi entered the city in September and promptly appointed De Sanctis governor of his home province of Avellino. The following year he became minister of education in the cabinet of Cavour, a post which he held for only one year on this occasion, but which he again occupied in 1878 and in 1879–1881. During this decade preceding the final unification, De Sanctis wrote much and talked much on the importance of education in the new nation, voicing the persuasion that now new Italians must be created worthy of the new Italy. In 1871 he was appointed to the chair of comparative literature in the University of Naples. In that same year he finished his two-volume Storia della letteratura italiana (Eng. tr., History of Italian Literature, 1931), to which he planned to add a third volume to bring it up to his own day. This volume as such he never finished, but his courses at the university (since published) were in the direction of preparation for it. He remained at the university until 1877.

De Sanctis's main critical work is contained in his Saggi critici (1866), his Storia della letteratura italiana, and his Nuovi Saggi critici (1872). His complete works contain many essays on politics, essays and polemics on criticism, and the fragment of an autobiography written at the end of his life; but his fame rests upon his criticism of Italian literature (see Italian literary criticism). He is now commonly considered to be Italy's foremost literary critic, and his contemporaries knew him as one of her greatest teachers of literature. The best of his published critical work grew out of his classroom lectures, and much of it has kept the style of the spoken lesson.

De Sanctis's criticism is outstanding in its time for its insistence upon poetry as the product of an autonomous faculty of the human spirit, the fantasia, which is intuitive, organic, and synthetic. Faithful in his best criticism to this principle of the autonomy of art, he could effectively reject the neoclassic attention to externalities of form, the French concern with the biographical (Sainte-Beuve), and the contemporary German preoccupation with the idea in art (Hegel). In conformity with such a principle, his importance as a teacher and critic of literature resides in his determination to keep his eye on the work of art itself. His greatness lies in his power of analysis and synthesis in the examination of a single work of art. His intuitions of literary qualities in the single work make him one of the great literary critics of modern times. De Sanctis was able to see the literary object almost without distraction and as a whole. He once remarked that good criticism was like the eye which sees objects but does not see itself.

In his Storia della letteratura italiana, now generally recognized as a classic and as his greatest work, such a criterion of autonomy and of undistracted attention required grave compromise with other interests. The exclusive attention to the single work of art and the principle of the freedom of that work, as a form, from everything else obviously did not allow at all for the writing of a history with continuity and evolution, either between works of art or between persons and works of art. His new historiographical purpose required that the work of art be used as a document to something else. These conflicts were never reconciled in De Sanctis's work, nor is it clear that they could have been reconciled. In the Storia, the essay on the individual form stands grafted into a dialectic which seeks to view it as part of the spiritual journey of a people and the birth of a nation. The Storia thus clearly attempts to satisfy a national demand. The romantics had long insisted on viewing society in literature. Now the new nation turns and would see itself in its national literature. The will to re-educate Italians for a new Italy takes over. The result is far from being a work of pure and consistent criticism; but it has proved to be a work of great vitality.

While De Sanctis went far beyond his time in the perception of certain fundamental principles concerning the nature of poetry, he quite naturally brought to the explication of those principles tastes and predilections which were very much of his time. In the Divine Comedy, Hell was more poetic than Paradise, Francesca da Rimini more poetic than Beatrice. By the same romantic penchant for the dramatic, Shakespeare's is a greater poetry than Dante's. However, in spite of the discount that the passing of one or two generations must always make in the estimate of a critic, literary history and literary criticism in Italy today constantly return to the Storia and to the Saggi for certain fundamental perceptions regarding Italian literature.

See: B. Croce, Estetica come scienza dell'espressione e linguistica generale, 4th ed., revised (1912), Ch. XV; Croce, Gli Scritti di F. D. S. e la loro varia fortuna (1917), and De Sanctis, Pagine sparse, ed. by Croce (1934), for complete bibliography; G. A. Borgese, Storia della critica romantica in Italia, new ed. (1920), Ch. XVII; L. A. Breglio, Life and Criticism of Francesco De Sanctis (1941).

C. S. S.

Descaves, Lucien (1861–, French novelist, dramatist, and critic), was born in Paris in the Montrouge quarter; his father was an engraver of some talent, and Lucien Descaves remained faithful to the atmosphere and to the artisans of the faubourgs. He became a bank clerk at the Crédit Lyonnais, which showed him the sordid world of business, and he then spent four years in army service and learned to note with an implacable eye the insipid coarseness and the brutality of the professional noncommissioned officers. When he was able to return to civilian life, he became friends with Edmond de Goncourt, Alphonse Daudet (qq.v.), Gustave Geffroy, Séverine, J. K. Huysmans (q.v.), and even Zola (q.v.). But when Zola's La Terre was published, he signed the "Manifeste des Cinq" (Figaro, August 18, 1887) and revolted against the extremes of naturalism (see French naturalism). In 1889 the publication of Sous-Offs was the occasion of a scandal; Descaves was prosecuted and then acquitted after a very eloquent plea made by Alexandre Millerand (1890). But the victory had a Pyrrhic quality since the antimilitaristic author continued to be ostracized by bourgeois opinion. He was able, however, in 1892, when the Journal was founded, to use the medium of an important daily newspaper and to give free play to his stormy temperament. He was elected to the Goncourt Academy in 1900, became its enfant terrible, and eventually its president (1944).

The writings of Descaves, numerous and varied, show a constant interest in minute observation of everyday reality and warm sympathy for the abundant troubles of humble folk. At first harsh, not to say brutal, in the current naturalistic manner, he gradually freed himself from such heaviness and pessimism and grew to be both ironical and tender, critical and sentimental—in a word, fundamentally Parisian. His novels and stories include Le Calvaire d'Héloïse Pajadou (1882), Une Vieille Rate (1883), La Teigne (1886), all youthful works; La Caserne (1887), Misères du sabre (1887), and Sous-Offs, which are violent satires of military life; Les Emmurés (1894), a moving account of the life of the blind; La Colonne (1902), an episode of the Commune, and Philémon, Vieux de la Vieille (1913), which is the odyssey of a political exile who took refuge in Switzerland after the terrible Bloody Week; Barabbas (1914), which is eloquent and heart-rending; and finally the story of Georgin, L'Imagier d'Epinal (1919), proof of the author's admiration for the small tradesmen.

His dramatic writing, extensive and uneven, shows that Descaves was again preoccupied with social and moral problems and again full of sympathy for idealistic revolutionaries. Among the plays are La Pelote (1889), written with Bonnetain; Les Chapons (1890), written with Darien; La Cage (1898), production of which was forbidden by the censor; La Clairière (1900), written with Donnay (q.v.) and very successful; Oiseaux de passage (1904), also written with Donnay and containing an analysis, by contrast, of the revolts of occidental idealism and of Slavic mysticism; L'Attentat (1906), biting political satire, written with Capus (q.v.); La Préférée (1906), full of sentiment; La Saignée (1913), a tragic picture of the Commune, written with Nozière; Pierre Dupont (1922); L'As de cœur (1920), a post-war drama; Le Cœur ébloui (1926); Les Fruits de l'amour (1928).

Descaves also composed, over a period of more than half a century, several thousand articles, often piquant, at times aggressive and formidable and earning him lasting enemies. The best of these pieces are in the Intransigeant and the Journal, both of which newspapers he long served as literary editor. Although a rebel—and of the line of Jules Vallès (q.v.)—he did not always succeed in suppressing delicate sensibilities and authentic enthusiasms, as appears from La Vie douloureuse de Marceline Desbordes-Valmore (1911), the devoted pages of Les Dernières Années de Huysmans (1941), and especially Les Mémoires d'un ours (1946), which is an autobiography.

See: Emile Moselly, Lucien Descaves; biographie critique (1910); Léon Deffoux, Lucien Descaves (1930).

G. G.

Desjardins, Paul (1859–1940, French philosopher and critic), was born in Paris of a well-to-do family and after a brilliant academic career entered the teaching profession, eventually becoming director of the Ecole Normale de Sèvres. His published work is small, not much more than a half-dozen volumes, of which only Esquisses et impressions (1888) and La Méthode des classiques (1904) are very large in bulk, but most of it is of the highest quality. His influence on European culture, however, cannot be measured merely in terms of publication. Desjardins, at the end of the 19th century, was one of the many in France who deplored the wave of pessimism which, whether or not the result of the defeat of 1870, had made itself felt more and more in the years that followed it. In Le Devoir présent (1891; Eng. tr., The Present Duty, 1893) he divided mankind into the positives and the negatives, those with and those without faith in life and civilization, and condemning the latter—the disciples of Renan (q.v.), of Darwin, of Zola (q.v.)—he called for a réveil moral and an association of men of good will who, regardless of race or creed, would unite in affirming the primacy of spiritual values. His first step towards this end was the formation in 1892 of the Union pour l'Action Morale, which in 1898 was split by the Dreyfus affair and, with the schism of Vaugois and Pujo (founders of the Action française), became the Union pour la Vérité.

From 1892 Desjardins's life was one of tireless devotion to the Union and its ideals; in its monthly bulletin and in personal discussions he labored heroically for the cause of humanism and the maintenance of the highest ideals of European culture. In pursuance of this purpose he bought the century-old Cistercian abbey at Pontigny and in 1910 organized the first of the famous "Entretiens d'été de Pontigny," informal discussions of artistic, philosophical, economic, and moral problems by intellectual leaders of all countries. Desjardins preserved throughout these troubled years an intellectual and spiritual integrity and detachment that few could rival; his one vocation was the search for truth, and he believed that it could best be arrived at by free and friendly discussion, by cooperation, faith in mankind, and good will, rather than by suspicion, intolerance, and partisan hatreds. The First World War dealt a serious blow to his ideals, but he persisted; the conferences were resumed in 1922 and during the succeeding years reached a new brilliance. With the Second World War came a new interruption and the death of Desjardins, still hopeful in spite of all. Neither the war nor his death was allowed to put an end to the work, however; during the Second World War the conferences took on a new life at South Hadley, Massachusetts, under the sponsorship of the New York Ecole Libre des Hautes Etudes.

See: Ernst Robert Curtius, Französischer Geist im neuen Europa (1925); Jean Dietz, Paul Desjardins (1930); M. D. Petre, "Paul Desjardins; a Personal Reminiscence," Hibbert Journal, XXXVIII (1940), 505-510.

C. W., Jr.

Deus Ramos, João de (1830-1896, Portuguese poet), was born in São Bartolomeu de Messines, Algarve, of humble parents. In 1849 he went to Coimbra to study law. A contemplative and indolent character, given to self-absorption, he evinced a complete indifference to his academic obligations and gave his time to poetry and bohemian student life. This delayed his law degree 10 years. When he was eventually graduated in 1859, he was so fond of the Coimbra atmosphere that he remained there until 1862. As a result he became attached to the group which, under the name Generation of Coimbra, was to have so much importance in the history of recent Portuguese literature (q.v.). A product of romanticism, and also an uncompromising nonconformer and a mystic rebel, he identified himself spiritually with the new revolt, exerted an influence on many of its adherents, and maintained close relations with almost all of them. Later he left for South Portugal and for a period engaged in journalism in Beja. Returning home, he hunted and loitered about the countryside until 1868. João de Deus had never bothered about the publication of his writings; these he composed mentally, and when they took final form he either wrote them down or dictated them to his friends, who collected his scribbled sheets and sent them to the reviews. As early as 1860 some of his friends had thought of collecting his works, and Antero de Quental (q.v.) had proclaimed their great artistic worth in an article. In 1868 he published his first collection of poems with the simple title Flores do campo (Wild Flowers). Later Teófilo Braga (q.v.) was to collect the lyrical works scattered in magazines and newspapers in a volume entitled Campo de flores (1893; Field of Flowers), which João de Deus dedicated to "his contemporaries at the University of Coimbra." In 1868 also a group of friends induced the poet to enter politics and sent him to Parliament as a deputy. He accepted indolently but soon became disgusted and gave up the post. He married at this time, and his years of poverty began. He shut himself up in a garret, worked at the sewing machine to help his wife, composed verses on commission for confectionery shops and rural parties, and did the most menial sort of work for book-dealers, lacking the energy to look for a position or even to leave his house.

Flores do campo had been successful but the poverty continued. In 1875 he produced Fóllhas soltas (Loose Leaves)—and that same year abandoned poetry to devote himself to the active promotion of a reading method for schools which he had invented (Cartilha maternal; Maternal Primer). From that moment his resigned apathy disappeared, and he developed a miraculous self-discipline and great energy and tenacity in his apostleship of popular education. In 1888 his method was officially accepted, and he was appointed to introduce it. In 1896 the youth of the schools paid elaborate homage to him in his home where he lived in semi-poverty. Before the end of that year he died, modest, smiling, and kindly, as he had lived.

Before the publication of the first verses of Quental and before the appearance of a new aesthetic with the polemic of Coimbra, João de Deus—and this is his importance—had already asserted himself as a lyric poet. Chronologically he belongs to realism, but he is separated from this type of poetry by the fact that he does not philosophize. Actually, he is the last great romantic, although also apart from this movement in his scorn for history. He revitalized decadent amorous lyricism, limiting the show of the sentiments and the overfree expansion of the subjective to a pure expression of love. He abolished artificial verbalism and brought to lyricism the only originality possible at that time: a maximum expressiveness within the framework of an eloquent simplicity, which in him reaches the pure folkloric. He renovated the suggestive value of the commonest vocabulary through delicacy of emotion and smooth musicality. A veritable symphonist of words, he created a new metaphysic of love within a new elaboration of Lusitanian rhythms, characterized by extreme fluidity and sweetness. This was an unexpected revelation, and its influence was felt in all subsequent poetry. A succession of images expresses the iridescences of lyric emotion—a method that had been unknown in Portuguese poetry. His poetry contains only contemplative love; there is no anger, hate, or grief. Eça de Queiroz (q.v.) referred to "his two interests, woman and divinity: Love and Mysticism." Women never caused him erotic uneasiness, or rather he was able to transform an emotion of voluptuous origin into a beautiful beatitude of pure contemplation. His work is the synthesis of the best Portuguese lyricism. A man of scant culture, through an intuition of genius he was able to combine the traditional vein of the Cancioneiros with Renaissance Neoplatonism and the natural flow of folk poetry and so produce the purest lyricism in Portuguese poetry since Camões.

See: T. Braga, "João de Deus e a renovação do moderno lyrismo," in As modernas idéias na literatura portuguesa (1892), II, 5-95; A. F. G. Bell, "Three Poets of the Nineteenth Century," in Studies in Portuguese Literature (1914); E. de Castro, "João de Deus," Biblos, VI (Coimbra, 1930), 109-130.
E. G. D.

Deutschland, Das Jüngste. This designation for German naturalism (q.v.) is repeatedly used by the writers of the naturalistic period. It was created by analogy with Das Junge Deutschland, a literary movement of the 1830's which the naturalists felt was akin to their own in its insistence on contemporary subject matter and its belief that literature's function was to shape and direct contemporary thought. The naturalists saw their own desire for social reform through literary activity as a further development of the political aspirations of Das Junge Deutschland. Many of their scientific ideas and aesthetic theories were foreshadowed, they believed, by Ludolf Wienbarg and other critics of the earlier group.

W. H. R.

Deyssel, Lodewijk van (pseud. of Karel Joan Lodewijk Alberdingk Thijm, 1864-, Dutch critic, essayist, and novelist), was born at Hilversum and spent his childhood at Amsterdam, where his father, a leader among Dutch Roman Catholics, taught aesthetics and the history of art at the Academy of Fine Arts. From 1875 till 1878 he was a pupil at a Catholic boarding school at Rolduc in the province of Limburg. Here he had to speak French and learned to read French literature. He reveled in its beauty, and at the age of 17 he took up the defense of Dumas filis and Zola (q.v.) against the strictures of W. J. F. Nuyens, a prominent Roman Catholic writer. Van Deyssel admired in Zola his passion for truth and his application of the positivist method to literary art. He sensed the poverty of Dutch literature and longed to do his part in revitalizing it. He professed himself an advocate of "art for art's sake." An author who made his books subserve religious, political, or social ends did not deserve the name of artist. He saw in Zola neither a social reformer nor a popularizer of scientific knowledge, but a pure artist who portrayed reality with a scientist's objectivity. Still, he did not wholly agree with the French master. There was something of the moralist in Zola that detracted from his greatness as an artist. For that reason Van Deyssel felt more and more drawn towards the art of the Goncourts (q.v.). In this period, and under these influences, he wrote two naturalistic novels, Een Liefde (1887; A Love Story) and De kleine Republiek (1886; The Little Republic). They shocked Dutch society by the frank description of indecent scenes. He had introduced them, Van Deyssel explained in later life, not from any delight in such scenes, but to proclaim his theory that "we have the right to say everything." Een Liefde is the study of a woman born for love who, married to an unresponsive husband, mentally disintegrates. The other novel is a minute record of life in the Catholic boys' school at Rolduc. But Van Deyssel was too much of a lyricist to find permanent satisfaction in naturalism. A few years after the appearance of Een Liefde he declared in De Dood van het Naturalisme (1891; Naturalism Is Dead): "Naturalism no longer fills me with the happiness of a dazzling dawn such as I feel at the discovery of a new, incipient art." He now veered toward the mysticism of Maeterlinck and Huysmans (qq.v.). The mysterious life of the soul had greater fascination for his sensitive nature than the sordidness of visible reality. Still, he paid a noble tribute to Zola on the occasion of his death in 1902.

Van Deyssel was one of the so-called "Eightiers" who edited De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide), the organ of the rebel generation which revolutionized Dutch literature. As a literary critic he was bold and aggressive. His criticism was a clarion call to rebellion against all that was smug and humdrum and platitudinous. He used words for the voicing of passion and pride and profanity such as the preceding generation had been taught to avoid as obscene and wicked. If his prose had been merely daring, the revolt that he led, aided by his friend Willem Kloos (q.v.), would have been a flash in the pan. But he was an inspired prophet who challenged the age in magnificent language that burned itself into the hearts of his youthful contemporaries. After 1900 the fight that he led so brilliantly was won. Van Deyssel was recognized as the dean of modern Dutch literature. His productivity declined in the security of triumph. His later work was marked by exquisiteness of observation and phrasing, but it lacked the passionate élan of his early prose.

See: J. de Graaf, Le Réveil littéraire en Hollande et le naturalisme français, 1880-1900 (1938), pp. 56-73 and passim.

A. J. B.

Dicenta, Joaquín (1863-1917, Spanish dramatist), was born in Calatayud, the birthplace of Martial, but he did not inherit the Hispano-Roman's incisive wit. He began his education in the school of the Piarist fathers at Getafe, near Madrid, and came out a rebel against religion and the established social order. Many tales are told of the excesses of his wild bohemian life. He began his literary career by writing poems in Edén, a journal published by the perfume trade, and later wrote for a large number of newspapers, most of them decidedly ephemeral in character. From time to time throughout his career he published sketches, short stories, and novels, now forgotten. Although he wrote a number of dramas, in verse or prose, and even zarzuelas (musical comedies), he is commonly thought of as the dramatist of the proletariat because of one play, Juan José, the dramatic sensation of Spain in the late 19th century. He had begun his career as a playwright with a frankly romantic verse drama in four acts called El suicidio de Werther (1888), brought to the boards through the influence of Manuel Tamayo y Baus (q.v.). The play had small success, and the verse dramas which followed even less. Los irresponsables (1892), still in verse, won ecclesiastical censure and attention from dramatic critics. Dicenta began his prose plays with the thesis drama Luciano (1894). This was followed by Juan José (1895; Eng. tr., 1919), the most popular play written in Spain after Zorrilla's Don Juan Tenorio. It has been translated into seven foreign languages. Juan José, an honest workman, through the persecutions of his rich and cruel employer, is turned into a murderer. The play had real novelty in Spain and possesses considerable dramatic brute strength. So does the less popular Aurora (1902), first shown in Barcelona. Daniel (1906) is a violent play of syndicalist activities in a mine. In Sobrevivirse (1911) Dicenta turns from the proletariat to portray the tragedy of a dramatist who has outlived his inspiration and commits suicide. El lobo (1914) shows a hardened criminal transformed by love into a hero. In all these plays, despite their external crude realism, Dicenta remains fundamentally romantic in spirit; his protest against social abuses, timely enough, is mainly sentimental. Echegaray (q.v.), who considerably influenced Dicenta, was the romanticist of the bourgeois: Dicenta himself was "a romantic in a workman's smock," as Díez-Canedo (q.v.) has called him. At any rate he gave the proletariat dramatic dignity.

See: A. González-Blanco, Los dramaturgos españoles contemporáneos, Ser. 1 (1917), pp. 205-294.

N. B. A.

Didring, Ernst (1868-1931, Swedish dramatist and novelist), has been one of the most productive of Swedish dramatists of the last half century. His first play, Midnattssol (Midnight Sun), was performed in 1897; and since the turn of the century he has written some 20 others, most of which have been successfully produced in Sweden. Didring's greatest theatrical triumph was Högt Spel (1909; High Stakes), an exciting dramatic treatment of jealousy, which won recognition also outside of Sweden. He has been far less productive as a writer of prose fiction. But one of his novels, Malm (3 vols., 1914-1919; Iron Ore), is to be reckoned among the more successful of that rather large number of novels of the last 50 years which have described the industrial development of modern Norrland, the far northern Swedish region famous for its fabulous iron deposits and rich lumber and fishing industries. In Malm Didring is not so much concerned with the popular brand of Arctic literary romanticism, with its pandering to the merely picturesque and its overstrained lyricism. Rather, he is occupied with the solid and heroic labors of that group of men who built the far northern railroad through what seemed an impassable terrain and opened the great iron mines in the heart of a desolate Arctic countryside, bringing the blessings of a productive civilization to the wilderness and adding one of the most stirring chapters to the story of Sweden's modern industrial development. Didring's novel has an epic sweep in keeping with the demands of its theme; and though it may be said to be somewhat uneven in purely literary qualities, it maintains for the most part a finely controlled narrative touch and a firm handling of character. As an artist in general, Didring is scarcely of first rank; but his work everywhere, in addition to a noteworthy industry, possesses a sober sense of reality which speaks directly on current themes without lending itself to excesses of propaganda. In his plays he developed with time into a skillful manipulator of dramatic construction and dialogue.

Aside from his authorship Didring was active in a number of ways. He served as an accountant for the Royal Swedish Railways for a quarter of a century (during which time he was active in establishing an employees' pension system), was a member of a Swedish Red Cross committee concerned with war prisoners during and after the First World War, and occupied positions of high trust in both the Swedish Authors' Society and the Swedish Dramatists' Society. Just before his death in 1931 he was the recipient of the annual literary prize of Samfundet De Nio, perhaps a rather tardy semiofficial recognition of his long and unselfish if not distinguished service to Swedish literary and cultural life.

See: Ruben Gustafsson Berg, "Ernst Didring," Ord och bild, XLI (1932), 209-224.

A. G.

Diego, Gerardo (1896-, Spanish poet), is the most representative of the writers of "pure" poetry who came into prominence about 1919. He is especially associated with the movement dubbed creacionismo by the Chilean poet Vicente Huidobro, who believed that the poet should not mirror God's world but create his own. Diego, born in Santander, studied with the Jesuits in Deusto, a district of Bilbao, and at the universities of Salamanca and Madrid. He has taught at the institutos of Soria, Gijón, and Santander and lectured widely on literature and music.

Diego's first book, El romancero de la novia (1920), was followed by Imagen (1922), of capital importance in the "pure" poetry movement, whose creed it states and illustrates. "Does it not seem to you, my brothers, that for a good many years we have lived on Saturday?" asks the poet. "We have been resting because God has given us everything ready-made. Let us shape our own Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays." Poetry has been too long the reflection and plaything of humanity; it must be "dehumanized," freed from narrative, descriptive, and rhetorical preoccupation with the common coin of human experience. Having no emotional substance, it must skip over the surface of life with a kind of cosmic playfulness, catching up images, recombining and refocusing them until they become independent lyric creations.

For Diego, the symbol of poetry is water, which yields its transparency to a multiplicity of images, its eternal rhythm to innumerable melodies, "singing always the same verse, but with different water," "a frieze running forever in the same deliberate posture." The beauty of water informs such musical poems of Imagen as "Madrugal" and "Movimiento perpetuo." Tossed into the air it gives title and inspiration to Manual de espumas (1924), which is almost pure creacionismo, and perhaps reaches its highest point in the fresh and jubilant aspiration of "Paraíso."

Viewed in the order of their publication, Diego's books show an alternation of creacionismo with poetry of more or less traditional type. Imagen is followed by Soria (1923), whose lyrical visions of Castile recall Antonio Machado (q.v.). Manual de espumas is followed by Versos humanos (1925) and Viacrucis (1931). Viacrucis, a collection of 33 décimas in the baroque style, is tender and moving. Versos humanos, although largely traditional in character, contains, in the sonnet "El ciprés de Silos," for example, some of Diego's most audacious multiple imagery; it reiterates the assurance that his poetry may be for the moment in captivity to human experience, but will soon leave the cage and resume its lyric flight.

Diego has had great influence among the poets of his group. His Antología poética en honor de Góngora (1927) acclaimed one of the most potent sources of their inspiration. His Poesía española (1932; new volume, 1934) is an excellent presentation and interpretation of their work.

See: A. Valbuena Prat, La poesía española contemporánea (1930); F. de Onís, Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, 1882-1932 (1934).

D. K. A.

Díez-Canedo, Enrique (1879-1944, Spanish poet and critic), was born in Badajoz. He began his literary work as a poet in the first year of this century, winning a prize in a contest of the newspaper Liberal. Three books, Versos de las horas (1906), La visita del sol (1907), and Del cercado ajeno (1907), were soon published. Del cercado ajeno, made up of translations of foreign poets, especially French, established his reputation as a translator and a connoisseur of contemporary European poetry. In the same period he began to distinguish himself as a critic--the most constant activity of his life. From 1909 to 1911 Díez-Canedo studied in Paris, becoming acquainted with many Spanish American writers who were living in or visiting the French capital and whom he made known to the Spanish public. He contributed to the most important reviews and papers of the Hispanic world and taught French and history of art. He was also a dramatic critic for Voz and Sol and for many years was one of the most active and amiable persons in the literary life of Madrid. He lectured in several countries and was in 1931 a visiting professor at Columbia University. As a result of his close friendship with Azaña (q.v.), he was ambassador to Uruguay and Argentina during the Republic. In 1935 he entered the Spanish Academy, reading an address on a subject he knew particularly well, the literary relations between Spain and Spanish America (Unidad y diversidad de las letras hispánicas). Like many other Spanish writers, he lived in exile in Mexico after the fall of the Republic.

Well equipped by culture, curiosity, and taste for literary criticism, Canedo's work, although fragmentary and circumstantial, is vast and in several respects of very high authority—the evaluation of many contemporary writers, the review of new plays and books, the diffusion of foreign literature in Spain, and the study of current Spanish American literature, a field in which he was a recognized expert. He knew also the literature and plastic arts of the past, and when the pressing duties of the professional critic left him free time, he wrote scholarly studies such as those found in his edition of Boscán and of Garcilaso, those collected in Conversaciones literarias (1921) and Los dioses en el Prado (1931), and his lecture "España en los umbrales del arte moderno" (Revista de Indias, Bogotá, Vol. IV, 1939, pp. 80–94).

Though known primarily as a critic, nevertheless it is probably in poetry that Canedo best expressed his instinctive feeling for perfection in form as well as his fine sensibility of a natural, intimate, and minor-key lyricism, equidistant from the rhetoric of certain modernists and the subtilized expression of more recent pure poetry. Other volumes of his poetry are La sombra del ensueño (1916), Algunos versos (1924), Epigramas americanos (1928), and El desterrado (1940).

See: T. Navarro Tomás, Discurso (1935), composed for Díez-Canedo's reception into the Spanish Academy.

A. del R.

Di Giacomo, Salvatore (1860–1934, Italian dialectal poet, novelist, and playwright), was born in Naples, where he was educated and spent his life. He began the study of medicine, but was soon lured away by the love of letters and in 1881 wrote his first sonnet in the Neapolitan dialect. All his subsequent poems were written in Neapolitan. He also wrote stories, in the Italian language, most of them having Neapolitan life as a background: Novelle napoletane (1919). Di Giacomo became a contributor to the Corriere del mattino, the Pungolo, and later to the Corriere di Napoli. For many years he served as librarian of the Lucchesi-Palli in Naples. As a scholar he was especially erudite in the history of Naples, about which he wrote a total of 34 volumes, in Italian. Like Petrarch he thought his fame would rest on his scholarly work, of which he would often talk, rather than on his poetry, for which in fact his fame spread even beyond national boundaries, notably to Germany and France. One of his famous songs "A Marechiare," set to music by Tosti, is still sung the world over. On March 18, 1929, he was admitted to the Italian Academy.

Di Giacomo matured early as a poet and by 1910 had already written his best poems. His last years were devoted almost entirely to editing his works; the final edition of his complete poems appeared in 1927. In his old age Di Giacomo suffered from both physical and spiritual afflictions. He died alone, away from friends. His publisher, Achille Ricciardi, said he died even away from his poetry and himself.

Di Giacomo began writing when folklore studies and verism had reached their zenith in Italy. His early poems and novels deal directly with the common people. Poems such as "O funneco verde," "Irma," "A Strata," are examples among many of his veristic beginning. Even the great series of sonnets "San Francisco" is to some extent veristic. But he is not the poet of the people. His documentation is not like that of Verga or Capuana (qq.v.). His is attenuated, sentimentalized, and even made subjective. Indeed at times he becomes so very personal that one can no longer properly speak of verism. His novels and dramas, however more veristic than his poetry, also show the poet's individuality; they are often mere versions of his poems, keeping not only the subject but also the feeling. Di Giacomo never really wrote prose or verism. The throbbing personality of the author could not remain enchained by either. His poetry is thus lyric, but it unfolds a melancholic lyricism which affects the reader not by a crescendo, but by a sostenuto. It often leaves the reader in tears. His is a sweet and dreamy melancholy, not merely in the subject, but especially in the tone. Poems such as "O Munasterio," "Tutto, tutto se scorda," "Nanninà," "Pusilleco," e.g., leave one very sad. He is simple and innocent like a child, and like a child he is easily enchanted by the starry sky or the big moon shining on the sea of Naples. At times he is enthralled by the macabre and the weird; his enchantment gives place to mystification and mystery; he becomes a victim of his own youthful and impetuous fantasy. In his later years Di Giacomo did not write with the same verve; he himself admits it in one of his last poems. The philosophy of his poetry, which shows dissatisfaction with life, is no longer melancholic, but tragic, for the poet ceases to derive appeasement from his own sorrow. Turmoil finally seizes him as well as his characters and readers.

Di Giacomo's poetic language, in Neapolitan dialect, contains earmarks of the poet's culture. His verses are musical, polished, and refined. But the greatness of his poetry lies in the fact that it is warm and refreshing; it does not owe, however, its warmth and freshness to the dialect per se, as it has been claimed; no language is fresh or stale, warm or cold in itself. Di Giacomo's Neapolitan becomes peculiarly his particular channel of expression; it is the reflection of his poetic genius which Croce (q.v.) first of all recognized. To Croce, in fact, Di Giacomo owes his rapid rise to fame, but he would have sooner or later surmounted the obstacle of dialect and would have been given recognition just the same because poetry is poetry in any language. Today he is considered not only the outstanding modern Neapolitan poet, but one of Italy's greatest lyric geniuses.

See: F. Gaeta, Salvatore Di Giacomo (1911); L. Russo, Salvatore De Giacomo (1921); B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 2d ed., III (1922), 73-100.

F. D. M.

Döblin, Alfred (1878-, German novelist and essayist), had the greatest narrative talent of any of the members of the German expressionist movement. A writer of tremendous vitality, fertile imagery, and vision, he is thoroughly grounded in modern science and philosophy. He was born in Stettin, but his parents moved to Berlin when he was 10 years of age. He studied in Berlin and Freiburg, obtaining his M.D. in 1905. However, he turned to journalism, and it was not until 1911 that he went back to Berlin to settle down as a psychiatrist in the workers' district around the Alexanderplatz. He married and had four sons. During the first phase of his life his publications were confined to his professional field and to essays on philosophic and aesthetic questions.

Writing was a passion with Döblin; after experiences he needed expression. Most of his early writings remained unpublished. His first public appearance as a writer was made in Der Sturm, the expressionist periodical published by Herwarth Walden. The stories there presented were later collected in Die Ermordung einer Butterblume (1913). Here vision merges with reality, perspective with distortion, and reflection with symbolism—characteristics revealed also in most of Döblin's later work. His first great success was the "Chinese" novel, Die drei Sprünge des Wang-lun (1915), which brought him the Fontane prize. It is not a story of adventures or curiosities, although there is a colorful background and exciting incidents abound, but a literary attempt to transplant the soul of the Far East to Europe. Wang-lun, the roaming revolutionary and reformer, must succumb to the crude power of the state, but even in his defeat he demonstrates the victory of the nonviolent spirit over brute force.

In the First World War, Döblin was for three years a physician at the front, but even there he continued his work. Wadzeks Kampf mit der Dampfmachine (1918) poses grotesquely and ironically the problem of man versus machine. The historical novel Wallenstein (1920), which varied the philosophical theme of Wang-lun, was also partly written at the front. Stripping history of idealizing embellishments, Döblin shows the collapse of mere power, and is obviously giving his interpretation of the First World War. Berge, Meere und Giganten (1924) is a satirical, yet horribly powerful vision of the future of man, a veritable nightmare of expressionist conjuration. Man's modern science without goodness of heart will lead to fantastic apocalyptic doom. Döblin's best-known novel is Berlin Alexanderplatz (1929; Eng. tr., Alexanderplatz, Berlin, 1931). The best elements of expressionism are fused in this unique work, which though wrongly called an imitation of Joyce nevertheless suggests the Irish writer. The story of the fate of a simple, if rude, proletarian, done with consummate skill and an intimate knowledge of people and locale, has been translated into many languages and has secured the author's fame.

When the anti-Semitic tide rose, Döblin left Germany. His books were burned there, but he continued his work. Some of his writings in exile are: Babylonische Wanderung (1934); Pardon wird nicht gegeben (1935; Eng. tr., Men without Mercy, 1937); two exotic historical novels dealing with the Spanish conquistadores, the Indians, and the Jesuits, Die Fahrt ins Land ohne Tod (1937) and Der blaue Tiger (1938). Bürger und Soldaten 1918 (1939) is the first volume of a projected trilogy on the German revolution in 1918. The novelle Nocturno (1944) adds little originality to a well-known literary motif. A discriminating essay on German literature written in exile since 1933 is Die deutsche Literatur (1938). Döblin and his family lived for a while in Palestine, then moved to the United States. He returned to Germany after the war and in Baden-Baden interested himself in the publishing of a literary magazine.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 871-885; W. Mahrholz, Deutsche Literatur der Gegenwart (1930), pp. 425-427; F. Bertaux, A Panorama of German Literature from 1871 to 1931 (1935), pp. 186-192; H. von Hofe, "German Literature in Exile: Alfred Döblin," German Quarterly, XVII (1944), 28-31.

W. K. P.

Dobrogeanu-Gherea, Constantin (1855-1920, Rumanian literary critic), was born and educated in Russia where he took part in revolutionary activities. He suffered imprisonment, escaped to Norway and England, and finally took refuge in Rumania. He contributed to the Jassy Contemporanul (The Contemporary) political articles and literary criticisms. His polemics with Titu Maiorescu (q.v.) mark an epoch in Rumanian letters. In 1890 he became a Rumanian citizen, the manager of the Ploesti railroad-station restaurant, and a guiding spirit of political propaganda. When the leaders of the Rumanian Socialist Party renounced their struggle and joined the liberals, Dobrogeanu-Gherea alone continued to uphold socialist theories in his writings. In Neoiobăgia (1910; New Serfdom) he gave a searching analysis of the exploitation of the peasantry. His main work, however, is in the three volumes of Studii critice (1890-1897; Critical Studies). If politically the seeds of Dobrogeanu-Gherea's ideas fell on stony ground, from a literary point of view they germinated the Poporanist (People's) movement which blossomed in 1906.

See: B. Lăzăreanu, Ioan Gherea (1924).

L. F

Domenchina, Juan José (1898-, Spanish poet and critic), was born in Madrid. Little is known of his early life. With his first volumes of poems—Del poema eterno (1917) and Las interrogaciones del silencio (1918)—he began to attract attention and to be considered as one of the main poets in the transition between modernism and the "new poetry." From the beginning his poetry had an intellectual bent strangely mixed with a Castilian sense of reality and a baroque form of expression. Díez-Canedo (q.v.) defined this as the "corporeity of the abstract," a definition adopted by the poet himself as the title of one of his most characteristic books, La corporeidad de lo abstracto (1929), and by most of the critics who have studied Domenchina's poetry. In 1936 he collected his poetic work in the volume Poesías completas, which included the books already mentioned as well as the later Dédalo (1932) and Margen (1933). The early elements of his poetry have not changed, but are rather intensified, acquiring a humane, neo-romantic, and expressionistic character which reaches at times a distorted satiric tone in the best baroque and stoic Spanish tradition of the 17th century. The same can be said of his last book, Destierro (1942), written in Mexico, where Domenchina has lived since 1939.

He has also tried narrative prose in two novels, but outside the field of poetry he is best known as a critic for his Crónicas de Gerardo Rivera (1935), made up of newspaper articles in which he judged incisively many contemporary writers. In 1941 he published in Mexico an anthology of contemporary Spanish poetry, good as far as the selection of poetry is concerned, but marred by unkind criticism of some fellow poets in the introductory notes.

See: E. Díez-Canedo, "Juan José Domenchina, poeta estoico," in Domenchina, La corporeidad de lo abstracto (1929), pp. 9-15.

A. del R.

Donnay, Maurice (1859-1915, French playwright), born in Paris, studied to be an engineer and graduated from the Ecole Centrale in 1885. In 1890 he was a member of the famous Montmartre cabaret, Le Chat Noir, where he presented certain pièces d'ombres—Phryné (1891), Ailleurs (1891). In 1892 he began his real dramatic subjects.

Donnay is one of the most important authors of light comedies. At times he indulged in dramas typical of the boulevard theatre (Education de Prince, 1900; La Patronne, 1908; La Belle Angevine, 1922, with André Rivoire; Le Geste, 1924, with Henri Duvernois) and even wrote librettos for musical comedies (Le Mariage de Télémaque, 1910, with Jules Lemaître, q.v., and Le Roi Candaule, 1920). He also contributed plays of deep psychological significance (Amants, 1895; La Douleur, 1897; L'Autre Danger, 1902; Paraître, 1906) as well as studies of social problems. Among the latter are La Clairière (1900; with Lucien Descaves, q.v.), an amusing satire of a phalanstery; Le Retour de Jérusalem (1903), on the Jewish question; Oiseaux de passage (1904; with Lucien Descaves), on the difficulty people of different races and backgrounds find in understanding each other; Les Eclaireuses (1913), on feminism. A skepticism without bitterness and a keen sense of humor prevented Maurice Donnay from giving his social dramas the dull character of problem plays.

Although primarily a playwright, he wrote the Vie amoureuse d'Alfred de Musset (1926) and volumes of an autobiographical nature, Pendant qu'ils sont à Noyon (1917), Autour du Chat Noir (1926), Mes Débuts à Paris (1937). Maurice Donnay was elected to the French Academy in 1907.

See: Roger Le Brun, Maurice Donnay (1903); Paul Flat, "Maurice Donnay," Revue bleue, LII (1914), 359-362; Henry Bidou, "Les Epoques du théâtre contemporain en France: IV, La Période Donnay-Capus," Revue hebdomadaire, Année XXX (1921), Tome I, pp. 195-210; P. Bathille, Maurice Donnay; son œuvre (1933).

M. E. C.

Dörfler, Peter (1878-, German novelist), was born at Untergermaringen in Württemberg, of an old Catholic peasant family. After completing the Gymnasium at Augsburg, he studied theology and now lives in Munich as a priest and director of an orphanage. A representative of regional literature, Dörfler began with short stories and extensive novels having a Swabian background, almost in the same manner in which Heinrich Hansjacob (1837-1916), also a Catholic priest, had some 20 years earlier told peasant tales of the Black Forest district. His first book—and still one of his best—is Als Mutter noch lebte (1912), the story of a young man, a monument to his own mother. It was followed by the novel Judith Finsterwalderin (1916), telling in a most simple and clear language the tragic fate of a young peasant girl. Here as well as in the tales which rapidly followed, Dörfler proved to be a genuine writer of and for the people: well he knew how to combine the sense of realism of the Swabians with piety and hearty humor. He originated a genre of fiction which was light but not unrelated to the important problems of life, simple but not superficial.

Dörfler's creative power appears at its best in the two novel-trilogies, Appolonia and Allgäu. The first stories, Die Lampe der törlichten Jungfrau (1930), Appolonia's Sommer (1931), and Das kommende Geschlecht (1932), tell of the daughter of a Swabian miller and her sacrifices for three generations of her family. In the second trilogy, Der Notwender (1934), Der Zwingherr (1935), and Der Alp- könig (1936), an outstanding leader risen from the people struggles against the internal and external troubles of his homeland, the Allgäu. Dörfler belongs to the writers of the literature of "race and soil." In spite of his Catholic faith, he was given high honors by Nazi officials.

See: F. Lennartz, Die Dichter unserer Zeit (1938), pp. 57-59; J. Bithell, Modern German Literature, 1880-1938 (1939), p. 490.

H. Sch.

Dorgelès, Roland (pseud. of R. Lécavelé, 1886-, French novelist), was born at Amiens. He attended the Ecole des Arts Décoratifs in Paris, but soon drifted to Montmartre, to live a bohemian life during some 12 years. His name was associated with a famous hoax to fool art critics. When war came, Dorgelès, who like Barbusse (q.v.) had not previously been a soldier, volunteered for the front. After a few months in the trenches, disillusion came, and he looked for a change. Flying was an honorable escape: Dorgelès flew, but not at the front. These facts are important to correct the author's imaginary heroics described by his biographers. In 1919 was published his first book and greatest success, Les Croix de bois (Eng. tr., Wooden Crosses, 1921), a war novel visibly inspired by Barbusse's best seller, Le Feu. But he was careful to avoid the brutal realism for which his senior had been blamed. A good critic who had never been a soldier wrote the review that initiated the success. There followed Le Cabaret de la belle femme (1919; Eng. tr., The Cabaret up the Line, 1930), war tales; Saint Magloire (1922; Eng. tr., 1923), the story of a saint in a 20th-century community; Le Réveil des morts (1923), the rehabilitation of war-devastated regions; and four travel books, Sur la route mandarine (1925; Eng. tr., On the Mandarin Road, 1926), Partir (1926; Eng. tr., Departure, 1928), La Caravane sans chameaux (1928), Entre le ciel et l'eau (1930). The most sincere and original works of Dorgelès, Le Château des brouillards (1932) and Quand j'étais Montmartrois (1936), describe the bohemian life he knew so well, a milieu which had not been so vividly presented since Henri Murger gave Scènes de la vie de Bohème in 1850. Dorgelès was elected to the Goncourt Academy in 1929, succeeding Georges Courteline (q.v.).

See: J. N. Cru, Témoins (1929), pp. 587-592; A. Dubeux, Roland Dorgelès (1930).

J. N. C.

D'Ors, Eugenio (1882-, Spanish critic and essayist), was born in Barcelona. He is a writer of great artistic and philosophic capacity, always responsive to the conflicts and problems of the modern spirit. The title of one of his most substantial works, Las ideas y las formas (1928), suggests his major interests. He is especially attracted to the treatment of aesthetic problems, which he offers the reader in his own disconnected and fragmentary mode of expression—the “glosa.” This is a shorter commentary than the essay, rejected as too digressive; the subject is isolated with precision and all the skill of a craftsman. This technique is notable in El nuevo glosario (1922), Diálogos de la pasión meditabunda (1922), and Cuando ya esté tranquilo (1930). The form of the gloss and the enormous field opened to the curiosity of the writer have caused at times a misunderstanding of the great unity of the work of D'Ors. Even those glosses which are the most frivolous from the standpoint of their content or those apparently most removed from the fields of art and thought can be fitted into a system of ideas and into a coherent body of philosophical thought. D'Ors is one of the Spanish thinkers who have tried, with modern sensibility, to overcome the traditional conflicts of philosophy by means of their own solutions. He is really a systematic writer within his “discontinuity.” He has an inherent feeling for order—even to giving the word order its architectonic sense; he favors a classifying precision, an established norm. He chooses his themes from among the most lofty and developed forms of human culture much in the manner of a gardener more intent on the perfection of the flower than on its mysterious gestation. He is devoted to intelligence, to reason; he is the enemy of “phantasmagories,” as he calls everything that cannot be classified or reduced to method.

In consequence of an antiromantic temperament, D'Ors shuns certain traditional Spanish values which are not in agreement with his attitude. However, he exalts others, since despite his cosmopolitanism D'Ors has a deep concern for Spanish things. Less Hispanized than his immediate predecessors of the Generation of '98 (see Spanish literature), he nevertheless turns toward lo hispánico from his native Catalonia. He began by being a Catalan writer employing the Catalan language and signed his work with the pseudonym Xenius, a Catalan diminutive of Eugenio. He then wrote his famous novel La ben plantada (1912). Already in 1906 he was collaborating on the important Catalan newspaper Veu de Catalunya, and that same year his Glosari, which fascinated the young Catalan intellectuals, also established the author as a European figure. As a director of public education he took an active part in the movement for the political and intellectual renovation of Catalonia. Then, in 1920, he broke with his Catalan friends, wrote his following works in Spanish, collaborated only on Madrid newspapers, and finally adhered to the cause of Franco, taking an active part in its political educational program.

D'Ors is a restless and crusading writer who attempts, as he says, to elevate to the rank of a “category” the anecdotal flow of history. His attempt to reconstruct a morphology of culture is interesting, and the classification and connections which he establishes between the apparently different modalities of the spirit are penetrating and fruitful. To him is due in great measure a revaluation of baroque art; he rectifies traditional concepts and establishes the fact that here is a manifestation of culture general during certain periods of history; far from being a deformation of classical taste, here is a forerunner, it is argued, of the romantic attitude. As an art critic the interpretation by D'Ors of the great painters is significant (Poussin y el Greco, 1922; Tres horas en el Museo del Prado, 1923; Cézanne, 1924; L'Art de Goya, 1928; Pablo Picasso, 1930).

An academic spirit par excellence, attracted by so many currents, D'Ors may be said to have two poles, the aristocratic, ironic, rationalistic, rococo taste of the 18th century on the one hand and the classical Mediterranean values which embody a certain aspect of the Catalan spirit on the other. For although D'Ors still feels lo hispánico through the unilateral and exclusive form of the new and already decrepit falangismo, he has very deep roots in Catalan tradition, one of the richest variations of the Hispanic spirit and attitude—witness his cosmopolitan zeal, his “classicism,” his plastic capacity, his luminous order. The work of D'Ors is damaged, nevertheless, by a certain affectation of tone, doubtless the result of his purely intellectual adherence to irony, an attitude from which he is temperamentally as removed as he is from humor and jesting.

See: D'Ors, La filosofía del hombre que trabaja y que juega (1914), introduction by Manuel G. Morente, commentaries by M. de Unamuno, and other studies; Samuel Putnam, ed., The European Caravan (1931).

F. G. L.

Dossi, Carlo (pseud. of Alberto Pisani, 1849–1910, Italian novelist and diplomat), was born at Zenevedro, Pavia. At the age of 19 he won recognition as a literary artist by writing L'Altrjeri (1868), the story of his childhood friendship with little Lisa, his pale-faced playmate, and of her death. The simplicity and the grace of this work recall the Vita nuova; its poetry is derived from the subtle observation of a world of delicate feelings and kind deeds in which the commonplaces of daily life take on artistic value. In La Vita d'Alberto Pisani (1870), a romantic autobiography, his style is often overcast by the clouds of Werther and Orthis. Elvira (1872) contains many delightful stories about the little things which make a child's life meaningful and about the joys of innocent love. When Dossi took his place in public life as secretary to Crispi, and later as minister in Bogotá and Athens, the personal poet yielded to the satirist. But he learned little about men; deeply rooted in him were an aristocratic aversion for the vulgarity of the masses—which led him to publish his works in small private editions—and a general distrust and ignorance of the outer world as a whole. La Colonia felice (1874) is a poem of ideas which tells of a group of convicts deported to a distant island and there left to themselves, who decide to submit to laws and appoint a ruler in order to build up a natural society and live happily. The three volumes of I Ritratti umani (1873–1885) present a series of portraits of a vulgar and sordid world with the habits and faults that Dossi bitterly resented; the first volume, Il Campionario, is a loud protest against the dull and the tedious in men and things, and the third, La Desinenza in A is a bitter satire of various types of women. The characters are generally as unconcerned with their contemporaries as the author himself; sometimes they are reduced to mere abstractions. Gocce d'inchostro (1880) and Amori (1887) are two collections of stories which had already appeared separately in periodicals; the last contains enchanting reflections of his own inner world of youthful memories. At the age of 40 Dossi stopped publishing: "The lamp was soon clogged by too much oil and afterwards it only smoked." He died in 1910 at Cardina, near Como. Posthumously published were his memoirs, the Note azzurre (1912), and two comedies, Ona Famiglia de Cilapponi (1921), Commediole (1927).

Dossi belongs to the period of late Lombard romanticism, to the Milanese circle of the painter Tranquillo Cremona from whom he borrowed effects of delicata sfumatura. But he also reacted vigorously against the tradition established by the followers of Manzoni, and his own disciple Lucini has regarded him as the master of a new literary style. Dossi tried to enrich the Italian narrative language with obsolete Latin or caustic Milanese or newly coined idioms. He believed that a language became monotonous when nationally adopted and commonly used; he claimed for the writer the right to invent new words as he created new modes and discovered new thoughts. This thirst for a manifold richness of expression tortured him at every page of his work. Croce confirmed him as an artist of merit and has given him a place of importance among the writers of the new Italy. As a poet of simple feelings and quiet scenes, the master of tones and rhythms, Dossi is now widely esteemed.

See: G. P. Lucini, L'Ora topica di Carlo Dossi; saggio di critica integrale (1911); B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 2d ed., III (1922), 201–217.

N. L.

Dostoevski, Fyodor Mikhailovich (1821–1881, Russian novelist and journalist), born in Moscow, was sent to a military engineering school in St. Petersburg at the age of 17. Dull drill and technical studies bored him and he sought relief in fiction and poetry and in translating Balzac's Eugénie Grandet. In 1843 he obtained a commission in the army, but the next year resigned to devote all his time to literature. His first novel, Bednyie lyudi (1846; Poor Folk), aroused the enthusiasm of the leading critic, Belinski, who acclaimed the author of this slight tale a coming new force in Russian literature. At the end of the same year (1846) he published his second work, Dvoinik (The Double), which disappointed Belinski. Over the next three years Dostoevski wrote some 12 sketches and short stories, concluding with an unfinished novel, Netochka Nezvanova (1849). The influence of several authors, particularly that of Gogol, is apparent in these works, but one can also detect some of the characteristic traits of the great novels of the future—the original dramatic method, a deep sympathy with humiliated, oppressed people, and an intense interest in morbid psychology.

During this early period in St. Petersburg, Dostoevski had been a shy, lonely, unsociable individual, always poor and with few friends. Eventually his liberal sympathies brought him into contact with a group of young men, known as the Petrashevski Circle, who met regularly to talk of social and political reforms. No doubt some of these youths, Dostoevski included, were preparing to engage in the illegal printing of controversial writings. At any event, the reactionary government of Nicholas I did not tolerate this kind of activity, however harmless, and in April, 1849, many members of the Petrashevski Circle were arrested and sentenced to death. At the place of execution they were informed that this penalty—really a cruel, theatrical device on the part of the tsar—had been commuted to exile to Siberia. Dostoevski never forgot those terrible moments. He was now to spend four years of hard labor at Omsk. His epilepsy, traces of which had begun to appear earlier, was no doubt aggravated by his severe sufferings at this time. His experiences as a convict played an important part in his development. Any radical leanings were abandoned; he acquired a firmer faith in the teachings of Christ, and his study of the New Testament in prison taught him his notable doctrine of salvation by suffering; he had come in prison to know the common Russian people as never before, and he was convinced that upon them rested the future greatness of Russia.

Dostoevski was released from prison in 1854, but the terms of his sentence obliged him to serve as a private in the ranks. He was quartered in the little Siberian town of Semipalatinsk, where he met and married Marya Isayeva, a widow with one child. An amnesty in 1859 allowed him to return to St. Petersburg. Literature was claiming all his attention once again, for he depended upon his pen for a livelihood. His first new work was Dyadyushkin son (1859; Uncle's Dream), an amusing and satirical long short story of a provincial town, quite unlike anything he had done up to this time. In the same year appeared the novelette Selo Stepanchikovo i evo obitateli (The Village of Stepanchikovo and Its Inhabitants; Eng. tr. as The Friend of the Family), in which he returned to his early method, particularly in the repulsive but brilliantly realized character, Foma Opiskin. His prison experiences began to appear in 1861 in the vivid Zapiski iz Mertvovo Doma (Notes from the House of the Dead; Eng. tr. as Buried Alive, Prison Life in Siberia, The House of the Dead), a book that Leo Tolstoy (q.v.) thought was the author's greatest. In the same year a full-length novel, Unizhonnnye i oskorblyonnyie (The Insulted and Injured), was issued in serial form. Once again Dostoevski was regarded by the public as one of the leading novelists.

Meanwhile, in 1861, he had entered the field of journalism with his own periodical Vremya (Time). It achieved an immediate success, partly because of his astuteness in steering a middle course between the prevailing extremes of radical and conservative thought. In rather affluent circumstances for the first time, he went abroad, but in 1863, some months after his return, an unfortunate article on the Poles brought about the suppression of his review. The blow left him deeply in debt; yet in the midst of his misfortunes he went abroad to keep a rendezvous in Paris with Polina Suslova, a handsome devotee of the new type of emancipated woman, with whom he had fallen passionately in love, and also to try his fortune at the gaming tables of Wiesbaden. His luck with both was execrable. Upon his return home he revived his review under the name of Epokha (The Epoch), but it got off to a bad start and lasted only a short time. He contributed to it his remarkable piece Zapiski iz podpolya (1864, Notes from the Underground; Eng. tr. as Letters from the Underworld), a kind of prologue to the five great novels that followed.

This same year (1864) his wife and his brother died and, deep in debt, he wrote furiously to pay off creditors. Prestupleniye i nakazaniye (Crime and Punishment) appeared in 1866, and the next year Igrok (The Gambler). While writing these works he employed a stenographer, Anna Snitkina, whom he married in 1867, one of the most fortunate events of his life. The couple soon went abroad, and this time Dostoevski remained in Europe for four years, living a hand to mouth existence while he indulged his passion for gambling.

He wrote Idiot (1868–1869; The Idiot) and began Besy (The Demons; Eng. tr. as The Possessed) in 1871, the year he returned to Russia. He eventually obtained a position as editor of a conservative weekly (1873–1874), to which he contributed a column, "Dnevnik pisatelya" (The Diary of a Writer), later offered with much success as a separate publication. A novel, Podrostok (A Raw Youth), appeared in 1875, and Bratya Karamazovy (The Brothers Karamazov) in 1880. The last few years of his life were spent in fairly good financial circumstances. His contemporary fame reached its height upon the occasion of an address delivered at the unveiling of the Pushkin Memorial in 1880, and when he died the following year he was accorded a public funeral.

Dostoevski's fame rests largely upon Crime and Punishment, The Idiot, The Possessed, and The Brothers Karamazov. He possessed in an extraordinary degree the qualities of the consummate novelist—dramatic construction, psychological insight, convincingness, and the ability to create memorable characters, such as Raskolnikov, Sonya Marmeladova, Prince Myshkin, Stavrogin, and Dmitri and Ivan Karamazov. He also infused his works with his powerful personality and his ethical and moral thought. Throughout his novels runs his special message of meekness and faith in Christ, whose precepts of suffering and love will enable the Russian people to bring about universal brotherhood. His vision of a purer and finer world was founded on the love and innate goodness that dwell in the hearts of men. This positive doctrine in his novels, however, is always opposed by a negative one, for Dostoevski's own life was a constant struggle between good and evil, and this struggle is reflected in the great characters he created.

There are numerous English translations of Dostoevski's works.

See: N. N. Strakhov, Biografiya, pisma i zametki iz zapisnoi knizhki Dostoyevskovo (1883); E. H. Carr, Dostoevsky (1931, in English); N. A. Berdyayev, Dostoevsky: An Interpretation, tr. by Donald Attwater (1934); Avrahm Yarmolinsky, Dostoevsky; a Life (1934); E. J. Simmons, Dostoevski: The Making of a Novelist (1940).

E. J. S.

Doumic, René (1860–1937, French critic), born in Paris, made a brilliant record at the Lycée Condorcet and the Ecole Normale Supérieure and taught rhetoric at the Collège Stanislas, engaging in journalism at the same time. In 1897 he abandoned systematic teaching to give all his time to criticism. By then he had written for the Correspondant, the Revue bleue, and the Journal des débats, and, more important, he had established himself solidly at the Revue des deux mondes, whose dramatic criticism he continued to write until his death. In 1910 he was elected to the French Academy, and in 1919 he succeeded Frédéric Masson as its secrétaire perpétuel. But in 1916 an even more important event had taken place: Doumic became editor of the Revue des deux mondes, in which position he remained the rest of his life.

Doumic, like his master Brunetière (q.v.), believed that art and morality were inseparable. The task of the critic, as he saw it, was to place writers according to the classic accepted values, to reward those who seemed to work for the spiritual and moral benefit of society and to punish those who, like Baudelaire (q.v.), seemed to have aligned themselves with the forces of evil. The critic was a teacher also, improving the public's moral perception as well as its aesthetic, spreading those ideas which were obviously wholesome, handing down the approved verities. To these aims was added, during the later part of Doumic's life, the complementary one of maintaining the prestige of the Revue and the Academy. To him the Revue in particular seemed the natural guardian of all that was important in the French spirit; it was the living expression of the glories of the French intellect. As its editor he was faced with the problem of keeping it "up to date" without lowering its standards; and his success is amply demonstrated by the fact that he tripled its circulation, though not without suppressing to some degree his own taste in the arts and politics and accepting in literature audacities of form so long as the sense was not contrary to faith and morals. In the Academy, too, his influence was profound.

Though Doumic was most at home in dramatic criticism, collected in such volumes as De Scribe à Ibsen (1893) and Essai sur le théâtre contemporain (1897), he produced also the useful Histoire de la littérature française (1890); a long series of interesting literary essays, Etudes sur la littérature française (6 vols., 1896–1908); and three respectable, if not brilliant, studies, George Sand (1909; Eng. tr., 1910), Lamartine (1911), and Saint-Simon (1919). A volume of articles, Contemporary French Novelists, was published in English translation in 1899. The most striking characteristics of Doumic's criticism are its bluntness, its deliberate dryness of style, and its constant moral elevation. For all his honesty and high-mindedness, however, Doumic was without any great originality, and it is difficult to see his work as anything more than a weaker continuation of Brunetière.

See: Emile Faguet, Propos littéraires, Sér. 4 (1907); John Charpentier, "René Doumic," Mercure de France, CCLXXXI (1938), 24–32; Gabriel Hanotaux, "Le Souvenir de René Doumic," Revue des deux mondes, November 15, 1938, pp. 266–292.

C. W., Jr.

Drachmann, Holger Henrik Herholdt (1846–1908, Danish poet), was the son of a naval surgeon in Copenhagen. From boyhood he was familiar with the sea and the men who lived by the sea and wanted at first to become a marine painter. His travels as a "journeyman painter" took him to England, and the poverty and misery he saw around the docks of London made him a revolutionary. His first published poem, "Engelske Socialister" (1871; English Socialists), revealed a striking talent. It was followed by two collections, Digte (1872; Poems) and Dæm- pede Melodier (1875; Muted Melodies), still under the sign of revolt. Drachmann naturally joined the group of which Georg Brandes (q.v.) was the center, but other elements in his rich, complex nature asserted themselves. He made a trip to South Jutland, which had come under German rule in 1864, and wrote a series of travel letters Derovre fra Grænsen (1877; Over There from the Border) which had an immense popular success. Incredible as it now seems, the patriotic note—together with the implied strictures on the literary and political squabbles in Copenhagen—offended Drachmann's internationally minded friends. At the same time he expressed his disgust at the "Lenten fare" of the problem literature. He craved romance and heroics. Nevertheless his sea stories, e.g., I Storm og Stille (1874; In Storm and Calm) or Paa Sømands Tro og Love (1878; On a Sailor's Word and Promise), though somewhat sentimental, show a more sympathetic understanding of the common man than does the work of the professed realists. From this early romantic period are the fairy-tale poem Prinsessen og det halve Kongerige (1878; The Princess and Half the Kingdom) and the popular poem Østenfor Sol og Vesten for Maane (1880; East of the Sun and West of the Moon). At the same time Drachmann attained his full stature as a lyric poet in Sange ved Havet (1877; Songs by the Sea), Ranker og Roser (1879; Vines and Roses), and Ungdom i Digt og Sang (1879; Youth in Poetry and Song). In these collections he developed to the point of virtuosity that peculiar flexible verse form which is so well suited to express infinitely varied moods. The pretty fairy-tale comedy Der var en Gang (1887; Once upon a Time) has retained its place on the Danish stage.

In spite of his charm and his gift for catching the popular imagination, Drachmann remained a lonely man. His South Jutland letters had pleased the conservatives, but his extravagances and the irregularities of his life brought down upon him their censure. His entire life became a swinging back and forth between the mutually hostile intellectual camps of Denmark, just as temperamentally he vibrated between his inherited bourgeois standards and his own bohemian tastes. In his un-bourgeois phase he felt akin to Byron, whose Don Juan he translated (1879). In his big two-volume novel of Copenhagen, Forskrevet (1890; Signed Away), he personifies the two sides of his nature in two friends, one a vagabond poet, the other a hard-working artist-journalist. The book is formless and chaotic, but rich in profound characterization and written in beautiful lyrical prose. The friends are both inspired by Edith, a singer in a variety theatre modeled after a woman who had great influence over Drachmann for a number of years. She appears under various names in his works, notably as Suleima in a cycle included in Sanges Bog (1889; The Book of Songs), containing some of the finest poems of his maturity. Drachmann was enormously productive. Threescore volumes of prose and poetry reflect the events and the mental and emotional crises of his life. Of uneven merit, they all bear the stamp of his genius and his subjective experience.

See: Georg Brandes, Det moderne Gennembruds Mænd (1883); Valdemar Vedel, Holger Drachmann (1909).

H. A. L.

Dreyer, Max (1862–, German dramatist and novelist), was born in Rostock, Mecklenburg. After receiving his doctorate in 1884, he became a Gymnasium teacher. Disappointed in his profession because of the rigidity of the educational system, he resigned in the late 80's and became a free-lance writer. School life and pedagogical problems, however, were to play a large part in the best of his literary work.

Dreyer wrote a score of realistic dramas, some of which were very successful on the stage. His drama Drei (1894) deals with a triangular marital problem, Der Winterschlaf (1896) with a tragic love affair; In Behandlung (1897) satirizes the conventional morality of typical small-town society. His greatest stage success was achieved in Der Probekandidat (1900; Eng. tr., On Probation, 1903), in which a young teacher fights for the maintenance of his intellectual integrity. It is generally considered to be Dreyer's most characteristic and powerful drama.

In the early period of his creative writing, Dreyer is strongly influenced by Ibsen as well as by the earlier works of Gerhart Hauptmann (q.q.v.). In Dreyer's subsequent plays this influence grows weaker, even though an occasional attempt is made to grapple with "problems," as in Die Siebzehnjährigen (1904), which deals with the disturbances of a boy and a girl in adolescence. Most of Dreyer's later plays, however, are written in a lighter vein, e.g., the comedies Das Tal des Lebens (1903) and Des Pfarrers Tochter von Strelendorf (1910).

In addition to his plays, Dreyer wrote a number of novels, the more important of which are Der deutsche Morgen (1915), Nachwuchs (1917), Die Siedler von Hohenmoor (1922), Das Gymnasium von St. Jürgen (1925), Der Weg durchs Feuer (1930), and Tapfere kleine Renate (1932). A volume of poetry, in Low German, Nah Huus, appeared in 1904.

G. K.

Drieu La Rochelle, Pierre (1893-, French novelist and critic), was born in Paris of a well-to-do Norman family. Destined for diplomacy, he attended the Ecole des Sciences Politiques; but the First World War soon put an end to that. By the end of the war, he had written two volumes of verse, Interrogation (1917), which Barrès thought the best book inspired by the conflict, and Fond de cantine (1920). Both were strongly reminiscent of Rimbaud and, even more noticeably, of Claudel (q.v.) in violence and magniloquence of metaphor and sweep of long, free-verse line. In the years following the war, Drieu provided a perfect example of the intellectual confusion and moral bankruptcy of his generation: disoriented, yet passionately desiring order, he jumped from movement to movement with an agility that rivaled Cocteau's (q.v.). Communism, surrealism, the Action Française, all at some time counted him as an adherent; he dabbled, like Mauriac (q.v.), in Catholic mysticism and, like Montherlant (q.v.), sang the praises of the stadium and the bedroom. A volume of short stories, Plainte contre inconnu (1924), and two semi-autobiographical novels, Etat-Civil (1921) and Le Jeune Européen (1927), convey vividly but confusedly the emptiness he and the post-war generation found behind all accepted values, their desire for action and energy, without any distinct idea of the end toward which it was to be directed. In Mesure de la France (1923) he surveyed with little hope the political and economic situation of his country, and in Genève ou Moscou (1928) he called for a new party of the right, young, authoritarian, and antimaterialist. His novels of this period, L'Homme couvert de femmes (1925), Une Femme à sa fenêtre (1930), and Le Feu follet (1931), continue the theme of disillusion, mixed with a need for the assertion of the individual which finds its outlet in sport, violence, and a monotonous and physical love. In the next decade, however, Drieu discovered his leader in Doriot and his program in the Parti Populaire Français. His position was made clear in such books as Avec Doriot (1937), a collection of articles which appeared in Doriot's Emancipation nationale, and the novel Gilles (1939), the story of a rootless young man who, disgusted with the bourgeois world, finds salvation fighting for Franco in Spain. Immediately after the French defeat of 1940, Drieu became the director of the Nouvelle Revue française and stood out, intellectually at least, as the most prominent of the collaborationists.

See: André Rousseaux, Ames et visages du XXe siècle (1932); Paul Chauveau, Caractères (1933); Beatrice Corrigan, "Drieu La Rochelle: Study of a Collaborator," University of Toronto Quarterly, XIV (1945), 199-205; Jean Ehrhard, Le Roman français depuis Marcel Proust (n.d.).

C. W., Jr.

Du Bos, Charles (1882-1939, French critic), anima naturaliter christiana ever on guard against the spirit of the salon, was born in Paris to the head of the exclusive Jockey Club and his wife, née Eustis, of the family which supplied an American minister to France. The call of the blood, the English poets and Emerson, read at Oxford (1900-1901), successive sojourns (1902-1907) in the Florence of D'Annunzio (q.v.) and the Berlin of George (q.v.) and Simmel, with a return visit, this time to the England of Henry James, fitted him for the spiritual interpretation of foreign literatures. With the Nouvelle Revue française group he labored to develop, through the interpenetration of cultures, the "European," synonymous with the fullest humanity.

The enemy for Du Bos is Cartesian and Voltairian rationalism as well as the (to him) false classical unity trisecting into man, writer, and Christian the oneness of creative personality restored, via Rousseau, by Claudel (q.v.). Looking to Bergson (q.v.) and the Plato of the transcendent Idea, he combines moralism (without being moralistic), intuition, and ecstasy. Thus, outside of the France of Pascal and Baudelaire (q.v.), he feels particularly at home in English, German, and Russian literatures. In a household of faith hospitable to apparent contraries, the Trinity is Shakespeare, Dante, and Keats, with Novalis and Pater as sources of decisive revelation. Nietzsche (q.v.) figures as the noblest of adversaries and the dearest of tempters in the years of "individual truths" (1918-1927). But Du Bos "passed beyond" to Catholicism.

Through translations and the editorship of a series of foreign writers, thanks also to unusual powers of conversation and extensive friendships, Du Bos sowed germs of thought and influence freely, like a grand seigneur of ideas. The organizing tendency is a view of literature which won him a lodging, not without protest on his part, in Thibaudet's (q.v.) Quartier des philosophes. Literature is "life becoming conscious of itself when, in the soul of a man of genius, it joins its plenitude of expression." A masterpiece embodies a sense of life, but in its characteristic music a metaphysic speaks. Thus the Dialogue avec André Gide (1929) rejects together Gide (q.v.), Goethe, and Nietzsche, the whole family of spirits whose art informs the hypothesis, "The end of life is life itself."

Creative criticism results, but with transcendental tendencies. The critic, through analysis-in-ecstasy applied to the tone and tempo of style, re-creates the artist's inspiration and intuits his truth. In rapid formula this criticism is the fusion of Pater, Proust (q.v.), and the later James with Du Bos's spiritual fervor and his need to explain. It expects only "approximation" of the artist's essential quality. Judgment is not expressed directly but, at most, overheard in the critic's tone. Du Bos made exhausting efforts to "become the object," and hostile judges will add, "Only to substitute himself too often for it."

The most characteristic work of this self-styled fragmentist is Extraits d'un journal (2d ed., augmented, 1931), from which radiate seven volumes of Approximations (1922-1937). It marks those "tops of sovereignty" in the presence of literature, music, and painting which led to religion. Other important writings are Byron et le besoin de la fatalité (1929; Eng. tr., Byron and the Need of Fatality, 1932), three articles, "Du spirituel dans l'ordre littéraire" (in Vigile, 1930), and What Is Literature? (1940), lectures in English in 1938 before the faculty of Saint Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana. Du Bos projected much, completed little—and that in a style uninviting to the general reader. Chronic ill-health, but even more the exquisite sincerities of his form of the religion of art, constricted expression. Friends have suggested that Du Bos is the Sainte-Beuve of the 20th century; in no spirit of derogation one may think more naturally of Mallarmé (q.v.).

See: E. R. Curtius, "Du Bos," Revue nouvelle, July 15–August 15, 1926; Paul Archambault, Témoins du spirituel (1932); André Maurois, "Mon Ami Charles du Bos," Nouvelles littéraires, August 12, 1939.

A. P. B.

Ducasse, Isidore Lucien, see Lautréamont, comte de.

Dučić, Jovan (1874–1943, Serb poet), was born in the small town of Trebinje, Herzegovina.

He attended teachers' colleges in Mostar and Sombor and studied law in Geneva and Paris. Choosing a diplomatic career, he served in Sofia, Rome, Athens, Madrid, Cairo, Geneva, Budapest, Bucharest. After the outbreak of the Second World War, he found refuge in the United States, where he died in Gary, Indiana, in sad and bitter exile.

At the beginning strongly influenced by Russian poets, especially Pushkin, and by the Serbian poet Vojislav Ilić (q.v.) as well, Dučić quickly found himself and achieved original expression of his great poetical talent. His stay in France gave him an intimate acquaintance with French literature, and he became enthusiastic about the poetry of the Parnassians and the symbolists (see French symbolism), without however any slavish copying of their manners. Dučić was indeed a poet of individualistic tendencies, given to deep introspection. He knew how to turn all his emotions into art. His poetry, often very personal, was extraordinarily subtle, fluid, ethereal, gracious, of a diverse and variable artistic inspiration. He wrote with harmony and elegance, but was never merely conventional or orthodox in his sentiments; on the contrary, his poems abound in rare, delicate feelings, disquietudes, vaguenesses, nuances, mists, and shadows. Very haughty, with a certain scorn for mediocrity and everyday life, he desired his muse "to be too beautiful lest she should please everybody."

Dučić's first book, Pesme (1900; Poems), was followed in 1908 by another collection of lyrics and in 1912 by a choice of his best poems; his Sabrana dela (1929; Collected Works) comprehend all his poetic as well as his prose writings. The sonnet sequences "Jadranski soneti" (Adriatic Sonnets) and "Carski soneti" (Imperial Sonnets) are masterpieces of poetry. The latter possess moreover a great national value because of their brilliant glorification of the Serbian race, reverence for its past, and belief in its future.

Dučić was also a first-rate prose writer. Besides many critical and aesthetic essays, he published cycles of letters concerning his extensive travels; he describes Geneva, the Alps, the Ionian Sea, Paris, Athens, Madrid. These letters, which reveal an extraordinary pictorial gift and imaginative power, are among the most brilliant pages in Yugoslav literature. Blago Cara Radovana (1931; The Treasure of Emperor Radovan), a series of essays on women, love, friendship, poets, prophets, heroes, etc., fascinates one not so much by its thoughts, often commonplace, as by the colorfulness and brightness of its incomparable style. During Dučić's few final years in the United States were published a monograph, Grof Sava Vladislavić (1942), and Federalizam i Centralizam (1943; Federalism and Centralism), a book of political controversy.

Dučić has appropriately been called "the prince of Serbian poetry and prose" of the 20th century.

See: B. Popović, "Jedna kritička analiza," Srpski književni glasnik (1914); P. Albala, "Putopisi Jovana Dučića," Letopis matice srpske, August 1, 1928; N. Mirković, "Jovan Dučić," Slavische Rundschau, July, 1932; P. Albala, "Jedna knjiga životne mudrosti-Blago Cara Radovana," Prilozi za književnost, jezik, istoriju i folklor (1938).

P. A.

Duhamel, Georges (pseud. Denis Thévenin, 1884-, French poet, dramatist, novelist, essayist, and critic), born in Paris, was the son of a physician. He too studied medicine and began to practice shortly before the First World War. He is also an excellent flautist. In 1906 Duhamel, Vildrac (q.v.)—later his brother-in-law—and several other young men interested in the arts rented a house at Créteil, which they called the Abbaye. There they planned to live a life in common, working together and devoting themselves to their vocations. They bought a press and printed books, including Duhamel's Des légendes, des batailles (1906). In 1907 the group disbanded, due in part to a lack of money. Such an enterprise was destined to fail, since the groundwork had not been carefully prepared. Shortly after leaving the Abbaye, Duhamel became interested in the theatre. In 1911 the Odéon produced his play La Lumière (Eng. tr., The Light, 1914), in 1912 Dans l'ombre des statues (Eng. tr., In the Shadow of Statues, 1914). In 1913 the Théâtre des Arts presented Le Combat (Eng. tr., 1915). L'Œuvre des athlètes was played at the Vieux Colombier in 1920; it is an excellent satire on a literary club of that name and was well received. Duhamel's wife was a member of the Vieux Colombier (founded by Jacques Copeau, q.v.). La Journée des aveux, played at the Comédie des Champs-Élysées in 1923, illustrates Duhamel's keen powers of observation and a certain sensitivity and delicacy which are characteristic of his entire work.

In 1913 Duhamel accepted the position of literary critic on the Mercure de France and wrote a volume on the poetry of Paul Claudel (q.v.). Then the First World War broke out, and he left for the front in the capacity of surgeon. The years spent in front-line ambulances revealed another side of Duhamel—the portrayal of suffering and the champion of justice. Two volumes of war stories were written at the front, Vie des martyrs (1917; Eng. tr., The New Book of Martyrs, 1918) and Civilisation (1918; Eng. tr., 1919), for which he was awarded the Prix Goncourt. The descriptions of the suffering of the wounded and dying and the irony with which Duhamel describes the stupidity and heartlessness of those in charge of the hospitals are handled with consummate art and deep-felt sympathy.

Duhamel the novelist has created characters who will surely live in posterity. In his Cycle de Salavin (1920–1932; Eng. tr., Salavin, 1936) he describes the gropings of a mediocre man, Salavin, who tries hard to adapt himself to life, who is too introspective, too sensitive, too afraid of life to attain happiness. He tries friendship, but it fails him; he tries saintliness, but falls victim to his own generosity; he tries to take an active part in society, but innocently falls into a trap. Finally he leaves France, hoping to change his personality in devoting himself to others, but is wounded by the very boy he tried to protect. Before he dies, he tells his wife that, were he to start life anew, he would know now how to live.

In Chronique des Pasquier (Eng. tr., The Pasquier Chronicles, 1937-), the first volume of which was published in 1933 and which is still in the course of publication, Duhamel describes a certain bourgeois family of Paris, giving the reader a picture of French life during the early years of the century. The mother is a self-sacrificing, self-effacing woman; the father is an extraordinary and fantastic person, who studied medicine in middle age, after all the children were born, and actually became a practicing if not too effectual physician. Of the five children Laurent, the scientist, represents the ideal towards which Duhamel has always strived.

Duhamel has also written many volumes of essays. Among the first is La Possession du monde (1919; Eng. tr., The Heart's Domain, 1919), in which he entreats man to appreciate the beauty of nature, to aspire to happiness through the cultivation of his inner life. Duhamel has traveled all over Europe, and his books have been translated into nearly every language. Scènes de la vie future (1930) was written after a short and hasty voyage to the United States. Something of a diatribe—although Duhamel did not authorize the title used in the English translation (America: The Menace, 1931)—he warns the reader against an overindustrialized civilization, where man allows himself to become a slave of the machine.

In Querelles de famille (1931) he shows how France, too, has been too greatly influenced by modern inventions like the radio and telegraph. Man has drifted away from the wholesome, simple life. Before the outbreak of the Second World War, Duhamel produced several volumes of essays in which he warned France against Nazism and made a plea for a strong, united France.

Duhamel's style is sober and free from exaggerations, humorous, in the best tradition of the greatest French writers. His sympathy for his fellow beings has attracted many young writers to him; his influence as a person and as a writer has been great throughout Europe. He is a member of the French Academy.

See: H. Massis, Jugements, II (1924), 155-206; André Thérive, Georges Duhamel, ou l'Intelligence du cœur (1925) and Georges Duhamel (1927); P. Claudel et al., Duhamel et nous (1937).

H. H.

Dullin, Charles (1885-, French actor, theatrical director, and metteur en scène), fled his native Yenne in Savoie, a clerkship in Lyon, and the cabarets of Montmartre to distinguish himself in the role of Smerdiakov in Copeau's adaptation of The Brothers Karamazov (1911). As the associate of Jacques Copeau (q.v.) in the Théâtre du Vieux Colombier (1913-1914, 1917-1919) and of Firmin Gémier at the Comédie Montaigne he gathered experience for his own experiments. His Atelier (opened in 1921)—which finally made a financial success with the adaptation by Stefan Zweig and Jules Romains (qq.v.) of Volpone—began as a rigorous school for actors following the theories of Stanislavsky and Copeau (q.v.) and gradually became a school for dramatists as well. Using music by Darius Milhaud and Georges Auric, sets and costumes by Jean Hugo, Touchagues, et al., he has taught the virtues of a stylized simplicity far from the conventional naturalism of the Théâtre Libre and created spectacles containing fairylike qualities. His marked predilection for Aristophanes (Plutus, Peace), for the English great (Shakespeare, Jonson, Ford, and Farquhar), and for the Spanish theatre (Cervantes, Calderón, Jacinto Grau) has enriched the Paris stage with beautiful performances.

J. O'B.

Durch, Der Verein. Parallel to M. G. Conrad's activity as naturalistic critic and editor in Munich, there arose in Berlin in 1886 a literary club, "Durch," in which the revolutionary young writers gathered. The name was suggested by Konrad Küster, a leader in university circles and publisher of university journals, who came into contact with the group of young literary rebels through Leo Berg and Eugen Wolff. Other members were Arno Holz (q.v.), Johannes Schlaf (q.v.), John Henry Mackay, Heinrich and Julius Hart (q.v.), Gerhart Hauptmann (q.v.), and Adalbert von Hanstein. In the years 1887 and 1888 articles by club members appeared in Küster's Allgemeine deutsche Universitätszeitung, the most important of these being Eugen Wolff's "Die 'Moderne,' zur Revolution und Reform der Literatur." The club sought to combat the contemporary mediocrity of German literature and to develop a modern and realistic literature which should treat contemporary social problems frankly and forcefully. Striving to avoid narrow dogmatism, it demanded recognition of contemporary scientific hypotheses and of the complex social conditions of modern life. The club provided a prelude to the later formulation of naturalistic theory.

See: A. von Hanstein, Das jüngste Deutschland (1901); W. Liepe, ed., Verein Durch: Facsimile der Protokolle 1887: Aus der Werdezeit des deutschen Naturalismus (1932).

W. H. R.

Durkheim, Emile (1858-1917, French sociologist and philosopher), born in Epinal, Vosges, taught at the University of Bordeaux from 1887 to 1902 and at the Sorbonne for the rest of his life. Some 50 years after sociology had received its letters patent from Auguste Comte, he found it—in France at least—still inorganic and undeveloped. At the time of his death he had made it, with the semi-independent help of Lucien Lévy-Bruhl (1857-1939), a thoroughly autonomous science, complete with a charter, a program of studies, a review (Année sociologique, 1898-1913, continued by others after 1923 and superseded in 1934 by the Annales sociologiques), and, last but not least, an impressive team of workers eager to follow in the master's footsteps (Célestin Bouglé, Henri Hubert, Marcel Mauss, François Simiand, Paul Fauconnet, Maurice Halbwachs, Charles Lalo, Georges Davy, et al.).

Durkheim's four main works are: De la division du travail social, his doctoral dissertation (1893; Eng. tr., Emile Durkheim on the Division of Labor in Society, 1933); Les Règles de la méthode sociologique (1895; Eng. tr., The Rules of Sociological Method, 1938); Le Suicide (1897); and Les Formes élémentaires de la vie religieuse: Le Système totémique en Australie (1912; Eng. tr., The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, 1915). Two of these are deserving of special mention. Les Règles de la méthode sociologique, somewhat reminiscent in title and purpose of the Discours de la méthode of Descartes, effects an abrupt separation between sociology and individual psychology (for an opposite view see Tarde, Gabriel) and insists that social facts be considered as "things," that is to say, as entirely original syntheses with no relation to their personal constituents. In Les Formes élémentaires de la vie religieuse Durkheim, a deeply religious spirit who counted rabbis among his relatives, asserts that religion is the social fact par excellence, not only because it is social in its essence and origins, but because all collective representations—laws, customs, traditions, fashions, tastes, revolutions—are religious in character, having the same aura of coercion and supra-individual power which surrounds the mystical gatherings of primitive tribes.

See: Maurice Halbwachs, "La Doctrine d'Emile Durkheim," Revue philosophique, LXXXV (1918), 353-411; Georges Davy, Emile Durkheim (1927); Georges Gurvitch, Essais de sociologie (1938), pp. 68-90, 113-169, 189-193, 277-306; Harry Alpert, Emile Durkheim and His Sociology (1939).

J.-A. B.

Durych, Jaroslav (1886-, Czech novelist and poet), is the outstanding representative of the Catholic movement in recent Czech literature. He was born in Hradec Králové, studied medicine at the University of Prague and was an army doctor during the First World War. He rose to be a colonel in the medical corps of the Czechoslovak army. Durych's short stories and novels have a great variety of settings, but are variations on one theme: man's desire for divine grace. This grace can be found in mystical union with God, in the love of a pure, simple woman, in the humility of the poorest beggar, and in moments preceding death. Durych, convinced Catholic of the Neo-Thomist persuasion, wants to create a Catholic art which aspires to the Absolute, which would turn the age to God and eternity and revive the Catholic glories of Czech history. But these spiritual aspirations are always crossed by Durych's strong instincts: his sensuality, which struggles with his cult of innocence and purity; his rebellion against social oppression, which seems difficult to reconcile with his glorification of the Counter Reformation; his predilections for the horrible and cruel, grotesque and even brutal, which frequently debase his urge towards mystical ecstasy.

Some of Durych's best work is in small legends and fairy tales, graceful or horrible, whereas his full-length novels suffer from disjointed plots, repetitions, and monotony. The novels include Na hordách (1919; On the Mountains), a poetic love story set in a dim medieval setting, and Sedmikráska (1925; The Daisy), Paní Anežka Berková (1931; Mrs. Agnes Berk), and Píseň o růži (1934; The Song of the Rose), all three set in small-town surroundings. Bloudění (3 vols., 1929; Eng. tr., The Descent of the Idol, 1935), the most important, is a large-scale attempt at a historic novel. Its story is set in the time of the Thirty Years' War, and the figures of the great General Wallenstein and of the Emperor Ferdinand II, together with other historical references, are part of the background. In the foreground is the story of a Czech Protestant emigrant and a Catholic girl of Spanish origin whose love finds fulfillment only in the hour of death. Durych enters with sympathy and understanding into the civilization of the Jesuit baroque, but his strained, ornate style, his fantastic landscapes, feverish visions, superhuman passions, and grandiose battle scenes are "expressionism" in a highly modernist manner rather than an imitation of 17th-century art. Bloudění is, at least, a welcome reaction against the antiquarian type of historical writing represented by Jirásek (q.v.) and Winter (q.v.). A set of three stories, Rekviem (1930; Requiem), placed just after Wallenstein's assassination, is a particularly successful example of Durych's art on a small scale. His last novel, Masopust (1938; The Carnival), is also drawn from history, this time the 16th century; in it his usual motifs of wandering at random and of searching for the one predestined woman are varied with less effect than in the great book on the Wallenstein period.

Durych also wrote distinguished verse, mostly in the simple popular style of ballads and songs (collected as Básně, 1930, Poems), and some dramas on themes of martyrdom (e.g., Svatý Václav, 1925, St. Wenceslaus) which try to revive the form of the 17th-century Spanish autos. His miscellaneous prose includes travel impressions from Germany, Italy, and Spain, reminiscences, and some criticism expounding the Neo-Thomist dogmas or attacking all different contemporary ways of thinking (e.g., Ejhle, člověku, 1928, Behold a Man; Váhy života a umění, 1933, The Scales of Life and Art). Durych admires Otokar Březina (q.v.), to whom he devoted an early pamphlet (1918) in which he declared his allegiance to a symbolist art permeated with the Catholic spirit. He, of all the many Czech Catholic writers of the last decades, has come nearest to fulfilling this ideal.

See: J. Bartoš, Kdo jest Jaroslav Durych? (1930).

R. W.

Dutch literature (see also Belgian literature in Flemish). Modern Dutch literature had its beginnings in the 80's of the past century. Each new movement in the history of letters has always been a revolt of the rising generation against the standards and preferences of its immediate predecessor, and the forms in which the modernism of the young rebels found expression have loomed large and alarming to their older contemporaries. In retrospect the contrasts generally fade, and the perspective supplied by the passage of time levels the seemingly jagged line of development into a course of smooth continuity.

But this general truth does not hold for Holland's literary movement of the 80's. This did, indeed, revolutionize Dutch literature and bring about so profound a change in diction and word usage that the cleavage between the periods preceding and following the 80's is still clearly apparent to all readers more than half a century after the breach occurred. It was not only a difference in the handling of the language that set off the new era in such sharp contrast to the past. The general outlook, the attitude towards life and the world, underwent a profound transformation. The first half of the 19th century was an age of emotional stagnation. The Dutch of that period were an orderly, conventional, church-going community, whose main concern was the pursuit of commerce. They were keen businessmen, but poor connoisseurs of letters. They lived by sight, rather than by insight. They knew a good picture from a bad one, but they cared little for poetry. Their sense of realism distrusted the genuineness of poetic exaltation. It made them feel embarrassed and uncomfortable. They liked descriptive and didactic verse that portrayed the domestic scene with edifying unction, and, from a patriotic sense of duty, they read and applauded poetry that glorified the national heroes of the past. At the same time they secretly thanked God that heroism was no longer required from their own most unheroic age.

There was, it is true, one poet of great merit, an Amsterdam merchant who had a very uncommercial passion for the cult of letters. E. J. Potgieter (q.v.) was the founder and editor of De Gids (The Guide), the leading literary monthly, and tried all his life, by criticism and example, to lift the literary output of Holland above the pedestrian level to which it had sunk. He was ably assisted by his fellow editor Coenraad Busken Huet (q.v.), a theologian who, unable to reconcile personal belief with traditional doctrine, had left the church to make a living with his pen. It was a trenchant and merciless weapon in his hand. But not even the ablest critic can castigate an artless generation into repentance and creative vigor. When dissension arose between Huet and other members of the editorial board, Potgieter sided with Huet. In 1865 the two men left De Gids in charge of respectable mediocrity.

It was 20 years later that a group of young writers at Amsterdam founded a new monthly which, by way of challenge, they called De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide). The name implied that, in their opinion, De Gids was superannuated and no longer able to give guidance. De Nieuwe Gids would take over that literary mission. In the 20 years preceding their entrance upon the literary scene, rumblings of the revolution they were to bring had reverberated in the writings of Multatuli (q.v.), the self-pitying pen name of Eduard Douwes Dekker meaning "I have suffered much." He had won sudden fame in 1860 with his autobiographic novel Max Havelaar, a biting satire on the self-satisfied bourgeoisie of Holland which neglected its Christian duty towards the natives of Java for the sake of the profits that the labor of those natives put into Dutch pockets. Multatuli's style struck home by its directness and simple beauty. "I do my best," he wrote, "to write living Dutch, although I have been to school." A rebel by temperament, he hated school for its choking grip on originality. By shaking off the grip of the literary standard upon the language, which squeezed all expression into stereotyped clichés, he prepared the revolutionary movement that was started by the young editors of De Nieuwe Gids.

A passion for truth in art was the motive power of their movement. "Whatever one wishes to say, there is only one word to express it, only one verb to animate it, and only one adjective to qualify it." That well-known dictum of Guy de Maupassant (q.v.), inspired by Flaubert (q.v.), was adopted as the guiding principle of the movement. "Word art" was the favorite name by which these writers called their new style. Each strove for a strikingly individual form of expression. New words were coined and old words were given new syntactic functions. This hunt for the one exact phrase often led to mannerisms and excesses, but even the severest critics of these cannot deny that this word art transformed and permanently enriched the language.

The substance of much of what they wrote has lost the powerful appeal which it possessed for their own generation. The sonnets and the best of the critical prose of Willem Kloos (q.v.), the leader of these "Eightiers," as they are called, the bulk of the prose writings of Lodewijk van Deyssel (q.v.), critic, essayist, and novelist, the œuvre of Frederik van Eeden (q.v.), the most versatile among the group, and Albert Verwey's (q.v.) first volume of poems have stood the critical test of time.

The revolt of the next generation against the "Eightiers" was voiced by C. S. Adama van Scheltema (q.v.). He condemned their movement for its self-centered egotism and its barren adoration of "art for art's sake." Jacques Perk (q.v.), the young poet of the sonnet sequence "Mathilde," had turned the Lord's Prayer into an invocation of beauty. He died at the age of 21, four years before De Nieuwe Gids was started. But Willem Kloos, who edited his posthumous volume of verse, hailed him as a herald of the movement. Perk's deification of beauty was indeed akin to the "Eightiers's" passionate worship of art. Art is passion, they proclaimed, but Scheltema retorted that art is the memory of passion conventionalized, the styleful re-creation of it, a process in which the intellect must take a part. The "Eightiers," in denying the need for control of the passionate impulse by the unimpassioned reason, did not for long sustain the high excellence to which they rose in their best moments.

In this respect P. C. Boutens (q.v.) differs from the "Eightiers," for although he shares their intense individualism, he knows how to purify his emotions in the crucible of the intellect. He is the poet of poets of the introspective mood. His verse technique is unsurpassed by any other living Dutch poet, but owing to his proud aloofness from the passions astir among the people of his own age, his poetry, mysteriously phrased and expressive of intellectualized emotion, appeals to only a small circle of readers.

Another "Eightier" who did not belong to the Nieuwe Gids group but was hailed by them as a kindred soul was Herman Gorter (q.v.), whose poem Mei (May) is considered one of the great poems of modern Dutch literature. It appeared in 1889 and immediately gained for its author a prominent place among the poets of his generation.

In general it is not the theory that makes the poet, but the poet who makes the theory. And this theory should help in the understanding of his poetry. Adama van Scheltema's theory that all art must be for the many is not belied by the fact that Boutens's poetry, which is for the few, is nevertheless great art. Nor does the fact that the poetry of Boutens is greater art than Scheltema's refute Scheltema's conception of the poet's mission. It only proves that, of the two, Boutens is the greater poet. His verse is like a deep, unrippled mountain lake that mirrors the haunting stillness of the dark woods and the infinity of the sky above. Only the lips of those who can climb that height will touch its waters. Scheltema's songs are like running brooks that reflect the varying scenery through which they pass—woods and fields, the villages and the main road, and the city with its splendor and its slums. Like the brook his poetry seeks the valley where the people toil and suffer, to bring them a draught of eternal life.

His protest against the self-cult of the "Eightiers" was echoed by the generation born shortly before or in the 80's. The Social Democratic Labor Party was in the ascendant; the proletariat began to assert itself and found eloquent spokesmen for its cause in the poets of the rising generation. Scheltema joined the party. A. van Collem, a contemporary of the "Eightiers," became a Communist. Henriëtte Roland Holst's (q.v.) poetry was the singing voice of the Communist Party.

The same spirit of revolt which animated Roland Holst in political life seems loath to obey the discipline of rhyme and meter. Her artistic conscience evidently constrains her to observe the traditional conventions, but the revolutionist in her finds it difficult to keep within the irksome bounds of prosody. This lends to her verse something rugged and fierce, as if it were on the verge of breaking from its restraint into the lawlessness of free verse.

The "Eightiers" themselves found no lasting satisfaction in their barren worship of beauty, art, and the divine self. They abandoned their egotism for a humanitarian devotion to communal concepts—the nation, the proletariat, mankind. Verwey, who in his youth had written, "Self is the only god," embraced the past of his own and other peoples as it is revealed by their literatures and turned critic and historian; Herman Gorter made the cause of the world's proletariat his own and became an exponent of Marxism; Frederick van Eeden vainly searched for the true life in the footsteps of Thoreau and Tolstoy, until he found it in the bosom of the Church of Rome; Van Deyssel, child of a devoutly Catholic home, was drawn away from his worship of Zola (q.v.) and the naturalistic portrayal of human baseness to the mysticism of Huysmans and Maeterlinck (qq.v.) through which he recaptured the lost faith of his infancy. Kloos alone did not change. But the homage that was given him by a younger generation was for the achievement of his youth, which held a promise unfulfilled in riper age.

This diversity of tendencies among the editors found its reflection in the destinies of De Nieuwe Gids. Verwey was the first to leave the fold. He was followed by Van Eeden in 1893. Then Van Deyssel resigned and founded with Verwey Tweemaandelijksch Tijdschrift (Bimonthly Periodical), which in 1902 was turned into a monthly under the title De XXste Eeuw (The 20th Century). Three years later Verwey seceded again and founded De Beweging (The Movement). As its editor for 14 years he made it a rallying point of a group of younger poets, who recognized in him their mentor and master. The most prominent among these were Geerten Gossaert (pseud. of Frederik Carel Gerretson), Jakobus Cornelis Bloem, Pieter Nicolaas van Eyck, Adrianus Roland Holst, and Martinus Nijhoff. Verwey alone of the "Eightiers" can be said to have formed a school, although his own verse lacks the emotional quality of that of Kloos, Van Eeden, Gorter, and Boutens. Verwey's poetry seems the happy result of industrious effort, thought turned into verse because the thinker willed it; whereas the poetry of the others, especially Gorter's, impresses one by its inevitability, as thought crystallized into that very form by an impulse stronger than its thinker.

Among the novelists, the epic poets of our time, the late Louis Couperus (q.v.) is the only one who has won for himself international recognition. In one of his Roman stories, De Komedianten (1917; Eng. tr., The Comedians; a Story of Ancient Rome, 1926), he describes a scene in the Theatre of Pompey. A popular mime, the story of a brigand who atones for his crimes on the cross, is being played that day. Instead of the usual life-size doll, a convicted murderer is crucified and lacerated by a bear before the eyes of the horrified audience. Tacitus and Juvenal rise from their seats in disgust and call to Martial, "Come away with us." But Martial answers, "I am staying. This is my own time. I want to look on, that I may know it." "Our time," says Tacitus gloomily, "which one day I shall record that posterity may know." "Indeed,"

Juvenal joins in, "our time which one day I shall scourge." "And I," replies Martial, "shall no less celebrate it in verse, since I am nothing but a poet."

This threefold attitude towards life, of the chronicler, the moralist, and the poet, defines the chief varieties of the modern novel. That of Couperus is the poet's. He accepts life as an artist enamored of its colors and sounds, even though they are the allurements of corruption. He creates an elegant entertainment out of this Vanity Fair, be it modern or ancient, and plays with people's destinies as he plays with the language, handling them with graceful nonchalance or distorting them into something forced and unreal, as the whim of his playful mood dictates.

Marcellus Emants (q.v.), on the other hand, is the Juvenal of modern Dutch literature. Neither he nor Couperus ever identified himself with De Nieuwe Gids. They were of The Hague, the worldly resort of diplomacy, of military display, of the idle rich. Emants is the stern critic of that life of leisure, where woman reigns supreme. Woman as the embodiment of insincerity, vanity, and folly is the theme of most of Emants's novels and plays. His novels are masterpieces of psychoanalysis, but they leave the reader chilled by their skeptical denial of all loveliness.

The chronicler's novel is a more common type in Dutch literature. The objective description of everyday life, including the smallest details of the milieu, the thoughts, and the actions with photographic accuracy, is the main subject of what we nevertheless persist in calling fiction. The plot is negligible, the realism and the word art are considered as constituting the essential elements of a good novel. Some of these novels are indeed fine works of art, closely akin to the art of the Dutch genre painters of the 17th century, but whereas those paintings can be taken in at a glance, the picture of the novelist demands sustained attention from the reader which detracts from his aesthetic pleasure. Jacobus van Looy's (q.v.) Jaapje (1917) is a beautiful instance of this pictorial character of the Dutch novel. Van Looy was a painter by profession, and under his hands the story of little Jaapje's life in the orphanage has become a series of exquisite word pictures rich in action and color. The artist watches the shifting scene of every day, and only by the manner in which his little hero's feelings are affected by that spectacle is Jaapje's inner life disclosed to us.

But this unjudging realism invited reaction. It left the reader unsatisfied because it gave him no other than aesthetic enjoyment. And the Dutch public, whatever the literary connoisseurs may say to the contrary, wants to be edified. It likes a story with an ethical purpose. "Art without a purpose is no art," decreed Nico van Suchtelen. The novelist should not be merely a painter, but also a poet who unveils the eternal behind the shifting pageant of reality. He must reveal to us our fellow men as they might be according to their deepest selves, as they live in their dreams. The descriptive realists, like Couperus's Tacitus, have faithfully and often artistically recorded their own time, that posterity may know. A complete collection of such novels will give some future historian a comprehensive picture of early 20th-century life in Holland. But the school, if so unorganized a movement may be called by that name, of which Van Suchtelen is the chief exponent, wants to interpret this age to itself, depicting its good and its evil not for the sake of the picture, but for the sake of the good in an author's fancy that might be turned into future reality.

A unique figure among Holland's novelists is Arthur van Schendel. He does not take his subject matter from the world in which he lives, but from the world that lives in him. His stories deal with creatures of his fancy, incarnations of an elemental longing for love and wisdom. They tell of dreamed existences in which the abstract outweighs the concrete. His later novels, though, are of the naturalistic school. Still, they create in the reader an impression that the happenings in these stories of actual life are not real but seen in dreams. This is due to Van Schendel's technique, which is that of the impersonal and wholly unemotional recorder. It is only through the words of the recorder that we know what the characters did, said, and thought.

Holland's dramatic output is small in comparison with that of the poets and novelists. The "Eightiers," with the sole exception of Van Eeden, were not interested in the stage. The only playwright whose work has more than ephemeral value is Herman Heijermans (q.v.). His mind was quick to perceive dramatic possibilities in the most trifling incidents of everyday life. That facility proved sometimes a pitfall for his artistic conscience. Too often, also, he let his wit outrun the judgment of his taste. But when time will have winnowed the chaff, enough will remain that is of lasting value.

After the First World War a reaction set in against the intellectualized poetry of Verwey's disciples. It was led by Hendrik Marsman (q.v.) who, strongly influenced by German expressionism, became the exponent of what he liked to call "vitalism." The "vitalists" longed to merge themselves in the dynamic community of the nameless. To them the poet was one of the millions, but at the same time their spokesman and protagonist. In 1933 Marsman clearly formulated the artistic credo of his youth in an article entitled "De Dood van het Vitalisme" (The Death of Vitalism). The poets of Marsman's generation had their organ first in Het Getij (The Tide), afterwards in De vrije Bladen (Free Leaflets). Chief among them were Jan Slauerhoff, Hendrik de Vries, Jan Engelman, Anthonie Donker. They opposed to the sensitive refinement and the individualism of De Beweging the vehemence and immediacy of actuality. The "vitalists" developed a new rhetoric which, worked to death by their imitators, discredited the movement and called forth a reaction in the periodical Forum. This preached clarity, soberness, veracity. The leaders of the Forum group were Menno ter Braak, Charles E. du Perron, and Simon Vestdijk, all three of whom had a strong influence upon the youngest generation. Ter Braak through his keen, trenchant style, Du Perron through the charm of his personality even more than through his writings, and Vestdijk through his novels which, together with those of Arthur van Schendel, are among the very best that modern Holland has produced.

Shortly before the German invasion a group of young modernists, under the influence of French surrealism, rebelled against the literalness of Forum and pleaded for the irrational as the source of true poetry. Although the various artistic credos of these rival groups create an impression of irreconcilable differences, the practice of the youngest writers does not confirm the existence of a profound cleavage. Bewilderment, despondency, cynicism, hopelessness, are the moods that pervade all their writings, and the manner of voicing these does not strikingly vary from one author to another. What variety there is springs from their individualism rather than from their adherence to some aesthetic dogma.

See: K. H. de Raaf and J. J. Griss, Zeven Eeuwen; Spiegel der Nederlandsche Letteren, Vierde Deel: Stemmingen en Gestalten (1920); A. J. Barnouw, Holland under Queen Wilhelmina (1923); J. de Graaf, Le Réveil littéraire en Hollande et le naturalisme français, 1880-1900 (1938); J. Greshoff, Nieuwe Nederlandsche Dichtkunst (1942).

A. J. B.

Duun, Olav (1876–1939, Norwegian novelist), was born in one of the islands belonging to the district of Namdalen in northern Trøndelag, where fjords, forests, and mountains unite in determining nature and life. He was a farmer's son and participated for some years in the work of farming and fishing, but at 25 left his home to study at a teachers' college. Graduating in 1904, he became a public school teacher, serving most of the time at Botne, near the town of Holmestrand on the Oslo Fjord. He continued to live there in some isolation, even after it was possible for him to give up his teaching position. He began to write books in 1907, first short stories, but soon almost exclusively novels, and after a decade he won fame and recognition as one of the most important authors of Norway. Very few of his books, however, attained a large sale, because he chose to write in the literary form of the vernacular, called Landsmaal (see Norwegian literature), from which wide circles of the reading public still kept aloof. To him it was the only natural medium, and also it conformed closely to his home dialect—which was the more necessary to him as his home district was the exclusive scene of all his works. Not that it was the design of his authorship to picture merely local life, but he felt the need of writing only about what he intimately knew; and his novels give proof of profound psychological study which, combined with his masterful, original art, make them human documents of the broadest interest.

The fundamental theme of all his novels is the battle of man with the forces that would dominate his thoughts and acts. The first novels pictured man and the forces of nature. Later we see man struggling against the mental forces within himself created by social surroundings and moral traditions. The monumental work of this order is the series of six relatively short novels, finally collected under the title Juvikingar (1918–1923; Eng. tr., The People of Juvik, 1930–1935). This is virtually constructed like one of the great Icelandic family sagas, embracing a period of a century and a half and telling of the determined fight of succeeding generations. Culmination is in the story of the last man of the family (presented in the three last volumes), his mental growth from childhood, his ripening, his final victory over the primitive heritage. Wild self-assertion cedes to the nobleness of self-sacrifice; the strength of resignation, however, is really won by virtue of inherited will power. Here, in colorful pictures, is the education of man from barbarism to the highest morality.

The next climax in Duun's authorship was a trilogy of novels—Medmenneske (1929; Fellow Beings), Ragnhild (1931), Siste leveår (1933; The Last Year of Life)—centered around a single person, a woman, who simply by her innate goodness, in her fight to save the human essence of her soul, is driven to murder, and then finally, through her sufferings, is able to give an example of purity to the world.

Taken together, Duun's novels present a marvelous galaxy of varied and sharply designed characters. In the later ones he made society and surroundings more and more secondary, though they are always distinctly felt, and he never abandoned showing the fight of the individual against the hidden forces of his own soul. He himself defined the idea of his whole authorship by the title of his last book, Menneske og maktene (1938; The Man and the Powers). Duun was plainly continuing here the line of Ibsen (q.v.). Also, his novels are just as severely and firmly constructed as Ibsen's dramas, and they are like the Icelandic sagas in that the characters reveal the secrets of their nature by their own acts and words, without any interference of the author's pointer. The style of Duun is often surprising for its striking, unaffected paradoxes, of a subtle irony. Without artistry he was an exquisite artist, whose every word served the aim of his work and helped illuminate the eternal psychology of struggling manhood.

See: A. Överland, Olav Duun (1926), and "Olav Duun," in Syn og segn (1936); R. Thesen, Menneske og maktene (1941).

H. K.

Dwinger, Edwin Erich (1898–, German novelist), born in Kiel, the son of a technical officer in the German navy and a Russian woman, is a powerful writer on war experiences. Volunteering to become a cavalry officer, he went to the Eastern front at the age of 17 and in 1915 fell, severely wounded, into the hands of the Russians. After long and painful months he recovered and was gradually moved eastward thousands of miles into Siberia. Later he served against the Bolsheviks in Kolchak's White army and took part in the catastrophic retreat of the Whites through Siberia. In 1920 he succeeded in escaping to Germany, where he settled down to live on a farm in southern Bavaria.

His first attempts to give expression in the form of fiction to the chaotic wealth of his experiences were the novels Das grosse Grab (1920), Korsakoff (1926), and Das letzte Opfer (1928). He failed. It was not given to him to invent a plot and to create human conflicts, and he was also too much absorbed in the feeling that he had a message for the German people and the world. As he expressed it later: "After Siberia one cannot fight for small objectives; our steel-trained souls must search for something which is worthy of our dead and which breaks up the soil as thoroughly as Bolshevism did in Russia." Dwinger found the form he needed in the "diaries" of the trilogy later called Die deutsche Passion. The three parts were Die Armee hinter Stacheldraht (1929; Eng. tr., Prisoner of War, 1930), Zwischen Weiss und Rot (1930; Eng. tr., Between White and Red, 1932), and Wir rufen Deutschland (1932). Dwinger presents unforgettable scenes of the sufferings of war prisoners in Siberia, of whom 600,000 perished. He reports the derangement and the perversions of the survivors, the insanity and abysmal hopelessness of years of imprisonment, but also the heroic greatness of men in defeat. Thanks to his maternal heritage he is able to give a fair and realistic picture of the Russians, who vacillate between the extremes of cruelty and brokenhearted contrition. In a compact style which abounds in gripping scenes and pictures, Dwinger reports his story as a human being who always sides with the oppressed. The sufferings which he and his comrades endured have meaning in so far as they impede other world catastrophes. Germany must abolish its class distinctions and find a way to socialism of the heart. The third volume of the trilogy reveals a decline of Dwinger's power. He often loses himself in critical and dialectic discussions to show the necessity of a Germany based on an ethnic community.

None of Dwinger's later works, among them the novel Die letzten Reiter (1935), can be ranked with the first two books of his trilogy. In his Spanische Silhouetten (1937) he gives his impressions of a trip through Spain on Franco's side during the civil war, a piece of journalistic reporting blended with conventional fascist ideology. In The Second World War he served as a war correspondent with a Panzer Division. The book Panzerführer (1941) is a glorification of leadership, but also describes ably the work of the staff, the action in the field, and the life of the division when at rest.

See: A. Frisé, "Edwin Erich Dwinger," Die neue Rundschau, Jahrgang XLIV (1933), Bd.

I, pp. 840-850; W. K. Pfeiler, War and the German Mind (1941), pp. 279-285.

W. K. P.

Dygasiński, Adolf (1839-1902, Polish novelist), was born in Niegosławice, Kielce district, Russian Poland. Reaching maturity at the most tragic moment in all Polish history, 1863, he left his studies in the Warsaw Szkoła Główna (see Polish literature) to participate in the fatal events of that year. The exigencies of his own temperament, a tendency to aloofness and gloom, coupled with the necessities imposed by the times, made him a perpetual wanderer, earning a poor living however and wherever he could, now as the proprietor of a bookshop in Cracow (1874-1878), now as a journalist and teacher in Warsaw (1879-1888), again as a tutor in various country houses (1889) or a chronicler of emigrant life in South America (1890-1891), finally as a plodding journalist once more in Warsaw. Of the scores of works from his pen—among these translations and manuals for teachers—two will not be forgotten: the letters he wrote from Brazil and later reworked in semi-fictional form as Na złamanie karku (1893; Backbreaking Work) and the Kiplingesque Gody życia (1902; The Feast of Living). The former is important because of its influence on the better-known portrait of the Brazilian Pole by Konopnicka (q.v.), Pan Balcer w Brazylji (1892; Mr. Balcer in Brazil), while the latter, an epic of the life cycle of a wren and a prose poem in praise of the life-giving forces of nature, not only possesses great intrinsic beauty, but is, besides, a pioneer work of its kind in Polish.

See: Z. Wasilewski, Współcześni (1923), pp. 164-197; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, I, (1934) 40-49, 303-306.

A. P. C.

Dyk, Viktor (1877-1931, Czech poet, dramatist, and novelist), has written the most important political poetry of the Czechs. A strong nationalism inspires his ironical and satirical spirit. Dyk was born at Psovka near Mělník (north of Prague), the son of a steward on an estate. He became a journalist, taking a prominent part in the editing of several periodicals of the "Radical Progressive" Party which was sharply anti-Austrian. In 1917 he was imprisoned by the Austrian authorities. After the liberation of Czechoslovakia, he became a member of Parliament and later a senator for the National Democratic Party. He died of heart failure while bathing in the Adriatic near Dubrovnik, Yugoslavia.

Skepticism and even nihilism were the main themes of Dyk's early poetry, but his despair was always tempered by irony and satire. He uses stanzaic forms and loves points, paradoxes, and grotesque rhymes. The best collection was called Marnosti (1900; Vanities). He then slowly turned away from individual problems of futility and found his themes more and more in political satire and exhortations to his nation. Satiry a sarkasmy (1905; Satires and Sarcasms) and Pohádky z naší vesnice (1910; Fairy Tales from Our Village) upbraid the nation for abandoning its old traditions and recommend an uncompromising nationalism of a conservative brand. The political verse of Dyk culminates in four collections, Lehké a těžké kroky (1915; Light and Heavy Steps), Anebo (1918; Or), Okno (1920; The Window), and Poslední rok (1922; The Last Year), which comment on the war and post-war developments as well as on the author's experiences in an Austrian prison. Among the later books of less importance, Devátá vlna (1930; The Ninth Wave) is interesting for its personal tone; the feeling of approaching death unifies a miscellany of intimate lyrics. Besides lyrical poetry, where Dyk is at his best, he attempted also epics on a small scale—a cycle of ballads or romances like that on Giuseppe Moro (1911) or a short verse story like Zápas Jiřího Macků (1918; The Struggle of George Macků), which deals with a peasant's defiance of death.

As a dramatist Dyk used a technique of effective dialogue, with sharp dialectics, which makes each of his dramas almost a series of epigrams on the stage. Posel (1907; The Messenger) is a historical drama which attempts to indict the spirit of Christian pacifism for the loss of the independence of the nation in the Battle of the White Mountain (1620). Zmoudření Dona Quijota (1913; Don Quixote Recovers His Reason) is an ironic dramatization of the conflict between romantic dream and sober reality, while Revoluční trilogie (1921; The Trilogy of the Revolution) contains three short plays on the French Revolution which bring out the poet's sarcastic attitude towards idealism.

Least successful is the voluminous prose of this author. He wrote some good short stories which vary the theme of romantic illusionism, e.g., Krysař (1915; The Pied Piper). But his attempts at satirical and political novels are artistic failures in spite of the interest of the materials, which are based on memories of events and personalities. The composition is loose, and debate and discussion crowd out all imagination. Konec Hackenschmidův (1904; Hackenschmid's End) depicts the students' part in the "Progressive" movement; Soykovy děti (1929; Soyka's Children) is a chronicle of the war; and Děs z prázdna (1932; Horror vacui) attempts to reconstruct Czech political life of the early 19th century. Dyk also wrote polemical prose, a certain amount of criticism, and reminiscences.

Dyk overcame his early nihilism by a fervent nationalism which recommended the most radical measures against Austrian dominion and which after the establishment of the republic turned against socialism and the humanitarian democracy represented by President Masaryk (q.v.). Dyk thought of the nation in terms of its historical tradition and conceived of it as a moral absolute. Artistically, he is important as a lyrical poet, because in a time of rhetoric he cultivated concise, hard, and sharp forms. But imagination is too frequently sacrificed to sheer intellect. His dramas seem excogitated, and his novels suffer from too much topical discussion. Though Dyk has been compared to Barrès (q.v.), he is far drier, more sober and subdued, and far more narrow.

See: K. H. Hilar, Viktor Dyk; essay o jeho ironii (1910); M. Rutte, Viktor Dyk; portrét básníka (1931); H. Jelínek, Viktor Dyk (1932); A. Novák, Viktor Dyk (1936).

R. W.

E

Ebner-Eschenbach, Marie von (née von Dubsky, 1830–1916, Austrian poet and novelist), was born in Moravia (Zdislawitz); her husband, Baron von Ebner-Eschenbach, was like herself a member of the Austrian aristocracy. Much of her life was spent in Vienna, the summers usually on her country estate; and the Austrian metropolis and countryside repeatedly form the background of her narratives.

Influenced largely by Schiller and the performances of the Vienna Burgtheater, she began to write as a young girl. Her lyric verses are of scant importance, and her dramatic attempts, in which she persisted for many years, likewise met with slight success. Even in the field of the Novelle, it was not until 1881 that the publication of Lotti die Uhrmacherin brought her recognition. In the 80's, however, her reputation grew rapidly; soon Marie von Ebner was considered one of the masters of the 19th-century Novelle. Most of her Novellen may be described, to quote the title of one of her books, as "village and castle stories," stories of the peasantry and of the landed gentry. Among her best-known shorter narratives are "Die Freiherrn von Gemperlein," "Krambambuli" (Eng. tr., 1913-1915), and "Komtess Muschi" (Eng. tr., The Two Countesses, 1893). Perhaps her most important longer work is the novel Das Gemeindegeld (1887; Eng. tr., Child of the Parish, 1893); Unsühnbar (1890; Eng. tr., Beyond Atonement, 1892) is less convincing and more sentimental. Her works are marked by narrative skill, a generally sympathetic treatment of character, quiet humor, and an emphasis on the development and education of the central figure which places many of them in the tradition of the Bildungsroman. The didactic tendency is occasionally all too evident in her fiction; it appears to best advantage in her Aphorismen (1880; Eng. tr., Aphorisms, 1883). Her female characters follow one of two dominant patterns, the gentle "model girl" or the sport-loving, reckless tomboy. In general, she portrays women and children more successfully than men. The sentimentality of many of the stories is relieved by occasional flashes of psychological insight. An enemy of naturalism, Marie von Ebner strove for that middle ground between realism and idealization which is vaguely described in German literary history as "poetic realism." Socially and politically she was staunchly conservative, a consistent supporter of the family and the church. Though her criticism of the Austrian aristocracy was sometimes incisive, she apparently never questioned the privileges and powers of the nobility. She was by no means devoid of sympathy for the poor and uneducated and felt that the lower classes should be decently treated by their "superiors" in the hierarchy of Austrian society.

Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach has often been compared with Luise von François (1817-1893) who greatly admired her and who also writes largely of the aristocracy and from the aristocratic point of view (see her novel Die letzte Reckenbürgerin, 1871).

See: M. Necker, Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach (1900); A. Bettelheim, Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach (1900) and Marie von Ebner-Eschenbachs Wirken und Vermächtnis (1920).

H. C. H.

Eça de Queiroz, José Maria (1845-1900, Portuguese fiction writer and journalist), the indisputable master of the Portuguese novel, was born in Póvoa-de-Varzim, Minho, to a middle-class family. He studied law in Coimbra and was a bosom companion of Antero de Quental (q.v.) and an outstanding member of the Generation of 1865. He did not take an active part in the "Coimbra dispute" or in the student struggles, but he did participate in the "Conferências democráticas do Casino de Lisboa" in 1871 (see Portuguese literature). After graduation he engaged in political journalism in Evora and practiced law intermittently in Lisbon. In 1869 he attended the opening of the Suez Canal and traveled through the Orient, experiences which he was to use later in his writings. In 1870 he was municipal administrator in Leiria and there familiarized himself with the provincial atmosphere, which he also incorporated subsequently in his work. Finally he entered the Foreign Service, which took him to consular posts in Cuba (1873-1874) and England (1874-1888) and to Paris (1888-1900). The last assignment constituted the realization of a lifelong ambition, nurtured as he was in the Gallophilism of his generation. His long absence from his native land enabled him to judge it dispassionately and at the same time to come in contact with new currents of ideas. This resulted in a richness of intellectual experience which acted as a leaven in his already rich personality.

The articles and stories which were his first work (collected posthumously in Prosas bárbaras, 1905, Barbaric Prose) reveal him as under a multitude of youthful influences: he has imagination in the manner of Hoffmann, Parnassian erudition, Poe-like gloominess—transmitted by way of Baudelaire (q.v.)—and Germanic lyricism in the manner of Heine. All of this was presented in a provocative new language, Gallicized, twisted, and nebulously lyric. But in Eça's case these influences were only the point of departure for his vigorous originality. In 1871 he undertook with Ramalho Ortigão (q.v.), with whom he had already collaborated on a mystery novel, the publication of the monthly review As farpas (1871-1883; The Darts), "a monument of criticism and . . . of the social history of its time and country," in which he revealed his biting irony and his bent for reform. After the lectures in 1871 and after having been converted in some measure to French naturalism, he produced O crime do Padre Amaro (1875; Father Amaro's Crime), a thesis novel directed against the corruption of the clergy, in which he utilized his observations made in Leiria. The work concerns sacrilegious love in a mean provincial atmosphere, elaborated with all the characteristics of determinism, inheritance, detailed analysis, and psychophysiological description. There is a broader social scene in O primo Basílio (1878, Cousin Basil; Eng. tr., Dragon's Teeth, 1889), in which, through a case recalling Madame Bovary (see Flaubert), the moral constitution of a middle-class Lisbon family is analyzed. The panorama of Portuguese society is widened in Os Maias (1880; The Maias) to embrace high society, tardily romantic. The great financial, religious, and literary world is depicted with thoroughness and increasing irony. Opposition to these first two novels gave rise to the polemic about the new novelistic art (see again Portuguese literature). Eça has been called the Portuguese Zola (q.v.), but this is unjust, since naturalism was only a subordinate element from which he soon freed himself to affirm a personal art.

His evolution was slow and harmonious. Observation disciplined his imagination. Eventually he found his distinctive manner, rhythmic, suggestive, and ironic, a mixture of essential romanticism and realistic probity. In O mandarim (1880; The Mandarin), a delightful, short, fanciful novel, is a charming view of China gathered through his readings. "On the rugged nakedness of truth—the diaphanous mantle of fancy" are the words which open A relíquia (1887; Eng. tr., The Relic, 1925); in a sordid novelistic incident of religious hypocrisy he encases an evocation of Palestine, suggestive of Renan (q.v.) and having recollections of his own journey, and a poetic reconstruction of the Passion. He had already treated the theme of Christ (see Prosas bárbaras), and he returned to it in a delightful story, Suave milagre (1891; Eng. tr., The Sweet Miracle, 1904), included in the posthumous Contos (1902; Short Stories).

Because of his ironic denationalizing criticism a great deal has been said of his foreign sympathies and antipatriotic attitude. But his rebellious satire is only an aspect of his essential Portuguese tenderness, that of a "poor man from Póvoa-de-Varzim," as he defined himself. He treated Portugal ironically because he loved her so much and wished to improve her, and his mockery and dejection are deeply Lusitanian. This tenderness keeps revealing itself; in A ilustre casa de Ramires (1900; The Illustrious House of Ramires) it expands lyrically over the essentials of Portuguese life. A cidade e as serras (1901; The City and the Mountains) is a hymn to native country and by extension a hymn to primitive simplicity. An aesthete disillusioned and surfeited with civilization, Eça here becomes emotional on contact with nature and simple things. A return to ingenuousness, coupled with the poetically archaeological, is also the explanation of the Pre-Raphaelite hagiology of the "Lendas de Santos" (Saints' Legends), included posthumously in Últimas páginas (1911; Last Pages). He projected the richness of his own human personality as a universal Lusitanian in the type "Fradique Mendes" (Correspondência de Fradique Mendes, 1900; Correspondence of Fradique Mendes), the incarnation of the ideal of his generation, a skeptic and sentimental dandy who parades through the world his thirst for aristocratic perfection and his caustic politeness. To Eça, irony was the prism for the analysis of reality, but his smile, devoid of bitterness, reveals a benevolent comprehension of human weaknesses. He is a master in the creation of unexpected relationships between things, an implacable enunciator of the harassing contrast between the aspiration and the reality of the human being; nevertheless his irony is different from that of a Bernard Shaw or an Anatole France (q.v.), less corrosive, less cruelly refined.

For his particular art Eça needed a new instrument, ductile and complicated; he had to renew the structure of the language, and indeed he started the greatest revolution that Portuguese prose ever underwent in all its history. He broke up the long oratorical sentence, so dear to the Peninsular ear, joined words in new and subtle combinations, and encompassed in one line a whole series of insinuations, the product of patient observation and synthesis. Uniting abstract elements with concrete images and distilling metaphysical suggestion in lyrical expression, he succeeded in creating a style in which fantasy and reality constantly intermingle. He has been reproached for verbal and syntactical poverty and Gallicisms, but he has a rare intensity of expression. A victim of the "illness of perfection," he changed his thought over and over again, always dissatisfied, ever in search of the ideal, ineffable note. He succeeded in evolving a new aesthetic in a new language; he revealed another world, of vague concepts existing in the subconscious.

Eça's ability to catch an observed totality in a few strokes is comparable to that of Maupassant (q.v.). He complained of not having attained either the "sublime note of eternal reality" of Balzac or "the exact note of transitory reality" of Flaubert, but in fact he sometimes achieved both qualities and suggests also the vigor of Zola, the caricatural tenderness of Dickens, the succulent humanity of Thackeray, and the mental aristocracy of Renan. In his very characteristic work as a journalist and a letter writer, collected posthumously in several volumes, is further evidence of his great gifts as an observer of the life and culture of the end of the century. His death marks the end of a period in Portuguese literature. His work has been translated into many European languages, and his influence, discernible not only in the Peninsula but also in all the Hispanic world, is now beginning to be studied as it deserves.

See: F. de Figueiredo, História da literatura realista (1914), pp. 117-170; A. Cabral, Éça de Queiroz; a sua vida e a sua obra (1920); C. Ramalheite, Éça de Queiroz (1942); João Gaspar Simões, Éça de Queiroz, o homem o artista (1945).

E. G. D.

Echegaray, José (1832-1916, Spanish dramatist), was born and died in Madrid. He devoted himself with brilliant success to diverse activities, coming to occupy an outstanding position in the scientific, political, and literary life of Spain. Although he was past 40 when he began to cultivate the field of literature, it proved nevertheless the one in which his personality displayed itself in its most original form. He taught at the School of Civil Engineering until the Revolution of 1868 brought him into the political arena. He was elected to the Cortes Constituyentes, was appointed director of public works and minister of the interior, and was considered an authority on economic questions. From 1874, however, when his two first plays, El libro talonario, a comedy, and La esposa del vengador, a romantic drama, were presented on the stage, he devoted himself almost entirely to the theatre. The success of these works was surpassed the following year by the theatrical, romantic drama En el puño de la espada, which definitely established the popularity of its author. From that moment for 30 years Echegaray contributed to the Spanish stage a steady stream of dramas and comedies in prose and verse, and he may well be considered the most genuine and almost exclusive representative of the Spanish theatre during this period. Of all his works there are several besides En el puño de la espada which most intensely reflect the quality of his talent—O locura o santidad (1876; Eng. trs., Folly or Saintliness, 1895, Maa-nan or Saint, 1912), En el seno de la muerte (1879), El gran Galeoto (1881; Eng. trs., The Great Galeoto, 1895, The World and His Wife, 1908), Mariana (1892; Eng. tr., 1895), Mancha que limpia (1895), El loco Dios (1900; Eng. tr., The Madman Divine, 1908). For a complete evaluation of Echegaray's work one of his comedies must be included, as, for example, Un crítico incipiente (1891), and also some of his best short stories and articles and speeches.

The dramas referred to can be classified into two different groups, the romantic dramas which are in the nature of historic legends and the dramas which deal with contemporary moral and social problems; the best of his work falls into the latter division. But the difference between the two is more apparent than real. The nature of the dramatic conflict in Echegaray is that of the typical romantic drama. Certain of his later works, such as El loco Dios or El hijo de don Juan (1892; Eng. tr., The Son of Don Juan, 1895), are exceptions; in these he attempted to infuse new life into his theatre by way of a belated Ibsenian inspiration (see Ibsen, Henrik). His theatre in general, however, is in the nature of a retrogression. Echegaray stems directly from romanticism, both French and Spanish; but, one step removed, he has as his background and origin the classical Spanish theatre—especially Calderón—and, in a certain sense, Shakespeare. Among all these influences the most important, from the point of view of similarity of results, is that of Calderón. It might be said that just as Calderón was the stylized dramatist of the decadence of the Spanish theatre in the golden age, Echegaray is a belated romantic who appears when romanticism has been completely eclipsed and the powerful reaction of the middle of the century has set in against it. This explains both the good and the bad qualities of Echegaray's theatre. It also explains the popularity and resounding success of his plays, which revived the subject matter and procedure of the romantic and, to a certain extent, the classical theatre, so deeply rooted in the Spanish people. The conflicts assume stark, violent forms, with man and human will the plaything of the more powerful fatalities of chance, and give rise to those calculated, electric, almost physical clashes between individuals. Such is the formula of most of Echegaray's dramas. They revive in modern guise, coldly and with an eye to effect, the old themes and conflicts—a sense of chivalry, honor based on conjugal fidelity which, clouded over by the shadow of a doubt, makes life full of anguish, unbearable. These ideals in their most extreme and unreal forms are the very essence of drama in such of his plays as O locura o santidad, the drama of a conscience scrupulous to the point of mad Galeoto, the drama of public opinion in which there is a spirit of revolt, of horror, and even of redemption with regard to these dominant sentiments. For this reason the two plays have been the most popular and undoubtedly represent the culminating moments of Echegaray's work.

The literary generation that followed him reacted violently against Echegaray at the very moment he was at the height of his national popularity and had been internationally recognized through the award of the Nobel prize (1905). Yet the reputation of Echegaray, within Spain and abroad, is based on positive values which must be judged by the author's own artistic concepts. His talent lies in the way he handles a type of art which is not realistic, which consists in the use of an abstract device whereby themes, oversimplified and at the same time exaggerated, are juxtaposed with intense dramatic effect. There is, as might be expected from one with his mathematical mind, a deliberate withdrawal from reality. The characters are types or simply generic human beings; the passions are abstractions and logical principles; the words are rhetoric. But all this world in which reality is emptied of its content has a perfect harmony of its own, a structural, musical beauty.

See: J. Yxart, El arte escénico en España (1894); E. Merimée, José Echegaray et son œuvre dramatique (1916); M. Bueno, Teatro español contemporáneo (1909-); G. B. Shaw, Dramatic Opinions and Essays, 1916 ed., I, 81-89, II, 186-194.

F. de O.

Edschmid, Kasimir (pseud. of Eduard Schmid, 1890-, German novelist), was born in Darmstadt, which has remained his home. He is by and large the real leader of the expressionistic group of German writers. Three short novels, Die sechs Mündungen (1915), Das rasende Leben (1916), and Timur (1917), were the first proclamations of his idea of ecstatic and passionate living in an imaginary world. In a special volume, Über den Expressionismus in der Literatur (1918), and in his own periodical, Tribüne der Kunst und Zeit (1918-1920), he expounded the artistic, ethical, and technical theories of expressionism. Die achatnen Kugeln (1920) "with its hospital routine and erotic minutiae" is his first full-sized novel of considerable length, in which he applies all the newly established principles of form, style, and diction of the expressionistic movement. Nine years later they seem to him still valid, since they are still in evidence in his next novel, Lord Byron; der Roman einer Leidenschaft (1929; Eng. tr., Lord Byron; the Story of a Passion, Am. tr., The Passionate Rebel; the Life of Lord Byron, both 1930); this is not so much a biographical account as a psychological study of the poet's sex life. Repeated journeys to Italy and other Mediterranean countries are later extended to Africa and South America, and after 1929 the observations and experiences of these travels are almost exclusively the background or subject matter of his writings. While language, vocabulary, and style of the earlier works have not essentially changed, his presentation is now more direct and realistic. Afrika nacht und angezogen (1929) and Glanz und Elend Südamerikas; Roman eines Erdteils (1930; Eng. tr., South America; Lights and Shadows, 1932) are the best representatives of this new type of travel writing. Edschmid tries to retain as far as possible the narrative form. Among his products of the last 10 years are four books with very significant titles dealing with Italy and the Mediterranean: Zauber und Grösse des Mittelmeeres (1932), Italien: Lorbeer, Leid und Ruhm (1935), Italien: Gärten, Männer und Geschichten (1937), and Italien: Inseln, Römer und Cäsaren (1939).

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 346-349, 828-839; J. Bithell, Modern German Literature, 1880-1938 (1939), pp. 400-489.

A. Bu.

Eeden, Frederik Willem van (1860-1932, Dutch poet, novelist, essayist, and dramatist), was born at Haarlem and studied medicine at the University of Amsterdam, where he took his M.D. in 1886. He started to practice at Bussum, while conducting at the same time a psychotherapeutic clinic at Amsterdam. But gradually his literary work and his interest in social experiments drew him away from the practice of medicine. He was one of the founders and first editors of De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide), in which he published his philosophical fairy tale De kleine Johannes (1887; Eng. tr., Little Johannes, 1895). This story is a poetical autobiography. Its principal motif is Johannes's longing for the Great Light, i.e., Van Eeden's search for God. The search leads him on to "the great, dark city of humanity and its misery." That is the story of the poet Van Eeden in a nutshell. He turned away from the pride and self-glorification of the Nieuwe Gids group to share and alleviate the sufferings of his fellow men. He founded a communal colony, which, ardent admirer of Thoreau as he was, he called Walden. This experiment ended in failure, but Van Eeden, not disillusioned, continued his quest for the true life until he found peace at last in the bosom of the Church of Rome. In his poem Ellen (1889) he sang a mystical hymn to divine love, which alone can make man's heart susceptible to beauty. Then followed his great dramatic poem De Broeders; Tragedie van het Recht (1894; The Brothers; a Tragedy of Justice), which in the second edition was renamed De Broederveete (The Brothers' Feud). In this, perhaps his greatest work, stark realism and mysticism are interwoven into a moving and deeply significant drama. Van Eeden gave the fullest and clearest exposition of his Weltanschauung in a long philosophical poem in terza rima entitled Het Lied van Schijn en Wezen (1895-1910; Song of Semblance and Substance). The novelist Van Eeden is at his best in Van de Koele Meren des Doods (1900, Of the Cool Pools of Death; Eng. tr., The Deepes of Deliverance, 1902). He was the only one among the "Eightiers" who took an interest in the stage, and his versatility ranged from farce to tragedy, from satirical comedy to the stately historical play. But he was primarily a mystic and philosopher and could portray his inner self much more vividly than he could portray others. Still, some of his plays had a stage success—IJsbrand (1908), In Kenterend Getij (1910; Change of Tide), De Heks van Haarlem (1915; The Witch of Haarlem). His prose essays fill six series of Studies (1890-1918). They reveal the wide range of his knowledge and intellectual curiosity.

Van Eeden was indeed the most versatile among the authors of his generation and the one who, more than all others, commands the admiration and the interest of present-day Holland. It is clear from his diaries that Van Eeden felt himself to be a solitary stranger among his fellow men, who failed or refused to understand him. He had, indeed, more enemies than friends among his contemporaries. But two years after his death, a society was founded for the study of his works, the Frederik van Eeden Genootschap, with headquarters at Amsterdam. The Mededeelingen (Publications) which this organization has issued since February, 1935, contain a mass of valuable information and original documents that throw new light upon this enigmatic figure in modern Dutch literature.

See: A. Lang, "Introductory Essay," in Van Eeden, Little Johannes (1895); W. H. Dircks, "Introduction," in Van Eeden, The Deepes of Deliverance (1902); G. Kalf, Jr., Frederik van Eeden; Psychologie van den Tachtiger (1927); H. W. van Tricht, Frederik van Eeden, Denker en Strijder (1934); Mededeelingen van het Frederik van Eeden Genootschap (1935-1940).

A. J. B.

Eekhoud, Georges (1854-1927, Belgian novelist), appears as one of the most subjective of Belgian writers. He was born in Antwerp. Little is known of his early years; certain biographers have relied too heavily on references more or less personal in his La Nouvelle Carthage (1888) and attributed his anarchistic tendencies to a supposed unhappy childhood. Such inferences are contradicted by his Souvenirs, published in 1914. These, however, stop at his 11th year, when his father died; his mother he had scarcely known. His guardian wished him to prepare for a business or professional career, and this may have caused friction. When he came into possession of his heritage, Eekhoud lived for a few months as a gentleman farmer in the rugged Campine around Antwerp. This period was the happiest of his life; it supplied the matter, and especially the inspiration, for many of his future books. Ever afterwards he evoked memories or dreams of that short experience. Hence the nostalgia so marked in his writing. When his financial resources were exhausted, he declined a last offer from his guardian and for the rest of his life eked out a precarious existence as a journalist in Brussels.

He began his literary career in 1877 with a tiny volume of verse, shortly followed by two others. The fanatic lover of independence and of "irregulars" is in bud in certain of these poems. His first prose work was a biography (1881) of the popular Flemish novelist, Hendrik Conscience (q.v.), for whom he repeatedly expressed admiration in later years. A note of naïve sentimentality in some of his tales seems to stem from this source. In 1881 Eekhoud joined the vivacious group who, under the leadership of Max Waller, edited the Jeune Belgique (see Belgian Literature in French). In 1893 he broke with his associates, whose growing Parnassian trend toward aloof objectivity was repugnant to him. Doubtless his own passion for independence was enhanced by this incident. He was accused of abandoning art in the name of an effort toward social reform, but such charges are based on an at least partial misunderstanding. More than his colleagues he had taken to heart De Coster's (q.v.) advice: "Go to the humble folk—the bourgeois are all tarred with monotony." He protests repeatedly that he would not change the social status of his beloved vagabonds—that would destroy their picturesqueness—but at last he became aware of dangers inherent in this fascination. In Le Terroir incarné (1925) two artists are discussing their principles. One would be the impassive and disinterested interpreter of nature. The other seeks to concentrate and symbolize a whole region in a single individual; he finds his ideal in a simple peasant and loses sight of his pictorial ideal in the obsession unwittingly wrought by his rustic model. Finally he prays for strength to create a work which may immortalize his subject in art and kill it for himself. Thus, at the end of his career, Eekhoud seems to admit the strictures of his former colleagues of the Jeune Belgique.

Yet the power of his work comes from his passionate espousal of pariahs and criminals. The stories of Le Cycle patibulaire (definitive ed., 1896) are among the most vitriolic he has signed. He would argue that his outcasts are, more or less consciously, unrecognized saints. The last story of the first edition (1892), "Le Suicide par amour," preaches universal charity, but declares that ideal humanity must be created out of dreams. Eekhoud ever defends the most heterodox and brutal ethics provided only that they take their rise in primitive impulse and in revolt from contemptible bourgeois uniformity. His favorite painters are Rubens and Jordaens, whose delight in brawniness he shares; in English literature, it is the Elizabethans who charm him. He translated plays from Webster, Fletcher, and Marlowe and wrote Au Siècle de Shakespeare (1893). Unlike Verhaeren (q.v.), he can see only evil in "progress" and curses our financial civilization. Striking in this respect is his novel La Nouvelle Carthage (Eng. tr., The New Carthage, 1917), in which he deplores the modernization of Antwerp and delights in recalling its ancient picturesque squalor. The hero, who has much in common with the author, clashes violently with a social reformer who would "save" what can be saved of the populace and ignore the hopelessly depraved. For Eekhoud the latter are the most precious of the denizens and to change them would be blasphemy against art. Yet he is far from being consistent. He admired the Russian novelists for their revolutionary trends and wrote in 1891: "Literature has been preparing for a long time the social upheaval of tomorrow."

The majority of his short stories (e.g., Kermesses, 1884; Nouvelles Kermesses, 1887;

and Dernières Kermesses, 1920), as well as many of his novels (e.g., Kees Doorik, 1883; Les Milices de Saint-François, 1886; and Escal Vigor, 1899), deal with rustic scenes. There is a certain realism in the setting, but the characters, whether peasants or aristocrats, are too often mere symbols destined to personify their creator's visions. The novels, at least when judged by conventional standards, are faulty in structure: they are formed of loosely connected episodes offering dramatic expression of preconceived theories or painting pictures. One cannot forget that Eekhoud, like many of his countrymen, was obsessed by traditions of the brush. He wrote several volumes of art criticism, among which Les Peintres animaliers belges (1911) deserves special mention. A similar phenomenon is apparent in his manner of writing. Francis Nautet, the critic of Jeune Belgique, remarked that Eekhoud had a language rather than a style. He cares more for colorful words than for harmony of phrase and seeks first to give vent to his robust individuality.

His power lies in his passionate sincerity, in the conflict within himself of the artist and the humanitarian, in his championing of the picturesque helots of civilization, and in his cosmopolitan sympathies. While exalting always his tiny Campine, he would commune in ever widening circles with "tragic and agonized humanity."

See: J. Bithell: Contemporary Belgian Literature (1915); H. Krains: Portraits d'écrivains belges (1930); G. Vanwelkenhuyzen, L'Influence du naturalisme français en Belgique (1930); G. Black, Bibliographie de Georges Eekhoud (1931).

B. M. W.

Egge, Peter (1869–, Norwegian novelist), was born in Trondheim. His first success was with a group of stories about his native city and environs. Later he often returns to the same milieu. His books are low-toned, without great events, but with the stress laid on the inner life of the characters. Inde i fjordene (1920; By the Deep Fjords) describes the conflict that arises when a professional man's daughter marries into one of the proud, stiff-necked peasant families. Jægtvig og hans Gud (1920; Jægtvig and His God) is a study of a poor shoemaker who thinks he is born to create a new religion. Hansine Solstad (1925; Eng. tr., Hansine Solstad, the History of an Honest Woman, 1929), generally considered the author's masterpiece, describes a peasant girl whose consciousness of an unstained family record sustains her through a lifetime of unmerited disgrace.

EGGE is a very productive writer. Besides a great number of novels, some historical, but most of them with modern themes, he has written successful serious dramas as well as comedies in which his sense of humor, restrained in his other works, has free play.

H. A. L.

Ehrenburg, Ilya Grigoriyevich (1891–, Russian journalist, poet, and novelist), is the Soviet Union's most brilliant war correspondent. Extensive travel and long residence abroad have given him a knowledge of Europe which, together with his remarkable powers of observation and his faculty of discerning the inner significance of events, have won him an international reputation in his reporting of both World Wars and of the Ethiopian and Spanish wars. His voluminous literary production, including novels, short stories, poems, translations, articles, plays, and criticism, while artistically uneven and derivative, is regarded in the U.S.S.R. as a valuable source of sociological information on Western countries.

Born in Moscow of poor Jewish parents, Ehrenburg spent his childhood in a suburban brewery and his youth in wandering over Russia, enduring the severest hardships. In 1909 he went to Paris, where he became one of a cosmopolitan group of writers, including his close friend, Francis Jammes (q.v.), whose work he translated (1913). At one point his interest in Catholicism nearly led him to join the Benedictine order. In 1917 he returned to Russia, where he remained four years. There he lectured on Russian literature and worked at organizing children's theatres with V. L. Durov, a famous animal trainer and collaborator with the eminent physiologist, Ivan Pavlov. As a writer Ehrenburg belonged to the group once known as "fellow travelers," who accepted the Revolution yet remained its critics. In 1921 he returned to Paris. Expelled at first as a Bolshevik, he was later allowed to return; except for numerous journeys throughout Europe and to the U.S.S.R., he remained in Paris until 1940.

At his best Ehrenburg is a master storyteller of a cinematic, satirical type of adventure tale. His essential rootlessness is both an asset and a liability to his vivid, versatile talent, giving it now perspective, now a cynical superficiality. His chief work includes Lik voiny (1920; The Face of War), called the best Russian depiction of the first world conflict; Neobychainye pokhozhdeniya Khulio Khurenito i yevo uch-enikov (1921; Eng. tr., The Extraordinary Adventures of Julio Jurenito and His Disciples, 1930), a picaresque legend after the manner of Candide, satirizing several nations in their nihilistic characteristics; Lubov Zhan-ny Nei (1924; Eng. tr., The Love of Jeanne Ney, 1929), an ironic story of love and spies with a French-Soviet background; V Pro-tochnom Pereyulke (1927; Eng. tr., A Street in Moscow, 1932), a richly detailed portrayal of Moscow slums; Vtoroi den (1933, The Second Day; Eng. tr., Out of Chaos, 1934), a novel dealing with the collective versus the individual will as manifested in the construction of a giant Siberian steel plant; Ispaniya (1937) and Chto cheloveku nado (1937; What a Man Needs), articles and sketches on the Spanish civil war; Padenie Parizha (1942; Eng. tr., The Fall of Paris, 1942), a novel of the decay of France from 1935 to 1940, which won the 100,000-ruble Stalin prize and sold 35,000 copies the first week of its publication in London; Voina (1942; Eng. tr., Russia at War, 1943).

See: Y. Zamyatin, "Ehrenburg," Rossiia, 1923; G. Struve, "Ehrenburg," in Soviet Russian Literature (1935), pp. 11–13.

N. S.

Ekelund, Vilhelm (1880–, Swedish poet and essayist), began his literary career in the limited lyric manner of the nature poets of Skåne, the province of his birth in the south of Sweden. But since his muse demanded sterner gods to worship, he developed soon into Swedish poetry's most persistent and fanatical seeker after Beauty in the absolute, abstract Platonic sense. Though the early poetry with motifs from Skåne's countryside was a mere preliminary phase in Ekelund's development, it contains some of the most exquisitely beautiful nature poetry in the Swedish language. Indeed, in these early poems—contained in the volumes Vårbris (1900; Spring Breeze), Syner (1901; Visions), and Melodier i skymning (1902; Twilight Melodies)—he outdid his master Ola Hansson (q.v.) in the creation of sensitive, mellifluous, nature-intoxicated verse. In his later reaction against the tendency of such verse to become a merely sensuous and passive form of aestheticism, Ekelund turned to other sources of inspiration, first to Nietzsche (q.v.) and to Platen and Hölderlin, and then, in his most mature stage of development, to philosophers and mystics such as Swedenborg and Emerson, Pascal and Thomas à Kempis. In Nietzsche he found the heroic ideal, at least partly derivative from the ancient Greeks (Pindar, Heraclitus); and in Platen and Hölderlin he discovered in its purest form a passionate, never satisfied longing for Absolute Beauty, a form of beauty completely dissociated from the world of phenomena and the senses. In the philosophers and mystics he found at first merely certain other spiritual manifestations of a passionate, essentially heroic seeking after Beauty and Truth; but later in his development, when he had come to respond somewhat less to the heroic ideal, he sought in his reading more the quiet and calm of the classical conception of beauty and the Christian conception of truth. Always, however, the object of his quest has been the Absolute; never has he been satisfied with outward beauty alone or with the mere appearance of truth. This has made him the most exclusive of Swedish authors, a restless half-disembodied spirit ranging widely in the most rarefied regions of art and of thought, far distant from the ordinary everyday preoccupations of man.

The best of his mature work is contained in four volumes of poems—Elegier (1903; Elegies), In Candidum (1905), Havets stjärna (1906; The Star of the Sea), and Dithyramber i aftonglans, (1906; Dithyrambs in the Splendor of Evening)—and in a long series of volumes of prose aphorisms and essays beginning with Antikt ideal (1909; The Antique Ideal). Though for a long time he has not employed verse to any extent to give expression to his thought, his aphoristic prose, with its marvelous compactness of phrase, its flashing metaphors, and its subtle half-rhythmic form, is certainly not wanting in the qualities of pure poetry. He stands today as the one Swedish master of the aphoristic style, and though his influence upon contemporary Swedish literature is difficult to trace with precision, it is unquestionably present, particularly on the younger generation of poets.

See: O. Levertin, Svensk litteratur I (1908), A. Werin, "Vilhelm Ekelund som essayist," Ord och bild, XXVII (1918), 641–648; A. Österling, Dagens gärning (1921); N. Svanberg, "Vilhelm Ekelund's lyrik," Nysvenska studier, III (1923), 148–156; F. Böök, Resa kring svenska Parnassen (1926) pp. 85–102; G. Castrén, Den nya tiden 1870–1914 (1932), Vol. VII of H. Schück and K. Warburg, Illustrerad svensk litteraturhistoria, 3d ed., pp. 442–447; K. Strömberg, Modern svensk litteratur (1932), pp. 108–114; S. Ahlström, Vilhelm Ekelund (1940).

A. G.

Elskamp, Max (1862–1931, Belgian poet), was born in Antwerp. This strange and eccentric gentleman of the rich bourgeoisie never left his native town, except during the First World War when he spent four years in Holland. He was born in a part of the city overflowing with Flemish fishmongers and thrift shops. Although he disliked these surroundings, he never went away from this proletarian district. He spent the greatest part of his life in his fine house and collected rare rose trees and sundials for his garden. Between 1892 and 1898 he published several tiny books of poetry. Although very few copies of Dominicales (1892) and Salutations dont d'angéliques (1893) were printed, they were immediately appreciated in the cenacles of the French symbolists in Paris. Elskamp's French syntax, his modes of expression, and his abundance of rare and unexpected images made him akin to Mallarmé (q.v.). But his inspiration was much closer to that of Verlaine's (q.v.) La Bonne Chanson. He draws the themes of his songs from the life of the simple people of his neighborhood; from their faith, their devotion to the calvaries, the baroque statues of saints placed on artificial rocks around the church. He celebrated the daily toil of the humble, their games and festivities. He uses musical rhythms, repetitions, and alliterations in his short poems, and although, at first sight, they would seem to be songs of folklore, they are in fact extremely intellectual stanzas, chiseled with patience and wit. In 1898 Elskamp collected all his poems in one volume under the title Louange de la vie (the same title was adopted a few years later by Gabriele d'Annunzio, q.v., for his great poetical work Le Laudi). After that, Elskamp remained silent for 23 years. An exile in Holland during the First World War, he wrote Sous les tentes de l'exode (1921), and, after his return to Antwerp, La Chanson de la rue St. Paul (1922), glorifying the modest provincial street of his birth. But he never again attained the freshness and purity of his early works.

Elskamp's influence can be retraced in the works of the foremost Catholic poets of France: Charles Péguy and Paul Claudel (qq.v.). His influence is to be found also in some of Guillaume Apollinaire's (q.v.) songs. In Belgium, Max Elskamp was considered by nearly all the French-writing poets of the 1920–1930 generation as their master.

L. K.

Elsschot, Willem, see Ridder, Alfons de.

Elster, Kristian (1841–1881, Norwegian novelist), achieved his first important recognition posthumously with Farlige folk (1881; Dangerous People), his best novel. During the 60's he had published a number of sketches, short stories, reviews, and correspondence, but in spite of encouragement from Brandes and Ibsen (qq.v.), he was unable to overcome a fatal shyness and lack of self-confidence which was the bane of his life and a common theme of his writing. Elster's stories are somber in tone, pessimistic about the cultural future of his country, filled with a sense of injustice. His characters are conceived against a background of cultural conflict between peasants and officials, a background which Elster had special qualifications for understanding. His death cut short an unusually promising literary career; as Björnson put it, "he died before the Word was matured on his lips, that last Word of understanding for which his whole life had been a search."

See: J. B. Halvorsen, Norsk forfatterlexikon, II (1888), 216-220; G. Brandes, Samlede skrifter, III (1900), 416-424; G. and E. Brandes, Breveksling, ed. by F. Bull (1939), I, part 2, 375-387.

E. H.

Eluard, Paul (1895-, French poet), was born at Saint-Denis, Seine. He became associated in the beginning of his poetic career first with the dadaist and then with the surrealist movement. His early poetry, such as Les Nécessités d'une vie et les conséquences des rêves (1921), presents impersonal and pure images of the external world or flashes of that "living reality" of dreams which seem to be automatically registered, but which the poet views by the cold light of his detached spirit. Throughout, he appears to be armored against his own sensibility and that of the world.

These traits do not disappear totally from his later poetry, but with the publication of Mourir de ne pas mourir (1924) he reveals a new manner, the "beating of the loving heart in the breast that is vanquished." He undertakes "the magic study of the happiness nobody evades." In love with love, he adores the same woman in all women; all his loves mirror one soul; she embodies for him the taste and fragrance of the earth and the radiance of the heavens. He feels he exists only because her eyes behold and reflect him, and when they do not the universe ceases to be. Lamartine, Vigny, Baudelaire (q.v.), had known desolation, but their loneliness was an earth solitude. Eluard's is an univers solitude, as the title to one of his poems indicates. The woman he loves in the end loses her human entity, merging with nature and, ultimately, with the Absolute.

His poetry is like a nebula of ineffable passion and vision, and sometimes appears formless and vaporous. Its myriad images, like stars, reflect the invisible and the unknown. There was still enough of the classic in Baudelaire and Rimbaud (q.v.) to lead them to seek "correspondences" between nature and their spirits; each image in Eluard is a lost paradise and fulfills Hegel's definition of the romantic spirit which "seeks itself solely within and resists what sets limits to it." There are indeed no limits in Eluard's poetic domain. The very titles of his books convey the breath of it: Capitale de la douleur (1926), Les Dessous d'une vie, ou la Pyramide humaine (1926), L'Amour la poésie (1929), La Vie immédiate (1932), La Rose publique (1934), Les Yeux fertiles (1936). Not everything in them rises to the same high level of purity, but the greater part does and stands as a wonderful bridge over the abyss between dream and reality, between what can be felt and thought and what lies beyond.

Eluard's poetic experience does not neglect the human condition, however. He has taken an active interest in the political and poetic activities of surrealism as well as in its experimental explorations in the realm of the subconsciousness, of which he has written the best example in L'Immaculée Conception (1930), done in collaboration with André Breton (q.v.). This responsiveness of the poet to the pathos of life is reflected even more markedly in his later work, as in Cours naturel (1938), which contains the moving poem "Victoire de Guernica," in Chanson complète (1939), and, especially, in the poems which he wrote to sing the tragedy and heroism of the unconquered soul of France during the terrible years 1940-1944, including Poésie et vérité (1942) and Au rendez-vous allemand (1945).

See: Marcel Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933), pp. 322-323, 354-358; Jean Cassou, Pour la poésie (1935), pp. 268-278; Eluard, Thorns of Thunder, English translations of selected poems, ed. by George Reavey (1936); Michel Carrouges, Eluard et Claudel (1945).

S. A. R.

Emants, Marcellus (1848-1923, Dutch novelist, poet, and playwright), was born at Voorburg, a suburb of The Hague. He studied law at Leiden, but, being a man of means, instead of practicing he devoted himself entirely to literature. He was the first in Holland to declare that art, no less than science, should free itself from the tyrannical domination of religious dogmas and ethical concepts. Truth in art was his favorite slogan. In 1879 he made his début with Een drietal Novellen (Three Short Stories). In his preface the author revealed that one of these had been written for the periodical De Banier (The Banner), but that it had been refused because it might have shocked "proper ladies who administered respectable circulating libraries." The story was based, he said, on a sketch from nature, and "the responsibility for the coarseness or the dignity of the characters and situations rested, perhaps, with the public in which the spirit of the age is embodied, but not with him who caught its reflection in his mirror." In that same year was published his article "Schoonheid" (1879; Beauty), in which he clearly formulated his conception of the mission of naturalism in art.

Emants believed with Taine (q.v.), for whom he had a deep admiration, that "every human action is the necessary reaction of an individual to the influence of his environment." Most of Emants's stories are objective studies of neurasthenic or hypersensitive people. The greatest of these is Een nagelaten Bekentenis 1894; (A Posthumous Confession), the story of a man who knows himself to be the helpless victim of his fatal heredity. He struggles in vain to assume his place in the world of normal beings. "I have heard it said all too often that a man who knows his own faults is able to eradicate them. Those who say so must have very little self-knowledge." He cannot free himself from the curse that is on him and is driven by his fate to the murder of his wife. In Inwijding (1901; Initiation), Waan (1905; Delusion), and Liefdeleven (1916; Love Life) the dominant theme is the agony of slowly dying love. The author seems obsessed with the hopelessness and futility of all existence. His novels are masterpieces of psychoanalysis, but they leave the reader chilled by their skeptical denial of all loveliness. Emants expressed in poetry also his despair of man's goodness. He symbolized in Lilith (1879) the eternal libido and its inescapable results. "All who are conceived in voluptuousness shall sooner or later fall a prey to voluptuousness." Woman as the embodiment of selfishness and folly is the theme of Emants's best drama, Domheidsmacht (1904; The Power of Folly). Among the foreign authors who influenced his work were Flaubert, Zola, and above all Turgenev (qq.v.).

See: T. de Wyzewa, Ecrivains étrangers, Sér. 1 (1896), pp. 293 ff.; J. de Graaf, Le Réveil littéraire en Hollande et le naturalisme français, 1880-1900 (1938), pp. 107-125.

A. J. B.

Eminescu, Mihail (pseud. of Mihail Iminovici, 1850-1889, Rumanian poet), was born in Botoșani, the sixth child of the 10 boys and girls in Gheorghe and Ralița Iminovici's family. His father, a modest merchant and farmer, wished to bring up his offspring carefully. Mihail spent his childhood in the native Moldavian town and on the Ipotești farm. At the age of six he was sent to primary school, in Cernăuți, Bukovina, graduated, and attended secondary school for a while. He did not, however, finish his studies, but took to the road with various theatrical stock companies in which he served as prompter. His first published verse appeared in the Budapest Familia (The Family) in 1866. The editor of this periodical is responsible for the change of Iminovici's name to Eminescu, as more Rumanian sounding.

Eminescu went to the University of Vienna in 1869 to study philosophy. There he met other young Rumanian writers, and from there he mailed his lyric contributions to Convorbiri literare (Literary Conversations), the influential publication of the Jassy Junimea (Youth) society. Returning to his native country, he was helped by this society to continue his studies in Berlin and Jena. He came back once more to Jassy, and in 1874 was appointed director of the library in that city and inspector of schools in 1875. A year later he temporarily joined the newspaper Curierul de Iași (The Jassy Courier) and from 1877 to 1883 he lived in Bucharest as an editor of Timpul (Time), the official organ of the Conservative Party. During these years he wrote most of his poems. But in 1883, the first signs of insanity appeared, and after long, painful, and agonizing sufferings he died June 15, 1889, in a Bucharest asylum.

In 1883 Titu Maiorescu (q.v.) published most of Eminescu's poetical works in book form. This was followed by numerous editions, and some of his verse as well as his prose appeared posthumously. Eminescu's influence grew to the extent of absorbing generation after generation of writers as well as statesmen. His articles written during his editorship of the Bucharest and Jassy dailies, collected, commented upon, and published by admiring epigoni, became the credo of various political leaders; his hold on men of the newer ideologies was extraordinary. As a poet he is undoubtedly head and shoulders above all others in his land. He runs the gamut of passion and revolt. We behold his sweetheart passing a soothing hand over his stormy brow; Hyperion, the star, pleading with God to be made a man, for the sake of a woman; the conflict between emperor and proletarian in revolutionary Paris; small talk of small towns; the fairy tales and ancient lore of the mountains and valleys; the creation of the world. An innovator, a creator of enduring lyric monuments, Eminescu compares favorably with the great European romantic poets.

See: G. Călinescu, Viața lui Mihail Eminescu (1932).

L. F.

Engström, Albert (1869–1940, Swedish prose humorist and illustrator), was born in Lönneberga near Kalmar on the southwest coast of Sweden. He studied at Uppsala (1889–1891) and later at the art school of Göteborg under the celebrated master Carl Larsson. In 1897 he founded the humorous weekly Strix, after which he published a long succession of volumes consisting mainly of short stories about peasant and seafaring life. Outstanding among these are En bok (1905; A Book) and Bläck och saltvatten (1914; Ink and Salt Water). It came as a surprise to literary Sweden that Engström was finally elected to the Academy, but few choices have been more popular.

Engström is the nearest that Sweden has come to producing a Mark Twain. He delighted in rough characters, preferring the profane, hard-drinking, loud-laughing sailors of the old school. Old Skipper Isakson, first introduced on his deathbed, was destined to recover and become probably the most appreciated of his heroes. Like the American humorist, Albert Engström was fond of tall stories, the wilder and more extravagant the better. Like him too he enjoyed deflating famous historical personages. Few Swedish authors of importance have been deficient in humor, but Engström raised the national gift to the level of a new art. Many of his books were illustrated by himself, and few authors have been happier in this combination of the arts.

See: F. Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of O. Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919–1921), pp. 325–331; H. A. Larsen, ed., Sweden's Best Stories (1928).

C. W. S.

Erenburg, Ilya Grigoriyevich, see Ehrenburg.

Erlingsson, Þorsteinn (1858–1914, Icelandic poet and short-story writer), was born of well-to-do parents at Stóramörk, Rangárvallasýsla, Iceland. After a happy youth Erlingsson went to school in Reykjavík and then in Copenhagen, where he began by studying law at the university but ended by devoting his time to Icelandic studies and poetry. Here he contracted the tuberculosis of the lungs which finally was to prove fatal. On his return to Iceland, he eked out a meager living by journalism and private teaching.

In Copenhagen, Erlingsson was influenced not only by Brandes's (q.v.) realism, but also by the growing socialistic movement. He became an ardent socialist, an antimonarchist, and an intrepid attacker of church and clergy. His satire was as sharp as it was brilliantly executed; it proved very effective in demolishing the fundamentalism of the 19th-century Lutheran Church in Iceland. But Erlingsson was far more than a satirist. Fervent love and nature lyrics also came from his pen. He loved nature in its sunny summer garb, and he expressed his sympathy with birds and beasts not only in poems, but also in exquisite short stories cast in the form of oriental tales. Erlingsson was deeply interested in Icelandic folk poetry; he polished its chief vehicle, the quatrain (ferskeytla), to a degree of perfection attained only by the few masters of this form. A high degree of workmanship is characteristic of everything he wrote.

Erlingsson's volume of poems, Þyrnar (Thorns), was printed in three editions (1897, 1905, and posthumously, with many additions, in 1918). The poem Eiðurinn (1913; The Oath), on the same subject as The Virgin of Skalholt by Kamban (q.v.), and the animal tales, Málleysingjar (1928; The Dumb Ones), complete the list of his productions.

See: Erlingsson, Þyrnar (1918), ed. by S. Nordal, with an introduction by several authors.

S. E.

Ernst, Paul (1866–1933, German poet, essayist, and writer of fiction and drama), composed many hundred essays, several hundred short stories, six novels, and 23 works for the theatre (comedies, tragedies, historical dramas, and what he conceived as a new form and called "redemption drama" or "meta-tragedy"). He also produced Erdachte Gespräche (1921), two slender volumes of short poems, two epics, the more important of which is Das Kaiserbuch (6 vols., 1923–1928), and two volumes of autobiography, Jugenderinnerungen (1930) and Jünglingsjahre (1932), which are actually a comprehensive account of the economic, social, and political conditions and of the literary trends in the last three decades of the 19th century. He edited with critical prefaces some 50 works from German and other European literatures, in some cases supplying also the translation.

The author of this enormous output of prose and verse, fiction, drama, and criticism was born in Elbingerode and grew up at Clausthal in the stable economic and social conditions of the Harz Mountains, the son of upright parents in modestly comfortable circumstances. His father was a mine foreman possessing all the simple virtues characteristic of the old-fashioned skilled workman and official, to whom Paul Ernst has set up so fine and touching a monument in his Geschichten von deutscher Art (1928). The boy was an omnivorous reader. Destined for the ministry, he felt himself repelled by the modern theology professed at Göttingen and Tübingen and by the indifference of its propounders to the social problems and needs that confronted and horrified him in Berlin. He gave up theology for practical social action, writing both literary criticism and essays on economics, politics, and sociology, later editing the Social Democratic, i.e., Marxian, Berliner Volkstribüne and making political speeches.

The first of his published works is his essay Leo Tolstoy und der slawische Roman (1889). Significant in this essay is the respectful attention he devotes to Tolstoy's criticism and interpretation of the Gospels. Subscribing to Marxian economics, he wrote his doctoral dissertation on Die gesellschaftliche Reproduktion des Capitals bei gesteigerter Produktivität der Arbeit (Bern, 1892). Shortly after, he freed himself from his Marxian connections and at the end of the decade turned to creative literature, writing four one-act plays in the naturalistic manner. These satisfied neither the public nor the author. A trip to Italy in 1900 afforded him the necessary clarification of his reflections concerning the principles of art and the laws governing the various genres. There, in the classic forms, both literary and pictorial, he found the intention of poet and artist, and the means they employed, more congenial to his innate conservatism. Thereafter Paul Ernst was to combat naturalism in art as well as Marxism in all its manifestations (Der Weg zur Form, 1906; Ein Credo, 1912; Der Zusammenbruch des deutschen Idealismus, 1919; Der Zusammenbruch des Marxismus, 1919; Grundlagen der neuen Gesellschaft, 1930).

His political and artistic principles thus clarified, he began his important work as a mature man of 35 with a strong predilection for the drama (which to him was synonymous with tragedy) and a low regard for the novel.

Yet some of his novels (Der schmale Weg zum Glück, 1904; Der Schatz im Morgenbrotthal, 1926; Grün aus Trümmern, 1933; Das Glück von Lautenthal, 1933) found their way to the hearts of a public that remained cold to his dramas. Der schmale Weg zum Glück has passed through 10 editions. No comparable success greeted his Brunhild (1909), the perfect exemplification of his theory of tragedy, or his Ariadne (1912), written after he had received the "grace of faith in Jesus Christ" and had decided that tragedy and its essential pessimism must give way to a form "beyond tragedy," to "redemption drama." The same disappointing reception awaited Das Kaiserbuch, which he undertook after the First World War hoping by this panorama of the glorious medieval past to give courage to his defeated and despoiled nation. But the very length, 100,000 verses, precluded its becoming the familiar companion of his people. Moreover, Paul Ernst is in no sense what he most ardently aspired to be—a writer for the masses. Though he denied it persistently, he is essentially a thinker with a penchant for abstract thought. This does not detract from his Novellen, and here, in the short story of classic construction and brevity with its unexpected point and often two or three turns in as many pages, in this art for an intellectual élite which he brought back from Italy and cultivated for 30 years, he became the supreme master. In his Komödianten- und Spitzbubengeschichten (1920) the 16th-century Italian setting is so perfect that many Germans speak of the tales as translations. And his Geschichten von deutscher Art might more readily and more profitably become a German household book than the great Kaiserbuch with its heterodox ideas concerning good and evil.

Paul Ernst is, for all his excellent novels and stories, most stimulating as a critic in matters purely literary and technical. In matters religious and philosophical, subjects which occupied him constantly, his thought remains to the end confused and confusing because, though he was able to free himself from Marxism and naturalism, he was never able to free himself from the intellectual prison of subjectivity and modernism for which Lessing, Kant, the "higher critics," and Tolstoy contributed the foundation stones. However persistently he speaks of God, God is for him not a spirit both transcendent and immanent, not a reality—though also not Vaihinger's "necessary fiction"—but a necessary function of the human mind: "Gott ist kein Ding [an sich], sondern ein Vorgang" (God is no [ultimate] reality, but a process). However deep an experience his own very special "gift of faith in Jesus Christ" was, and it was a deep experience, it did not prevent his denying the historical Jesus of Nazareth. Upon so unstable a foundation and out of theses so un compelling it was impossible to build great drama or to fulfil as a positive force, except in the practical implications of his best novels and stories, the function of the poet as he conceived it—that of prophet and high priest of his people. But in his very limitations Paul Ernst remains the most significant writer of his day, for his self-contradictions constitute a reductio ad absurdum of nominalism and modernism, of post-Kantian philosophy and theosophy. More than any other contemporary German thinker outside the Church, Ernst points the way to the restoration of orthodox Christianity among the intelligentsia.

See: K. A. Kutzbach, "Von Paul Ernsts letzter Lebenszeit" and "Nachwort" (with bibliography), in Paul Ernst—Gedenkbuch (1933), pp. 25–28, 212–232; A. Potthoff, Paul Ernst (1935); J. F. Goodloe, "Zur Einführung in Paul Ernsts Werke und Weltanschauung," Monatshefte für deutschen Unterricht, XXXII (1940), 9–17.

J. F. G.

Ertel, Alexander Ivanovich (1855–1908, Russian novelist), was born near Voronezh, son of the manager of an estate. The boy was prepared for the Gymnasium, but his father refused to allow him to enter, and when he was 13 he was compelled to assist in his father's work. The family moved to the neighborhood of Usman, and there Alexander met a girl of a more cultured milieu and married her in 1875. She educated him and interested him in literature. In 1878 they moved to St. Petersburg to take charge of a library. Troubles accumulated. The library did not succeed; Ertel had a severe illness and was arrested because of some slight contact with revolutionary organizations and forced to settle in Tver (Kalinin). Here he separated from his wife and married a second time. Harassed by material needs, he was forced to take charge of various estates. He gradually gave up writing and died in 1908 after 10 years of silence.

His first important work, Zapiski stepnyaka (1890; Memoirs of a Man of the Steppes), was written under the influence of Turgenev (q.v.) and Gleb Uspenski. Then came Volkhonskaya baryshnya (1883; A Young Lady of Volkhonka) and Pyatikhiny deti (1884; The Children of Pyatikhin). Ertel gradually came under the influence of L. N. Tolstoy (q.v.) and reached the highest level of his achievement in Gardinins, ikh dvornya, priverzhentsy i vragi (1888; The Gardinins, Their House, Adherents, and Enemies). Later came Smena (1898; The Change). In spirit and methods of treatment Ertel was very close to the Russian Populists, but he believed instinctively, and also because of his knowledge of estate administration, in a more truthful and realistic approach to the peasant problems. He escaped largely from the direct following of Tolstoy by his increasing appreciation of Western culture. In his later years there was also a growing interest in the essence of religion that separated him from many of the Populists. Ertel was a keen observer of the reality of Russian peasant life, looking at it as one who had been reared in a rural environment; he treated less well the decaying gentry and had no reason for feeling that sense of personal guilt and obligation which marked many of his literary associates. Definitely a minor writer, he nevertheless composed in The Gardinins one of the best works of the period and won for his style the compliments of Tolstoy.

See: F. D. Batyushkov, "A. I. Ertel, po neizdannym dokumentam," Sobraniye sochineni, I (1909), 1–48; D. S. Mirsky, Contemporary Russian Literature (1926).

C. A. M.

Esenin, Sergei Aleksandrovich, see Yesenin.

Espina, Antonio (1894–, Spanish poet, novelist, and essayist), was born, studied, and has lived the major part of his life in Madrid, where he has been the editor of various important daily and weekly periodicals and a contributor to the reviews Pluma, España, Revista de Occidente, and Gaceta literaria. All of his books have been published in that city. These embrace a variety of genres: he started with verses in Umbrales (1918) and, after a prose interlude (Divagaciones, 1920), continued with the same genre in Signario (1923), which is his most characteristic book of poetry. Narrative writing is found in Pájaro pinto (1927), in which volume a story, "Xelfa, carne de cera," is outstanding and indispensable for an understanding of his work. The novel Luna de copas (1928) was followed by two of a biographical type, Luis Candelas (1930) and Romea, o el comediante (1935). He is seen as a short-story writer in Las siete virtudes (1931), a book prepared in collaboration with other writers. But the newspaper article, literary and political in nature and elevated very often to the category of the essay, has occupied the major part of Espina's attention. The best examples are to be found in Lo cómico contemporáneo (1927) and especially in El nuevo diantre (1934). He has made a translation of a work by Benjamin Constant, Adolfo (1924), and of a play by Crommelynck (q.v.), El estupendo cornudo (1926), later presented in Madrid. Some of his writings have been translated into various languages.

Espina says that "poetry is the really unexpressable. The nearer we approach what can actually be expressed, the greater danger there is—without our realizing it—of losing our way." Onís places Espina's poetry "in that stream which represents the total disintegration of modernism, the way for which was prepared by post-modernistic irony," although "his basic art transcends both the former and the latter." His work is characterized by great facility of creation in both verse and prose, the search for the unstable, an apparent puerility, voluntary contradictions, imaginative dissociation, whim, grimace, and caricature; all these qualities are presented in a universal post-war tone which is at the same time deeply Spanish. It has been pointed out that Espina is nearer to the "esperpento" (as created by Valle-Inclán, q.v.) than to the newly developed film art; this is another way of affirming that he is a national product rather than an expression of cosmopolitanism. His humor and jesting reveal living depths of sentiment. His literary criticism and political thought are entirely devoid of any meaningless use of word and image and arise from a deep and responsible appreciation of human values.

See: Gerardo Diego, Poesía española (Antología) (1934), pp. 265-274, 582; Federico de Onís, Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana (1934), pp. 1046-1052, 1194.

A. I.

Espina de Serna, Concha (1877-, Spanish novelist), was born and bred in Santander. The charming daughter of well-to-do parents, she was given the advantages of a good education and encouragement to develop her taste for writing. The first poems of her girlhood were published in the local newspaper. She married early and went with her husband to Chile. Soon her marriage proved to be a tragic mistake. Unhappy and in need of money, she began to write poems and articles for the Correo español of Buenos Aires and for other newspapers. After three years she returned to Spain, where first a volume of lyric poems, Mis flores (1904), was published, then a collection of short stories and articles, Trozos de la vida (1907), and her first novel, La niña de Luzmela (1909). In this story of a Cantabrian Cinderella, Concha Espina's distinctive contributions to the Spanish novel are already apparent—her sensitive interpretation of a woman's mind and heart and her intimate and realistic portrayal of the physical aspects and social customs of her native province. Since 1909 her fertile pen has produced more than 30 volumes, including 14 novels and a dozen collections of short stories as well as poems, essays, one drama (El jayón, 1918), and works of other genres. The country around Santander forms the background of the novels Despertar para morir (1910), Agua de nieve (1912; Eng. tr., The Woman and the Sea, 1934), La rosa de los vientos (1916), Dulce nombre (1921; Eng. tr., Red Beacon, 1924), Altar mayor (1926), and La flor de ayer (1934) and of many short stories. La esfinge maragata (1914; Eng. tr., Mariflor, 1924) tells of life in an isolated community in the province of León, a district so poor and barren that the men must go south to work through the winter, leaving the women to watch over house and land. This penetrating study of the effect upon women of such poverty and loneliness has become Concha Espina's best-known work.

During the 1920's Concha Espina traveled extensively in Spain, Central Europe, and the United States. The novels El metal de los muertos (1920), a sociological study of life in the Río Tinto mines, and El cáliz rojo (1923), an exposition of the problem of the Sephardic Jew in Germany, and the short stories in Tierras del aquilón (1924) and Copa de horizontes (1930) reflect this experience in their backgrounds. Two volumes of American reminiscences are entitled Singladuras (1932) and Alas y leguas. In 1936-1937, during the Spanish civil war, Concha Espina, whose sympathies were with the Falangists, lived in seclusion in her country home in Mascuerras (Luzmela) in territory held by the Loyalists. After the victory of General Franco's forces in the province, she published the diary she had kept during the months of her retirement, Esclavitud y libertad: Diario de una prisionera (1938), and some stories of the revolution, Retaguardia (imágenes de vivos y muertos) (1937), Luna roja (1939), and Princesas del martirio (1940).

See: R. Cansinos-Asséns, Literaturas del norte: La obra de Concha Espina (1924); E. A. Boyd, Studies from Ten Literatures (1925), pp. 128-136; Cuadernos de literatura contemporánea, No. 1 (1942).

E. H. H.

Estaunié, Edouard (1862-1943, French novelist), was born at Dijon in Burgundy. From early childhood he was brought up by his widowed mother—a woman of exceptional charm and intelligence—and an austere grandfather to whose rigid discipline the child readily submitted. He received his schooling at the hands of Jesuit masters, and it was the memory of his schooldays which suggested to him, in later years, the idea of his best-known novel, L'Empreinte (1896). In 1882 he was admitted to the Ecole Polytechnique to study engineering; he was subsequently appointed director of the Ecole d'Application de Télégraphie, a none too flourishing school of engineering in Paris. Here he was fortunate enough to secure the collaboration of such eminent men as Henri Poincaré and Pierre Curie, and very soon the school was infused with new life. Estaunié did other engineering work; during the First World War highly responsible work was entrusted to him, and his services were recognized by the French and the Belgian governments—he was made Commander of the Legion of Honor and received the medal of the Order of Léopold.

He hesitated for some time to let his interest in purely literary pursuits be known. It was the publisher Perrin who brought him before the public. He was from the outset, and remained to the end, what Thibaudet (q.v.) called le romancier de la douleur. He reminds one of Edouard Rod, who introduced him to the Revue des deux mondes; they have the same deep sympathy for all those who suffer their destiny without any morbid self-pity. Estaunié's first novel, Un Simple (1891), deals with exactly the same problem as the Pierre et Jean of Maupassant (q.v.). The two works were published within a few weeks of each other; Estaunié dedicated a later book of his, Le Ferment (1899), to Maupassant. In 1892 came a second novel, La Bonne Dame, and in 1896 L'Empreinte, in which Estaunié used his experience as a pupil of the Jesuits. His apparent thesis is that the education of the Jesuits, widespread in France, leaves so indelible an impression on the young souls of the pupils that they are never able to efface it. The novel was considered by some an attack on religious education; this impression Estaunié promptly corrected by the following novel, Le Ferment, in which he stressed the disadvantage of a purely rationalistic upbringing. The later novels and stories of Estaunié never aroused as much discussion, but were esteemed as keen analyses of the varied experiences of interesting and unhappy souls. The best known are L'Epave (1902); La Vie secrète (1909), which was awarded the Prix Femina; Les Choses voient (1913), the choses being three pieces of furniture abandoned in an attic which tell the stories of three generations; L'Ascension de Monsieur Baslevre (1919), on the ascent of a mediocre soul to a state of ardent spirituality; L'Appel de la route (1921), on the inevitableness of suffering. A characteristic story, "L'Infirmes aux mains de lumière," gave its title to a collection of shorter narratives (1923); another collection bears the title Le Silence dans la campagne (1924). In 1932 appeared Estaunié's last novel, Madame Clapain. He also wrote a study of his great Burgundian compatriot, Buffon (1924), and was a frequent contributor to such periodicals as the Revue des deux mondes, Revue de Paris, Grande Revue, and Revue bleue. He was elected to the French Academy in 1923, to succeed Alfred Capus (q.v.).

See: André Bellessort, "Un Grand Romancier contemporain," in Nouvelles Etudes (1923), pp. 236-264; John Charpentier, Estaunié, avec . . . un essai de bibliographie par Francis Ambrière (1932); Camille Cè, Regards sur l'œuvre d'Edouard Estaunié (1935); M. H. Ilsey, "Edouard Estaunié's Message," French Review, XVI (1942-1943), 461-471.

A. Sz.

Estonian literature. The few Estonians who could afford a university training in the 1820's and 1830's included two men who gave a new direction to Estonian letters for much of the 19th century. F. R. Faehlmann (1798-1850) interested himself in folklore and then, influenced by the success of Lönnrot's Kalevala (1835; collected poems about the heroic Kalev), he turned to the Finnish national epic poem based on oral traditions (the Estonian language is related to Finnish). After his death his friend F. R. Kreutzwald (1803-1882) finished the compilation of the Kalevipoeg (The Son of Kalev), published 1857-1861. A sense of continuity now stimulated national consciousness to dream of future counterparts of past glories, of a time when, as the poet said, "Kalev comes home to bring happiness to his people." Kreutzwald, although earning the reputation of being the "father of song," did not actually lead literary expression of the expanding national feeling towards great lyrical heights. But Lydia Koidula (1843-1886) achieved altogether admirable literary form in her passionate, triumphant, and poignant patriotic songs. For a short period after the death of Koidula the romantic historical novel was a prevailing genre.

The moods of the next generation were different and more various. Many wanted hard facts, not exalted feelings. The realistic or naturalistic novel, presenting social data in somber and simple language, met this desire. Eduard Vilde (1865–1933), the master of the new school, was realistic in his early novels and then sharply critical and revolutionary in his later fiction. A similar belligerent tendency prevailed in the short stories of Ernst Peterson (1868–) and in the earlier works of Anton H. Tammsaare (1878–1940) and Mait Metsanurk (1879–). Juhan Liiv (1864–1913) was the only poet among the realists.

Prose writers of a new school called Noor Eesti (Young Estonia) exemplified a great improvement in Estonian literary style, but the very nobility of their language kept them from attaining the popularity of the realistic novelists. Friedebert Tuglas (1886–), the greatest master of this new style, has published several volumes of short stories. Jaan Oksa (1884–1918) was perhaps the most cosmically inspired of this group. Young Estonia also brought about its own renaissance of Estonian lyrics. Gustav Suits (1883–) is a poet of great intensity of thought and an impressive poetical style. Villem Ridala (1885–) is mainly known as an author of nature poems. Ernst Enno (1875–1934) was a pioneer remaining for the most part outside the group.

In its turn also the Young Estonia movement did not go unchallenged. Its modernism was violently attacked by the above-named Eduard Vilde. And, during the First World War, a group of younger lyrical writers, taking up in their own way the modernist and individualist tendencies of Young Estonia, formed themselves into what was known as the Siuru group (Siuru is the name of a mythological bird). Rapturous sensualism gradually gave place to something more idealistic. Marie Under (1883–) has the greatest poetic talent of this group. Henrik Visnapuu (1890–), marked innovator in lyrics, has written nature, love, and patriotic songs and poems of variety and a remarkable ingenuity of form. Johannes Semper (1892–), beginning as a lyrical poet and translator of poetry, turned to literary criticism and in 1935 embarked as a novelist with a definite gift of style. August Gailit (1891–) is an author of fantastical novels. In 1926 A. H. Tammsaare, who has come to be regarded as the master of Estonian fiction, began the publication of his monumental novel Tõde ja õigus (Truth and Justice), a vast painting of the social life of Estonia from the last quarter of the 19th century down to the present day. He has been followed by many younger writers.

On the whole the realist revival continues to be dominant, and its representatives are gradually achieving a synthesis of objective description and artistic form. Mait Metsanurk has produced successful war novels; Oskar Luts (1887–) has maintained his position as the foremost Estonian humorist. A. Jakobson and A. Mälk are the most prominent writers among the younger realists. Of the younger poetical generation, J. Sütiste and E. Hiir deserve to be mentioned.

Estonian drama and comedy attained a high level in the works of August Kitzberg (1856–1927), who mostly treated rural subjects. Eduard Vilde wrote at least one drama and one comedy of high quality. A. H. Tammsaare offered in Judith (1921) one of the most original treatments of this favored theme, and Hugo Raudsepp (1883–), the wittiest of Estonian essayists, has revealed himself as the writer of comedies in which his humor successfully overshadows his castigating tendency.

See: O. Kallas, Die Wiederholungslieder der estnischen Volkspoesie (1901); M. Martna, L'Estonie (1920); M. Kampmaa, Eesti Kirjandusloo Peajooned, Vol. IV (1936); A. Pullerits, Eesti Kirjandusest (1937).

E. Ju.

Eulenberg, Herbert (1876–, German dramatist and short-story writer), was born in Mühlheim am Rhein near Cologne and has remained attached to his Rhenish home country all his life. As a young student he stepped into the arena of naturalism (see German naturalism) and whipped up its diminishing enthusiasm by a revival of the ideals of the "storm and stress" of Goethe's youth. Passion is his driving motive, the weird, the uncanny, the sensational, and the grotesque are the aim of his dramatic presentations. Anna Walewska (1899), a play with a sex motif involving father and daughter, is the most noteworthy product of his youth and typical of his life's work. Sensuality and sexuality are the themes he discusses in all their variations. In the first decade of the century he is one of the most productive stage writers in Germany and his work possibly the most frequently performed. Among his plays are Leidenschaft (1901), a dramatization of his favorite sex theme; Kassandra (1903); Ritter Blaubart (1905), a fairy play in the Strindberg manner; Simson (1910); Alles um Liebe (privately printed in 1910), a rather tragic comedy; Belinde (1912), awarded the Schiller prize; Die Insel (1919), a drama with a truly Shakespearean note. Sonderbare Geschichten (1910) is a collection of short stories in the style of the later romanticists, especially in the manner of E. T. A. Hoffmann. Generally speaking, all Eulenberg's prose writings up to the First World War show these same tendencies. Actual post-war conditions are described in Der Bankrott Europas (1922) and Die Hohenzollern (1928; Eng. tr., The Hohenzollerns, 1929). His most recent writings, such as Pankraz, der Schmoller (1938), indicate a leaning towards the biographical presentation.

A. Bu.

Euringer, Richard (1891–, German novelist and lyric poet), was born at Augsburg, Bavaria. School and the study of music were followed by military service in 1913. He served as an airplane pilot in the First World War and in 1917 became the head of a Bavarian pilot-training school. After the war he resumed his studies, but soon had to give them up for want of funds, and for some time he tried to make a living as a worker in a saw-mill and as an office boy in a bank. During the years of the Weimar Republic, Euringer was a herald and champion of the coming Third Reich; in 1933 he was rewarded for his loyalty to Hitler by being appointed chief librarian of the public library of Essen, without having been professionally trained for library work. He retired in 1936 to a small town in Lippe and since that date has given his time over to writing.

Upon his return from the First World War, Euringer had begun pouring out plays, stories, and visionary verses. Eventually he succeeded in producing one of the better war novels, Fliegerschule 4 (1929), showing the positive side of the war as well as its tragedy. This novel belongs to those war tales that stress the common adventures of a group of soldiers, here of pilots. Later Euringer took up the problem of unemployment in a novel entitled Die Arbeitslosen (1930), but tendentious theories are far too predominant. The same can be said of his historical novel Die Fürsten fallen (1935), which pictures the collapse of the old European monarchies between 1793 and 1886, a period of European history which he calls "one hundred years of anarchy." Euringer's lyrics (Die Gedichte, 1937) come from a world entirely lacking the classical severity of George's or Rilke's (qq.v.) verses; they are original, frequently obscure, at times full of life. His outstanding success was Deutsche Passion (1933), a radio play in which he revived some of the traits of the medieval mysteries. For this work he was awarded the first national state prize of the Third Reich.

See: F. Lennartz, Die Dichter unserer Zeit (1938), pp. 73–75.

H. Sch.

Evreinov, Nikolai Nikolayevich, see Yevreinov.

F

Faeroese literature. In the isolation of the Atlantic the people of the small, rugged Faeroe Islands have preserved not only a dialect, Faeroese, which is closer to Old Norse than any modern language except Icelandic, but also a unique ballad literature, dating from the 13th century. This is the literary expression of their folk dancing (ring dance), from which a renaissance of folk dancing has spread in Scandinavia in recent times. Considering the smallness of the population (approximately 25,000) literary interest and activity have been great.

Up to the late 18th century the ballads were preserved orally only, and nothing was printed until the 19th. Then Venceslaus Ulricus Hammershaimb (1819–1909) virtually created the Faeroese written language with his grammar (1854) and his editions of ballads and folk tales, of which Færøsk Anthologi (1884–1891) is the best. His work was carried on by the linguist and folklorist Jakob Jakobsen (1864–1918), whose chief works are Færøiske Folkesagn og Æventyr (1898–1901; Faeroese Folk Tales and Märchen) and An Etymological Dictionary of the Norn Language in Shetland (2 vols., 1928–1932).

The modern poetry is, as might be expected, predominantly lyric, with a strong strain of the old ballads. Of the modern poets the brothers Jens Hendrik Oliver Djurhuus (1881–) and Hans Andreas Djurhuus (1883–) are perhaps most prominent, the first for his Yrkingar (1914; Poems), the second for several volumes of poetry, two plays, and two novels. Even better beloved by his fellow countrymen is the ardent patriot and political leader Jóhannes Patursson (1866–). He has a volume of poems (Yrkingar, 1932) to his credit. Of the prose writers Heðin Brú (pseud. of Hans Jacob Jakobsen, 1901–) has written fine novels (Lognbrd, 1930, Mirage; Fastatökur, 1936, Firm Grip) in Faeroese itself, while William Heinesen (1900–) and Jörgen Frantz Jakobsen (1901–1937) have written in Danish for a wider public. Heinesen's novel Nóatún (1938) was well received, and Jakobsen's Barbara (1939), published after the author's death, became a best seller in Denmark.

See: A. Sigmundsson, "Tunga og bókmenntir Færeyinga," Skinfaxi, XXIV (1933), 100-114; E. Krenn, Die Entwicklung der feroerischen Literatur (1940).

S. E.

Faguet, Emile (1847-1916, French critic), was born at La Roche-sur-Yon. After attendance at the Ecole Normale Supérieure, he spent a superficially tranquil life, teaching first at La Rochelle and Bordeaux, then at the Sorbonne, and producing a steady flow of books and articles (he averaged over a book a year for a period of 30 years) which won him both distinction and popularity. He succeeded Jules Lemaître (q.v.) as dramatic critic on the Journal des débats in 1896 and in 1901 was elected to the French Academy.

As a critic Faguet occupied a middle ground between the classicism of Brunetière (q.v.) and the impressionism of Lemaître or Anatole France (q.v.). Though not without standards, his criticism did not attempt primarily to distribute rewards and punishments. Books were interesting to him chiefly for what they revealed of an author's character or ideas, and to make the reader join him in apprehending this revelation was the object of his work. Strong in logic, deft in analysis and synthesis, he succeeded best in writing of those men in whom the rational intellect prevailed; weaker in aesthetic sense, he sometimes did badly with poets who were merely poets. He lacked, or rarely showed, the gift of presenting a large picture, the growth or decline through several generations of a literary type or a mode of thought; his chief works of purely literary criticism, Seizième Siècle (1894), Dix-septième Siècle (1885), Dix-huitième Siècle (1890), and Dix-neuvième Siècle (1887), are hardly more than a series of individual studies, given a larger unity only by the covers of a book. As he grew older, Faguet's interest turned almost exclusively to the problems of his own day, which he presented in such books as L'Anticléricalisme (1906), Le Socialisme (1907), and Le Féminisme (1910) with his habitual adroitness and precision in grasping and expounding the ideas of others, but without reaching any notable conclusions. His final work, Jean-Jacques Rousseau (5 vols., 1911-1913), is an amazing pendant, both in size and in fertility of ideas, to a life so full of literary activity.

There is hardly a great French writer whom Faguet has not analyzed, always with interest, generally with keen intelligence. In particular his championing of the 17th century as against the 18th led to a new interest in the earlier period and, in the minds of many readers, to a wholesome revision of judgment. Perhaps, on the whole, his greatest merit is the fact that, in a period in which criticism seemed likely to be dominated overmuch by the minutiae of historical scholarship on the one hand and the sweeping vistas of the sociologist on the other, he covered erudition with grace and insisted that a proper primary emphasis be put upon the individual writer and his work.

See: Victor Giraud, Les Maîtres de l'heure (1911); Alexandre Bélis, La Critique française à la fin du XIXe siècle (1926).

C. W., Jr.

Fagus (pseud. of Georges Eugène Faillet, 1872-1933, French poet), was born in Brussels, the son of a Frenchman who had been exiled after the Commune in 1871. The family returned to Paris after the amnesty of 1880. As a youth Fagus was, like his father, a radical, but later became reconciled to the republic and for some time earned his living as an official at the Prefecture of the Seine; he finally turned into a decided reactionary, a fanatic royalist, and an ardent Catholic. Indifferent to recognition by the general public, he remained, until his death in an accident, un isolé. He belongs to the generation of the symbolists (see French symbolism), who not infrequently could be called bohemians in their writings and gentlemen in their tastes and their way of living. Hostile to all that savored of vulgarity, he insisted on decency in behavior and manners; his language was that of a purist. As an artist he belongs to the family of the Villons, with such writers as Mathurin Régnier, Gérard de Nerval, and Verlaine (q.v.), and Gautier would no doubt have added his name to the list of his Grotesques.

The titles of his collections of poetry together with the dates of publication are in themselves somewhat revelatory of his evolution towards an ever more orthodox philosophy and creed: Colloque sentimental entre Emile Zola et Fagus; poèmes (1898); Fagus: Testament de sa vie, recueilli et expurgé (1898); Ixion; poème (1903); Jeunes Fleurs; exercices poétiques (1906); Frère Tranquille; dialogue entre la raison et le spectre de la mort (1918); La Danse macabre (1920); La Prière de 40 heures, ou les 14 Stations sous l'horloge du destin (1920; republished in La Guirlande à l'épousée, 1921); Les Ephémères (1925); Le Sacre des Innocents; poèmes (1927); Ballade de Saint Côme offerte à M. Aug.

Fournier pour tout l'Hôtel-Dieu et les autres hospitaliers (1927). In 1908 was published a small volume, Aphorismes, and in 1926 Clavecin, comments on the art of writing. As a scholar he translated Vergil's Eclogues (1929) and the Chanson de Roland (1929). He was a contributor to numerous periodicals and for a time, after 1925, wrote "Chroniques" for the Événement.

See: H. Martineau, "Fagus," Divan, XVII (No. 100, May, 1925), 195-312; Adolphe van Bever and Paul Léautaud, Poètes d'aujourd'hui (1929).

A. Sz.

Falkberget, Johan (1879-, Norwegian novelist), was born near the small mining town of Röros. Among his forbears on both sides were people who had come from Sweden. They were peasant miners, and the boy began work in the mines when he was only eight years old. It was hard, rough toil in sordid, brutal surroundings, but redeemed by the austere beauty of nature on the treeless mountain plateau. Johan was only 16 when his first stories were published in a local paper. After he had definitely left the mines, he served a short time as editor of a labor paper and then went to Christiania to try his luck as an author. After many rebuffs he placed his first book, Svarte fjelde (1907; Black Mountains). It dealt with a remarkable subject matter quite new to Norwegian literature and revealed a narrative gift that has made Falkberget one of the most popular authors in his homeland. Outstanding among his earlier books is Lisbet paa Jarnfjeld (1915; Eng. tr., Lisbeth of Jarnfjeld, 1930), the story of a woman from the high mountains who marries a man from the lowlands and can never tame her wild nature to pull together with him.

In 1922 Falkberget returned to his home to take over the small farm his father had cleared on the edge of Rugelsjøen. There he lived, writing, studying his background in archives and in present-day life till he had thoroughly mastered it, and identifying himself closely with the people. With Den fjerde nattevagt (1923; The Fourth Night Watch) he began writing historical novels, at which he was to excel. The central figure is a clergyman of the early 19th century who comes to the mining community full of a desire to dominate, but who learns charity and humility. The great trilogy Christianus Sextus (1927-1935), placed in the 18th century, is the story of the mine of that name and a monument to the simple, hard-working people. In 1940 Falkberget fled before the invading Germans and walked across the plateau to Sweden carrying the manuscript of his latest book, Nattens brød (1940; Night Bread.) In this book he takes the story of the mine back to its beginning in the 17th century.

Falkberget's understanding of the life of the poor, their toil and hardships down through the centuries, is deep and genuine, but his work is free from the gospel of hate. In hatred he sees only a negative, corrosive influence. Regeneration must come from work and from love based on Christian faith.

See: T. Freding, "Johan Falkberget," American-Scandinavian Review, XXI (1933), 401-406; A. H. Winsnes, Norges litteratur fra februarrevolutionen til verdenskrigen, part 2, pp. 561-571, Vol. V (1937) of F. Bull, F. Paasche, and A. H. Winsnes, Norsk litteraturhistorie.

H. A. L.

Fallström, Daniel (1858-1937, Swedish poet), was born at Gävle, in central Sweden. He began his career as a journalist, and brought out his first volume of lyrics, Stockholm och skärgården (Stockholm and the Coast), in 1881. This book was followed by many others, both of verse and of short stories. There is little originality in the poetry of Fallström. He was neither a thinker nor a pioneer in any way. And yet few poets below the highest rank have had a wider audience in Sweden. A natural singer, he had something of Snoilsky's (q.v.) freshness and joy of life. Love songs and pictures of Stockholm, the sea, and the country poured from his pen in melodious abundance, never impressive but seldom insipid. Facile, with neither the firm classic touch of Snoilsky nor the intensity of Fröding (q.v.), Fallström is still far from negligible. He was a sort of Swedish Whittier; at all events he was a poet who, like Whittier, found a sure path to the hearts of his people.

See: K. Warburg, Svensk litteraturhistoria i sammandrag (1911); C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930).

C. W. S.

Fargue, Léon Paul (1878-, French poet), born in Paris, made his début in symbolist circles (see French symbolism) and attended Mallarmé's (q.v.) receptions. One of his first poems, Tancrede (1894), was a characteristic symbolist confession, showing the influence of both La Bruyère and Gide (q.v.); it dramatized the plight of the young man as an artist.

Fargue was a frequent contributor to such magazines as Mesures and the Nouvelle Revue française. It was not until 1912 that a collection of his works, called simply Poèmes, was published. Their appearance passed almost unnoticed; they were read only by a select circle of admirers—on whom, indeed, they exerted a strong influence. Though somewhat reminiscent of Rimbaud (q.v.) in their imagery, they differ entirely in psychological background. After a second long period during which nothing of Fargue was published there appeared, in 1921, Espaces and Sous la lampe. Espaces includes "Vulture," with its fantastic visions, and "Epaisseurs," the name of which suggests the density of the matter through which dreams must penetrate to attain being. Sous la lampe comprises "Banalité," a title indicative of the fund of experience from which the poet draws his inspiration, and "Suite familière," a summary of his artistic theories. In 1932 appeared Fargue's D'après Paris, in which factual accounts mingle with the dreams, the nightmares, the fantasies, invented in the course of his wanderings through the sleeping city: "J'ai bu le lait divin que versent les nuits blanches."

Basically Fargue is an escapist; he finds a remedy for his sorrow in the dreams that haunt him: "J'ai tant rêvé, j'ai tant rêvé que je ne suis plus ici." His special domain is the visionary penumbra where life is more enjoyable than in hard reality. Through lyrical daydreams pass memories of his childhood, glimpses of ephemeral happiness, short, poignant scenes imbued with a sense of melancholy. He is irrevocably alone. Solitude, death, the tragic inanity of life, darkness and its nightmares, the plight of soul and body, constitute the major themes of these verbal symphonies. Some of Fargue's poems are rhythmic and sensitive in the manner of Chopin's études. Others, while finely attuned to every poetic nuance, have a certain firmness which presages Romain (q.v.) or a quality which recalls the melancholic yet smiling nonchalance of a lied.

Most of Fargue's work is in prose, but it has little in common with what are generically called prose poems; it is so personal and rich that only the word poetry can properly describe it. A great experimenter with words, images, and sounds, Fargue is one of the links between symbolism and surrealism (see Breton, André).

See: Régis Michaud, Modern Thought and Literature in France (1934); René Lalou, Histoire de la littérature française contemporaine, enlarged ed., Vol. II (1940).

P. B.

Farina, Salvatore (1846–1918, Italian novelist), was born in Sardinia, but spent most of his life in Milan. He studied law at Pavia and Turin, but the publication of his first novel, Cuore e blasone (1864), at a very early age started him on a literary career to which subsequently he dedicated all his attention and energy. Farina wrote with great facility and has some 70 titles to his credit. It may be said that they are on much the same plane; almost any novel or, indeed, short story will give the measure of the artist. The best known however are Il Romanzo di un vedovo (1871), Mio Figlio! (originally appearing in the Nuova Antologia as a series of episodes, 1877–1881), Amore ha cent'occhi (1883), and Amore bugiardo (1893). Farina has a conventional outlook on life; his plots are based on the simple emotional problems of the Piccola borghesia. He presents characters that are easily recognizable without necessarily being "types," devoid of psychological complications and treated with sympathy sometimes verging on sentimentalism. It is fair to add that he possesses also a playful irony that keeps the sentimental tendency within bounds and gives to his work a coloring of humor that has made some critics mention Dickens by way of comparison. It is not a comparison that will stand analysis; more revealing of Farina's tone is the fact that his books were very popular in Germany during the later years of the past century. He is not in the least profound, but he is no fool either; his attitude toward life is sane and healthy, and the characters he depicts are always credible. He took no part in the verismo controversy; schools and literary camps meant nothing to him. His style is charming; he had a respect for good Tuscan without letting it prevent the frequent use of picturesque regional phraseology. Not a great author, Farina is none the less an honest and accomplished craftsman, and his novels bear rereading today.

See: B. Croce, Critica, IV (1906), 186–192, VI (1908), 410–411, IX (1911), 340, XII (1914), 282, and La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 2d ed., I (1921), 192–199; Farina, La Mia Giornata (3 vols., 1910–1915), his memoirs; L. Russo, I Narratori (1923), pp. 47–48; V. Dendi, Un Romanziere dimenticato, Salvatore Farina (1921).

T. G. B.

Faure, Elie (1873–1937, French essayist and art critic), was born at Sainte-Foy-la-Grande in the province of Gascony, the country of Montaigne, Montesquieu, and Gobineau; in one of his books, Les Trois Gouttes de sang (1929), he has shrewdly analyzed the ethnic and psychological originality of that region of southwestern France. His father was of peasant stock; his mother came from a well-known Protestant family, the Reclus, and several of his maternal uncles were doctors or geographers. Elie Faure soon revolted against his education and the Protestant environment, to which he owed little except—and the exceptions are notable—an indomitable passion for truth, an austere refusal to compromise, an obstinate independence of character. He studied medicine in Paris, practiced some branches of it all his life, and served as a doctor during the First World War. His main interest, however, was in art and philosophy. The chief formative influences were for him Montaigne, Spinoza, Lamarck, Michelet, Gobineau (q.v.), and Nietzsche (q.v.); to these should be added the names of the innumerable artists whom he admired, first in the Louvre museum and in the medieval cathedrals, then in Italy, in Spain, and in Asia. Elie Faure's best-known work is his Histoire de l'art, in four volumes (1909; revised ed., 1920; Eng. tr., 1921–1924), to which he added in 1926 a fifth volume, on his own theories, L'Esprit des formes (Eng. tr., 1930). Scholars and specialists primarily attached to factual objectivity and historical method have often criticized this ambitious work; it is rich in dangerous but pregnant generalizations, dazzling by its piercing intuitions, and always thought provoking. The same original combination of profundity and occasional superficiality, of immense knowledge and of lyrical exaltation, characterizes the other volumes of art criticism written by Elie Faure (Velasquez, 1903; Derain, 1923; Cézanne, 1923; The Italian Renaissance, 1929, published in English; Corot, 1931; Ombres solides, 1934).

It is possible that future readers will rank higher among Faure's works his volumes of philosophical meditations, La Danse sur le feu et l'eau (1920; Eng. tr., The Dance over Fire and Water, 1926), Napoléon (1921; Eng. tr., 1924), Montaigne et ses trois premiers-nés (1926), and, above all, Les Constructeurs (1914; revised ed., 1921), one of the finest works of critical and personal interpretation of the present century. Toward the end of his life Faure undertook a trip around the world. On his return three volumes appeared, Mon Périple, Découverte de l'archipel, D'autres terres en vue, all in 1932, which constitute a genial achievement in that most difficult of all genres, the analysis of the souls of the various peoples and races in the world. The acute and lyrical interpretation of Asia and, to a lesser extent, the pages on North America have been especially admired. Faure's message, through its apocalyptic and at times florid style, through its rejection of bourgeois morality and of spiritual inertia, has antagonized many critics, professors, and snobs. No contemporary French writer has proved more consistently scornful of academic and worldly honors. With Nietzschean fervor, but with more humility than the German thinker, Faure has sung lyrical hymns to adventure and the life of danger, even to wars and revolutions, to a tragic conception of life which honors above all men the hero and the saint. The fame of this courageous and generous prophet is probably destined to rise higher, as posterity recognizes his lucid insight and his fearless faith.

See: "Hommage à Elie Faure" (by several eminent French writers and artists in a special number), Europe, December 15, 1937.

H. P.

Federer, Heinrich (1866–1928, Swiss novelist), born in Brienz, was for many years the most popular writer in Switzerland. That a Catholic author—Federer was an ordained priest—could attain such a position is evidence of the conciliatory spirit of his work and of the willingness, on the part of the Protestants, to acknowledge its humane qualities. In Federer, Catholic Swiss literature, which had long been relegated to a secondary role, reached a place equal to that occupied by Protestant writing, falling in line with and strengthening the national tradition of tolerance.

Though all his novels and stories draw extensively on Catholic life and customs, they are nevertheless predominantly Swiss in character, so much so that Federer can be said to typify the high standards of Swiss literary craftsmanship, for a number of reasons. He makes his literary occupation to a marked degree a means for pedagogical intentions, for preaching Christian ethics and explaining their application to everyday life. This pedagogical aim Federer attains by the simple expedient of keeping in close touch with such practical problems as the bringing up of children, the political affairs of small communities, the relationship between husband and wife, and by imperceptibly blending his advice into the epic movement of events, without pedantry or dullness. The favorite milieu out of which he fashions his stories is that of the lower middle classes, preferably the inhabitants of mountain districts where he spent many years. Berge und Menschen (1911), Jungfer Therese (1913), Das Mätteli- seppi (1916), are among the best regional novels Switzerland can show—and there is no dearth in this particular species. An occasional journey into foreign fields, such as Sisto e Sesto (1913) and Patria (1917), is likewise in the best Swiss tradition, opening as it does a window upon the wider world. Whether it be the Italian scene or his native mountains, Federer always apprehends the outside world with an almost sensuous delight, a Wirklichkeitsfreude, characteristic of Swiss literature. Federer's style makes ample use of the Swiss prerogative of spicing German literary diction with ingredients from native dialects. This is of course a process which requires good judgment as to the degree to which the interspersion with local expressions may be carried, without discouraging the non-Swiss German reader. Federer, to judge by his enthusiastic reception in Germany, was able to infuse new blood into a language which, during the second half of the last century, suffered considerably through pollution by stilted official proclamations, sloppy journalism, and a colorless commercial jargon.

See: F. Wagner, Heinrich Federer; der Mann und das Werk (1931); O. Floeck, Heinrich Federer; Leben und Werk (1938).

H. B.

Fedin, Konstantin Aleksandrovich (1892–, Russian novelist), comes of a lower-middle-class family. He traveled extensively in Western Europe, served in the Red army, and has been publishing since 1913. His early stories, like Gorky's (q.v.) first novels, deal extensively with the narrowness and insipidity of middle-class life, but show scant originality. His first major success came with the novel Goroda i gody (1924; Cities and Years), in which he developed the theme of culture and the Revolution. Here, though the canvas is broad, including pre-1914 society, the First World War, and the Revolution itself, with scenes in both Germany and Russia, the emphasis is in some degree misleading, since the intellectuals are overweighted and too little attention is given either to the upper middle class or to the masses. The essence of the novel derives from one man's struggle against society: Fedin's hero, an intellectual, unable to reconcile himself with the proletarian revolution, perishes. Soviet critics attribute the weak aspects of the novel to Fedin's personal affinity with this hero, though its rich and figured style, coupled with an appreciably affected language, lends it considerable charm. The hero's psychology is not, however, highly plausible, and the sequence of events is irrationally confused. From the standpoint of socialist realism, the individualistic tendencies exhibited both here and in Fedin's next novel, Bratya (1928; Brothers), have also been subjected to some criticism. In the latter novel Fedin discusses the irreconcilability of art and life and endeavors to justify the individualism of his hero, the composer Karev. In Transvaal (1928), attacking the official agrarian policy, Fedin even went so far as to idealize the unpopular kulak, or prosperous peasant, against whom the subsequent collectivization program was directed. These fictional works brought Fedin some unpopularity, and it was not until 1930 that he produced another story, entitled Starik (The Old Man). A pronounced change in his approach to revolutionary reality was later signaled by his novel Pokhishchenie Yevropy (1934; The Rape of Europe). In this, Europe, shaken by crisis, is unfavorably contrasted with the progressive Soviet Union, so that the proletariat, in its new function of leadership is, so to speak, running away with the decadent middle-class continent. The novel is also celebrated for its description of unemployment in the capitalist countries. While Fedin can hardly be regarded as a leading talent, he is distinguished by unusual ability in plot development and by an effective style.

See: G. Reavey and M. Slonim, Soviet Literature; an Anthology (1934), pp. 144–163; G. Struve, 25 Years of Soviet Russian Literature (1944), pp. 33–42, 265–269.

S. H. C.

Feijó, António Joaquim de Castro (1862–1917, Portuguese poet), was Portugal's last Parnasian of rank. He was born in the northern town of Ponte de Lima, home of the "singer of the clear, gentle, haunting river Lima," Diogo Bernardes, whom he counted among his forebears. After studies at Coimbra (1877–1883) Feijó entered the Foreign Service and was sent to Brazil in 1886. In 1891 he went to Stockholm, remaining there, much to his regret, until his death.

Antero de Quental's (q.v.) influence predominates in the melancholy attempts at "understanding the modern scientific truths" which Feijó recorded poetically in his first sizable book, Transfigurações (1882; Transfigurations). For a time the ironical aesthete and suave diplomat forgot Antero's desperate pessimism in a Parnassian cult of impeccable form and a huge appetite for refined pleasures. In Líricas e bucólicas (1884; Lyrics and Bucolics) he thus presents a motley of musical impressions, morbid thoughts, and stanzas as sweet and gentle as folk songs. With other aesthetes of Europe he then turned away from the machine age to the purer art of the Orient and retranslated Judith Gautier's Livre de jade into a musical Portuguese of gemlike perfection, giving it the title Cancioneiro chinês (1890; 2d ed., improved and enlarged, 1903; Chinese Song-book). Bailatas (1907; Little Jumps) shows him as a master in the gentle art of irony, which turns once more to gloom in his last poems, posthumously published as Sol de inverno (1922; Winter Sun).

See: J. H. Stabler, tr., Songs of Li-Tai-Pé from the Cancioneiro chinês of António Castro Feijó (1922); Francisco Queiroz, António Feijó e os poetas contemporâneos de Ribeiro Lima (1932); Luiz de Magalhães and Alberto d'Oliveira, essays in Feijó, Poesias completas (1939?), pp. 297-341.

G. M. M.

Fernández Almagro, Melchor (1895-, Spanish critic), was born in Granada. There he lived the first 20 years of his life, studied law at the university, and began his literary activities in the local newspapers. He finished studies for the doctorate in law in 1913 at Madrid, where he has since lived. In 1921 he became a member of the editorial staff of the conservative paper Epoca. More recently he has written, mainly as a dramatic critic, for Voz, Sol, and several other papers. His main books are Vida y obra de Angel Ganivet (1925); Orígenes del régimen constitucional en España (1928); Historia del reinado de don Alfonso XIII (1933), completed recently with Historia de la República española (1931-1936) (1940); and Jovellanos: Antología, selección y prólogo (1940). To several reviews he has contributed literary studies on such figures as Valle Inclán, García Lorca, and Miró (qq.v.). All his critical works are distinguished by a sense of objectivity, a wealth of significant details, and a keen perception of cultural and literary values.

A. del R.

Fernández Flórez, Wenceslao (Spanish journalist and novelist), was born, if the literary historian Cejador be correct, in La Coruña in the extreme northwest of Spain. The date of his birth is not forthcoming. One of the several writers of Galician origin looming large on the contemporary Spanish literary horizon, Fernández Flórez cultivated the field of journalistic literature first in his native province, later in Madrid.

In Volvoreta (1917), which was awarded a prize by the Circle of Fine Arts of Madrid, the theme is developed by the author with a degree of tenderness and lyricism rarely attained afterward. It shows the trusting male deceived by an altogether unscrupulous daughter of Eve, whose nickname (volvoreta = butterfly) the antihero's mother rightly suspects to be indicative of frivolity. Attractive scenes of the damp Galician countryside and of its inhabitants add to the harmony of the effect. Ha entrado un ladrón (ca. 1920) tells less artistically the same tale of disappointed love in the prosier atmosphere of middle-class Madrid. Jacinto Remesal excites less pity and greater scorn than did the well-studied adolescent, Sergio, of the earlier novel. The material of Las acotaciones de un oyente (1916), of Las gafas del diablo (1918), which merited a prize from the Royal Spanish Academy, and of El espejo irónico (1921) was originally contributed to the conservative Madrid newspaper, ABC. The value of these humorous journalistic glimpses of modern Spanish society, however fairly observed, was largely ephemeral. This was justly recognized by their author in the preparation of later editions. The statement of Fernández Flórez that his shorter novels have cost him as much effort as the longer is readily applicable to Silencio (1918), an account of the progressive annulment of conscience, of personality, through alcoholism. With its unsmiling humor and excision of irrelevant matter, the unity of this novelette is a positive achievement. El calor de la hoguera (Apuntes para la historia de un pueblo español durante la guerra europea), which constitutes the final selection in the volume Silencio, is utilized to form in part the novel Los que no fuimos a la guerra (1930). In these pictures of contemporary customs Fernández Flórez paints with light but revealing strokes the venal publisher, patriots searching for a German spy, the supposed volunteer who is shortly discovered enjoying the sporting life in Madrid, and, above all others, Don Arístides, the zealous boy-scout leader. He who has considered the recent feminine industrial worker will perhaps stifle a yawn at Fernández Flórez's concluding observation that the First World War produced a new race of women. The philosophical novels El secreto de Barba Azul (1923) and Las siete columnas (1926) probably represent the high point of their author's satirical art. The thesis of the former, an unusually episodic narrative, is that Bluebeard's forbidden chamber was empty, i.e., that human life has no purpose whatsoever. A remedy, thinks Wladimiro Kull, would be to attract the attention of the gods by collective suicide. Las siete columnas, another prize winner, is a more cohesive work, done into English by Sir Peter Chalmers Mitchell (The Seven Pillars, 1934). It presents and develops the engaging notion that the social edifice, civilization, progress, all are supported by the seven pillars which are the deadly sins. When the columns collapse through a pact entered upon by the Devil and the hermit Acracio Pérez, devastation sweeps the world so thoroughly that Acracio himself joins the procession demanding the restoration of wickedness in its several forms. Among representative works of the not unprolific Fernández Flórez, one of the most recent is La novela número 13 (1941), so titled, says the author, because it is his 13th novel. (The first one, La tristeza de la paz, was published in 1910.) An ostensible account of the adventures of an English detective in Spain, La novela número 13 serves as a vehicle for altogether unflattering pictures of the Marxist aspects of the republican government. Detective Ring's search for the thoroughbred race horse Wotan ends with the discovery that he himself has consumed part of the animal, meat being scarce in Barcelona. If he is intended to be in any way symbolic, Ring's English tenacity appears more praiseworthy than his perspicacity. It is appropriate at this point to recall that a little earlier Fernández Flórez had printed Una isla en el Mar Rojo, a bitter commentary on Spanish civil warfare as seen from the vantage point of an embassy.

The least acute reader of Fernández Flórez will at once be aware that this is an ironically humorous writer. The irony has not, however, as Chalmers Mitchell says, the "suavity of Anatole France [q.v.] nor the bitter pathology of Octave Mirbeau [q.v.]. It is life seen through the hard and positive eyes of a Spaniard and even the humor is grim." Fernández Flórez has tried his hand particularly at the journalistic essay, the short story, the short novel, the novel of regulation length, psychological, philosophical, and, especially, frivolous. Within the limits of one work several tendencies are in conflict—the "ironic temper;" the partiality for pathetic incidents (in Volvoreta the tubercular children of Doña María de Solís die one by one before her eyes); the periodic insertion, in the tradition of the older Spanish novel, of extraneous anecdotes within the bigger framework; the fondness, grown to disturbing proportions in La novela número 13, of the author's characters for prolix discourses on problems of human behavior (thus the detective airs his views on nudism and Valdés finds the continuity of human existence in man's desire for trade). In short, the reader may come to feel that a simpler, less diffuse and less varying formula would leave a more lasting flavor, a deeper impression of the obvious inventive talents and satiric powers of Fernández Flórez.

See: J. Casares, Crítica efímera, II (1919), 87-101, 181-187; R. Cansinos-Asséns, La evolución de la novela, 1917-1927, Vol. IV (1927) of La nueva literatura, pp. 139-149.

R. K. S.

Fernández y González, Manuel (1821-1888, Spanish novelist), is known as the Spanish Dumas. He had something of the charm and verve of his native Seville and the curse of uncontrollable fluency. He wrote long and short poems, modeled on those of Zorrilla, but his principal works were novels, of which he produced the astounding number of 300. Since many are long, they fill about 500 volumes. Throughout all of them the reader may normally expect at least one thrill per page. As in the case of the Dumas productions, many of the works of Fernández y González appeared in newspapers, and the voluble Andalusian had no difficulty in dictating the required number of thousands of words per day. Relatively few of the novels are sentimental social works of the Eugène Sue type. Most are based at least distantly on Spanish history and legend, which the author truly loved, especially of the medieval period and the golden age. Examples are Los siete Infantes de Lara (1853); Obispo, casado y rey (1865), on Ramiro the Monk, king of Aragon; Men Rodríguez de Sanabria (1853), on the times of Peter the Cruel; El pastelero de Madrigal (1862), on the famous impostor who claimed to be King Sebastian of Portugal; and El conde-duque de Olivares (1868). La historia de los siete murciélagos (1863) best shows Fernández y González's vivid and brilliant imagination in the realm of the fantastic. His virtues are vigor, rapidity of action, picturesqueness, and color. He was a born storyteller, but not a real literary craftsman. The care and polish of the true artist were unknown to him.

See: A. González-Blanco, Historia de la novela en España desde el romanticismo a nuestros días (1909).

N. B. A.

Ferrari, Severino (1856–1905, Italian critic, scholar, and poet), was born in Alberino, Bologna. Beginning his studies in Bologna in 1865, he continued them in Florence, where in 1878 he received the degree of doctor of philosophy. His father had given him a taste for classical literature. He taught in various schools in Italy and finally (1897) was appointed to a chair in the Istituto Magistrale Femminile in Florence; at this time he also assisted Carducci (q.v.), who was lecturing at the University of Bologna. In 1877, together with other ambitious young men, he had founded the review Nuovi Goliardi to combat pedantic criticism and to satirize the partners of Mario Rapisardi (q.v.), who were Carducci's enemies; the conflict between carducciani and rapisardiani was at the moment tense. Except for financial difficulties the review would undoubtedly have succeeded. Ferrari continued the struggle alone and between 1877 and 1883 he composed a poem in eight cantos, Il Mago, published in Rome in 1884. Since his vein was satiric as well as lyric, he was tempted to imitate the poems of Heinrich Heine, whose influence in Italy was then considerable. Il Mago, abounding in allusions, allegories, and caricatures, does not often really succeed in being a social and literary satire, but does contain beautiful descriptions of the Romagna countryside. His marriage in 1886 was the inspiration for many of his verses.

It was as a lyrical poet that Ferrari achieved distinction. His lyrics are in three main groups: I Bordatini (1885), Versi (1892), and Sonetti (1901). One finds in them echoes of various schools and a harmonious, happy blending of various elements. Ferrari did not imitate the great classic writers like Dante, Petrarch, Cavalcanti, and Politian from any pedantic motive, but because of a personal, spiritual affinity with them. His discipleship was the natural result of a careful, passionate study. Indeed it is not accurate to speak of imitations when referring to his poems, but rather of original rearrangements. He felt that the old classic poetry was still alive and he wished to continue the glorious tradition by using the most popular Italian forms of poetry since the 14th century—the madrigal and the ballad—which he was convinced had the possibility of expressing the complexity of the modern mind.

A close friend of Carducci, Ferrari was also influenced by him, but his personal horizons are much more limited than Carducci's. Passion for historical or philosophical research was unknown to Ferrari, whose muse was only nourished by the serene springs of domestic affection. In I Bordatini, the group of poems dedicated to his wife and to his native countryside, Ferrari reveals his personality: his sane, youthful passion is displayed with potency of inspiration and purity of form. Unlike other lyric poets, he celebrated one love and not love, one woman and not women. Carducci found in Ferrari's poems "much variety and vividness of images and of feelings," and time has more or less vindicated this estimate. Ferrari would be entitled to a higher place in modern literature if his style were always up to the ideas and to the beauty of his inspiration. But his verse often sounds harsh and in the last group, Sonetti, he seems unable to exercise control over it. It is not easy to place him in literature. He is neither a romantic nor a sensualist, and his personality is not clearly enough defined to allow him to stand alone. He is a gentle soul, who greatly loved all that was his: his wife, his friends, and his country.

Ferrari's work as a scholar is considerable. He carried on long and patient research on poesia popolareggiante from the 14th century on and sponsored its study. Together with Carducci, he commented on Petrarch's Canzoniere, some cantos of Dante's Divine Comedy, and other classical masterpieces. He compiled many anthologies and made annotated texts for school use. In 1905 he died in a sanitarium at Collegigliato where he had been confined for a nervous ailment.

See: B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 2d ed., II (1921), 282–289.

D. F.

Ferrero, Guglielmo (1871–1942, Italian historian and essayist), was born at Portici, near Naples, and died in Geneva. After studying at the universities of Pisa and Turin, he associated himself with Cesare Lombroso, the famous criminologist, whose daughter he later married. Notable among his early works are L'Europa giovane (1897) and Il Militarismo (1898; Eng. tr., Militarism, 1902); Ferrero here begins his passionate advocacy of democracy which he never abandoned. In the first-named book the social situation in northern Europe is studied and a quasi-racist interpretation of European peoples is given—the northerners are held to be by nature better adapted to industrialism. Ferrero always approached a historical problem with a few simple ideas, adding little or no qualification. This perhaps explains his world-wide journalistic popularity, and on this score too it may be contended that the facts are forced into an arbitrary pattern. Controversial issues reached a polemical stage with the publication of his five volume Grandezza e decadenza di Roma (1902-1907; Eng. tr., The Greatness and Decline of Rome, 1907-1909). Ferrero states that the Roman histories of Mommsen and Duruy are not read today because they are based on the no longer arresting struggle between republicanism and monarchy. However, his own work is also based on problems of contemporary interest, i.e., the class struggle and extreme concern over economic problems. To this must be added sensational parallels between Roman and modern history: Caesar and Napoleon, Tammany Hall and the organization of the Roman unemployed by demagogues, etc. The work is lively and colorful in style, and it can be said, despite the cold reception Ferrero received from scholars, that thanks to him many read something of ancient history who ordinarily never would have done so.

In Memorie di un sovrano deposto (1920) and La Ruine de la civilisation antique (1921) Ferrero makes use of the principles of legitimacy, an idea which he develops extensively in his last works. Opposed to Fascism he left Italy in 1930 to become professor of modern history at the University of Geneva. His last writings constitute a trilogy: Aventure: Bonaparte en Italie 1796-1797 (1935; Eng. tr., The Gamble: Bonaparte in Italy 1796-1797, 1939), Reconstruction: Talleyrand à Vienne (1940; Eng. tr., The Reconstruction of Europe—Talleyrand and the Congress of Vienna, 1941), and, finally published only in America on account of the impossible conditions in Europe, The Principles of Power: The Great Political Crises of History (1942). Aventure is a most intriguing piece of historical writing. The events of 1796-1797 in Italy are shown to sweep the historical personages beyond their own calculations. The central idea of the three volumes is that force creates fear and instability, the illegitimate government itself feeling insecure. Ferrero does not however state the criteria which determine the legitimacy of a state; at times it seems that a regime or dynasty is legitimate if it has been tolerated for centuries. Ferrero does say that a modern state derives true legitimacy from democratic consent and respect for minority opinion. In general his political outlook suffers grievously because of a lack of consideration for economic matters; an ethico-political structure is formed without regard to what Benedetto Croce (q.v.) would call a preceding moment in the hierarchy of life.

See: C. Barbagallo, L'Opera storica di Guglielmo Ferrero e i suoi critici (1911).

V. G.

Feuchtwanger, Lion (pseud. J. L. Wetchcek, 1884-, German dramatist and novelist), son of a wealthy manufacturer, was born in Munich. His international reputation can best be explained by his being a scholar, a Jew, and an effective publicist. After having received a Ph. D. in 1907 (his dissertation was on Heine's "Rabbi von Bacharach"), Feuchtwanger started on a literary career with a number of widely performed dramas and adaptations of Greek plays. His fame, however, began with his renewal of the historical novel, in which interesting pictures of the past were given a modern psychological understanding. In 1923 appeared Die hässliche Herzogin (Eng. tr., The Ugly Duchess, 1928), a story of the 14th century, followed by Jud Süß (1925; Eng. tr., Power, 1926), a fascinating presentation of the age of absolutism. Feuchtwanger's scholarly interest in the character of the Jewish historian and politician Josephus resulted in the creation of a formidable novel in three massive volumes, Der jüdische Krieg (1932; Eng. tr., Josephus, 1932), Die Söhne (1935; Eng. tr., The Jew of Rome, 1935), and Josephus and the Emperor (1942, in English only). A by-product of his studies of Roman antiquity, with allusions to present-day conditions, is the novel Der falsche Nero (1936; Eng. tr., The Pretender, 1937). But Feuchtwanger is also a publicist of contemporary events. Erfolg (1930; Eng. tr., Success, 1930) gives a clear insight into the life of Munich following the revolution of 1919 and the rise of the Hitler movement. After Feuchtwanger had been driven by the Nazis to France, he published Die Geschwister Oppenheim (1933; Eng. tr., The Oppermanns, 1933), a story of a Berlin Jewish family before and during the Hitler dictatorship, and Exil (1940; Eng. tr., Paris Gazette, 1940), a novel about journalism and journalists in Paris. Personal experiences are revealed in the books Moskau 1937 (1937; Eng. tr., Moscow, 1937, 1937) and Unholdes Frankreich (1942; Eng. tr., The Devil in France, 1941). The latter is an account of his hardships in France after that country collapsed. With great difficulty Feuchtwanger escaped to Spain and finally reached the United States. Here was published the sensational novel Double, Double, Toil and Trouble (1943; originally written, but not published, under the title Die Zauberer), which is hardly worthy of Feuchtwanger's talent. Far better is the novel Simone (1944, in English), which treats the German invasion of France and deals with the timeless topic of the triumph of idealism over selfishness.

See: A. Burkhard, "Thomas Becket and Josef

Süsz Oppenheimer," Germanic Review, VI (1931), 144-153; L. Franulic, Cien autores contemporáneos, I (Santiago de Chile, 1941), 248-259.

H. Bf.

Fialho de Almeida, José Valentim (1857-1911, Portuguese prose writer), was born in Vilar-de-Frades, Alemtejo. He began to study in Lisbon, but poverty obliged him to work as a pharmacist's clerk. After overcoming great difficulties—giving private lessons and collaborating on obscure publications—he received his medical degree, only to abandon this profession and devote himself wholeheartedly to literary activities. He became well known at once for his political campaigns against the monarchy and attained great popularity. In 1889 he began to publish Os gatos (1889-1893; The Cats), a monthly review devoted to Portuguese life and edited exclusively by him. This was a continuation of As farpas (1871-1883; The Darts), through which, years before, Eça de Queiroz and Ramalho Ortigão (qq.v.) had fustigated the weaknesses of that same society. Os gatos, "mewing little, scratching always, and never fearing," launched inexorable attacks against the institutions and the person of the king and his ministers, replacing the delicate humor of As farpas by aggressive, defamatory violence. Os gatos is the pessimistic reaction of a passionate temperament which sees nothing but a society in ruins, inspiring only hate and scorn. There is lacking the reforming faith and social didacticism of Ramalho, but there are unforgettable pages of journalistic impressions and descriptive prose. In Pasquinadas (1890; Pasquinades), Vida irónica (1892; Ironical Life), A esquina (1903; The Corner), and other books of criticism and journalism, Fialho's biting satire stirred the life of his period with its acid commentary, at once plebeian and aristocratic. His literary initiation coincided with the triumph of realism, to which he adhered, although through personal and literary admiration for Castelo Branco (q.v.) there remained in his work much romantic sentimental disorder and subjective expansiveness. If one adds to this the materialism which was a result of his medical training and the bitterness and narrowness of his life, spent at times in the company of an insane brother, one better understands the author's corrosive personality.

His purely literary work is made up of various collections of stories—Contos (1881; Short Stories), A cidade do vício (1882; The City of Vice), and O país das uvas (1893; The Country of Grapes). He was not interested in the soul but in the instincts; a uniform, elemental primitivism permeates all these narratives. In this naturalistic version of rural life Fialho represents the extreme reaction against the falsely idealized vision of romanticism. His literary merit is found in his capacity for apprehending the plastic physiognomy of things. The highly energetic style of his prose and the almost brutal quality of the descriptive coloring reveal a chromatic hypersensitivity. He has recourse even to syntactical distortions, in his vehement desire to give in all its richness the pictorial sensation which his eyes beheld. He would intersperse Gallicisms in his writings when the desired shade was lacking in the vernacular, and he argued the necessity of overcoming by Neo-Latin contributions the rigidity and inadequacy of the old Portuguese language. His influence on modern Portuguese letters in this and other ways has been extensive. In O país das uvas he has given, in powerful and palpitating style, a dazzling and luminous vision of the people and the countryside of his native district, Alemtejo.

Expatriation was the bitter end of his life. The clever cajolery of the dictator João Franco had softened him and even made him a fervent supporter; when this regime fell, he found himself surrounded and isolated in a hostile atmosphere. He left for his own province and from there went to Cuba, where he died in 1911.

See: Claudio Basto, A linguagem de Fialho (1917); Castelo Branco Chaves, Fialho de Almeida (1923); A. Forjaz de Sampaio, "Fialho de Almeida," in Journal dum rebelde (1924), pp. 63-93.

E. G. D.

Figueiredo, Fidelino de Sousa (1888-, Portuguese literary critic and historian), a reformer at heart, with an unusually strong philosophic bent, has raised the standards of Portuguese criticism on the basis of individualist principles. Furthermore, he has introduced the study of comparative literature in Portugal.

Born within the bounds of "Pombal's Lisbon," he went to Coimbra to study law and, under Teófilo Braga (q.v.), literature. Soon he began to write as a journalist. Dissatisfied over the iconoclast Republic of 1910 and its break with a cherished past, he gathered a group of social-minded traditionalists around his Revista de história (1912-1928; Review of History). His hour of action struck when, as a young conservative deputy, he entered the short-lived cabinet (1918-1919) of the dictator-general Sidónio Paes. When Paes was murdered, Figueiredo went into exile. Remaining true to his ideals of enlightened conservatism, he soon found himself outdistanced by Portugal's modern Sebastianists. Like a medieval scholar he wandered from university to university, from country to country, as the intellectual ambassador of his beloved "little backyard." He taught abroad in Rio de Janeiro (1920), visited Madrid (1927-1930) and Berkeley, California (1931, 1937), among other places, returned to Brazil and finally to Portugal.

Guided by ideas received from Benedetto Croce, Paul Bourget (qq.v.), and Sainte-Beuve, Figueiredo injected a sound critical spirit into the study of Portuguese literature, till then a favorite ground for national self-glorification. He applied a psychological method, which focused on the individual personality of each author as the primary factor in his works. The practical outgrowth of his theories was A história literária como ciência (1912; Literary History as a Science), with its good comparative bibliography, and three standard works, História da literatura romântica portuguesa, 1825-1870 (1913; History of Portuguese Romantic Literature), História da literatura realista, 1871-1900 (1914; History of Realist Literature), and História da literatura clássica, 1502-1825 (3 vols., 1917-1924; History of Classic Literature). Other didactic works included a concise História da literatura portuguesa (1919; also published by "Labor," Barcelona, as Historia de la literatura portuguesa, 1927). Sincere friendship for Spain speaks through his translations from Unamuno and Menéndez y Pelayo (qq.v.) and through two original studies, As duas Espanhas (1932; The Two Spains) and Pirene (1935; Pyrene). Most of his shorter literary papers are gathered in the four volumes of Estudos de literatura (1917-1924; Studies of Literature). Special subjects are taken up in Características da literatura portuguesa (1914), in História dum "vencido da vida" (1930; History of a "Victim of Life"), a study of Oliveira Martins, in A épica portuguesa no século XVI (1931; Portuguese Epics of the 16th Century), and in Antero (1942). He has also written works of fiction, including the autobiographic novel Sob a cinza do tédio (preface, 1925; Under the Ashes of Disgust).

As a historian Figueiredo laid down his program of militant traditionalism in the handbook O espírito histórico (1910; The Historical Spirit). This program was carried out in the 16 volumes of his Revista de história. The Estudos de história americana (1929) is a contribution to Portuguese-American relations.

Figueiredo himself has provided the best key to his ideas on politics and literature in two volumes of essays that challenge blind, extreme nationalism—Notas para um ideário português (1929; Notes for a Portuguese System of Ideas) and Problemas da ética do pensamento: O dever dos intelectuais (1936; Problems of Thought Ethics: The Duty of the Intellectuals).

See: Figueiredo, Notas para um ideário português (1929), pp. 153-160.

G. M. M.

Finnish literature. The generation of 1880 gave a new impetus and new directions to Finnish literature. Until approximately that date most authors of the country had been educated in Swedish-language schools (Swedish remained the sole official language of instruction in all secondary schools until 1859) and Swedish-language literature had played an important and sometimes a dominant role. In the 1880's a group of new writers began to employ the vernacular, the mother tongue, with new enthusiasm and gave direct and natural expression to the local culture. A distinctly Finnish style developed. These writers also established contacts with the whole world outside, opened up new horizons for their countrymen, suggested new ways of art and life.

The foreign literary influence came mainly from the Scandinavian countries, especially from Norway, and in lesser degree and not as directly from France and from Russia. The general European tendency of the time to stress realities of life in the selection and treatment of literary themes (see French naturalism, German naturalism) came to the fore also in Finnish literature. The works of Minna Canth (1844-1897), the pioneer of the new school, are very representative in this respect. In her drama Työmiehen Vaimo (1885; The Laborer's Wife) she indicts the upper classes of society for condoning if not actively supporting traditions and laws which kept the poorer classes in hopeless servitude and poverty. In the Papin Perhe (1891; The Parson's Family) it is the older generation which is set up in opposition to the younger; the old people appear with all their deep-seated prejudices and narrowness whereas the children demand a healthy, free development of personality.

While Minna Canth wrote with the fervor of the social reformer, Juhani Aho (pseud. of Juhani Brofeldt, 1861–1921), although he too wrote of the life of the common folk, was less concerned with the solution of their social problems than he was with giving us realistic, often humorous glimpses of their everyday lives. In Rautatie (1884; The Railroad) Aho tells an amusing tale about an excursion of two backwoods dwellers, husband and wife, who wish to see that fabulous wonder, “the train.” It is only a small bit of the life of primitive people, but presented with remarkable art. In two of his novels, Papin Tytär (1885; The Parson’s Daughter) and Papin Rouva (1893; The Parson’s Wife), Aho treats of the mode of living in an educated middle-class home. The plot centers in a young daughter of the family who is compelled to marry the man of her father’s choice. These two works, especially Papin Rouva, are artistically well conceived and executed. With great mastery Aho describes the fine shades of feeling in the soul of the young woman and the grayness of a loveless marriage and her internal struggles in having to live with a man who is spiritually coarse. The moods of the characters fuse remarkably well with the background of nature. Aho possessed a notable talent for portraying natural scenery as a background for the delineation of his characters. The qualities of Juhani Aho as an artist will be remembered most, perhaps, on account of his short stories, which he called Lastuja (1902; Chips). In them particularly he developed his distinctive style, full of poetic imagery.

The influence of Leo Tolstoy (q.v.) was felt very strongly in Finland, especially in the case of the eminent writer Arvid Järnefelt (1861–1932). In Heräämiseni (1894; My Conversion) Järnefelt confesses his Tolstoyan faith completely and unreservedly. He has written short stories, novels, dramas. The stories assembled in his two collections, Ihmiskohtaloita (1885; Human Fates) and Elämän Meri (1904; The Sea of Life), are among the best in Finnish literature.

The outstanding lyric poet in recent Finnish letters is Eino Leino (pseud. of Armas Eino Leopold Lönnbohm, 1879–1926), a prolific writer, and inspired. He has interpreted the yearnings and sufferings of his people and his own personal sentiments and visions as only a true poet can do, notably in Helkavirsiä (1903; Helga Hymns) and in Ajan Aalloilta (1899; The Waves of Time).

Two other masters of verse are Otto Manninen (1872–) and Veikko Antero Koskenniemi (1885–). Manninen has published two notable collections, Säkeitä (1905–1910; Stanzas) and Virran Tyven (1925; The Calm of the Stream). His verse is precise, concentrated in both thought and feeling; fine intellectual quality and genuine feeling combine to form a beautiful, integrated whole. Occasionally he turns to the symbolical. Koskenniemi interprets the general human feelings awakened in him by life about him; his poetry brings before us the great eternal problems of life and human fate. Sometimes he contemplates his own misfortunes, but without tears.

The most eminent of recent Finnish novelists is Frans Eemil Sillanpää (1888–). Even in his earliest works, e.g., Elämä ja Aurinko (1916; Life and the Sun), he gave evidence of a rare talent for the impressionistic painting of fleeting moments and situations. Such novels as Nuorena Nukkunut (1931; Eng. tr., Fallen Asleep While Young, American title, The Maid Silja, both 1933) and Hurskas Kurjuus (1919, The Holy Misery; Eng. tr., Meek Heritage, 1938) are good examples of a kind of patient, resigned living which Sillanpää can describe in an excellent way. He received the Nobel prize in literature in 1939. Sillanpää’s latest work, Ihmisen Ihannus ja Kurjuus (1945; The Beauty and Misery of Human Life), shows that he is still a master artist.

The best Finnish dramatist is Maria Jotuni (1880–1943). Her last play, Klaus, Louhikon Herra (1941; Klaus, the Master of Louhikko), was well received and was awarded a prize as the best Finnish drama written in 1941. It deals with life of the Finnish nobility in the 15th century.

The best representative of the younger generation of novelists is Mika Valtari (1908–), a very prolific writer.

Other writers such as Unto Seppänen (1904–), Uuno Kailas, Lauri Haarla (1890–1944), Maila Talvio (1871–), Arvi Järventaus (1883–), and Kaarlo Sarkia (1902–1945) effectively depict various aspects of life about them and also act as interpreters to Finland of the great world outside.

See: V. Tarkiainen, Suomalaisen Kirjallisuuden Historia (1934), pp. 199–325.

J. B. O.

Fischer, Otokar (1883–1938, Czech poet and critic), represents a fine combination of poetry and scholarship. He was born in Kolín, studied German literature at Prague and Berlin, and became professor of German literature at the Czech University of Prague. From 1935 to 1938 he was dramatic director of the Prague National Theatre. He died of a heart attack on March 12, 1938, while reading the news of Germany's invasion of Austria.

Fischer's poetry—collected under such titles as Hořící keř (1912; The Burning Bush), Léto (1920; Summer), Kruhy (1923; Circles), Hlasy (1926; Voices), and Host (1930; The Guest), as well as Poslední básně (1938; Last Poems)—expresses the struggle of a sensitive soul with fate and with his own divided mind. A dependence on post-romantic poetry such as that of Theer (q.v.) gave way to a simpler and finer expression in later years, and the early subjective problems of mental isolation were more and more replaced by poetry which treated the tortuous problems of the Czech Jew and the wider questions of life and death. Fischer is possibly the best poetic translator in the whole of Czech literature. He combined remarkable scholarship and ingenuity with a real sense of style. His greatest achievement is a 15-volume edition of Goethe which contains his masterly translation of both parts of Faust. He translated dramas by Kleist, Nietzsche's (q.v.) Also sprach Zarathustra and the poems of Heine, Shakespeare's Macbeth, Marlowe's Edward II, Shelley's The Cenci, Corneille's Polyeucte, Lope de Vega's Fuenteovejuna, as well as selections from Villon, Verhaeren (q.v.), Pushkin, and Kipling. Fischer was likewise an ambitious dramatist, and his Spartakus (1925) is a successful attempt at composing poetic drama.

As a literary critic and historian Fischer also achieved great distinction. He began with highly specialized work in German and afterwards wrote monographs on Kleist (1912), Nietzsche (1913), and Heine (2 vols., 1924) which all show his mastery of facts and keen analysis of difficult personalities. A booklet, Otázky literární psychologie (1917; Problems of Literary Psychology), outlines the subject which attracted him most. His criticisms and studies, collected in the volumes Duch a slovo (1927; Spirit and Word) and Slovo a svět (1938; Word and World), belong to the most distinguished productions of Czech literary scholarship. K dramatu (1919; Towards the Drama) is a collection of his dramatic criticism. One book, Belgie a Německo (1926; Belgium and Germany), was the fruit of a year's stay as professor at the University of Ghent; it studies Pan-German policies and aspirations as they affected Belgium, with a keen understanding of the parallels to the situation in Bohemia.

See: V. Jiráť and others, Dílo Otokara Fischera (1933); R. Wellek, "Otokar Fischer," Slavonic Review, XVII (1938-1939), 215-218.
R. W.

Flaubert, Gustave (1821-1880, French novelist), was born at Rouen in Normandy. Until 1846 he lived in the city hospital, where his father was chief surgeon. Added to this gloomy atmosphere, the excesses of provincial romanticism in the 1830's produced a deep influence on Flaubert, who was naturally sensitive and impressionable. After early schooling in Rouen, he studied law in Paris unwillingly and unsuccessfully (1841-1843). This unhappy venture was terminated by a serious nervous malady which diverted him from a normal, active life and determined his literary vocation. Reading and meditating, he constructed his own inner world. Of his Œuvres de jeunesse (1910) the most significant are Novembre (written 1842) and the first Education sentimentale (written 1843-1845), both based on reality and often scrupulously detailed, but unrestrained in treatment and expression. They are interesting studies of Flaubert's early manner.

Limited in his attachments, Flaubert was particularly affected by separation from his intimate friends and by the death of his father and of his sister (1846). He spent most of his remaining years at Croisset, a country estate on the Seine near Rouen, devoted to the care of his mother and to the education of his niece. Above all he consecrated himself to literature as a pure art. A trip through Touraine and Brittany in 1847 with Maxime Du Camp inspired their collaboration in a travel book, Par les champs et par les grèves (1885). In 1848 Flaubert began a work which was to haunt him for a quarter of a century, La Tentation de Saint Antoine (1874; three versions composed 1848-1849, 1856, 1869-1872). Like his other early literary conceptions, this philosophical dialogue reveals the pessimistic and romantic influence of Alfred Le Poittevin. Toward 1848, when Le Poittevin died, he was superseded as Flaubert's literary counselor by Louis Bouilhet, a Latinist and poet obsessed by the idea of objectivity and perfection of form. Bouilhet condemned the first Tentation de Saint Antoine as lyric and fantastic. Following an extensive trip to the eastern Mediterranean countries (1849-1851), Flaubert began under Bouilhet's strict supervision the composition of his great novels, modeled and chiseled with extreme care and precision: Madame Bovary (1857), a penetrating character study set in a meticulously faithful milieu of Norman provincial life; Salammbô (1862), a brilliant epic of ancient Carthage, reconstructed after a trip to Tunisia (1858) and exhaustive documentation; a second Education sentimentale (1869), having little in common with the first except the title. This representation of the character and manners of the generation of 1840, based on Flaubert's own experience and observation, a work in grisaille, devoid of positive action and heroics, tinged with irony and disenchantment, is acclaimed by connoisseurs as his masterpiece.

Flaubert's last years were darkened by a succession of misfortunes, private and public—the death of Bouilhet (1869), the Prussian invasion and the occupation of Croisset, the loss of his mother (1872), the bitter struggles between liberals and reactionaries, and family financial difficulties involving tremendous sacrifices (1875–1879). He was also saddened by his failure in the theatre and by general lack of understanding of his work. His Trois Contes (1877), the only work published for possible profit, was received with mingled admiration and disapproval. He left unfinished Bouvard et Pécuchet (1881, ed. by Maupassant), a savage attack on accepted ideas and a bitter satire of human ignorance, stupidity, prejudice, and ineptitude.

Flaubert's career was a long series of struggles. Seeking in literature an escape from his infirmities and disillusionments, he forced himself to overcome a natural tendency toward excessive lyricism and imagination by a severe application of discipline and restraint. Questions of style and composition tortured him endlessly. He was preoccupied with truthfulness of character and of situation, naturalness of dialogue, and exactness of setting. But he was principally concerned with form. Harmony and rhythm of phrase, logic and solidity of structure, were essential. For Flaubert truth and beauty were inseparable, if not identical. "There are no fine thoughts without beautiful form and vice versa. . . . The Idea exists only by virtue of its form." Flaubert was a perfectionist, spending long years of almost incessant toil in elaborating and revising a single novel. He was completely devoted to his art, which was sacred to him. Because of his disdain for prevailing tastes and conventions, his work was not fully appreciated at first. Uncompromising in his principles, he refused to make concessions for the sake of popular or commercial success. But gradually he came to be recognized as one of the masters of 19th-century prose. He has been classified as a realist, but he himself disclaimed relationship with any literary school. In his ideals he resembles the Parnassians and the partisans of "art for art's sake." Aesthetically he is close to Baudelaire. Flaubert's Correspondance (new ed., 9 vols., 1926–1933) gives an intimate picture of the man and an eloquent expression of his ideas and theories. One of the most important literary correspondences of the 19th century, it has been an inspiration for many younger writers. Most of the works of Flaubert have been translated into English.

See: R. Descharmes and R. Dumesnil, Au-tour de Flaubert (2 vols., 1912); R. Dumesnil, Gustave Flaubert; l'homme et l'œuvre (1932); A. Thibaudet, Gustave Flaubert (1935).

J. F. J.

Flers, Robert Pellevé de La Motte-Ango, marquis de (1872–1927, French dramatist), born in Pont-l'Évêque, of a family prominent in Norman annals since the Middle Ages, spurned the more austere occupations of his forebears and devoted his life to the theatre. In 1901 he married the daughter of the well-known dramatist Sardou (q.v.) and began his highly successful collaboration with Gaston de Caillavet (q.v.). The latter died during the First World War (1915), and Robert de Flers, having volunteered his services, fulfilled important military and diplomatic missions to Russia and Rumania. Too modestly recorded in his volumes Sur les chemins de la guerre (1919) and La Petite Table (1920), they were formally eulogized in the Rumanian Parliament. With Francis de Croisset (q.v.) as a new associate, he produced another series of plays, at least one of which, the operetta Ciboulette (1926; music by Reynaldo Hahn), enjoyed the popularity of his former works. By then he held several influential positions, including that of literary director and dramatic critic of Figaro. His election in 1920 to the French Academy, which he had satirized in one of his best-known comedies (L'Habit vert, 1912), served notice upon his bewildered ancestors, two of whom had been members of the Institut, that all roads lead to the Coupole.

See: Emmanuel Chaumié, La Belle Aventure de Robert de Flers: Russic-Roumanie (1929); Francis de Croisset, Le Souvenir de Robert de Flers (1929).

J.-A. B.

Flex, Walter (1887–1917, German poet, novelist, and dramatist), is the poetic representative of the idealist German war volunteer of 1914, the very opposite of Remarque (q.v.). Born in Eisenach, Thuringia, he came from a family in which classical culture and idealism had merged with a strong patriotic consciousness. After university studies, the young philologist served for several years as a tutor in the Bismarck family. Early works written between 1909 and 1914—Demetrius (1910), Im Wechsel (1910), Zwölf Bismarcks (1913), Wallensteins

Antlitz (1918), and the drama Lothar (1920)—showed marked talent, but it is the experience of the war that gave substance to his work. From the standpoint of an idealism which he tried to carry into personal action, Flex wrote his war poems and reflections Sonne und Schild (1915), Vom grossen Abendmahl (1915), Im Felde zwischen Nacht und Tag (1917), and Leutnantsdienst (1917). His great success was the story Der Wanderer zwischen beiden Welten (1916), in which he depicts a high type of man equal to the war and its problems. The hero, a young lieutenant, wants the German soul and humanity rejuvenated through the spirit of the "Wandervogel," that idealist German youth movement which since the turn of the century tried to fuse the spirit of Rousseau with Nietzsche's (q.v.) Dionysian joy of living and with Christian faith and charity: "Stay pure in heart and ripen" is the motto of the story. This was to be followed by a long novel dealing in detail with Flex's own personal development. But in 1917 Flex fell in action, and only two chapters of the novel (Wolf Eschenlohr, 1919) were finished; we can see that he meant to offer a non-compromising idealism which was to solve the social question on a national basis. Genuine brotherhood was to remove the cleavage between the classes of the people and create the comradeship of the nation, things for which the war and the experience of the front had paved the way. The work of Flex, more intellectual than passionate, was essentially traditional and conservative. His collected works appeared in 1926.

See: A. Socergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 503-507; J. Klein, Walter Flex, ein Deuter des Weltkrieges (1928); C. Flex, Walter Flex (1937); W. K. Pfeiler, War and the German Mind (1941), pp. 82-90

W. K. P.

Fofanov, Konstantin Mikhailovich (1862-1911, Russian poet), was born into the family of a small shopkeeper near St. Petersburg. He received little education. His lyrical verse, somewhat decadent in its mood and devoid of civic ideology, harmonized in content with the anti-social ("art for art's sake") trend that characterized Russian poetry of the 1880's. His work soon became well known throughout Russia. Characteristic collections are Stikhotvoreniya (1887; Verses) and Teni i tainy (1891; Shadows and Mysteries). A great many of his poems were set to music, and Fofanov became an important literary figure. The greatest weakness of his poetry was its lack of depth, and eventually the symbolists replaced Fofanov in the readers' favor.

See: V. Bryusov, Dalekiye i blizkiye (1912).
O. M.

Fogazzaro, Antonio (1842-1911, Italian novelist), was born in the Venetian city of Vicenza. His family was well-to-do; he never had to earn his living. In his boyhood he had as tutor the gentle and open-minded poet-priest, Giacomo Zanella (q.v.), who influenced him deeply in many ways, strengthening the religious interest that was native to him and giving it a somewhat modernistic character. The young Antonio loved music and was not far from seeking a musical career; but lack of really outstanding talent together with a not unsympathetic parental disapproval kept him from entering that field. The failure of the war of 1859 made it unsafe for his family, known for its patriotism, to remain in what was still an Austrian province, and for the seven years that were to intervene before the final liberation of Venetia the family lived in Turin, where Antonio studied law, to little purpose. In 1866 the family returned to Vicenza. Thereafter Fogazzaro's life ran smoothly, divided chiefly, in locale, between two homes, a villa just outside Vicenza, and a villa at the water's edge at Oria, where a mountain valley, the Valsolda, comes down in beauty to the northern shore of the Lake of Lugano.

Fogazzaro came late into literary activity. It was not until 1874, when he was 32 years of age, that he published his first book, Miranda, a brief sentimental romance in blank verse; and it was not until 1881 that the series of prose novels, which constitute his only really important work, began with the publication of Malombra (Eng. tr., The Woman, 1907). His later novels are Daniele Cortis (1885; Eng. tr., 1887), Il Mistero del poeta (1888), Piccolo Mondo antico (1896; Eng. tr., The Patriot, 1906), Piccolo Mondo moderno (1900), Il Santo (1905; Eng. tr., The Saint, 1906), and Leila (1910; Eng. tr., 1911). Malombra and Il Mistero del poeta are of slight interest; but the others are all good novels, and Piccolo Mondo antico is a masterpiece, generally regarded as the greatest Italian novel of the latter half of the 19th century.

The five successful novels are concerned typically with the love affairs and other problems of high-minded protagonists, of whom one is the more meditative and idealistic, and the other the more energetic and humanly effective. The leading figures are surrounded, always, by an amazing host of secondary characters, depicted with an individualization, a vitality, and an irresistible humor that make them one of the most memorable groups of acquaintances in all modern literature. Fogazzaro's humor, which expresses itself in description, in convincingly real dialogue (sometimes in dialect), and in the ingenious confrontation of fixed habits with chance situations is a type which one associates more readily with English than with Continental fiction. First and foremost, Fogazzaro is a novelist of character: his personages are so real to him that some of them pursue him from book to book, insisting on reappearance—a phenomenon as marked as in the cases of Trollope and Balzac. The five novels all reveal Fogazzaro's preoccupation with religion; and all gain a flavor of melodic reminiscence from the extent and fineness of his musical culture: musical references are as omnipresent in his pages as is the sound of running water in the gardens of an Italian villa.

Piccolo Mondo antico is a study of the mutual influence of a husband, Franco Maironi, who is deeply religious, but rather a dreamer than a man of positive force, and his wife Luisa, who lacks religious faith, but does possess an energetic conviction of moral right and a very strong sense of justice. Their experiences, closely interwoven with those of other members of their families and of the ubiquitous surrounding throng, take them through critical perplexity, through comedy, and through deeply moving tragedy to final integration. The book gains an elevating patriotic tone from the participation of its actors in the preparations for the war of 1859. The three remaining novels proceed from Piccolo Mondo antico and form a series with it. Piero Maironi, son of Franco and Luisa, is the hero of Piccolo Mondo moderno and Il Santo. In the latter book he has left his own social world and reappears as a religious leader, fired with a Franciscan flame of love and abnegation and with a glowing desire for the regeneration of the church from within. One of Piero's disciples is the hero of the less significant final novel, Leila. Il Santo, while it has elements of greatness as a novel, is primarily an intense fictional appeal for a turn toward modernism in the policy of the church. As such it found disfavor with the Vatican and was placed upon the Index—as was also the case with the much milder Leila.

In addition to his novels Fogazzaro wrote a considerable number of short stories, some of them gems of this form of narrative art. A first collection of such stories, Fedele, was published in 1887. A second collection, Racconti brevi, was published in 1894 and reissued, with additions, in 1901 under the title Idillii spezzati. He also wrote much verse, of placid beauty rather than distinction. An early volume, Valsolda (1876), is a collection of lyrics suggested by the sights and sounds of his Alpine valley. A definitive volume, Le Poesie (1908), contains all of his verse that he thought worth preserving. He published also four volumes of miscellaneous prose writings and one collection of dramatic sketches, Scene (1903). He was made a senator in 1896.

See: S. Rumor, Antonio Fogazzaro, 2d ed. (1920); P. Nardi, Fogazzaro, 2d ed. (1930); Lucienne Portier, Antonio Fogazzaro (1937, in French).

E. H. W.

Fogelqvist, Torsten (1880–1941, Swedish educator, publicist, and critic), born in Lidköping, is one of the most important cultural personalities in 20th-century Sweden. Though he wrote some creditable verse in his earlier years (På vaxtavla, 1912, On a Wax Tablet; Sånger till den förlorade skönheten, 1915, Songs to Lost Beauty), it is as an educator, publicist, and essayist that he has made his important contribution to modern Swedish life. As a popular lecturer he traveled far and wide in Sweden in the early years of the century, an activity which he continued as time permitted down through his life, even after 1908 when he became first an instructor and then rektor at the famous folk high school at Brunnsvik in Dalecarlia. In 1919 he became a member of the editorial staff of the leading liberal newspaper in Stockholm, Dagens nyheter (The Daily News) and in 1931 was elected to the Swedish Academy. The view of life which motivated all of his activities as an educator, publicist, and essayist may be called a kind of common-sense humanism, in which the concept of evolution, with its stress upon change and development in man's social, economic, and political life, fuses with a fine sense of the historically organic nature of the intellectual and spiritual sides of human life. His love for the noble spiritual inheritance of man's past in general, and the Swedish past in particular, enabled him to avoid becoming encased in any of the schematic excesses of modern Marxist thought, even though his educational activities brought him into close and sympathetic contact with the younger working classes in modern Sweden.

The rich fruit of his mature thinking is contained in a brilliant series of prose essays and travel sketches, among which may be mentioned Bok och svärd (1917; Book and Sword), Allvarsmän och narrar (1921; Serious Men and Fools), När stugan blev mig trång (1922; When the Cottage Became Too Small), Typer och tänkesätt (1927; Types and Ways of Thought), and Svenska och klassiska utsikter (1940; Swedish and Classical Views). He has also written a group of penetrating biographical and critical monographs on three of his Swedish contemporaries, the artist-caricaturist Albert Engström, and the poets Erik Axel Karlfeldt and Dan Andersson (qq.v.). During the difficult days before the outbreak of the Second World War and after, Fogelqvist spoke out strongly with the conviction and eloquence of the great humanistic tradition against the reign of brutality and terror represented in totalitarian thought and action in Europe.

See: B. Bergman, "Torsten Fogelqvist," Ord och bild, XXXVI (1927), 177-184; S. Selander, Européer, amerikaner och annat (1930), pp. 200-207; V. Spångberg, Duktigt folk (1930), pp. 116-119; T. Fogelqvist, Jag minns den ljuva tiden (1935).

A. G.

Fontane, Theodor (1819-1898, German novelist), is the master of realism in German fiction. A descendant of French Huguenot refugees, Fontane was born in the little Brandenburg town of Neu-Ruppin, but in his early childhood the family removed to Swinemünde on the Baltic Sea. To prepare for his father's profession he was apprenticed to an apothecary in Berlin; later he worked as an apothecary's assistant in Leipzig, Dresden, and Berlin. While thus employed he wrote numerous articles for newspapers and journals and published a volume of poems (1851). This new apprenticeship introduced him to a new profession. In 1852 he visited England as a special correspondent for a Berlin newspaper and made a longer visit in 1854-1859. After his return to Germany he served on the staff of the Kreuzzeitung (1860-1870) and, primarily as a critic of the theatre, on the Vossische Zeitung (1870-1889). On the strength of his popular histories of the Prussian wars of the 1860's, a Berlin newspaper commissioned him to write a history of the Franco-Prussian War; he journeyed to the front, where he was captured and held a prisoner for a month. He died in Berlin, September 20, 1898.

Fontane's ballads first brought him recognition in the literary world. His themes were taken from English and Scotch history as well as from legends and historical events of his Prussian fatherland; "Von der schönen Rosamund," "Archibald Douglas," "Der alte Derffling," and "Der Tag von Hemmingstedt" are justly reckoned among the most successful efforts to perpetuate the ballad tradition in modern times. Fontane was in his 60th year when his first novel was published. His experience as a journalist had sharpened his eye in observing the significance of detail in human phenomena; the years had brought also a sanity and balance, a ripening of human understanding, from which his novels derived inestimable profit. His first novels were historical, in the tradition of Scott and of Scott's chief German follower, Willibald Alexis (Vor dem Sturm, 1878; Grete Minde, 1880; Ellernklipp, 1881). His last historical novel, Schach von Wuthenow (1883), is a masterly example of the genre; the essential qualities of a historical period, the time immediately preceding the battle of Jena, are embodied in fictitious character and fictitious circumstance. In the meantime with L'Adultera (1882) the novelist had entered the field in which he was to become preeminent, the realistic novel of contemporary life in Berlin and the surrounding countryside.

His conception of realism differed sharply from the left-wing realism of the naturalists. "Genuine realism," he said, "will always be full of beauty, for the beautiful belongs to life as well as the ugly," and again, "Art must resort to the ideal to give the impression of completeness." He chose his characters from the everyday world; they enter into normal human relationships and meet with no sensational experiences. He records with extraordinary fidelity the seemingly petty happenings which form the substance of most lives, and in the choice of detail he shows a consummate mastery, revealing the hidden meaning of the apparently insignificant. Fontane's interest centers in character, not in incident; for the most part he avoids scenes of excitement or even ignores the climax of an action, for he is more concerned with the slow process of inconspicuous steps which lead to a crisis. His plots are of extreme simplicity—indeed the last two narratives, Die Poggenpuhls (1896) and Der Stechlin (1899), hardly present at all the sequence of related events which one calls a plot. Fontane introduces and develops the characters by natural and effortless methods; conversation forms a conspicuous element, and exquisitely subtle and varied are the gradations in speech by which his figures are characterized. The artistic use of foreshadowing devices and his sympathetic relation to the characters of his own creation are not irreconcilable with true realism. The most constant theme in his stories is the problem of a marriage in which some form of inequality or disparity constitutes a latent source of misunderstanding, and the intrusion of a third person raises this to the surface. His masterpiece, Effi Briest (1895; Eng. tr., 1913-1915) is a novel of this type. The heroine, daughter of a country gentleman, marries a man of her parents' choosing, a middle-aged government official who had once been a suitor for her mother's hand; from girlish play she is called to the obligations of a new social position. Effi Briest is a supreme example of the novelist's ripened art. It is a subdued tragedy of marital error, related with the reticence of a great artist. Other novels present subtle variations of this general problem—L'Adultera, Graf Petöfy (1884), Cécile (1887), Unwiederbringlich (1892). Another distinguished example of Fontane's realism is Irrungen, Wirrungen (1888; Eng. tr., Trials and Tribulations, 1917). It presents the love of a young aristocrat for a girl of the people, an age-old story, here related in a very modern version. The lovers are separated by barriers of tradition which act as a kind of fate to which one bows in wistful resignation. The heroine, Lene Nimptsch, is one of the most convincing and memorable of Fontane's creations. Stine (1890) is a kindred tale, but more distinctly in a minor key, reaching a tragic conclusion in the suicide of the noble lover. In Frau Jenny Treibel (1892) the novelist casts an eye upon the plutocratic bourgeoisie. Frau Jenny has risen from humble origins to affluence and social position, and Fontane examines her and her circle with fine irony and amused tolerance. The slight plot is concerned with her plans for an appropriate marriage for her second son. It may be added that two or three of Fontane's novels (e.g., Unterm Birnbaum, 1885; Quitt, 1891) fall outside the usual pattern and contain some complexity of plot as well as thrilling or even melodramatic incidents.

Among the most engaging of Fontane's works are the autobiographical writings Meine Kinderjahre (1894; Eng. tr., of extracts, My Childhood Days, 1913-1915), Von Zwanzig bis Dreissig (1898), and Kriegsgefangen (1871), a delightfully good-humored account of his imprisonment in France; the selections from his journalistic correspondence, Ein Sommer in London (1854), Aus England (1860), and Jenseits des Tweed (1860), show a shrewd and friendly understanding of English life and culture. In his Wanderungen durch die Mark Brandenburg (4 vols., 1862-1882) Fontane pays tribute to the neglected beauty of his Prussian fatherland. His letters (various collections, especially 1904, 1910) reveal the distinction and charm of his personality and contain much pertinent comment on life and literature.

See: Franz Servaes, Fontane (1900); Joseph Dresch, Le Roman social en Allemagne (1850-1900) (1913); Conrad Wandrey, Theodor Fontane (1919); Kenneth Hayens, Theodor Fontane; a Critical Study (1920); Heinrich Spiero, Fontane (1928).

H. W. H.-T.

Forsslund, Karl Erik (1872-1941, Swedish poet and novelist), was born at Örebro and lived most of his life as a schoolteacher at Falun in the mountain region of Dalecarlia. Beginning with narrative prose, he became best known for his lyrics, of which the first collection was Arbetare (1902; Workers). He celebrated in particular the old-time Nordic virtues of the mountain folk among whom he taught. His ringing verse is represented in literary anthologies and still more often in socialistic publications. The youthful dreamer, he believed, is the true prophet and molder of the future. The war against oppression and luxury is like the forces of spring returning to rout the cold inertia of winter. A more generous and genial-hearted revolutionary would be hard to find.

See: K. Warburg, Svensk litteraturhistoria i sammandrag (1911); C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930.)

C. W. S.

Fort, Paul (1872-, French poet), was born in Reims. When he was only 18, La Petite Bête, a one-act comedy in prose, was published. In the same year, reacting against the naturalistic theatre and wishing to provide a stage for the "idealistic" drama of the symbolists, he founded the Théâtre d'Art (later the Théâtre de l'Œuvre). A number of his poems appeared in little magazines and plaquettes; collected, they formed the first volume of his Ballades françaises (1897), for which Pierre Louÿs (q.v.) composed a dithyrambic preface. Further books of ballads followed; and Fort found himself master of one of the numerous schools of poetry then flourishing, with headquarters in a café, the Closerie des Lilas. In 1905 he founded the review Vers et prose, important in the later history of French symbolism (q.v.), and was its editor until 1914. These were years of glory, culminating in his election (1912) as "prince of poets." Mistral (q.v.), voting for him, dubbed him la Cigale du Nord. The First World War and the years that followed failed to slacken the rhythm of his production: at the end of a 40-year period (1897-1937) no fewer than 38 volumes of the Ballades françaises et chroniques de France had been published. Three of the chroniques, cast in dramatic form, reached the stage of the Odéon; a fourth, Les Compères du roi Louis (1923), that of the Comédie Française. In 1927 Fort was awarded the Prix Lasserre; in the same year he and Louis Mandin published their Histoire de la poésie française depuis 1850. It early became evident that, in so voluminous a poetic output, some sort of sifting would be imperative. Choix de ballades françaises (1913) was the first of many Paul Fort anthologies, the latest of them having been published since the disaster of 1940 by the poet's friends, in attempted mitigation of his extreme poverty.

Like all poets whose inspiration is abundant, facile, and uneven, Fort tends to repeat himself. Although sometimes reckoned a symbolist, he seems rather a belated romantic strayed into a fog that has some relation to symbolism, and out again. Specialist of the ballad, he makes effective use of the traditional themes of popular poetry. With them he has made many gay and charming songs. He delights in the lively, the colorful, the picturesque; less naïve than it appears, this picturesqueness is not exempt from preciousness and often a rather too complacent (if agreeably ironic) sentimentality. At times he verges on semi-greatness. Although employing rhyme and alexandrines, he takes every kind of liberty with both. His rhymes shade into assonance, his alexandrines into highly rhythmic prose. While he has been acclaimed as a precursor of the vers libristes and a creator of new metrical forms, his innovation would appear to consist in the device of printing a ballad stanza in the form of a paragraph of prose. But his poems retain their vitality and freshness, for his exuberance is inexhaustible. He is the Peter Pan of French poetry, with a world of ballads for his Never-Never Land. As poet, chronicler, and animator of literary movements, his measure of fame seems secure.

See: Rémy de Gourmont, Promenades littéraires, Vol. IV (1912); Adolphe van Bever and Paul Léautaud, Poètes d'aujourd'hui (1929), Vol. I.

J. Me.

Forzano, Giovacchino (1884–, Italian playwright and librettist), born at Borgo San Lorenzo in Florence province, has had a kaleidoscopic career. He studied medicine, sang as a baritone, and obtained a law degree. In the field of journalism he has been editor and director of small, local newspapers as well as the Nazione di Firenze. He has also been stage director of such theatres as La Scala of Milan and Opera Reale of Rome. His talents and experience have been used by the Italian moving picture industry, for which he has directed many films.

Forzano's theatrical production has been prodigious. His buoyant temperament, facile wit, and amazing versatility have made him the idol of the masses and one of Italy's foremost box-office attractions. His immense popularity is due to the wide range and variety of subjects treated, his fertility of invention, and his skill in maintaining the interest of the audience. The scene of Sly (1920) is a London tavern of 17th-century England; in Tien-Hoa (1924) a Chinese girl commits suicide to keep faith with her dream of love; in Gutlibi (1925) a Senegalese boxer becomes involved in the intrigues of Bolshevik politics in Serbia; and in Jack Broder (1929) an immigrant Italian girl, masquerading as a young man, becomes a famous American screen star. Forzano is at his best in the creation of light comedies in which the sentimental, comic, and even tragic elements are expertly blended. His Madonna Oretta (1918) and Le Campanie di San Lucio (1916), of a gay, sparkling humor and colorful in their highly flavored Tuscan dialogue, belong to this class. Sly, already mentioned, is the offspring of Shakespeare's prologue to The Taming of the Shrew; Forzano transforms Christopher Sly, the drunken tinker, into a wine-loving poet who, upon awakening in the lord's palace after his abduction, falls in love with the latter's mistress. In the most powerful scene of the play, Sly professes his love in beautifully sensitive and touching verses which recall Cyrano addressing Roxane (see Rostand).

The French Revolution has inspired many of Forzano's historical dramas: Il Conte di Brécard (1923), I Fiordalisi d'oro (1924), Madame Roland (1926), Danton (1930), and Campo di Maggio (1930; Eng. adaptation, Napoleon, the Hundred Days, 1932). For this last-named play and for Villafranca (1931) Mussolini suggested the themes. In Campo di Maggio, Napoleon is somewhat extraordinarily portrayed as animated by love of humanity, devoted to family, generous with friend and foe, and inspired by a desire to weld all European nations into a happy, peaceful union.

The more serious critics have deplored Forzano's prolific output and have often classified him as a Scribe or a Sardou (q.v.). It is to be regretted that a writer as gifted as Forzano has viewed the theatre solely as a medium for providing entertainment and achieving "success" rather than as a vehicle for the study of real people and their problems. Forzano also wrote many librettos for operas by such famous composers as Mascagni, Franchetti, Puccini, Wolf-Ferrari, Leoncavallo, Randegger, and Lehar.

See: G. Ruberti, Storia del teatro contemporaneo, II (1928), 687-689.

P. P. M.

Fournier, Alain- (pseud. of Henri Fournier, 1886-1914, French novelist), was born near Bourges, Cher, at La Chapelle-d'Angillon, where his parents were schoolteachers. His childhood was remarkable chiefly for the intense joy he took in his surroundings, a joy that became nostalgic with the passage of time. After pursuing at Brest studies intended to prepare him for the merchant marine, he abandoned the idea of going to sea and went to the Lycée Lakanal, near Paris, to prepare for the Ecole Normale Supérieure. At Lakanal he met Jacques Rivière, (q.v.), later to be his brother-in-law; in 1905, when Fournier spent a summer in England, began the voluminous correspondence, since published, which is such a valuable source of information on the intellectual and spiritual life of the two young men. For two successive years Fournier failed in his entrance examinations for the Ecole Normale. He spent two years in military service, practiced journalism, and in 1913 published Le Grand Meaulnes, his only completed novel and the basis of his reputation. Fragments of Colombe Blanchet, the novel upon which he was working when war broke out in 1914, were published after the war by the Nouvelle Revue française (December, 1922); Miracles, a collection of stories and verse, some of them previously published in periodicals, appeared in 1924. Fournier was killed in action in September, 1914.

The first vague plans and sketches for what was to become Le Grand Meaulnes date back to about 1902 and seem to have their origin in Fournier's desire to express his emotions about the scenes of his childhood. By 1905 he called the projected book Les Gens du Domaine. His literary ideas were under the influence of such writers as Régnier, Mallarmé, Rimbaud, Francis Jammes (qq.v.; Claudel and Gide, qq.v., were to come later), and his basic idea was symbolist in character: he planned to write, not about the immediate scene, but about the invisible one behind it. In the final form of the novel, however, this "other landscape" appears only indirectly. Le Grand Meaulnes is a story of love and adventure, its protagonists are very human adolescents, its settings basically realistic. But the chief source of its elusive charm is the continual suggestion of deeper significance.

As interesting as the novel is the spiritual adventure which lies behind it and which is revealed by Fournier's letters. In them can be traced the evolution of the "Domain" from a place to a state of mind. They tell of Mlle de Q., or Yvonne de Galais as Fournier was to call her in Le Grand Meaulnes, the young woman twice seen in 1905, but at once absorbed into his Domain; they show her becoming a symbol, a Beatrice. Before Le Grand Meaulnes was finished, there came a check in this definitely mystical trend; and the refusal, the sense of contamination and of loss which accompanied this check, took their place in the novel beside the suggestion of the Domain.

See: Jacques Rivière, "Introduction," in Alain-Fournier, Miracles (1924); Havelock Ellis, From Rousseau to Proust (1935), pp. 345-362; Henri Peyre, Hommes et œuvres du XXe siècle (1938), pp. 179-212; Harold March, "The 'Other Landscape' of Alain-Fournier," Publications of the Modern Language Association, LVI (1941), 266-279.

H. M. M.

France, Anatole (pseud. of Jacques Anatole Thibault, 1844-1924, French novelist, story writer, poet, critic, and historian), was widely regarded in his time as the "prince of letters" and the leading exemplar of French intelligence, wisdom, and wit, on whom had fallen the mantle of Voltaire and of Renan (q.v.). While the future will probably not wholly ratify his contemporaries' high estimate, it will certainly rescue him from his present relative disfavor among critics and give him a distinguished place in his country's gallery of literary figures. Though he was not gifted with a powerful creative imagination, he possessed an admirably perceptive, comprehensive, and well-furnished mind and a delicate, responsive sensibility that made him perhaps the most lucid "witness" of his age. His understanding of the traditions and character of his country gave him an impressive authority as its spokesman both at home and abroad.

He was born in Paris, the only son of a bookdealer who had a small shop on the Quai Malaquais. The world of books became his natural habitat, and though he was far from being an exemplary student and failed to graduate from the Marist Collège Stanislas, all his life he was a voracious reader, with a prodigious memory and a sixth sense which made books extraordinarily real and living to him. Rather shy and retiring, yet fond of good conversation and later a brilliant talker in small groups, addicted to "silent orgies of meditation," yet responsive to feminine charm and delighting in the equivocal comedy of sex, he was more at home in the study and the library than in the drawing room or boudoir. His life was almost entirely spent in reading and "scribbling in the margins of old books." Aside from a few trips to Italy, a brief Mediterranean voyage, a lecture tour to Buenos Aires, and a visit to Sweden to receive the Nobel prize in literature, Paris remained his home until he retired, at 70, to his country place, La Béchellerie, in Touraine. His marriage in 1877 to Valérie Guérin, by whom he had a daughter, Suzanne, was at first a happy one; it was at this time that his writing showed a certain sentimental vein and that his first tender reminiscences of childhood and stories for children—Abeille (1883) and Nos Enfants (1896)—were produced. But incompatibilities led to a divorce in 1892, and during the following 20 years, which form his most productive period, he was inspired and somewhat dominated by Mme Arman de Caillavet, the great love of his life. His last years were melancholy, though he outwardly showed an Olympian serenity. He was given a state funeral that had not been equaled in pomp since that of Victor Hugo 40 years before, while the young generation of writers raised a cry of revolt against one who had held the center of the stage too long and who incarnated a literary ideal on which it had resolutely turned its back.

His first published writings were a study of Alfred de Vigny (1868), a sheaf of critical articles which he contributed to small reviews, and poems in the Parnassian spirit, the best of which he collected in Les Poèmes dorés (1872). These show a reverence for the classic tradition, to remain with him throughout his life, and a distinguished if not original poetic talent reaching its peak in a poetic drama, Les Noces corinthiennes (1876). His first attempts in prose narrative, Jocaste and Le Chat maigre (both 1879), show many influences and lack almost wholly the distinctive Anatolian "manner." This is a complex blend of irony, tenderness, sensuality, love of beauty, worldly wisdom, and studied disingenuousness, sprinkled with literary allusions culled from many sources, which first revealed itself in Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard (1881) and Le Livre de mon ami (1885). When in 1888 Adrien Hébrard appointed him to the literary editorship of the Temps, he was able for the first time to display his special qualities as a writer—and perhaps also his special limitations—to the full. His excellence, indeed, lies not so much in his ability to meet the demands of sustained work as in the immediate impact of his style, reflecting his many-faceted mind, the infinite play of his fancy and his memory around a great variety of themes. As a critic he was the leading impressionist of the period and affirmed the inescapable subjectivity of all judgments.

In 1897 he was at the height of his fame. He had been elected to the French Academy; Thaïs (1890), L'Etui de nacre (1892), La Rôtisserie de la reine Pédauque (1893), Le Lys rouge (1894), and Le Jardin d'Epicure (1894), among others, had been published. Master of language, he wrote in a pure classic style, enriched by the cadences and colors of the romantics which he adapted to the taste of the sophisticated, self-indulgent, world-weary intellectual élite of the day. Two things preserved Anatole France from becoming what some have been tempted to see in him, a facile purveyor of literary pleasure: these were a hard core of peasant soundness and a sense of kinship with the common people. Beneath his many moods and apparent contradictions, beneath what frequently could be taken for frivolity and intellectual irresponsibility, he shows attachment to the simple virtues of truth, justice, and goodness. Though he was mild by temperament and his far-roaming intelligence inclined him to detachment, he had a strong social sense which aligned him in the tradition of the French Revolution and led him to take sides in political issues and champion popular causes. With Zola (q.v.) he defended Dreyfus in the famous "affair." He flayed superstition, intolerance, injustice, demagoguery, and dictatorship, eloquently defended freedom of thought, liberal education, and science, and advocated mass education, the separation of church and state, social reform, labor organization, and the rights of minorities. He became a friend and admirer of the great socialist Jean Jaurès, a supporter of the Russian Revolution, and an advocate of socialism. After 1897 his work increasingly assumed the character of social satire. His strongest and most imaginative writing is contained in the four loosely constructed novels that compose L'Histoire contemporaine (1897–1901) and in L'Affaire Crainquebille (1901), L'Île des Pingouins (1908), and La Révolte des anges (1914), all of which involve broad political and social issues and make sharp, sweeping indictments of contemporary society. His monumental Vie de Jeanne d'Arc (1908), in the tradition of Renan's Vie de Jésus, is his chief bid for consideration as a historian. Most of the writings of Anatole France have been translated into English.

He was keenly aware of living at the end of an era, in a period of transition when new forces were in germination. Though he brings nothing essentially new to the world of literature, his work as a whole constitutes, with the inevitable limitations of perspective imposed by time and place, a brilliant summation of several centuries of French thought and life. A modern and heretical heir of the Greco-Roman and Christian traditions, in his stories and novels he revives scenes of the Alexandrian period, the Italian Renaissance, the French middle ages, the 18th century, and the period of the French Revolution. He heightens his pictures of the past with adumbrations of the present and those of the present with echoes of the past.

The key to his mind and temper is irony, a disposition to view all things in the double light of appearance and reality, to subject words, acts, institutions, to the test of a displaced perspective which brings out a contrast between the intent and its social projection. His world is one in which such ambivalences have infinite play and in which the relativity of time and place, plus the subjectivity of any human view, give a fleeting and uncertain consistency to phenomena.

See: Gustave Michaut, Anatole France; étude psychologique (1913); Léon Carias, Anatole France (1931); Haakon M. Chevalier, The Ironic Temper: Anatole France and His Time (1932); E. Preston Dargan, Anatole France, 1844-1896 (1937, in English).

H. M. C.

Frank, Bruno (1886-1945, German novelist, dramatist and poet), born in Stuttgart, studied at several universities in South Germany, taking the Ph.D. degree at Heidelberg. He lived as a writer near Munich until, after 1933, he left Germany; the United States was his home for some years before his death.

Frank began his literary career in 1905 as a poet; Aus der goldenen Schale (3d ed., Gedichte, 1907) contains graceful but not very original lyrics. Selected poems of the next years were published in Die Kelter (1920). Only a few among the many earlier novels, stories, and dramas which Frank wrote were successful, notably the novel Die Fürstin (1915) and the drama Die Schwestern und der Fremde (1918). It was not until after 1920 that Frank found the artistic formula that made him internationally known. He once wrote, "The masses detest being bored, they need strong stimuli." Adhering to this formula, he builds plots full of action around psychologically modernized historical figures or events, as in Tage des Königs; drei Erzählungen (1924; Eng. tr., The Days of the King, 1927), Trenck; Roman eines Günstlings (1926; Eng. tr., Trenck; the Love Story of a Favourite, 1928), the drama Zwölftausend (1926; Eng. tr., Twelve Thousand, 1928), the novel Ein Mann namens Cervantes (1934; Eng. tr., A Man Called Cervantes, 1934); or he piques the reader's curiosity by using well-known, if thinly veiled contemporary personalities as subjects for more or less fantastic stories, as in Der Magier (1925) and Politische Novelle (1928). The novel Der Reisepass (1927; Eng. tr., Lost Heritage, 1937), a love story among émigrés, makes use of popular anti-Nazi feelings to hold the interest of the reader. A novel, Die Tochter, was published in Mexico City in 1943 (Eng. tr., One Fair Daughter, 1943).

W. R. G.

Frank, Leonhard (1882-, German novelist and dramatist), was born at Würzburg, the son of a cabinetmaker. At the age of 13 he became the apprentice of a bicycle mechanic. For some time he tried to make a living as a factory hand, a chauffeur, a house painter, and a hospital attendant. At 30 he wrote his first novel, Die Räuberbande (1914; Eng. tr., The Robber Band, 1928), the story of several Würzburg boys who, named after some characters from Karl May's (q.v.) books, took part as disguised "brigands" in a series of romantic adventures and pranks. In a sequel to this story, Das Ochsenfurter Männerquartett (1927; Eng. tr., The Singers, 1932), the revolutionary tunes of Die Räuberbande are softened into a bitter-sweet scherzo on the theme of boys turning bourgeois: we now meet the old "brigands" as middle-aged men who have abandoned their adventurous spirit after the war. Frank's second novel, Die Ursache (1920; Eng. tr., The Cause of the Crime, 1928), proved his talents as an original narrator. With this book he joined the ranks of those who exploited revolt against the old order as a literary theme; it is full of warlike compassion for the innocently guilty creatures who are the victims of a coercive educational system. There was also a Freudian influence behind this protest inasmuch as it showed that not only moral but also psychological motives of repressed feelings in childhood are the cause of such a rebellious attitude.

When the First World War broke out, Frank left Germany and went to Switzerland as a refugee, where he became a member of a Zurich group of anti-war writers. Here his Der Mensch ist gut (1917) was written, a powerful, humanitarian denunciation of the war spirit, the first of its kind in German literature. The book was a great success and even during the war was widely read, in spite of its ghastly picture of suffering. It may have contributed to the weakening of the German home front. In any case it was enough in itself to make Frank again depart from Germany after 1933, when he joined the many recently exiled German writers. In 1924, still impressed by the revolution of 1918, he produced the novel Der Bürger (Eng. tr., A Middle-Class Man, 1930), less remarkable for its plot than for its style, similar to the technique employed in a movie script with its rapidly changing scenes. After this book Frank was definitely classed with the expressionists. In his short story Karl und Anna (1927; Eng. tr., 1929) he succeeded in presenting one of the most original variants of the Enoch Arden motif of the husband's return, but the story is centered primarily around sexual and not patriotic problems. Two years afterward he recast this novel into a very effective and successful play under the same title (1929; Eng. tr., 1929). Of his many short stories Im letzten Wagen (1925; Eng. tr., In the Last Coach and Other Stories, 1935) seems especially typical of his art, which skillfully combines sensationalism and psychological cruelty. More and more Frank disengaged himself from any allegiance to his native land, and the ground of his narratives became the wide world of international affairs. A large number of his books have been translated into foreign languages.

See: W. Mahrholz, Deutsche Literatur der Gegenwart (1930), pp. 399-403; J. Bithell, Modern German Literature, 1880-1938 (1939), pp. 411-413.

H. Sch.

French literature (see also French naturalism, French symbolism). The years between 1870 and 1940 undoubtedly constitute one of the richest periods in the history of French letters. Seldom had French literature proved more boldly original than under the Third Republic. Its prestige and influence abroad rose higher than at any other time except during the age of classicism and the Enlightenment.

Literary evolution does not necessarily coincide with the sharply outlined fluctuations of political, social, and military history. No other date, however, could provide such a logical starting point for an account of modern French literature as the year 1870. The brutal events which then shook France brought to the fore tendencies which might otherwise have remained dormant for many years. Between 1869 and 1876 the last survivors of the great romantic generation died—Lamartine, Sainte-Beuve, Mérimée, Dumas père, Gautier, Michelet, Quinet, George Sand. Hugo alone lived on, a universally respected patriarch of French letters, though of little influence on younger poets. Until about 1885 the main intellectual currents were those which had succeeded and opposed romanticism. Positivism was the most widespread philosophical attitude. Science was worshiped by many; mechanistic and determinist explanations of the universe and of man were generally accepted; metaphysical speculation was ridiculed as futile. Emile Littré (1801-1881), Claude Bernard (1813-1878), Marcelin Berthelot (1827-1907), and the psychologist Théodule Ribot (1839-1916) were the chief representatives of scientific positivism, even while another great scientist, Louis Pasteur (1822-1895), asserted his faith in spiritual and Catholic beliefs. The chief influence on literature was that of Taine (q.v.), through his critical theories advanced during the Second Empire and his philosophical study, De l'intelligence (1870). After the war and the Commune, Taine turned almost exclusively to the writing of history and did not conceal his disapproval of the realistic novelists and the poets of the new school. His ambitious work, in 12 volumes, Les Origines de la France contemporaine, suffers in retrospect from his excessive passion for generalization. However, it impressed many French writers (Bourget, Barrès, Maurras, qq.v.), through its severe appraisal of the faults of the French Revolution. Until his death in 1893 the prestige of Taine was immense, owing to his encyclopedic knowledge, splendid intellectual integrity, and ardent though somewhat artificial style. Since then it has declined noticeably, while Renan (q.v.), often associated with Taine as the chief guiding spirit of the years 1870-1900, remains to this day a powerful influence. His Souvenirs d'enfance et de jeunesse (1883) won many readers to his harmonious and lucid prose. As a historian of religion, his work, even when superseded by subsequent research, stands unrivaled for its subtle portrayal of souls and vivid evocation of scenery. As a political thinker he censured the excesses of democracy after 1871, advocating an austere moral and intellectual reform of France; but he soon adopted a more liberal attitude toward the republican regime and branded with prophetic insight the evils which unchecked nationalism and racial ideas would unleash in Europe. His philosophy, which he never tried to organize into a logical system, reacting against positivism and materialism, conceived of the universe as animated by a "mobile becoming" and a mysterious "nisus"—notions which prepared many minds for the élan vital of Bergson (q.v.). Loti, France, Lemaître (qq.v.), and Barrès owed much to Renan's assertion that religious felling should be preserved and purified while religious dogmas were being ruthlessly discarded. "He Christianized us," Barrès wrote of Renan in 1923. Besides Taine and Renan, mention must be made of two important philosophers, Antoine Cournot (1801–1877) and Charles Renouvier (1815–1903), whose influence on literature was relatively slight, and of two original essayists, Henri Frédéric Amiel (q.v.) and Louis Ménard (1822–1901), both torn between analysis and reverie, between nostalgia for the past and acceptance of modern science. In literary criticism Montégut (q.v.), through his wide curiosity and his refined style, and to a lesser extent Scherer and Weiss (qq.v.) seemed the least unworthy successors of Sainte-Beuve. After Taine and Renan the most important prose writer outside the field of fiction, although with a great narrative gift, was Gobineau (q.v.). He died in 1882, neglected by his contemporaries, but his fame soon spread, first in Germany, where his influence became considerable on Wagner, Nietzsche (qq.v.), and other exponents of racial theories. His philosophy of history hardly stands the test of critical examination; but Les Pléiades (1874), Nouvelles asiatiques (1876), and some of his posthumously published works are remarkable for their literary charm and the originality of an acute and independent mind, reminiscent of Stendhal at his best.

In the novel the years 1870–1885 saw the triumph of naturalism (see French naturalism). Flaubert's (q.v.) gospel of artistic and impersonal realism was strikingly reiterated in his posthumous works Bouvard et Pécuchet (1881) and Correspondance (1884–1892). The Goncourt brothers, Huysmans, and even Alphonse Daudet (qq.v.), with his sensitive and humorous realism, have lost much of their earlier appeal. Maupassant (q.v.) remains unrivaled in his short stories, but succeeded less conspicuously in the creation of character, although he has been much admired outside of France as a novelist. Zola's (q.v.) stature has risen since his death: his pseudoscientific and sociological theories have been exploded, but his epic imagination, his powerful inspiration, his brutal and massive strength, rank him among the great masters of the French novel. Two original temperaments, Jules Vallès and Barbey d'Aurevilly (qq.v.), the latter a colorful stylist and a brilliant storyteller rather than a novelist, remained outside of naturalism. A third one, Paul Arène (1843–1896), wrote of his native Provence with a delicate and racy flavor equal to that of Daudet.

The drama of the years 1870–1885 trailed behind the novel. The comedy of manners maintained a conventional technique with Alexandre Dumas fils (1824–1895), Edouard Pailleron (1834–1899), Henry Meilhac (1831–1897), and Ludovic Halévy (1834–1908). Eugène Labiche (1815–1888) enjoyed lasting success in light, almost farcical comedy.

Poetry seemed, until 1885, to be chiefly characterized by Parnassian tendencies—worship of art for art's sake, aloofness from the present, colorful and often ponderous evocation of ancient or "barbarian" cultures and religions, emphasis on sculptural beauty and elaborate technique. Leconte de Lisle (q.v.), however, occasionally struck a profoundly moving note in his more personal poems, and Heredia (q.v.) developed an impeccable technique for the sonnet. The minor Parnassians, including Banville (q.v.), whose fanciful and decorative verse Mallarmé (q.v.) esteemed, and once overrated talents such as Coppée and Mendès (qq.v.) were soon eclipsed by the advent of more original poets. Sully-Prudhomme (q.v.) deserves a partial rehabilitation today, as do the philosophical poets Jean Lahor (1840–1909) and, even more, Charles Cros (1842–1888).

A marked change became perceptible in the intellectual atmosphere around 1885–1890. Positivism and determinism no longer satisfied the youth or the scientists themselves. The validity of scientific laws was declared by many thinkers to be merely relative and statistical. Some rash prophets proclaimed "the bankruptcy of science." A formula borrowed from Herbert Spencer, "the Unknowable," was seized upon as making allowance for the mystery in the universe. Hegel and Schopenhauer were repeatedly quoted and occasionally read by French men of letters and were revered as teachers of philosophical idealism. Boutroux (q.v.) became the most eminent in a group of philosophers, among whom were Jules Lachelier (1832–1918), Alfred Fouillée (1838–1912), Marie Jean Guyau (1854–1888), and the great mathematician Henri Poincaré (1854–1912), who asserted the relativity of scientific laws and the irreducibility of mental and moral forces to physical phenomena. Bergson, whose first work appeared in 1889, was soon to provide a rallying point for the new tendencies.

The poets, long subdued by the prestige of Hugo (who died in 1885) and of the Parnassian school, suddenly leaped to the vanguard of literary evolution and have remained to this day the boldest and most original element in French literature. The last 15 years of the 19th century may be called the age of symbolism (see French symbolism). Baudelaire (q.v.) was hailed as the forerunner of the movement. Rimbaud (q.v.), who had abandoned literature in 1873, was discovered. The younger poets grouped themselves around Verlaine (q.v.) and Mallarmé. By the close of the century it became clear that a major revolution, affecting both content and technique, had occurred in French poetry.

Prose writers remained comparatively untouched by symbolism, an essentially poetical movement. Villiers de l'Isle-Adam (q.v.) is the only important storyteller who invested with a flamboyant and sonorous prose the idealistic visions of the symbolists. Laforgue (q.v.) died prematurely, before he could outgrow the humorous boyishness of his bitter talent. The expert artistry of Pierre Louÿs (q.v.) was at its best, not in his ingenious tales, but in his rare poems and prose poems. Rémy de Gourmont (q.v.), who tried his hand at the novel in a dry, cold manner, proved in criticism a keen expert at "disassociating ideas" and an original interpreter of the new literary tendencies. Marcel Schwob (q.v.) had likewise more delicacy of touch and wealth of erudition than imaginative gifts. Teodor de Wyzewa, a Pole, and Edouard Schuré (qq.v.), an Alsatian, both passionately fond of music, versed in several foreign literatures, and attracted by esoteric doctrines, were occasionally interesting critics. Vogüé (q.v.), whose novels are forgotten, widened the intellectual horizon of his generation through his pioneer work on the Russian novel (1886). The three leading critics of that period opposed symbolism as well as most of the new aspirations of their times: they championed French classicism and extolled the virtues of lucidity and order. Brunetière (q.v.), who attempted to judge literary works by dogmatic standards, to carry the notion of evolution into aesthetic history, and to uphold traditional moral values, suffers in retrospect from his conservative prejudices and oratorical style. Lemaître, who stood in sharp contrast to him, displaying nonchalant irony in his impressionistic articles, lacked the vigor and boldness of a great critic. Faguet (q.v.) wrote with an overabundant facility, but at his best evinced remarkable gifts as an analyst of ideas and a portrayer of intellectual temperaments, especially in his Politiques et moralistes (3 vols., 1891–1900). The most influential dramatic critic of the period, Sarcey (q.v.), did little to win the public to innovations of the stage. Fustel de Coulanges (1830–1889), a worthy successor of Taine and Tocqueville in his austere and systematic interpretations of the past, and Albert Sorel (1842–1906) were the most notable historians. Gaston Paris, Lanson, and Bédier (qq.v.) renovated literary history through an original combination of solid scientific discipline and artistic taste.

The French novel of the years 1885–1900, sharing in the general reaction against naturalism, shifted its emphasis from the minute description of reality to the analysis of psychological motives and a sympathetic rendering of men's emotions. Irony and pity alternated in the works of the two most popular novelists of the period, France and Loti. Each of them has left three or four masterpieces among a score of less significant works. Neither of them could contrive a dramatic plot, forgetting himself and endowing imaginative characters with life. Bourget was a conscientious builder of novels in the Balzacian manner. His heroes, however, often appear as too logically conceived; they embody intellectual or moral problems, but fail to haunt the reader like the more spontaneous characters of Balzac or Zola. His volumes of criticism, from the early Essais de psychologie contemporaine (2 vols., 1883–1885) to Quelques Témoignages (1928), show Bourget at his best as an intellectual analyst. Régnier, Hermant, and Marcel Prévost (qq.v.) brought to the novel their subtle gifts of irony and style in the best 18th-century tradition, but lacked the imaginative power which the creation of plot and character seems to demand. J. H. Rosny (1856–1940), Renard (q.v.), Mirbeau (q.v.), and Paul Adam (q.v.), who grasped reality with more vigor and tried to depict the contemporary world, failed to fulfill the promise of their early works.

On the French stage the most significant event between 1870 and 1900 was the founding of the Théâtre Libre by Antoine (q.v.) in 1887. Becque (q.v.) had already given two plays whose brutal truth, skillful characterization, and terse dialogue were not unworthy of Molière. Antoine accustomed Parisian audiences to realistic plays and pioneering innovations in the staging and the acting. His chief claim to fame may well lie in his discovery of several new playwrights—François de Curel, Brieux, Porto-Riche (qq.v.)—and to his courageous championing of foreign plays by Ibsen, Tolstoy, Hauptmann (qq.v.), et al. Soon after, in 1893, Lugné-Poe (q.v.) opened his Théâtre de l'Œuvre, which staged many foreign plays and launched several of the boldest French dramatic attempts by Jarry, Crommelynck, Couteau (qq.v.), et al. Both the Théâtre de l'Œuvre and Paul Fort's (q.v.) Théâtre d'Art, the latter founded in 1891, attempted to revitalize the drama through symbolism. Such a poetical invasion of the stage, though salutary after the realistic excesses of Antoine's Théâtre Libre and the didactic preaching of Curot and Brieux, was bound to be short-lived. Maeterlinck (q.v.) was the only dramatist among the symbolists who reached wide popularity: his ethereal dream-like characters, his mechanical suggestion of atmosphere, and the mannerism of his style have been judged severely by later generations. So have the colorful rhetoric and the dazzling verve of Rostand (q.v.). Nevertheless Cyrano de Bergerac (1897) and L'Aiglon (1900) remain the only poetic dramas since Corneille and Hugo which have caught the imagination of the French public at large.

At the turn of the century France was torn by the profound spiritual crisis which resulted from the Dreyfus case. Literature was invaded by political feuds. Historians, political thinkers, moralists, aligned themselves either with the democratic forces which insisted upon extending the liberal gains of the French Revolution farther in the social field or with the conservative elements which preferred traditional order to progress and dreamed nostalgically of the stately hierarchy of pre-revolutionary France. In the realm of pure philosophy the years 1900–1913 saw the triumph of Bergsonism. The notions of creative evolution, of the supremacy of intuition over intellectual deduction, of duration as opposed to time, and of the perpetual mobility of a world in which free will was restored and spiritual energy vindicated, corresponded to the aspirations of the generation which had grown up in the days of symbolism. Georges Sorel, Péguy, Thibaudet (qq.v.), professional philosophers such as Le Roy (1870–) and Chevalier (1882–), even artistic temperaments like Proust (q.v.), came under the spell of the new philosophy, which reshaped and reinforced the deep-seated Pascalian tendencies of French thought. Benda (q.v.), a staunch supporter of pure intellectualism, and Maritain (q.v.), who discerned a dangerous pantheistic current in a philosophy which seemed to distrust intelligence and Thomist rationalism, were in 1912–1914 the most vigorous opponents of Bergsonism. The other eminent French philosophers of that time were the sociologists Tard and Durkheim (qq.v.). Political thinkers of radical or socialist tendencies were rare in 20th-century France, and the lack was fraught with grave consequences in a country in which ideological doctrines hold much prestige over practical politics. Georges Sorel blended

Bergsonism and Marxism in an original system advocating action and violence as more fruitful than theoretical meditation: his socialism has proved influential chiefly on recent totalitarian doctrines. Jaurès (1859–1914), an eloquent orator and a prophetic historian, and Blum (q.v.), a subtle literary critic and a refined stylist, failed to develop an original body of thought to support their socialist policies, and this was true also of the champions of "radical" doctrines, Edouard Herriot (1872–, in Agir, 1917, and Créer, 1919) and the penetrating essayist Alain (pseud. of Emile Chartier, q.v.). The first decade of the 20th century was accompanied in France as in other countries (Kipling, Nietzsche and his Pan-Germanist successors, D'Annunzio, q.v.) by a revival of nationalist ideas. Barrès, whose group novel Les Déracinés had appeared as early as 1897, expounded his romantic religion of the soil, the race, and the dead, in most of his subsequent works. Maurras became the priest of neoclassical paganism in his graceful Anthinée (1901) and of royalist doctrines in his Enquête sur la monarchie, 1900–1909 (1909; definitive ed., 1924) and in his newspaper, Action française (a daily since 1908). His influence on literature has been profound, although his purely literary merits seem to have been much overestimated by partisanship. Bainville (q.v.) was the most lucid historian in that group, Léon Daudet (q.v.) the most robust and humorous polemist. The cogent but fallacious logic of their reasoning convinced a few critics of dogmatist tendencies, who laid most evils of modern literature to romanticism, itself an offshoot of Rousseauism and revolutionary ideas—Pierre Lasserre (1867–1930), Seillière (q.v.), Massis (q.v.), and even, more recently, Daniel Halévy (1882–). The greatest essayist of the early 20th century was, however, a thinker more illogical than all these, but nearer to the soul of the people of France and always open to the unpredictable élan vital celebrated by Bergson—Charles Péguy. He was at the same time a socialist and a Christian, a fierce patriot, a tireless reasoner, and a mystic. He wrote too much and too hastily and indulged in mannerisms of style which gave a racy flavor to his prose but weakened his poetry. As a literary critic, as a Bergsonian philosopher, as a Catholic interpreter of medieval faith, and as an ardent champion of social justice and Christian charity, Péguy remains to this day the chief representative of France's conflicting aspirations before the First World War.

Those years did not witness any outstanding development in the drama or the novel. The bold innovations of realistic and symbolist drama were followed by a relapse into conventional plays of love, jealousy, and social satire. Tristan Bernard, Capus, Donnay, Flers, and Caillavet (qq.v.) were all skillful masters of witty comedy; Henri Lavedan (1859–1940), Bataille (q.v.), Sacha Guitry (q.v.), and the most expert builder of plots among them, Bernstein (q.v.), moved as well as entertained their audiences for several decades. None of their works can lay claim to permanent survival as literature. Courteline (q.v.) displayed more racy verve in his ebullient farces with occasionally tragic undertones. The most popular among the French novelists in that decade was Romain Rolland (q.v.). His Jean-Christophe (1904–1912), however, was more successful in translation with foreign readers than at home: the French have always balked at Rolland's inelegant style, at the loose structure of his serial novel, and at the lack of originality of his psychological revelation. La Colline inspirée (1913) by Barrès suffers from just the opposite faults, strained pathos and overwrought prose. The best secondary talents among the novelists who preceded Proust were Renard (q.v.), a craftsman in a limited field, Philippe (q.v.), who continued and enriched the realistic tradition, Boylesve (q.v.), a delicate and modest artist, and Estaunié (q.v.), a more moving creator, obsessed with the tragedy of human suffering.

After 1900 poetry was the branch of literature most fertile in bold innovations. Symbolism had been attacked as soon as it seemed to have succeeded in its revolutionary attempts. The different tendencies or "schools" which undertook to replace it all proved abortive or sterile. The Ecole Romane, which advocated a return to classical or medieval models, could boast of only one gifted poet, its standard-bearer, Moréas (q.v.). Like most neoclassical tendencies, it mistook prosaic coldness for classical perfection and reiteration of the obvious for lucidity. Régnier and Gérard d'Houville (q.v.) reached graceful elegance in their aristocratic evocation of Greek and Alexandrian models, but could not lead the way to a poetical renaissance. Charles Guérin (1873–1907) was a felicitous and often moving successor to the Parnassian tradition; Louis Le Cardonnell (1862–1936) and Alibert (q.v.) sang with Vergilian ease and grace of mystic Italy and southern France. Toulet (q.v.) blended irony with tenderness in his verse, Fagus (q.v.) recaptured a few Villonian accents, and Spire (q.v.) proved an original technician and theorist of verse as well as a gifted poet. Two currents opposed symbolism with more success early in the 20th century. The first, naturism, was hardly successful under that name: it advocated the worship of life, reality, nature, and emotion and admired Walt Whitman. It then reappeared as unanimism and celebrated the group and its spiritual roots, the poetry of city life, the sentimental kinship of Europeans, and the fraternity of all men. The inspiration of these poets (Arcos, Chennevière, Martin-Barzun, Duhamel) and their style proved unequal to their great themes. Romain Rolland (q.v.), who became the theorist of unanimism, never mastered the language of poetry. Vildrac (q.v.) wrote more musical verse. The powerful Belgian poet Verhaeren (q.v.), Jammes (q.v.) in the more truly naïve masterpieces written before he cultivated his simplicity, and Fort in his fresh though monotonous ballads were the true apostles of the return to nature and robust health after the decadent eccentricities—all three were sons and heirs of the symbolist movement. Anna de Noailles (q.v.) poured out her tragic and eloquent lamentations on death, old age, and the tortures of love; she celebrated beauty, youth, and nature with pagan fire and romantic exuberance. The form she used lacked originality and subtlety, and her rhetoric lacked the restrained and poignant music which a few readers appreciated in another woman poet, also of foreign origin, Renée Vivien (q.v.).

The years 1900–1914 seem today, with the perspective of three decades, to have been dominated by two great poetical figures, Claudel and Apollinaire (qq.v.). Claudel is the most powerful Catholic singer ever born in France. As a creator of grandiose images, as a cosmic evocator of a universe all instinct with God's presence, as an eloquent successor to Rimbaud and—little as he would admit it—to Hugo, he stands unrivaled among 20th-century French poets. His best works appeared in 1910 (Cinq Grandes Odes) and 1913 (Cette Heure qui est entre le printemps et l'été, reprinted in 1931 as La Cantate à trois voix). Apollinaire struck a more modest note of melancholy tenderness; he transfigured familiar life with his playful humor and brought the themes and rhythms of the French folk song back into poetry. As an art critic and a champion of all aesthetic innovations he opened most of the new paths of later literary evolution. His friends Salmon, Carco (in La Bohème et mon cœur, 1912), and the disconcerting Jacob (qq.v.), alternately the humblest mystic and the strangest mystifier, deserve positions beside him.

Suddenly, around 1911–1913, a number of significant works appeared which revealed a true literary renaissance. After a decade of hesitation the new century seemed to have found itself. In painting, Cézanne was belatedly recognized; the "Fauves" and the cubists were struggling for new modes of expression. The Russian ballet had in 1909 revealed a new decorative art, and Stravinsky's Rites of Spring (1913) seized the Parisian vanguard with enthusiasm. Dostoevski's (q.v.) novels were eagerly read and imitated. The Nouvelle Revue française was founded (1909) to voice the emergent literary aspirations, and the theatre of the Vieux Colombier was established (1913). The writers who heralded that literary flowering were in part men in their early 40's who had had to wait 10 or 15 years before gathering their audience and publishing their masterpieces—Proust (Du côté de chez Swann, 1913), Gide (La Porte étroite, 1909; Les Caves du Vatican, 1914), Claudel (L'Otage, 1910; L'Annonce faite à Marie, 1910), Péguy (L'Argent, Eve, 1913). But there were also younger men, born around 1885, who (except for Alain-Fournier, q.v., and Ernest Psichari, killed in the war) were to form in the post-war years one of the most brilliant galaxies of talents France has ever known—Carco, Duhamel, Giraudoux, Jouhandeau, Jouve, Larbaud, Maritain, Roger Martin du Gard, Mauriac, Reverdy, Rivière, Romain, Suarès, Supervielle, Vildrac (qq.v.). The First World War matured their talents, inspired the reading public with a freer curiosity, and destroyed their respect for once venerable traditions; it produced a huge crop of war books, only a few of which (those by Duhamel, Maurois, Barbusse, and Dorgelès, qq.v.) have any lasting value; but it brought nothing essentially new to French letters, which developed with a fair degree of continuity between 1911 and 1930.

Speed and mobility, the mottoes of the young, were hardly conducive to serene meditation on eternal issues. Philosophical speculation was then in France much less original than purely literary achievement. Bergson remained the great patriarch of French philosophy; his last great work appeared only in 1932. Maritain alone rivals him in personal prestige. His austere advocacy of Thomist Catholicism, his speculations on the problems of free will, knowledge, ethics, education, government, and of a humanism turned toward God, and, even more, his charity and his understanding of art drew many literary and artistic figures to him. The influence of other French thinkers penetrated little outside university circles. Léon Brunschvicg (1869–1944), Lucien Lévy-Bruhl (1857–1939), and Maurice Blondel (1861–) have been the most eminent, and, among their successors, Etienne Gilson (1884–), Gaston Bachelard (1884–), Louis Lavelle, and Jean Wahl (1888–). Two lyrical essayists, Faure (q.v.) and Suarès, deserve to rank among the most versatile and occasionally the most penetrating ever produced in the country of Montaigne and Pascal. Henri Focillon (1881–1943) applied his universal and illuminating meditations to art criticism and the philosophy of history. André Siegfried (1875–) and Lucien Romier (1885–1944) have treated of political and economic subjects with literary charm. Literary criticism was practiced by many keen minds, often with brilliance, seldom with the unchallenged authority which critics of earlier eras had possessed. Weekly articles by Souday (q.v.), Jaloux (q.v.), Henry Bidou (1873–), Lucien Dubech (1882–1941), André Thérive (1891–), while undeniably influential on readers and writers, have proved little more than ephemeral pronouncements. Lalou (q.v.), Benjamin Crémieux (1888–1944), and Léon Pierre-Quint (1895–) have done more to mold opinion on living literature. Next to the original "criticism of creators," that of Gide and Valéry (qq.v.), the three most important critics of the last 20 years have been Rivière, Du Bos (q.v.), and Thibaudet. Bremond (q.v.) in his Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France (11 vols., 1916–1933) and Charles Andler (1866–1933) in his Nietzsche (6 vols., 1921–1930) have come nearest in our time to Sainte-Beuve's encyclopedic Port-Royal. André Chevrillon (1864–), Emile Legouis (1861–1937), and Louis Cazamian (1877–) have been Taine's worthiest successors as interpreters of English literature.

The novel received the lion's share in the French literary production from 1911 to 1930. Proust towers above all other novelists of this century because of his power to create life, the depth of his psychological penetration, the originality of his technique, and above all the poetical magic of his prose. The other two novelists of his generation, Gide and Colette (q.v.), fell far short of his supreme eminence. Gide is a very great prose writer and perhaps the most characteristic man of letters of France in the last 30 years. His truly Goethian curiosity and sympathy and the purity of his art were, however, ill suited to the novel; his shorter réçits remain more moving than his ambitious attempts in the manner of Stendhal and Dostoevski. Colette can exquisitely express the world of form and color, of keen sensations, and of feminine emotions, but lacks power to evoke more complex or less purely subjective characters. The most remarkable of the novelists who achieved their main success after the First World War is Mauriac. His intensely Catholic view of life, the provincial atmosphere of his tales of sin and remorse, the absence of social conflicts in his books, and his superbly classical technique have not yet won for him an adequate appreciation outside of France. Jouhandeau, at times hauntingly tragic, and Bernanos (q.v.), addicted to imaginative eloquence and too often unequal to his best achievement, are also able novelists of Catholic inspiration. There have been several adepts in the group novel, less traditional in technique and more preoccupied with the Balzacian delineation of an age or society. Romain is the most ambitious of all, and the length of his Les Hommes de bonne volonté (1932-) has stretched his creative invention to the breaking point. He knows, analyzes, explains, and organizes life but seldom re-creates it. Duhamel succeeded in conjuring up a compelling character in Salavin, but has since failed to endow his Chronique des Pasquier (1933-) with intensity. Roger Martin du Gard related the adventures of Les Thibault (1922-1940) with more convincing reality, an unobtrusive technical mastery, and a fluid style, although he cannot be compared, for sheer imaginative force, with the very great masters, Balzac, Flaubert, Zola, Proust. His earlier Jean Barois (1913) reached greater heights of intellectual tragedy. René Béhaine (1880-), who was among the first moderns to undertake a saga of the contemporary world, failed to win an audience for his Histoire d'une société (12 vols., 1908-1939). Other novelists of the same generation worthy of mention were Jean Richard Bloch (1884-), author of Jewish novels inspired by a robust liberal faith; the Tharaud brothers (q.v.), skillful storytellers; André Demaison (1885-), the author of forceful exotic tales on French African colonies; Mac-Orlan (q.v.), whose adventure novels retained psychology and style; Pourrat (q.v.) and the powerful Swiss writer Ramuz (q.v.), who have renovated provincial and peasant fiction. Alain-Fournier had written, one year before the First World War, in which he soon lost his life, an original tale of delicate fantasy, Le Grand Meaulnes, which was to be widely but vainly imitated in the post-war years, when the character of the "adolescent" invaded French fiction. Radiguet (q.v.), who died at 20, seemed to promise a brilliant career as a skillful and cynical adapter of a Stendhalian tradition. The time-honored French psychological novel was attempted by many in the age of Proust and Gide. Larbaud will probably remain as the most ingenious and touching of those minores. Lacretelle (q.v.) began with promise but failed to shake off some intellectual coldness, and Maurois, after an adroitly constructed but unconvincing novel, Climats (1928), struck a happier vein and a wider success in biography and journalistic essays. Giraudoux and Morand (q.v.) will probably provide the future historian of the years 1920-1930 with the most valuable illustrations of the manners and fashions of the age. Giraudoux embodied with fresh charm the perennial French tradition of préciosité and sketched a few vivid jeunes filles among the gallery of middle-aged women and corrupt young men almost exclusively portrayed in the post-war novel. Morand launched a striking fashion with his abrupt and exotic stories (Ouvert la nuit, 1922; Fermé la nuit, 1923); he then failed, like many of his brilliant contemporaries, in his attempts at self-renewal, though he drew, in Air indien (1932), a striking picture of the South American continent seen "with the eye on the object." Luc Durtain (1881-), after a short-lived success as a superficial novelist of California, wrote a keen and colorful travel book in Le Globe sous le bras (1936), which, along with Morand's stories and Faure's lucid analyses, bore evidence of the enlarged cosmopolitan curiosity of post-war France.

The 10 years which followed the First World War are probably the most brilliant the French stage has known for a century. Much credit should go to the impulse given in 1913, and again in 1920, by the Vieux Colombier of Copeau (q.v.). The earlier courageous attempts of Antoine, Lugné-Poe, and Gémier were resumed by him with more ardent faith and keener artistic touch; innovations borrowed from great foreign producers (Stanislavsky, Gordon Craig, Reinhardt) were introduced. To technical improvements in the staging, interpreting, and acting of plays, Copeau added an austere insistence upon sincerity, honest workmanship, and art. He avoided the two common pitfalls of vanguard theatres, intellectual snobbery and disconcerting strangeness. Suggestion, rather than realistic illusion, became the motto of his dramatic performances; they aimed at enhancing the poetical virtue of the text. Copeau's lessons proved lastingly fruitful, although he had decided, in 1924, to close the Vieux Colombier. The French dramatic renaissance of the 1920's owed much to his example. The Comédie Française and even the commercial theatres underwent the influence of his reforms. His truest followers were, however, in the best literary theatres of the last 20 years, led by Baty, Dullin, Jouvet, Pitoëff (qq.v.), André Obey, et al. The most substantial result of that dramatic revival was to achieve a reconciliation between the stage and literature, which would have been unthinkable in the 19th century. The most powerful French dramatist today, though not the most easily staged, is one of the loftiest poets—Claudel. The most original modern tragedies have been written by the most refined of the modern précieux, Giraudoux. Romans contrived ingenious comedies as well as elaborate works of fiction. Most of the finest writers of the age (Gide and Rolland before 1914, then Mauriac, Martin du Gard, Duhamel, Giono, q.v.), with varied success, brought the homage of their talent to the stage. Cocteau, after Claudel and Giraudoux, displayed some originality in modernizing old tragic themes (in Antigone, Orphée, La Machine infernale). Among other attempts at tragedy, those of Lenormand (q.v.) utilized the revelations of abnormal psychology and psychoanalysis with ponderous and humorless didacticism. Raynal (q.v.), while addicted to declamatory displays of virtuosity, is the author of a powerful psychological drama, Le Maître de son cœur (acted in 1920). Simon Gantillon (1890–) in Maya (1924) and Passeur (q.v.) in several recent plays showed uncommon gifts of stark force and ingenious structure. The attempts of Ghéon and Marcel (qq.v.) to revive a Catholic or philosophical drama have been more courageous than successful. The most original note in the drama since the First World War is a delicate blending of humor and poetry, of sentiment tempered with discreet mockery; brutal realism and melodramatic utterances have given way to delicate nuances and an art of suggestion, often through use of “silence.” Even more than Achard or Sarmant (qq.v.), whose early promise is still unfulfilled, J. J. Bernard (q.v.) and Vildrac were the most representative of those post-war playwrights who added a strain of Shakespearean fantasy to the tradition of Marivaux and Musset. Pure comedy, which Molière called more difficult than any other kind of writing, has had few adepts in the disillusioned post-war years. Emile Mazaud (1884–) and Crommelynck, on an old and apparently inexhaustible Gallic theme, Denys Amiel (q.v.) and André Obey, Pellerin (q.v.), in one or two original attempts, and lately Pagnol (q.v.) have produced the best recent outbursts of French laughter.

The brightest star in the poetical firmament after the First World War was that of Valéry. While his great contemporary Claudel wrote the best of his lyrical work before 1914, Valéry had been silent for 20 years before he gave the world his masterpiece, La Jeune Parque, in 1917. A slender volume, Charmes, followed in 1922. In the best of those poems he rivaled Racine and La Fontaine in pure and fluid music, Mallarmé in deliberate and elliptic condensation. They united with miraculous harmony the pangs of the intellect and the thrills of the flesh; only the heart at times remained unmoved. A felicitous fusion of classical, Parnassian, and symbolist elements, Valéry's poetry could not well be imitated. Expressed in a terse epigrammatic prose worthy of the 18th century, the poet's theories, which banished inspiration and the unconscious from artistic creation, fortunately kept pale imitators at a distance. St.-J. Perse (q.v.), whose strange, sparkling jewels dazzled T. S. Eliot and Archibald MacLeish, is much nearer to Claudel than to Valéry and even nearer at times to a more musical and more fluid Parnassian tradition. The Lithuanian Milosz (q.v.) wrote moving poems. Fargue (q.v.) transfigured with humor the familiar mysteries of modern life, and Yvan Goll (1891–) recaptured the charm of old ballads. Cocteau, in his verse as in his plays, novels, and lucid critical essays, is alternately cutting a boyish prank and repressing a bitter sob. There are three true poets, born around 1885, who may rank in future estimates as great poets, second only to Claudel and Valéry in the post-war years—Jouve, Reverdy, and Supervielle. Jouve, after writing clear and direct poems inspired by horror of war and pity for suffering, became engrossed in religious mysticism; his poetical fragments are sometimes rugged and dry, sometimes hauntingly mysterious, as if written by a French brother of Blake or Hölderlin. Reverdy, after sharing the literary nihilism of dada, developed a very original manner, untouched by publicity and coteries, in Les Epaves du ciel (1924) and Ferraille (1937). In his rendering of restrained emotion and of metaphysical or religious anxiety he is probably one of the most authentic of recent French poets and at times almost Baudelairean. Supervielle is the least revolutionary and difficult of the moderns. His themes are friendship, love, family affections, childhood memories, but also cosmic visions of oceans and planets gravitating through a poet's dreams. A profound philosophical emotion aroused by man's solitude in the universe permeates his finest volume, La Fable du monde (1938). None of these poets achieved the reputation won by the surrealists in the era between the two world wars.

The surrealist revolt was fiercely logical in its madness, scornful of traditional moral and aesthetic conventions, skillful in its organized publicity. In spite of its obviously preposterous claims, it constituted the marching wing of French literature after 1920 and recruited the largest number of genuine talents. Its beginnings are often traced back to dada, founded in Zurich in 1916, a radical revision of the essential literary values and a challenge to all rational processes of thought. Yet no first-rate figure emerged from dadaism, although its founder, Tristan Tzara (1896-), made some curious experiments with poetry and one of its members, Ribemont-Dessaignes (1884-), showed promise as a novelist and essayist. In the same year, 1916, in Nantes, independently from the abortive dada movement, the future founder of surrealism, Breton (q.v.), met Jacques Vaché (1895-1919) who, though he did not condescend to write anything himself, seems to have possessed fierce originality. The bitter nihilism of Vaché rejected all the traditional elements of Western culture, except for a very few prophets of the new vision, Rimbaud, Lautréamont (q.v.), Jarry, Apollinaire. Vaché committed suicide in 1919, as two other members of the surrealist group did later, Jacques Rigaut (1929) and René Crevel (1935). Surrealism (q.v.) took shape officially in 1924 under the guidance and strict ferule of Breton, assisted in his early manifestoes and experiments by Soupault, Aragon, and Eluard (qq.v.). The original affiliates have since broken with Breton's uncompromising orthodoxy, and new recruits have been added, chiefly from the ranks of painters. The movement became international in character: young English, American, German, and Spanish painters and poets have applied and developed its principles with originality. In its negative aspect surrealism was an all embracing revolt against the whole legacy of the past, aesthetic, moral, even political and social. Hence its provoking audacity, helped somewhat by Freud's discoveries, in doing away with the moral ban on subconscious and erotic visions and also its subsequent and often stormy association with Communist or Trotskyist doctrines, which caused several surrealist schisms. From 1930 on, however, it was clear that surrealism had gone beyond its negative stage and had grown into a constructive attempt to annex new provinces to psychology and literature. The main achievements of the surrealists, often disfigured by childish stunts, may be summarized as: opening the oneiric domain to poetry; breaking the shackles of logic and releasing the forces of imagination, however irrational and humorously absurd the results might be; recovering the purity of a child's vision of the world and the illogical freshness of a spontaneous flow of images; reaching the "super-real" state in which the subjective and the objective, the ego and the universe, are merged in a higher synthesis. In spite of an excess of obstinate reasoning in its very madness and of questionable claims to scientific validity, surrealism appears today a romantic aspiration toward greater sincerity in literature (man's subconscious being less prone to lying or self-deception than his rationalizing ego) and toward liberation of imagination.

The best of recent French poetry derives from the surrealist impulse. Breton, though no mean poet, is chiefly a clear and brilliant master of French prose in his doctrinal manifestoes, his graceful novel, Nadja (1928), and the original psychological speculations of L'Amour fou (1937). Eluard is the poet of love, conceived as a pathetic struggle against solitude, an aspiration toward purity, and the cosmic center of the universe. His delicate music and his fresh and graceful gift for coining ever renewed images have made him the most widely admired and imitated younger French poet today. Aragon, though apparently a more energetic temperament, is more plastic than Breton or Eluard: his successive works reflect the play of varied fashions or influences. In his early novels a master of satire and a virtuoso of truculent prose, after the Second World War began he suddenly won great popular acclaim through his eloquent restatement of traditional themes—love, the tragedy of war, the bitterness of defeat, patriotic fervor (Le Crève-Cœur, 1941; Les Yeux d'Elsa, 1943). Raymond Roussel (1877-1933), an original precursor, and Benjamin Péret (1899-) are the other outstanding surrealist poets. In fiction, surrealism has not produced in France works to be ranked with the German novels of Kafka (q.v.); Raymond Queneau and Julien Gracq are the only two promising younger novelists who may be attached to the group.

The year 1930 seems to have closed an era of inflation and false security in Europe. The dreams of a permanent Franco-German understanding were shattered; economic and political problems loomed large after the fallacious prosperity of the years 1920-1930. France, the last country to feel the blows of the worldwide depression, was the first to repudiate the literary fashions of the post-war years. Avid newcomers to the world of letters published in literary weeklies manifestoes demanding a new appraisal of the legacy of their elders; about 1930 a few striking works by Céline (q.v.), Giono, Malraux (q.v.), and Saint Exupéry (q.v.) ushered in a new period which, for lack of a better name, may be called "the second pre-war era." The years 1930-1939 discarded some of the more superficial features of the preceding literature: the literary inflation which had led to brief, repetitious volumes devoid of solid content; the excessive intellectuality of many post-war novels; the fashion for adolescent characters deficient in will power and addicted to selfish analysis of their feelings or of their inability to feel; the escapism which had inspired endless travel books, nonchalant reveries, and the subtle games of a new préciosité. The new period is marked by the ardent interest taken by men of letters in political and social problems; Gide led the way, with Malraux, Céline, Chamson (q.v.), and Drieu La Rochelle (q.v.) soon following. On all sides recent writers aspired to a closer communion with the people and repudiated the complacent self-analysis of their predecessors. They sought a new faith and tried to mold a better world or a better man, to build work more solid than the ephemeral volumes of the previous years. The men of this new literary generation, born around 1895-1900, found themselves at 30 or 35. Much may be expected of it, after the tragic experience of the Second World War.

In the novel the outstanding representatives of this generation are six men of striking originality. Céline, the oldest of the group, stands in sharp contrast to Proust and Gide. His power, brutal and truculent like that of a modern Rabelais, marred by mannerism and blatant crudities, is nevertheless haunting. The Voyage au bout de la nuit (1932) is a Goyesque nightmare; but his subsequent writing fell far below that startling début. Giono, born in 1895, revealed his full stature in his early masterpieces (Un de Baumugnes, 1929; Jean le bleu, 1932). With him French fiction has risen to epic heights and recovered a healthy contact with the earth and simple, healthy people. Le Chant du monde (1934) and, in parts, Que ma joie demeure (1935) are among the most powerful novels of the century, but excessive eagerness to deliver an ideological message has detracted from the later achievement of this spiritual son of Rousseau and Zola. Montherlant (q.v.), slightly younger than Giono, began his literary career much earlier and dazzled his contemporaries by his magnificent style and a boyish, cynical insolence alternating with sincere yearning for heroism. His novels are disappointing, but an anthology of his best reflective passages would constitute one of the finest examples of the passionate romanticism concealed behind the bitter dryness of recent French literature. Malraux, born in 1901, has conquered new domains for French fiction: he fled from provincial life and threadbare erotic themes to Asiatic revolutions and European civil wars. His novels, composed with a bold and harsh technique, scornful of traditional rules and even of the average reader's demands, are obsessed by the tragic solitude of the modern hero and his desperate attempts to find a faith for which to live and die. A similar groping search for a faith gives a spiritual meaning to the works of Saint Exupéry. His tales of an airman's life reveal an epic moralist and a creator of dazzling images. Julien Green (q.v.), born, like Saint Exupéry, in 1900, has, alone in this group, retained the traditional form of the French novel, swift, condensed, violent, like classical tragedy; his themes are lurid nightmares of terror and hate, at times too close to the mystery story to be fully convincing. Next to these outstanding names, many more testify to the continued vitality of the French novel: Chamson, also born in 1900, is a racy portrayer of peasants in the Cévennes and a refined artist, especially in Le Crime des justes (1929). Roger Verel (1894-), Kessel (q.v.), and Edouard Peisson have written skillful tales of sea and air adventures. Paul Nizan (1905-1940), a vigorous novelist and essayist attracted by revolutionary doctrines, was killed in the battle of France. The early tales of Jean Sartre (q.v.) blended cynicism and odd metaphysical anxiety (La Nausée, 1938; Le Mur, 1939). Giono's imaginative or mythical realism has allured many of the younger novelists, while old-fashioned realism counted few adepts in recent French literature. In 1930 a new group headed by André Thérive (1891-) and Léon Lemonnier (1890-) attracted some attention under the name of populism; they advocated a new naturalism, concerned with the common people and the working man instead of the bourgeois or aristocratic heroes of Gide, Mauriac, and Proust. But populism failed to produce any masterpieces. Dabit (q.v.) gave the best examples of realistic fiction. Guilloux (q.v.) in Le Sang noir (1935) displayed, with less power but more sincerity, some of the satiric verve and social bitterness of Céline. Henry Poulaille (1896-) and Malaquais (q.v.) have not yet risen to their stature or proved that they can avoid the pitfall of too many realistic novels—lack of art and style and monotonous sordidness of subject.

That same generation born around 1900 has had a number of gifted essayists and critics, but none has yet voiced its aspirations or expressed its original message with undisputed authority. Drieu la Rochelle, whose early works promised much and whose short stories in La Comédie de Charleroi (1934) are among the best of their decade, failed to reach a consistent doctrine in politics or literature. Ramon Fernandez (1894-1944) also disappointed those who had expected from him some of the best philosophical criticism of his age. Marcel Arland (1899-) has proved most sensitive to literary values in critical essays on the novel, and Jean Prévost (q.v.) is often lucid and sturdy in his intellectual approach. Jean Cassou (1897-) and Rolland de Renéville (1903-) are, with the two Swiss critics Albert Béguin and Marcel Raymond (1897-), the best interpreters of contemporary poetry. Among the younger group Roger Caillois (1913-), René Etiemble (1909-), and Edmonde Magny have shown acumen and courage in their critical judgment. The gifts of Thierry-Maulnier (pseud. of Jacques Talagrand, 1908-) are admirable when political partisanship and youthful paradoxes have not spoiled them.

In the drama Salacrou (q.v.) and Jean Anouilh have been the chief representatives of the same generation along with the few dramatists already mentioned who were recognized before 1930—Achard, Pagnol, and Sarment.

In poetry the leaders of surrealism belong to the same age group, and their lasting achievement, following their early revolt, has been effected since 1930. Their influence, often indirect, has left few recent poets untouched: the Belgian Henry Michaux (1899-) is probably the most brilliant of their followers. The tradition of their compatriots, who contributed several leading talents to French symbolism, has been maintained by three other Belgian poets, Eric de Haulleville (1900-1941), Odilon Jean Périer (1901-1928), and Alain Bosquet (1920-), the first an ambitious lyricist, the second moving in his restraint and simplicity, the third an original adapter of the fluid, erotic imagery of surrealism. Audiberti (q.v.) is more eloquent and sonorous; his astounding verbal gift is dangerously reminiscent of Hugo's facility and excesses. Georges Pelorson (1908-) attempted in Connaissance (1937) to load six-syllable verse with philosophical meaning. La Tour du Pin (q.v.), on the eve of the Second World War, was acclaimed the most pleasing and suavely musical of the younger poets: his themes and manner were the most traditional of his generation. In the suffering which followed the German invasion of 1940, French poetry suddenly reached a wide public. Aragon, Eluard, Jouve, rediscovered universal subjects and reintegrated appeal to emotion in their art. Two other poets, Pierre Emmanuel and Lanza Del Vasto, won the audience of the French readers.

At the beginning of the Second World War,

French literature, although accused, as it has been regularly for the last hundred years, of being obscure, morbid, decadent, and futile, was characterized by hardy, wholesome qualities. It was at the same time the most traditional in Europe in some aspects and the most revolutionary in many of its experiments. During the tragic years which followed the defeat of 1940, the French people found much comfort in the continued vitality of their literature.

The influence of the war on French letters cannot yet be fully assessed: it was in a sense negative, since it eliminated a number of writers who died between 1940 and 1945 (Giraudoux, Max Jacob, Romain Rolland, Saint Exupéry, Valéry) and others who had thoroughly discredited themselves through collaboration with the enemy and lack of moral courage (Céline, Chardonne, A. de Châteaubriant, Drieu la Rochelle, Maurras, Morand). The war years also created a gulf between the writers admired in the 30's and the youth of France which had grown under the tragic stress of national humiliation and of heroic fight for freedom. Gide, Claudel, even Valéry, have ceased being the masters of the younger generation; Romain counts few admirers, Giraudoux's last play (Sodome et Gomorrhe, 1943) was but a weaker repetition of his former manner, Montherlant and Giono had signally failed to apply during times of misery the message that they had preached in happier days. But literature continued active, both underground and in the open, and when France was finally liberated in 1944, the vitality of her letters astonished foreign observers. Some pre-war writers had grown in stature: Mauriac through his courageous role in rallying French Catholics against the clerical hypocrisy of Vichy and through his recent works, notably his play, Les Mal Aimés (1945); Chamson, who fought in the maquis and in the regular army and penned a vivid picture of life during the enemy occupation in Le Puits des miracles (1945); Aragon, who followed his war poetry with a brilliant novel of reminiscences of his youth, Aurélien (1945); and above all Malraux. Through his active fight against tyranny and through his Les Noyers de l'Altenburg (1943), which contained splendid passages, as well as through his earlier works reread in the light of subsequent events, Malraux appeared as the precursor of the strongest movement of the years 1944-1946.

This movement is often termed existentialism. Its starting point is philosophical, and some of its abstruse doctrines appeal to youth through their very obscurity. The phenomenology of the German Husserl, the metaphysical speculations of two other Germans, Jaspers and Heidegger, and the tragic anguish of the 19th-century Dane, Kierkegaard, have been integrated by these French men of letters into a strange system which proclaims the essential absurdity of life, denounces reason as powerless, rejects the easy refuge of the traditional faith in God and immortality. These negations are accompanied by a fierce determination to endow life with a man-made significance, since it has for them no transcendent meaning, and by the full acceptance of solidarity with other men in misery and in the conquest of freedom. Out of their very pessimism, clearly inspired by the conditions of life in Europe since 1940, these younger French writers emerge with the will to transform the world around them through their pens and through their actions. They reject the ivory-tower conception of the artist's role and maintain that literature is no fancy activity independent of politics, but is bound up with the struggle for liberty and fraternity. Sartre is the acknowledged leader of the new school: two plays, a huge treatise of philosophy, a fictional trilogy, Les Chemins de la Liberté, and many articles written since 1940 bear witness to the versatility and the originality of his talent. Beside him, though holding divergent philosophical views, is Albert Camus (q.v.), born in a suburb of Algiers, who, after a hard struggle for life and the practice of varied professions, revealed himself as a prose writer of eminence in Noces (1939), then in an ideological essay, Le Mythe de Sisyphe (1942), in which the Greek myth was reinterpreted as a proud vindication of man's fate against the absurd decrees of the gods, and in a baffling novel, L'Etranger (1942). His two plays, Le Malentendu and Caligula (both 1944), are, in spite of an unconventional and faulty dramatic technique, striking achievements. Camus, even more than Sartre, has proved a bold leader of public opinion through his articles in the newspaper Combat. Simone de Beauvoir is another gifted member of the group: her novel, Le Sang des autres (1945), which illustrates the thesis of man's responsibility in society, and her play, Les Bouches inutiles (1945), have brought existentialist ideas within the reach of a wider public. Michel Leyris and Raymond Queneau in the essay and the novel, Maurice Blanchot as essayist and critic, Anouilh in several plays, Elsa Triolet in the long short story (Le Premier Accroc coûte 200 francs, 1944), and Romain Gary, whose first book, Education européenne (1945), strikingly evoked the horrors of the Polish underground hunted by the Germans, stand foremost among the new writers of talent in France. Francis Ponge, Loys Masson, and Pierre Seghers are the younger poets who, together with Aragon, Eluard, Emmanuel, and Michaux, promise to assure an era of continued fertility to French poetry. In all its manifestations, recent literature seems today more concerned with philosophical issues and with probing the meaning of life than it had been after the First World War; it is also more socially minded, eager to enrich its substance through communion with other men and through a will to act which repudiates the complacent aestheticism of previous generations. At the same time, it has apparently emerged from the years of distress with no regimentation of the minds: the number and the variety of its individual talents bid fair to make the French writings of tomorrow fully worthy of the literary accomplishments of yesterday.

See: D. Parodi, La Philosophie contemporaine en France (1919); B. Crémieux, XXe siècle (1924); R. Lalou, Histoire de la littérature française contemporaine (1922; enlarged ed., Vol. I, 1941, Vol. II, 1940); I. Benrubi, Contemporary Thought of France (1926); John Palmer, Studies in the Contemporary Theatre (1927); E. Sée, Le Théâtre français contemporain (1928); Edmund Wilson, Axel's Castle (1931); R. Michaud, Vingtième Siècle; an Anthology (1933) and Modern Thought and Literature in France (1934); Marcel Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933); G. Truc, Tableau du XXe siècle, Vol. III: La Pensée (1933); C. Sénéchal, Les Grands Courants de la littérature française contemporaine (1934); R. Brasillach, Animateurs de théâtre (1936); A. Thibaudet, Histoire de la littérature française de 1789 à nos jours (1936); H. Peyre, Hommes et œuvres du vingtième siècle (1938); G. E. Lemaitre, From Cubism to Surrealism in French Literature (1941); P. Brodin, Les Ecrivains français de l'entre-deux-guerres (1942) and Maîtres et témoins de l'entre-deux-guerres (1943); M. E. Coindreau, La Farce est jouée (1942); S. A. Rhodes, ed., The Contemporary French Theater (1942).

H. P.

French naturalism can be defined as a "school" only in most general terms. For its outspokenness and brutality, for its usual (though not exclusive) penchant toward the drab, the vulgar, and the pathological, it strongly resembles naturalism in other countries (see German naturalism). Its basic philosophy, reminiscent of Locke, Condillac, and Diderot, holds that there is nothing in the human mind which does not emanate from the senses. By way of consequence, metaphysics are brushed aside, together with psychology as an introspective and analytical instrument of discovery; art, in particular, is but the factual reproduction of the sensation as experienced. The naturalists claim to have fallen heirs to one of the oldest French traditions—that of common sense and matter-of-factness, in short that of realism, as it runs from the fabliau and the farce through Rabelais and Molière to Balzac and Flaubert (q.v.). All such views are too sweeping not to require discussion and sometimes contradiction. The healthy hue of French realism is more often than not at variance with naturalist morbidity. Balzac's mysticism and Flaubert's insistence on le réel écrit (i.e., on an aesthetic transposition of reality) prove incompatible, if not always with naturalist practice, at least with naturalist theory.

Except for these broad definitions, the naturalist school never boasted a unified doctrine. It would be possible, of course, to build a case for Emile Zola (q.v.) as its leader and the Rougon-Macquart as its towering achievement. After all, it was Zola who first appropriated the word naturalism (in the preface to the second edition of Thérèse Raquin, May, 1868) and came nearest to making it a rallying motto for all those who sought "sincerity in art," namely, a free and total expression of themselves and their beliefs, unhampered by the rules of public taste or the laws of conformism. He befriended Cézanne and Manet and defended them at a time when their paintings were the butt of contempt and derision. He enlisted for himself the moral support of Flaubert, despite their violent differences on artistic grounds. His best novel, and one of his boldest, L'Assommoir (1877), appeared in the midst of the political reaction then rampant under the name of "moral order" and touched off a wide "naturalist campaign" against bigotry and intolerance. The same year Zola began gathering in his country house at Médan, near Paris, a group of five—and as yet unknown—disciples, Paul Alexis, Joris Karl Huysmans, Guy de Maupassant (qq.v.), Henry Céard (1851–1924), and Léon Hennique (1852–1935). The publication of Les Soirées de Médan (1880), a collection of six stories relating to the Franco-Prussian War (one by each member, including Maupassant's "Boule de Suif"), bears striking proof of Zola's ascendancy and stamps the Médan group as the most closely knit of all naturalist associations.

This, however, is only part of the general picture. From the very beginning two trends at least had been apparent within naturalism. Zola's tendency, as is shown at greater length elsewhere in this volume, was to make literature an adjunct of science. In a clumsy sort of way he took to himself Taine's (q.v.) determinism and extracted from Claude Bernard's Introduction à l'étude de la médecine expérimentale (1865) his own, rather extravagant theory of the experimental novel. Yet the depressingly materialistic atmosphere of this type of novel, or its pseudoscientific method, should not hide the fact that it conveys a broadly humanitarian message. It has a political, democratic tinge—one is reminded of Zola's pronouncement, "The Republic will be naturalist, or it will not be"; it is optimistic, yes, optimistic as it reveals an almost childish confidence in the possibility of immediate reform and progress. Maupassant said one day that naturalism was a reaction against the verbal and mental incontinence of Victor Hugo. This may be true in terms of Maupassant's works, but there is no denying the link which exists between the Rougon-Macquart and, say, Les Misérables. On the other hand, in those early days when Zola was still groping in the dark, the literary team of Edmond and Jules de Goncourt (q.v.) had given what is generally considered the first true sample of a naturalistic novel, Germinie Lacerteux (1864). Rich and independent, connoisseurs and art collectors, attracted to the rare, the exotic, the exquisite, the two brothers stood in strong contrast to the rugged, plebeian Emile Zola. Describing themselves as historians and chroniclers rather than scientists, they probed social evils, but with considerably less gusto, and delved into "popular" subjects, but far more detachedly, than the inventor of the experimental novel. Throughout the course of naturalism the aristocratic reserve and dilettantism of Edmond de Goncourt (Jules died prematurely, in 1870), emulated in many respects by Alphonse Daudet (q.v.), was to exert a restraining and somewhat dissolvent influence. In 1885 Edmond opened the doors of his "grenier d'Auteuil" (his studio at Auteuil, a Paris district) to a host of young writers and artists who might otherwise have found their way to the Médan cottage. He and Alphonse Daudet in 1887 inspired, rather underhandedly, the manifesto of five newcomers, all naturalists, Lucien Descaves (q.v.), J. H. Rosny ainé (1856–1940), Paul Bonnetain (1858–1899), Paul Margueritte (1860–1918), and Gustave Guiches (1860–1935), against Zola's novel, La Terre ("Manifeste des Cinq," Figaro, August 18, 1887). Finally, Edmond's will provided for the foundation of the Goncourt Academy, which was to become the logical repository of naturalism, but from which Zola was significantly excluded. As things happened, Zola died before the formal inauguration of the Academy in 1903.

Hovering between Zola and Goncourt, devoted to both but seldom in full agreement with either, the younger naturalists soon evolved a philosophy of their own. Age, here, was a decisive factor. Those who had been 20 or thereabouts in the fateful years 1870–1871 felt particularly the terrible impact of the Franco-Prussian War and of the communistic uprising (la Commune) which followed. Not without a certain amount of literary pose, they thought of themselves—we have seen this phenomenon repeated and amplified in more recent times—as a “lost generation.” Pessimism pervaded their writings. It was tempered no longer by Zola’s unshakable faith in science and the future, by Daudet’s indulgent smile, or by Edmond de Goncourt’s escapist propensities; it was stark pessimism, sheer gloom and despair, a deep sense of utter futility. Schopenhauer had played little or no part in Zola’s formation; but these people read him with delight and reveled in such adages of his as “Life is a pendulum which swings from Sorrow to Ennui.” To cite a few outstanding examples, Huysmans’s novelette A vau-l’eau (1882), in which the above maxim is quoted, many of Maupassant’s short stories, Henry Céard’s Une Belle Journée (1881), Georges Darien’s antimilitaristic novel Biribi (1890), Jules Renard’s (q.v.) Poil de carotte (1894)—such works forced down the reader’s throat some of the bitterest “slices of life” that he ever swallowed. From the novel, where naturalism flourished first and foremost, this disillusioned spirit crept upon the stage. Earlier attempts at creating a naturalist theatre had been obscured and doomed to failure by the immense vogue of Alexandre Dumas fils, exponent of the “thesis play.” Thesis plays represent at best a formula of prenatalistic vintage. Dumas himself, however, not unlike Flaubert, came to admire at least the courage and independence of his would-be successors. Through his good offices Henry Becque’s (q.v.) Les Corbeaux was admitted to the Comédie Française (1882). This somber work, many offerings of the Théâtre Libre (see Antoine, André), Octave Mirbeau’s (q.v.) dramatic masterpiece, Les Affaires sont les affaires (1903), testify to the strange vitality of that pessimist aesthetic which, in the words of the critic Rémy de Gourmont (q.v.), “could hardly go farther, or lower, without falling into sheer caricature.” This wholesale demoralization Paul Bourget (q.v.) saw fit to denounce in Le Disciple (1889); away from it finally fled a number of naturalists, some, like Huysmans, into the fold of religion.

Naturalism in general may best be summarized in negative terms. It is a revolt—a bourgeois revolt, by the way, long immune from any trace of Marxism—against the bourgeoisie as it had emerged from half a century of growing prosperity, as it was going to appear at the time of the Dreyfus affair, dull and self-seeking, vain and hypocritical, full of these ready-made ideas which Flaubert had so mercilessly satirized, socially conservative and reactionary in politics, attached to everything “academic” and conventional in art and literature, from the snobbish novels of Octave Feuillet and the spectacular dramas of Victorien Sardou (q.v.) to the stilted paintings of Bouguereau. Against this vast bourgeois complacency—to define it in other days the romanticists had used the word resistance—naturalism hurls itself, a minority movement, noisy to be sure, but a minority movement nevertheless, curiously conscious, because of this fact, of its affinities with other “vanguard” manifestations, such as positivism in philosophy, Darwinian or Spencerian evolutionism in science, symbolism in poetry, realism or impressionism in the fine arts. In this challenge thrown at the society in which they lived, a challenge which they strove to make as blunt and shocking as possible, whether it be constructive (e.g., with Zola) or merely devastating, the naturalists found cause enough, at times, to forget their own quarrels and strength enough to insure their survival.

Despite all assertions to the contrary, naturalism did not die around 1890. It could easily be shown that, at any given moment during the last 50 years, dozens of French novelists of greater or lesser repute (not to mention the dramatists) have been writing in one or another of the naturalist traditions. Wherever the spark of active or passive rebellion is readily discernible—in the industrial novels of Pierre Hamp (q.v.), in the peasant novels of Charles Ferdinand Ramuz (q.v.), among the literary witnesses of the First World War (e.g., Henri Barbusse, Roland Dorgelès, qq.v.), in the vast social frescoes unfolded by Romain Rolland, Roger Martin du Gard, Jules Romains, and Georges Duhamel (qq.v.), at the very heart of “populism” (e.g., Léon Lemonnier, Eugène Dabit, q.v.), in Louis Ferdinand Céline’s (q.v.) Voyage au bout de la nuit (1932), as late as 1938 in Jean Paul Sartre’s (q.v.) La Nausée—naturalism lives on.

See: Léon Deffoux and Emile Zavie, Le Groupe de Médan, suivi de deux essais sur le naturalisme (1920); Pierre Martino, Le Naturalisme français (1923); Léon Deffoux, Le Naturalisme (1929); Maurice Le Blond et al., "Le Naturalisme et les Soirées de Médan," Marges, Spring number, 1930; René Dumesnil, La Publication des "Soirées de Médan" (1933) and Le Réalisme, Vol. IX (1936) of Histoire de la littérature française, publiée sous la direction de J. Calvet, pp. 391-500.

J.-A. B.

French surrealism, see surrealism.

French symbolism is a literary movement which exercised a profound influence on the poetry and, to a lesser extent, on the prose, the thought, and the arts of France at the end of the 19th century and which spread from France to several other countries of Europe and America. Precise definition is almost impossible. The achievement of the symbolist poets seldom coincided with what they wanted to do; their theories and manifestoes are often misleading. The use of symbols is only one among many features of their work. Even when the group appeared fairly coherent, the symbolists never constituted a school, heeding or applying the lessons of one master. The most active period of the symbolist movement, though not necessarily the greatest, was between 1885 and 1892 when a dozen literary circles and over 100 poetry magazines flourished in Paris. But more revolutionary and more lasting works had been written by an earlier generation; and long after 1892 the lessons and the influences of symbolism were still felt. Symbolism, second only to romanticism as a force in 19th-century letters, appears above all as an invasion of many fields of art and thought by poetry.

Historically, three main generations of symbolists may be distinguished. The first includes writers born in the early 40's, at the same time as most of the impressionist painters and Rodin—Mallarmé (1842), Verlaine (1844), Corbière (1845), Lautréamont (1846), and the precocious Rimbaud (1854; qq.v.), who developed as a poet before the others and gave up literature at 19. To these a lesser but original poet, Charles Cros (1842), and the only great prose writer of symbolism, Villiers de l'Isle-Adam (1840; q.v.) should be added. Most of symbolism and "decadentism" is already latent or present in their works. Their common starting point was the Les Fleurs du mal (1857) and some of the prose writings of Baudelaire (q.v.), the ancestor and founder of symbolism. A second generation coined the words symbolist and decadent, fought the battle for the new poetry as a group, multiplied manifestoes and technical innovations, but produced few poets of the very first rank. Its outstanding representatives were Henri de Régnier and the American-born Vielé-Griffin (qq.v.), both of whom produced some of the masterpieces of musical free verse and then developed into more traditional poets. Jules Laforgue (q.v.), who died at 27, wrote in a humorous and original familiar vein. Samain (q.v.) popularized and often vulgarized symbolist themes. Moréas (q.v.), who appeared for a time as the champion and possible leader of the new group, soon deserted it to advocate a return to neo- or pseudo-classicism. Verhaeren (q.v.), a more robust talent, outgrew symbolism and sang contemporary life. Two other Belgians, Rodenbach and Van Lerberghe, and the American-born Stuart Merrill (qq.v.), wrote graceful and moving lyrics. Maeterlinck (q.v.) acquired wide fame in the 90's as the dramatist of the group. A. F. Hérold, Adolphe Retté (qq.v.), Ephraïm Mikhaël, René Ghil (q.v.) and Gustave Kahn (q.v.) deserve mention among the minor symbolists, the last two especially as theorists and technical innovators. The critics of the movement were Edouard Dujardin, Teodor de Wyzewa (q.v.), and above all Remy de Gourmont (q.v.). These men were all born between 1855 and 1866. Around 1870 a third generation was born, which was to enlarge and revive symbolism, after the movement had been almost stifled in ineffectual literary disputes. It included four writers of great eminence (Claudel, Gide, Proust, and Valéry, qq.v.), two important poets (Jammes and Paul Fort, qq.v.), and several critics (Schwob, q.v., André Fontainas, Royère, q.v., Camille Mauclair, and the youngest of the group, Thibaudet, q.v.), who interpreted symbolism for the 20th century. Bonnard, Vuillard, Matisse, and Rouault were, in painting, their contemporaries.

The symbolists had had predecessors in France and in other countries. In their fight for recognition they hailed as their masters Baudelaire (and sometimes two original poets of the romantic period, Gérard de Nerval and Aloysius Bertrand); E. A. Poe who, as one of the few poets in the English language to express aesthetic and doctrinal ideas on poetry, has had a powerful appeal in France; Shelley and at times Swinburne and Walt Whitman, the last as a master of free or irregular verse; among the Germans, Wagner (q.v.) and a few of the romantics, Novalis, Jean Paul Richter. The public and official critics were very reluctant to take the symbolists seriously. It was only in 1884 that the publication of two prose works, Verlaine's Les Poètes maudits and Huysmans's (q.v.) A rebours, attracted attention to them. Several symbolist manifestoes followed (1885–1886), and many reviews, among which Vogue (1886–1889), Revue indépendante (nouvelle série), 1886–1895), Mercur de France (since 1890), Ermitage (1890–1906), and Revue blanche (1891–1903) remain as the most important. In the 20th century, Vers et prose (1905–1914) and Phalange (1906–1914) continued the justification and the development of symbolism.

The confusion which still obscures today the history of the symbolist movement in France (which has not yet been adequately written) can be easily explained. The poets were all of individualistic temperaments, sometimes in agreement on what they rejected, seldom on what they wanted. No powerful personality, comparable to Victor Hugo among the romantics, won recognition as their accepted leader. Rimbaud had renounced literature, Verlaine was no chef d'école, and Mallarmé then seemed too esoteric a writer and too modest a master. No influential critic, comparable to Sainte-Beuve, helped the symbolists to clarify and formulate their ideas. The very word symbol lends itself to many divergent interpretations. While far preferable to decadent, which was for a time popular, and certainly as apt a label for that group of poets as romantic or Parnassian had been for earlier movements, the word symbolist confused the public and misled many poets. The public's general indifference had unfortunate consequences: the symbolists were branded by many contemporaries as a decadent and morbid group of sterile eccentrics. Tolstoy's (q.v.) What Is Art? (1897–1898; Eng. tr., 1898) and a ponderous and pseudoscientific volume by Max Nordau, Degeneration (1892; Eng. tr., 1895), both widely read in the late 90's, Verlaine's wretched life and Oscar Wilde's trial (1895), encouraged this belief in the general public. The unfortunate phrase fin de siècle seemed to justify it. Today symbolism appears on the contrary to have been, not an end but a beginning, not an abortive literary movement but one of the most fertile in the last two or three centuries.

Symbolism did not originate in any pre-conceived doctrine about the part to be played by symbols in literary creation. It was rooted in a profound dissatisfaction felt by the youth of 1870–1890 for the intellectual atmosphere then prevailing and in a desire to vindicate neglected predecessors (Poe, Baudelaire, Wagner) at the expense of official critical opinion.

Symbolism involved a reaction of poetry (and of imagination, fancy, intuition, and the free expression of personal sensibility) against prose. It involved very specifically a revolt against the realistic and naturalistic novel which then reigned supreme in France and a parallel revolt against the Parnassian school which had exaggerated the worship of objective and sculptural verse and had reduced poetry to description or to the narrative of ancient mythological legends. On a philosophical plane symbolism was a protest against the bourgeois spirit of the 19th century, against positivism and materialism (followers of Comte and of Taine, q.v.), but never became a philosophical movement and produced no great philosopher (the first great work of Bergson, q.v., appeared in 1889). The philosophical culture of the symbolists (even of Mallarmé and Villiers de l'Isle-Adam) was superficial. By borrowing, however, a few sentences from Hegel, Fichte, and Novalis (whom Maeterlinck, q.v., translated) and by taking a convenient formula from Schopenhauer ("The world is my representation"), they rejected the tyranny of the object and proclaimed as their chief credo the ideal character of the world, the superiority of nonrational and intuitive perception over intellectual and scientific knowledge. They quoted the later philosophical writings of Renan (q.v.) and those of Herbert Spencer, whose formula of "the Unknowable" seemed to justify their assertion that much, in this mysterious universe, will always resist and deride the efforts of human understanding.

Such a philosophical credo found a ready aesthetic translation in symbolist poems. Since it is vain to describe an elusive reality or to explain an unknowable world, literature should cultivate strangeness, obscurity, dream-like vagueness. It should express the poet's inner visions through suggestive metaphors and fluid melody. Against the bourgeois worship of activity and success, it should celebrate the rarest and most complex forms of beauty. Above all, in a world where every appearance has a hidden meaning, symbols are the only possible vehicle of eternal mysteries. The symbolists had little difficulty in proving that great geniuses had always expressed themselves symbolically (Pindar, Dante, Shakespeare). They quoted Swedenborg, Balzac's Louis Lambert, Emerson's hyperbolic praise of symbols in his essay "Poetry and Imagination," Carlyle, Vigny's attempts at symbolism, Wagner's doctrinal pronouncements, and, especially, Baudelaire's sonnet "Correspondances."

From that sonnet the essence of symbolism was derived. First, nature has a profound hidden meaning, which can only be revealed through "universal analogy." The invisible can be made visible and sensible if re-created by the artist's synthetic magic. These vertical correspondences, as they might be called, will be rendered through a series of symbols (Greek sumballo, to throw together) which fuse into one whole the thing which is signified and the sign which signifies it. Second, all arts are parallel translations of one fundamental mystery. Senses correspond to each other; a sound can be translated through a perfume and a perfume through a vision; each vowel suggests a color. Haunted by these horizontal correspondences or synaesthesiae and impatient to reach an impossible Wagnerian synthesis of all the arts, the symbolists often fell into sterile technical virtuosity.

The value of the symbolist poets can be measured by their success in giving life, depth, and suggestive power to symbols. Some created only allegories, i.e., inferior symbols, too explicit and too static. Others (especially the poets of the second symbolist generation and even, at times, Mallarmé) made their symbols too voluntary and too intellectual, oversubtle and precious riddles. The greatest among them created symbols spontaneously and intuitively and recaptured the freshness and the mythopoeic power of primitive bards (Nerval, Rimbaud, Claudel; Hopkins, Yeats, Eliot, in England; George, Rilke, qq.v., in Germany). Symbolism, in that sense, lies at the source of all great art: the concluding lines of the second part of Goethe's Faust ("Alles Vergängliche— Ist nur ein Gleichnis"), Renan's famous prayer to Athena ("Tout n'est ici-bas que symbole et que songe"), and many other pronouncements were quoted to prove it. Symbolism reintroduced depth of thought and multiplicity of meaning into poetry, the mystical quest for the One hidden in nature behind the Many, and made suggestion, not clear communication, its method. Occasionally the symbolists carried subtlety too far, disguised their meaning artificially, resorted to esoteric allusions and private associations, and opened up the way to much of the obscurity of contemporary poetry.

Much has been made of the technical innovations introduced by the symbolists. Such innovations appeared more revolutionary in France than they would have in other literatures, since the great achievement of French poetry has, in the past, been accomplished by a modest and voluntary submission to traditional rules of versification. Some of these reforms had permanent results, others have been rejected. The vocabulary of the symbolists is intentionally vague and "rare"; many farfetched and over-precious words were coined; archaic words were revived. A new and obscure but suggestive meaning was lent to many adjectives and nouns. The syntax is, especially in Mallarmé, even more revolutionary. The usual sequence of words is purposely altered or upset; orderly rhetorical development is carefully avoided, and Verlaine's advice to "wring the neck of eloquence" is followed. The impression produced is obscurity and strangeness, but often admirable plasticity and new effects of suggestion. The symbolists renounce the elaborate comparisons dear to the Parnassians, omit the first term of the analogy, and emphasize the second, which becomes a symbolic image. Explicit, clear-cut substantives are avoided, adjectives and verbs which suggest subtle motion or delicate vibration are multiplied. In versification, symbolism has been defined by Valéry as an attempt by several poets to "reprendre à la Musique, leur bien." Fluid melody and delicate music were avowedly their aim. Their best poems have a pure singing quality which French poetry had seldom possessed since the 16th century (Verlaine, Rénier). Much theoretical discussion took place in symbolist cénacles over free verse. This term designates a varied poetic pattern in which rhymes may disappear, caesuras and accents are capriciously displaced, and the sequence of the lines follows the poet's changing moods. But free verse (sometimes called freed verse, vers libéré, and, by Mallarmé, vers polymorphe) is not the only or the best innovation of symbolist poetry. The poem in prose enjoyed a wide and, at times, a dangerous vogue; a verse reminiscent of the Bible and of Pascal was revived and given a new splendor by Rimbaud and Claudel, even by Paul Fort and, later on, by St.-J. Perse (q.v.). Several poets merely used the traditional alexandrine which they made more supple and more musical. On the whole, metrical innovations introduced by the symbolists were not claims to more facility or to anarchic freedom, but a revolt against dead forms, a search for a new mold, as well as for a new idiom, for poetry.

In painting, the great contemporaries of symbolism were not the symbolist painters, Puvis de Chavannes, Gustave Moreau, Eugène Carrière, Odilon Redon, but the impressionists and the postimpressionists. Rodin, who repeatedly proclaimed that "all is symbol," is not, however, a symbolist, and César Franck, Fauré, and Debussy cannot be characterized truly as symbolist musicians. Even Wagner's relation to French symbolism has been exaggerated, and the powerful vitality of his sonorous orchestration has little in common with the delicate and subtle music of symbolist poets.

French symbolism has proved influential not only in the 19th century, but through the first 30 or 40 years of the 20th century. Numerous reactions tried to attack or to outgrow it around 1900—the neoclassicism of Moréas and Maurras (qq.v.); the neo-romanticism of Verhaeren, Rostand (q.v.), Mme de Noailles (q.v.); the social humanitarianism of Romain Rolland (q.v.); unanimism; the gospel of action and heroic life of Nietzsche (q.v.), Kipling, Péguy (q.v.). But the fame and influence of Baudelaire, Rimbaud, Lautréamont, Mallarmé, have steadily increased.

A latent symbolism or a "diffused mysticism" (Emerson) had long characterized English poetry. The influence of French symbolism in England made it more conscious, provided it with theories and technical innovations, and gave an impetus to English poetry at a time when it seemed to have exhausted its 19th-century vitality. The decadent aspects of symbolism were exaggerated by English imitators or disciples (Oscar Wilde, Ernest Dowson, Lionel Johnson), and an effete aestheticism was encouraged (Walter Pater, George Moore, Charles Morgan). The lessons in art and technique proved more beneficial (Walter de la Mare, Sturge Moore), as did the influence of the most ironical and humorous among the French symbolists (Corbière, Laforgue) on T. S. Eliot and his successors. The Irish literary renaissance, with Yeats, Æ., Synge, had probably the closest affinities with French symbolism.

In America the action of French symbolism (which cannot be clearly distinguished from that of Théophile Gautier and the Parnassians) was felt on the imagist group (1914–1917), on Ezra Pound, Wallace Stevens, et al. (Corbière, Laforgue), probably on Hart Crane. In Spain, Portugal, and Spanish America the Parnassian lessons in picturesque form and skillful technique were admired along with the symbolist models of mysterious suggestion: Antonio Machado, Eugénio de Castro, Jorge Guillén (qq.v.), who is often compared to Valéry, and most Spanish American poets, above all Rubén Darío, might be mentioned.

An exhaustive study by Enid L. Duthie, L'Influence du symbolisme français dans le renouveau poétique de l'Allemagne (1933), has traced the powerful and lasting influence of symbolism on Stefan George and his circle.

Baudelaire, Verlaine, Mallarmé, were equally worshiped by Hugo von Hofmannsthal (q.v.) and the Jungwien group in the early 90's, and the same poets, along with Gide and Valéry, by Rilke. In Russia the stimulating action of French symbolism was keenly felt first in the late 90's by admirers of Baudelaire and decadent literature (Bryusov, Balmont, Annenski, Merezhkovski, qq.v.), then by the more mystical and dreamlike Blok and Bely (qq.v.) in the first decade of the present century.

The technical experiments and the philosophical aspirations of the symbolists have been among the boldest in the history of literature. They could not but end in partial failures, just as romanticism, a broader movement embracing all literary genres and all the arts and richer in geniuses, had done before. Symbolism, in its flight away from reality, was sometimes lost in the clouds of a rarefied atmosphere; in its flight from its enemy, prose, it often "desperately tried to save its soul from the victor by giving up its body" (Robinson Jeffers) and was too easily content in doing without the earth, the flesh, and its passions; in its contempt for eloquence and communication with a profanum vulgus, it became needlessly esoteric and appeared to sing only for the few initiates of a secret cult. But these excesses were the inevitable price of a higher good. Symbolism rediscovered the original tradition of French poetry—a discreet, delicate, and indirect lyricism expressed in a fluid and subtle music. It rediscovered the essence of all great poetry—to feel with intensity and express through pregnant images and suggestive symbols the mystery of existence and the life of the soul.

See: Adolphe van Bever and Paul Léautaud, Les Poètes d'aujourd'hui (1900); Ernest Raynaud, La Mêlée symboliste (4 vols., 1918–1936); Pierre Martino, Parnasse et symbolisme, 1850–1900 (1926); John Charpentier, Le Symbolisme (1927); Marcel Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933). On symbolism in England: Arthur Symonds, The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899); W. B. Yeats, Ideas of Good and Evil (1903); Louis Cazamian, "Symbolism and Poetry," in Essais en deux langues (1938), pp. 187–204. On symbolism in America: Amy Lowell, Six French Poets (1915); René Taupin, L'Influence du symbolisme français sur la poésie américaine, de 1910 à 1920 (1929); Edmund Wilson, Axel's Castle (1931).

H. P.

Frenssen, Gustav (1863–1945, German novelist), a chief exponent of regionalism in German fiction, was born at Barlt in Holstein, the son of a local cabinetmaker. After theological studies, he served for 10 years as Lutheran pastor in two villages near his home; a collection of his vigorous but rather unorthodox sermons bears the title Dorfpredigten (1899; Eng. tr. of selections, Village Sermons, 1924). While working as country pastor Frenssen published three novels, Die Sandgräfin (1896), Die drei Gelreuen (1898; Eng. tr., The Three Comrades, 1907), and Jörn Uhl (1901; Eng. tr., 1905). The third novel proved a sensational success, and Frenssen resigned his pastorate to devote himself to writing. During these years Frenssen's belief in the orthodox bases for professional service in the church had become radically undermined; this shift of religious opinion appears as a fairly constant factor in his work (Hilligenlei, 1905, Eng. tr., Holyland, 1906; Der Pastor von Poggsee, 1921, Eng. tr., The Pastor of Poggsee, 1931).

Frenssen lived for a time at Blankenese on the Elbe near Hamburg, but he returned in his later years to Barlt. With keen understanding and a sympathy which occasionally degenerates into sentimentality, he portrays the peasants, fishermen, and seafaring folk of his homeland who wrest a livelihood from meager acres or seek it in ceaseless struggle with a bleak northern sea. His stories seem to lose validity when he wanders from these narrow confines, as in Klaus Hinrich Baas (1909; Eng. tr., 1911), which relates the rise of a Holstein lad to commercial eminence in Hamburg, or in that part of Lütte Witt (1924) covering the period before the youthful hero returns from the Ruhr to Holstein. One of the novelist's chief successes, Peter Moors Fahrt nach Südwest, (1907; Eng. tr., Peter Moor's Journey to Southwest Africa, 1908), hardly forms an exception; its popularity depended in part upon German interest in African colonization. Frenssen was not a voluminous author: a career of nearly 50 years produced 15 works of fiction, three plays, an epic, Bismarck (1914), and some miscellaneous writings (e.g., Briefe aus Amerika, 1923). Among the novels, Jörn Uhl remains the most representative; it is the story of a peasant youth who by sheer strength of character rises to mastery of his fate in conflict with adversity and with sordid and debasing surroundings. In Hilligenlei Frenssen sought to explain his new theological position; into the substance of the story the novelist inserts as the work of his hero a rationalized and humanized life of Christ. Otto Babendiek (1926; Eng. tr., abridged, The Anvil, 1930) is an autobiography in the form of a novel. Frenssen's characters are widely varied within the limits of Holstein types and are vividly conceived. He invests with beauty and charm the rather monotonous landscape of the North Sea shores, and he is capable of highly effective and graphic narrative—the account of the battle of Gravelotte in Jörn Uhl is deservedly esteemed. But his novels are weak in construction, are anecdotal and episodic; in this respect the shorter tales (e.g., Der Untergang der Anna Hollmann, 1911) show superior craftsmanship. Frenssen's signal talents in portraying the life of a particular region are marred by confused but militant thinking on theology, morals, and politics.

See: H. M. Elster, Gustav Frenssen (1912); A. Droege, Die Technik in Gustav Frenssens Romanen (1915); W. Alberts, Gustav Frenssen, ein Dichter unserer Zeit (1922).

H. W. H.-T.

Freytag, Gustav (1816–1895, German dramatist, novelist, and journalist), was born at Kreuzburg, Silesia, the son of a physician. He studied Germanic philology at the universities of Breslau and Berlin and entered upon a promising career as a scholar at Breslau. But success as a dramatist soon lured him to the literary circles of Dresden and Leipzig. The stirring events of 1848 aroused his political interests, and in that year, together with the historian of literature Julian Schmidt, he became editor of the influential weekly Die Grenzboten, a post he occupied for more than 20 years. Though ardently Prussian and nationalistic, Freytag was liberal in his political views and opposed Bismarck's policies with outspoken vigor. He served for a period as a member of the North German Parliament. His liberalism gained for him the friendship of the duke of Coburg, in whose duchy at Siebleben he had a summer home, and of the Prussian crown prince (afterwards Emperor Frederick). The last years of his life Freytag resided in Wiesbaden, where he died in 1895.

Freytag's dramas gained favorable recognition on the stage, but the only play which has stood the test of time is the popular comedy Die Journalisten (1854; Eng. tr., 1888), in which the dramatist combines small-town life, local journalism, and local politics with an adroit hand. In spite of technical merits his other plays (e.g., Die Valentine, 1847; Graf Waldeemar, 1850; and Die Fabier, 1859, an ambitious historical tragedy) are largely forgotten. As a novelist his reputation rests primarily upon Soll und Haben (1855; Eng. tr., Debit and Credit, 1856), which is one of the outstanding novels of the mid-century, a work of epic breadth, providing a comprehensive panorama of German life at the time; the solid merits of the middle classes and the dignity of honest labor form the theme of the novel. In Die verlorene Handschrift (1864; Eng. tr., The Lost Manuscript, 1865) Freytag used the background of university life, to which he had been introduced in his youth. Through the pages of Die Grenzboten Freytag sought to communicate to others his own patriotism, and for this purpose he wrote a series of sketches from German history, later published as Bilder aus der deutschen Vergangenheit (5 vols., 1859–1867; Eng. tr., Pictures of German Life, 4 vols., 1862–1863); in these he presents in brief compass the salient features of a historical epoch, often focused in the career of a commanding personality—Charlemagne, Luther, Frederick the Great. With similar aim he produced Die Ahnen (6 vols., 1872–1880; Eng. tr. of selections, Ingo, 1873, Ingraban, 1873), stories illustrating different periods of German history; the author's narrative gifts and his skill in evoking the spirit of a past epoch do not entirely conceal his pedagogical purpose. Outside of Germany, Freytag is undoubtedly best known through his Technik des Dramas (1863; Eng. tr., Technique of the Drama, 1895), a study of dramatic structure based mainly upon an examination of the Greeks, Shakespeare, and the German classics; this work was long and widely influential, even authoritative.

Freytag was for decades an outstanding figure in German letters, but his reputation has gradually dimmed. His political opinions have only historical interest. In literature he was not a great spontaneous creator, but a conscious artist of talent, trained in close observation of the masters; in Soll und Haben, for example, the patterns of Scott and Dickens are evident. Indeed the very presence among his works of a "technique of the drama" bears testimony to the studied methods which guided his creative imagination.

See: Freytag, Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben (1887; Eng. tr., Reminiscences of My Life, 1890); F. Seiler, Gustav Freytag (1898); H. Lindau, Gustav Freytag (1907).

H. W. H.-T.

Friðjónsson, Guðmundur (1869–1944, Icelandic poet, novelist, short-story writer, and essayist), was born at Sílalækur in Þingeyjarsýsla, near the shores of the Arctic. His father was poor, with a large family; but there was talent in the group, and two of the sons became literary figures. Guðmundur Friðjónsson himself had a brief schooling, became a farmer, and, like his father, raised a big family. He lived and died at Sandur, near his birthplace.

In spite of his time- and energy-consuming occupation. Friðjónsson was one of the most prolific recent authors of Iceland. He began as a realist in the 1890's, spurred on by the intellectual atmosphere of his native district. There a spiritual awakening was in progress among the farmers due in large part to the efforts of Benedikt Jónsson, the librarian at Auðnir, and to the early writings of the farmer-novelist Þorgils Gjallandi (pseud. of Jón Stefánsson). Later Friðjónsson became more of a national romantic. Three collections of his essays and lectures have been published, six collections of poems (1902–1942), one novel, and 10 collections of short stories, apart from a host of articles in newspapers and periodicals.

Friðjónsson has the rather narrow point of view of the Icelandic farmer, but within his limited sphere he is a keen observer. His sensitive nature has made him especially able to see and to appreciate the passive heroism so common among the poorer Icelandic farmers. One of his early poems, "Ekkjan við ána" (The Widow at the River), deals with such heroism, and the poet has returned to the theme in many a short story. He appreciates fully the virtues developed through centuries by the farmers in their hard struggle for existence; he has little understanding and less patience with the modern currents of thought and action that tend to sweep away this old culture. The Old Icelandic tradition is very strongly felt in his poems especially; they are as ornate and polyphonous as Bach's music. His prose style, too, is distinguished with the same characteristics; it is rich in images and highly poetical. Like Stephan G. Stephansson (q.v.), Friðjónsson exemplifies in his work Icelandic rustic culture at its best.

See: G. Finnbogason, "Guðmundur Friðjónsson," Vaka, III (1929), 129–160; S. Einarsson, "Frá Guðmundi Friðjónssyni og sögum hans," Tímarit Þjóðræknisfélags Íslendinga, XVIII (1936), 52–66.

S. E.

Fröding, Gustaf (1860–1911, Swedish poet), was born near Karlstad, in the pastoral and mining province of Värmland on the western border of central Sweden. His was the countryside so well known to readers of Gösta Berlings saga by Selma Lagerlöf (q.v.). Värmland is a district of lakes and forests, far from the turmoil of big cities yet with a gay, high-spirited local aristocracy. The peasants are noted for their hard drinking and rough humor. The loneliness of the region and the rigor of the climate have developed a peculiar sensitiveness in the Värmlander; old legends and superstitions are entwined with his earliest memories.

Mountain trolls, water nixies, and wood spirits are not mere characters of folklore but more than half actual to the popular consciousness.

Fröding came of cultivated and artistic stock on both sides. He was unusually shy and protected himself at school by clowning. His family life was early broken up by an accident to his father and the severe nervous collapse of his mother. There was insanity in his blood. From 1880 to 1883 he was at the University of Uppsala but left without taking a degree. He finally went into newspaper work at Karlstad, where he enlisted on the side of the radicals; this separated him even more from his family. Habits of dissipation formed at the university grew upon him and undermined his already delicate health. It was at this time that he began to contribute poems to his newspaper, his principal models being Burns, Heine, and Byron. His first pieces were mostly pictures of Värmland nature and characters close to the soil. Poetry had been at a low ebb in Sweden, but the success of the oriental sketches of Heidenstam (q.v.), Vallfart och vandringsår (1888; Pilgrimage and Wanderyears), encouraged Fröding to bring out a volume, the now famous Gitarr och dragharmonica (1891; Eng. tr., Guitar and Concertina; a Century of Poems by Fröding, by C. D. Locock, 1925). Although it was well received, it did not for some time attain the tremendous popularity it was to command later.

Other collections followed, more personal and fantastic, the influence of Heine predominating over that of Burns, his original inspiration. The visionary and the morbid side of his nature foreboded the mental breakdown which came in 1894 with shattering severity. Although he partly recovered, his creative power was lost, and he wrote little more of importance. He never married. His fame had, in his later years, been growing rapidly, and his funeral was celebrated by a demonstration unequalled in the history of Swedish literature. Today he is the most admired and beloved of all Swedish poets.

It is hard to give a final estimate of Fröding's poetry. Sir Edmund Gosse acclaims him as "one of the few great singing poets whom Europe has produced in the second half of the nineteenth century." He is at least that. His "terrible and enchanting lyrics" attain the highest perfection both in vivid reality of feeling and in spontaneity of rhythm. He is a melodist par excellence, in subtlety as well as in freshness; and yet, as we read him, we never think of him primarily as a virtuoso. Whatever his mood, he carries us with him irresistibly. At times he is almost insupportably intense, and again he will relax into humor, boisterous, grim, or delicate. His emotional range is wide and varied, but through all its gamut he is equally a master of his art. In the whirlwind of his passion, he has the temperance that gives its smoothness.

The keynote of Fröding's appeal is human sympathy, especially for the victims of circumstance, though he enjoys an occasional dig at the "unco guid." His popularity rests chiefly on his scenes from peasant and small-town life, where he is most objective and humorous. A rough hunter, a girl of the streets, an incorrigible small boy, a nasal prayer leader, a gay lieutenant, a drunken recruit, even an old mountain troll may emerge as his central figure. Into all he can project himself. But he has also a more idealistic and universal note. His "Man and Woman," depicting Adam and Eve in the world's first lover's quarrel, sums up the relations of sex from primitive brutality to the final reconciliation in tender forgiveness. The "Poor Monk of Skara" shows us a renegade priest won back to life and love by the beauty of nature. His wonderful fantasy "Dreams in Hades" likewise ends with "a ray of moonlight through Hades' door." To the problem of life's bitterness and cruelty his answer is like that of Shelley, an all pardoning compassion and the hope of a better age to be.

See: F. Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of O. Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919-1921), pp. 239-265; E. Gosse and W. A. Craigie, eds., The Oxford Book of Scandinavian Verse (1925); M. Hellberg, Frödingsminnen (1925). For other translations of his poetry see: Fröding, Selected Poems, tr. and with an introduction by C. W. Stork (1916); C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930).

C. W. S.

Fucini, Renato (early pseud. Neri Tanfucio, 1843-1921, Italian writer of poems, stories, and sketches), was born at Monterotondo near Pisa. After studying in the various places where his father, a country doctor, happened to be stationed, he attended the university of Pisa, specializing in agriculture. He became inspector of schools near Pistoia, taught in a secondary school, was assistant city engineer, and, for a time, was librarian of the Biblioteca Riccardiana in Florence. He spent most of his life in that city, except for vacations on his farm near Empoli or in his little villa at Castiglioncello, near Leghorn.

It was at Pisa, while a student, that he began to write facetious, witty sonnets in the Pisan dialect. Enthusiastic friends prevailed upon him to publish them; they appeared in 1872 as Cento Sonetti in vernacolo pisano. Later he added 50 more sonnets. This book became popular all over Italy and has had some 25 editions. The reason for this immediate and lasting popularity lies in the merry tone, the ease, the benevolent satire, the utter spontaneity of these sonnets, which Miss R. S. Phelps aptly called "little snapshots of 150 aspects of contemporary life." Later he wrote poems in standard Italian and proved that he could treat serious as well as humorous topics in the purest Tuscan with equal spontaneity. In 1878, after a trip to Naples, he published Napoli a occhio nudo, a collection of letters to a friend, describing that city with a masterly touch.

A direct result of his country life was Le Veglie di Neri (1884), a collection of short stories and sketches of Tuscan scenes and characters, sometimes pathetic, but in a healthy, restrained way, more often humorous, always delightfully genuine and vivacious. A similar volume, All'aria aperta, appeared in 1897, and a third, smaller one, Nella campagna toscana, in 1908. During his later years he devoted himself to school books (Mondo nuovo, 1901; Mondo vecchio, 1904). Three of his works appeared posthumously in 1922: Acqua passata, Foglie al vento, both containing autobiographical incidents and anecdotes, and La Maestrina. For his joyousness, the purity of his Tuscan style, his genuine humanity, his spontaneity, Fucini has a unique place among Italian writers.

See: B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, III (1915), 139-146; G. Biagi, preface to Fucini, Acqua passata (1922); R. S. Phelps, Italian Silhouettes (1924), pp. 142-159.

R. Al.

Fulda, Ludwig (1862-1932, German dramatist and translator), was born in Frankfurt am Main, studied in Heidelberg, Munich, and Berlin, visited the United States in 1906 (Amerikanische Eindrücke, 1906), and became president of the literary section of the Prussian Academy in 1926. His editing of the works of German poets around 1700 (Die Gegner der zweiten schlesischen Schule, 2 vols., 1883, in Kürschners deutsche Nationallitteratur) suggested to him the problem of his first drama. The failure of this dramatization of the tragic fate of Christian Günther (1882) is almost symbolic of Fulda's own work, since his keen intelligence senses ideals which his amiable, versatile, and facile talent is unable to attain or even to attempt. In spite of his early and courageous espousal of Ibsen's (q.v.) cause after the famous performance of Ghosts in Augsburg in 1886 and in spite of his membership in the directorate of the Freie Bühne, he deviated little in his own productions from the claptrap of the more ordinary French social drama and pièce à thèse; but with an unfailing scent for timely innovations and public demands he infused into them just enough of opportune problems and growing tendencies to insure stage success. Thus, in Das verlorene Paradies (1890) he anticipated Hauptmann's (q.v.) Die Weber (1892) in treatment of a threatening strike, in Die Sklavin (1892) he presented a parlor Nora, and in his symbolic drama Der Talisman (1893), based upon Hans Christian Andersen's "The Emperor's Clothes," he broke the yoke of naturalism and ushered in the neo-romantic drama. The awarding of the Schiller prize for this last work was vetoed by William II, but Fulda received the Viennese Bauernfeld prize for his comedy Die Kameraden (1894). His three score plays show little or no development except in routine. Of lasting value, however, is Fulda's achievement as a translator. In this field his empathic and linguistic talents and his gift of versification (which also comes to light in a collection of epigrams, Sinngedichte, 1888) master the most divergent form problems. Notable are his renderings of Ibsen (poems and Peer Gynt, 1915), Cavallotti (Hohes Lied, 1894), Beaumarchais (Figaro, 1894), Rostand, (Die Romantischen, 1895, and Cyrano de Bergerac, 1898), Molière (Meisterwerke, 4 vols., 1897), Shakespeare (Sonnette, 1913), and the Spanish dramatists (Meisterlustspiele der Spanier, 2 vols., 1926).

See: A. Klaar, Ludwig Fulda (1922).

E. F.

Furmanov, Dmitri (1891-1926, Russian novelist), son of a bartender, was born at Sereda, in the former Government of Kostroma, graduated from a technical school, studied literature at the University of Moscow, joined the Communist Party in 1918, and took an active part in the civil war. He was appointed commissar of various fighting units, then political chief on the Turkestan front. He won great popularity in Soviet Russia through his novel Chapayev (1923), the first full-scale literary work attempting to depict revolutionary events. Furmanov portrayed Chapayev, an undisciplined guerrilla leader of the southeastern steppes behind the Volga River, as a true representative of the elemental forces of a people in revolt. He used a semi-journalistic method, reporting accurately the facts of the civil war. Furmanov's other books (Dnevnik, 1923, Diary; Myatezh, 1923, Uprising; Pozhar, 1924, Fire) follow the same line of factual naturalism. They lack plot, artistic construction, or elaborate form; they are documentary reports on actuality. In 1923-1925 some enthusiastic critics in Russia acclaimed Furmanov as an initiator of a new "artless literature," asserting that "when the events are as fantastic as they are today, the writer does not need to add anything to them, his goal being merely to state them." Undoubtedly a very gifted man, Furmanov may be considered as a representative of the "factual literature" which flourished in the early period of Soviet art. His novels have hardly any aesthetic value, but they remain as vivid and interesting documents, faithfully reflecting the turbulent years of the Russian Revolution. A very successful film was made out of Chapayev.

M. S.

G

Gabriel y Galán, José María (1870-1905, Spanish poet), was born and raised in Frades de la Sierra, a village of Salamanca. He became a schoolteacher, a profession he soon gave up when he married and took up farming in a village of Extremadura, Guijo de Granadilla, isolated and archaic. It was there he lived the traditional life he describes in his poems. He became famous overnight with the poem "El ama," which was awarded first prize in the Juegos Florales held in Salamanca in 1901. In this poem he sang of the life of a ranch in Salamanca, the landscape of Castile, and the austere, traditional character of the Castilian peasant. At the same time he won recognition with another poem, "El Cristu benditu," written in the dialect of Extremadura. These two poems contained all of Galán, and when they were published they sufficed to give him a glory and popularity in which enthusiasm for his work was mingled with protest and with disapprobation of the revolutionary tendencies of the new modernist literature. Nevertheless, this popular traditionalist poetry of Galán's was still another product of the literary revolution that occurred at the end of the century. His glorification of Castile was linked with that of Unamuno, Antonio Machado, and Azorín (qq.v.). His classic tendencies were not the conventional ones of the 19th century, but derived from the old rustic and popular poetry, which had been rediscovered by the new school. His traditional sentiments are sincere and deep; he had lived from childhood in the country of Salamanca, where the customs of the peasants still preserved the harmony and grandeur of the great Spain of the past. His traditionalism is therefore healthy, gay, and serene, not sad and pessimistic like that of the modernists. All this holds true of his first poems, both those he called "castellanas" (see Castellanas, 1902; Campesinas, 1904; Nuevas castellanas, 1905) and those he called "extremeñas" (Extremeñas, 1902) in which the use of the dialect of Eastern León—very close to Castilian—simplifies and accentuates the rustic, primitive note. As long as Galán keeps to this field he is a great poet, deservedly popular; but in a number of his poems his true originality is smothered by the excess, the vulgarity, and the pedantry of the rhetoric of the 19th century, and for this reason he has had many detractors as well as many admirers.

See: E. Pardo Bazán, Retratos y apuntes literarios, Ser. 1 (ca. 1908); A. Revilla Marcos, José María Gabriel y Galán; su vida y sus obras (1923); F. Iscar Peyra, Gabriel y Galán, poeta de Castilla (1936).

F. de O.

Gaeta, Francesco (1879-1927, Italian poet), a solitary man, difficult of approach, lived all his life in Naples, where he was born and where he committed suicide a few moments after his mother's funeral cortege had left the house. He is remote from all trends of Italian contemporary literature, in spite of the fact that his youthful writings (1895-1904) show that at first he tried the forms of Carducci and D'Annunzio (qq.v.). Very soon, almost through an effort of will, his style manifested itself in a new direction (Sonetti voluttuosi, 1904-1906). With certain strange contortions, twists of verses, interpolations of incidental sentences, and frequent use of Latinisms, he manifested a very modern and personal force of feeling. In his last poems (Poesie d'amore, 1906-1920) he had mastered his technique and no longer offered to the reader such a rough and angular surface: smooth, melodious, and at times graceful, he was able to give full expression to his world. It is a world of sensuous, rapturous love which permeates one's very being, full of colors, odors, instances of forsaking all for a great love. But for him pleasure is forever restrained by a certain melancholy and torment.

One of the characteristics of his poetry is the abundance of realistic details: hairpins, underclothes, shawls, the odor of beef stew, cries of children, are all described in an impeccable, classical verse form. He wrote a masterful critical essay on Di Giacomo (q.v.), to whom he has been compared because of a common Neapolitan background, but the cultural resonances of Gaeta touch horizons never dreamed of by Di Giacomo, who, on the other hand, is more of a natural poet than Gaeta. The vibrations and agitations of voluptuousness in Gaeta always carry in their wake something that is somber and consuming and, in many instances, the menacing shadow of death. The trend of mind of Gaeta, when he wrote on practical matters, was also rather unusual for an Italian. He was an admirer of old Indian wisdom, convinced of the magnanimity and superior humanity of the Aryans, and in the last years of his life, when his mind was oppressed by cloudy thoughts, he became anti-Semitic (one of his manuscripts was published, posthumously, with the title Che cosa è la Massoneria, 1939).

He enjoyed a place in Italian literature but never attained fame and this was partly responsible for his misanthropy. A selection of his works in two volumes, Poesie and Prose, was published in 1928 by Croce (q.v.), who was a true friend and an appreciative critic during his life and after his death.

See: P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1934), pp. 28-35.

G. P.

Galdós, Benito Pérez, see Pérez Galdós.

Ganivet, Angel (1865-1898, Spanish essayist), emerged, at a time when the provincial spirit and the commonplace were dominant in Spain, as an extraordinary nonconformist who contemplated his native country from the north of Europe and aspired to ascertain critically the essence of her peculiar nature and the reasons for her decline. He was born in Granada; there his aesthetic sense of life was formed in the midst of natural beauty and that created by the art of two civilizations. His irregular character was incompatible with the sort of life possible for him at that time—he might have been lawyer or archivist or professor—and he preferred to embark on a diplomatic career in order to live abroad. He resided in Antwerp, Helsinki, and Riga. An indefatigable reader, he continued to nourish an intellectual passion which carried him far beyond any cold scientific curiosity—the latter, indeed, being a quality difficult to find in an Andalusian. Ganivet read especially those authors in whom he could find some connection with his Spanish soul: nonconformists or anarchists such as Renan (q.v.), Schopenhauer, Nietzsche (q.v.), Tolstoy (q.v.), Kropotkin (q.v.), and certain Scandinavian writers. At the same time he immersed himself in Spanish tradition, beginning with Seneca.

Anguished and pressed for time, he wrote all of his books in some three years: Granada la bella (1896); Idearium español (1897); La conquista del reino de Maya (1897), a rather disconnected satire of modern culture as applied to a people in the center of Africa; Los trabajos del infatigable creador Pío Cid (1898), an autobiographical novel which the author left incomplete and in which, in deep intensity of style, he reveals the uncertainty of his character—torn between faith and doubt, impulse and quietist fatalism. The drama El escultor de su alma (1904) appeared posthumously, and also Hombres del norte (1905), a collection of essays on Jonas Lie, Björnsterne Björnson, and Henrik Ibsen (qq.v.), previously published in a daily paper of Granada, as were Ganivet's Cartas finlandesas (1898).

This feverish activity allowed no peace or faith in life to that exuberant and maladjusted temperament, the victim, moreover, of a grave illness, progressive paralysis. In November, 1898, when he was in Riga, Ganivet threw himself into the Dvina from the tug on which he was going to meet his wife, who had borne him a son and was coming to join him. Pulled out of the water he hurled himself in again, confirming what he had written in his books, that he would die when he wished.

Ganivet is considered today the initiator of the reaction against the Spanish 19th century and of the revival of Spanish literature in the 20th century. His works have been republished and made the subject of numerous studies. When his body was moved to Granada in 1925, the intelligentsia organized ceremonies to honor the memory of the unfortunate writer, at a moment in which the country felt itself oppressed by the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera. His most outstanding work remains the Idearium español, in which are analyzed the essential characteristics of the Spanish soul. These, according to Ganivet, are Senecan stoicism and religious and poetic exaltation, with the latter traits susceptible of assuming the opposite states of either mysticism or fanaticism. As though he had read Hegel, Ganivet also outlines a geographic theory to explain history: continental nations possess spirit and resistance; insular nations are aggressive (Napoleon was an island that fell on a continent); peninsulas like Spain have a spirit of independence. Spain's error probably consisted in attempting to conduct herself politically as a continental nation, and her capital vice was "collective abulia." As opposed to the programs of Europeanization that Joaquín Costa (q.v.) and others were proposing during those years, Ganivet recommends a return to the Spanish way of being. Paraphrasing St. Augustine he writes: "Noli foras ire; in interiore Hispaniae habitat veritas." Without attempting to decide this problem, let us say only that the life of a people cannot be grasped through heterogeneous formulae about Seneca's doubtful influence and geographical conditions; it is juggling history to say that Spain should not have gotten away from herself, since, in explaining that history, it must be taken into account that she did do so, and to a great extent. The interesting thing in Ganivet is not the question whether he was right or wrong "scientifically," but the fact that he brought to a somnolent nation themes that would bestir it, that would oblige people to meditate on the meaning of their own lives and those of others. Ganivet's work gains vehemence and permanence because he himself lived the opposition between Spain and the rest of Europe. On the one hand he recognized the worth of the north of Europe, and on the other he did not abandon hope in the so-called backwardness of his country, in which many people had "the singular good fortune of not being able to read. . . . If the learned have only ideas gleaned from books of diverse origin, it is prudent and safe to be guided by the people, who are more artistic and philosophical than it would seem" (Granada la bella). That preference for the spirit, given and expressed in the completeness of life, not merely in books, is an idea which was to take deep root in Unamuno (q.v.), who was doubtless greatly influenced by Ganivet. "The people must understand art, since they create it; they are unable to express their thoughts, but they know how to adapt themselves to everything that is grand and beautiful and they are never out of tune" (Granada la bella). In this view there is something more than hackneyed romanticism.

Like Spain herself, Ganivet desired both to withdraw from and to enter into the orbit of modern culture; for example, he detested the regimentation and symmetry of such institutions as railway stations and school buildings and even proposed that centers of instruction be developed in the individual farmhouses, the living nuclei of Spain's national existence. In other words, life organically developing from within, not organized from without. The author's inner life was divided between reason, which differentiates, and a tendency toward a total contemplation leading to fatalism, the whole focused on the conviction that human spiritual activity is of value when it is converted into the stuff of life. The living person, not the idea, triumphs. Ganivet diffused the belief, today as generally widespread as it is debatable, that there exists a Senecan basis for Spanish life; he also helped to complicate, usefully, the question of what constitutes the essential nature of progress and civilization. After him came Unamuno, Rodó, and even the theories of Waldo Frank in his Virgin Spain (1926).

Sec: M. Fernández Almagro, Vida y obra de Angel Ganivet (1925); H. Jeschke, "Angel Ganivet; seine Persönlichkeit und Hauptwerke," Revue hispanique, LXXII (1928), 102-246; A. Espina, Ganivet; el hombre y la obra (1942).

A. C.

Garborg, Arne (1851-1924, Norwegian poet, novelist, and essayist), was born in the parish of Time in Jæren, southwestern Norway. He came of a family of poor but independent peasant farmers who had owned their own land for two hundred years. It was a happy household until, when Arne was about eight years old, his father, Eivind Garborg, went through a religious crisis which made him gloomy and tyrannical. He forbade the children going to a "worldly" school or even reading books. But Arne managed to read by stealth. He resolved to leave the farm, to which as eldest son he had odal rights, and go to the city. Yet he never ceased to regret the break in that family continuity which he came to value more and more as he grew older.

Garborg afterwards wrote that he was born in the 17th century and had to go through all phases of modern development before he could be himself. In Christiania he studied at the university, supporting himself by writing trenchant, irreverent articles on the questions of the day. He learned to handle the Riksmåal with virtuosity, but in his first important book he returned to the Landsmaal (see Norwegian literature). Bondestudentar (1883; Peasant Students) describes a phenomenon new in Garborg's day, the peasant boy uprooted from his environs and unable to fit himself into the life of the university. Mannfolk (1888; Menfolk) is a naturalistic novel describing young men adrift in the city in the most difficult phase of their lives, that of sex. Hjaa mor (1890; At Mother's) is its feminine counterpart, a weaker novel about the dreary life of a young girl who tries to keep respectable. In the natural reaction against the pietism of his home, Garborg had enlisted on the side of the modernists in the two burning questions of the day, free love and atheism. But he soon revolted against the flat negativism of the atheistic theory of life and sickened of the sensuality that masqueraded as free love. Trætte mænd (1891; Tired Men), written in diary form, is a record of disintegration in a man whose dissipated life has rendered him incapable of wholehearted love and trust, while he demands unsullied purity in the woman who attracts him. It is written in brilliant Riksmål well suited to the sophistications of its hero.

Trætte mænd marked Garborg's farewell to the city before he returned to the scenes and subjects of his childhood in Jæren. In Fred (1892; Eng. tr., Peace, 1929), the story of Enok Hove is based on that of Garborg's own father. It is a tragic and powerful study of a sincere but unlearned peasant nature in the grip of a fire-and-brimstone religion. The chronicles of the Hove family are continued in the drama Læraren (1896; The Teacher), Den burtkomne faderen (1899; The Lost Father), and Heimkomin son (1908; The Son Come Home). Here Garborg evolves an undogmatic religion and a social theory. Paulus, who in Læraren had sold his ancestral farm in order to follow literally the commands of Jesus, allows it to come back into the family and consents to work for his nephew as a hired man.

Meanwhile Garborg had written philosophical-religious books, and a translation of the Odyssey into Landsmaal, besides publishing volumes of letters and diaries, and the most popular of all his works, the poetic cycle Haugtussa (1895; The Hill Innocent). It tells the story of a young girl who has the mystic power of seeing the souls of the dead, as well as the trolls and sprites that surround human beings, though they are invisible to others. The struggle by which she wins over the powers of darkness is described with a spiritual exaltation which, combined with the lyric beauty of the separate poems, the pictures of Jæren landscapes, and the homely intimate details of peasant life, makes Haugtussa the most important poetic work ever published in the Norwegian Landsmaal.

See: I. Grøndahl and O. Raknes, Chapters in Norwegian Literature (1923); H. A. Larsen, "Arne Garborg," American-Scandinavian Review, XII (1924), 275-283.

H. A. L.

García Lorca, Federico (1899-1936, Spanish poet and dramatist), is the most widely known Spanish writer of recent generations. This is due both to his tragic end and to the expressive power of his inspiration which gained for him in the Spanish-speaking world a popularity unparalleled among first-rank poets. Born near Granada, he found in his native Andalusia the main source of his themes and the charm, passion, and soul which form the permanent basis of his temperament and style. His university studies in Granada in literature and law left no appreciable influence on him, in contrast to the lasting traces of an early artistic self-education as musician and poet. When he arrived at Madrid, at 19, he had already published a book of poetic prose, Impresiones y paisajes (1918), and written many poems, selections from which appeared in his Libro de poemas (1921). A year before, his first play, El maleficio de la mariposa, was presented without success. For some time Lorca wrote much but published little. Nevertheless, through the reading of his poems and his rare personal attractiveness he became known increasingly as one of the most important young writers of the "vanguardia" movement. His standing was confirmed in 1927 by the presentation, with Dalí's scenery, of the historical play Mariana Pineda and by the volume Canciones, a collection of delicate short poems, some inspired by folkloric and children's songs, others of an exquisite musical impressionism.

Lorca's real success came through the publication of Romancero gitano (1928), the only volume of poetry of the period which appealed to the general public and yet at the same time was highly regarded by the selected few for whom the new art was primarily intended. Many of his "romances" were soon recited everywhere; some, sung by the common people, came to enrich the treasure of traditional poetry. It was a repetition of that most characteristic phenomenon of Spanish literature in which a learned poet takes his subjects from the people and the people incorporate the new product into the stream of their living art. Although Lorca's poetry contains many apparently contradictory elements—varying in range from the simple forms of folkloric poetry to the abstract and surrealistic style of his odes ("Oda a Salvador Dalí," "Oda a Walt Whitman")—he probably struck in Romancero his most authentic note, that of re-creating the popular spirit of Andalusia, giving it a lyric sense and meaning.

In 1929 Lorca spent a year in New York. The impression made by the modern city upon this poet rooted in the soil and earthly passions is powerfully expressed in Poeta en Nueva York (1940; Eng. tr., The Poet in New York and Other Poems, 1940). It shows the influence of many contemporary trends, especially of surrealism, but the accent is Lorca's: its rich imagery has the concrete sense of reality, its tone is dramatic. What he misses in the mechanistic civilization is an expression of natural impulses. That is why "El rey de Harlem," one of his great poems, exalts the primitive nature of the Negro, in contrast to the cold soulless sensuality of the city.

The last five years of his life, after his return to Spain, were a succession of triumphs and a proof of his creative power. In 1931 was published El cante jondo, a collection of early Andalusian poems, the result of his friendship with De Falla. He directed the "Barraca," a student traveling theatre which carried to rural Spain the best Spanish classical plays, combining modern and classical staging. These were also the years of his great dramatic production—Amor de don Perlimplín, La zapatera prodigiosa, Doña Rosita la soltera, and the two rural tragedies Bodas de sangre and Yerma (Eng. trs. in From Lorca's Theatre: Five Plays, 1941; Blood Wedding, 1939). Together with certain minor works, they represent the highest attainment of a contemporary poetic theatre along the lines of the tradition of Spanish classic and romantic drama. Like his poetry, his theatre runs a wide gamut, from the "cámara" caprice suggestive of "ballet" technique, to bare tragedy. Like his poetry, it is also lyrical, musical, plastic, and dramatic.

Lorca's final work, Llanto por Sánchez Mejías (1935; Eng. tr., Lament for the Death of a Bullfighter and Other Poems, 1937), and his last two tragedies represent the plenitude and synthesis of the multiple elements of his art. That art is very complex and gives the impression of absolute spontaneity because, although it is a product of his time and of his country, it is above all the creation of a born poet. At the outbreak of the civil war Lorca was shot in Granada with the tacit consent of the fascist authorities, by one of the irresponsible groups let loose by the military rebellion. Modern and traditional, refined and primitive, Lorca has been appropriately said to be the essence of "living poetry." Though sometimes he skirted a dangerous facility, the strange force of his poetic personality raises his work to a superior plane.

See: R. M. Nadal, "Introduction," in García Lorca, Poems (1939); Angel del Río, "García Lorca," Revista hispánica moderna, VI (1940), 193-260.

A. del R.

García Morente, Manuel (1888-1941, Spanish philosopher), born in Arjonilla, Jaén, was educated at the University of Madrid. He early came under the influence of Francisco Giner de los Ríos (q.v.) and of his Institución Libre de Enseñanza, which was an important contributing factor to the development of new educational doctrines and ideals in Spain. García Morente went to Germany when Neo-Kantian philosophy was still prevalent and studied at the University of Marburg. In 1912 he was appointed professor of philosophy at the University of Madrid; later on he became a member of the Academia de Ciencias Morales y Políticas. Under the influence of José Ortega y Gasset (q.v.) his thought evolved towards phenomenology and the philosophy of values. A few years before his death, he became a Roman Catholic and a priest. He visited Argentina twice as a professor; in his second visit (1937) he became the founder and the first dean of the new faculty of philosophy of the University of Tucumán. He applied his excellent qualities as a writer to educational purposes, rather than to the construction of a new personal system. Both his books and his oral teachings were always a model of clearness and careful construction; his vocabulary was rich and classic, his style even and orderly.

García Morente's La filosofía de Kant and La filosofía de Bergson were both published in 1917; they are the best studies of these philosophers ever written in Spanish. Two of his most important long essays are "Ensayo sobre el progreso" (Revista de Occidente, January, February, March, 1932), on the philosophy of values applied to the problem of progress, and "Ensayo sobre la vida privada" (Revista de Occidente, January, February, 1935), a phenomenological study on private life. His introduction to philosophy, Lecciones preliminares de filosofia, was written and published in Tucumán, in 1937. His last works are Idea de la hispanidad (1938) and, with Juan Zaragüeta, Fundamentos de filosofia (1943).

E. N.

Gárdonyi, Géza (1863–1925, Hungarian novelist, poet, playwright), was born in Agárd and died in Eger. The idealistic habits that Gárdonyi acquired as a young elementary school teacher followed him throughout his life. He was devoted to idealism in its most profound sense; this idealism sustained his spirit when conditions tried his faith in values. He lived in the provinces rather than in Budapest, which he visited only on necessary trips to publishers or theatrical directors. As a rule the setting of his stories and plays is a Hungarian village or a small town, or a historical background is employed. His marriage failed, and this affected his views about women. Either he idealized them, because it was impossible to meet the ideal woman in life, or with the fervor of a misogynist, he assailed them. Though Gárdonyi did not live according to the tenets of an unquestioning faith, he was always inclined to be religious and, like Turgenev (q.v.), in the last years of his life he was interested in spiritualism and mysticism. His nation appreciated him; he was a member of several important literary societies, and one of the literary societies of Hungary is named after him. He had a certain international reputation too and in 1899 won first prize in a short-story contest arranged by Le Journal in Paris. He was also recognized in Italy. His juvenile stories show the same kind of warmth and understanding heart that is revealed in the juvenile stories of the Italian writer Edmondo de Amicis (q.v.).

It is rather ironic that Gárdonyi's popularity started with a series of amusing sketches about a village judge whose name is used as the title: Göre Gábor (1895; Gabriel Göre). The comic spirit that permeates these sketches is akin to the farcical gaiety of the fabliau; these sketches, however, would not justify Gárdonyi's literary fame. In his cheerful moods Gárdonyi was apt to turn to stock characters or to plots almost painfully simple. It is said that in his later years he himself felt uncomfortable when some of his early works were mentioned. His lyric poems are rich in sentiment and conventional in phrasing. His best play is Bor (1901; Wine). This is delightful, realistic, convincing; it has the charm and freshness of folklore. His other plays are less vital.

Gárdonyi's idealism is successfully expressed in his historical and social novels and stories. In envisaging the Hungarian past he liked to portray the ferocious times of Attila or the heroic times of the Middle Ages or the desolate 16th century. A láthatatlan ember (1902; The Invisible Man), Az egri csillagok (1905; The Stars of Eger), and Isten rabjai (1908; God's Slaves) are his representative historical novels. Gárdonyi understood the soul of historical reality, though sometimes his perspective was not sufficiently reliable and he was apt to stylize history. Az én falum (1908; My Village) contains his best short stories; they have humor and idealism. However, a good deal of his work is unsatisfactory; he wrote too much and in consequence many of his writings are more noble in intention than in artistic results.

See: L. Gopcsa, Gárdonyi Géza élete (1923); L. Szabolcska, Gárdonyi élete és költészete (1926).

J. R.

Garshin, Vsevolod Mikhailovich (1855–1888, short-story writer), was born near Bakhmut in the Ukraine. For some years he lived with his father, an army officer; the parents were estranged. At a Gymnasium in St. Petersburg he was attracted by natural science; but after entering the Institute of Mines he decided to devote himself to literature. Painting of the social scene also became one of his interests, and he formed friendships among the younger painters as well as among the writers. In 1877 the Russo-Turkish War broke out and Garshin, swept up by the desire to share the common man's suffering, volunteered. He was wounded in the leg and a year later left the service. His second story, "Chetyre dnya" (1877; Eng. tr., "Four Days," published, with the other translations mentioned below, in The Signal and Other Stories, 1912), brought him immediate fame; but a mental disorder, which had already manifested itself, interrupted his literary activity (1880–1882), and the year of his marriage proved to be only a respite (1883). Thereafter, the periods of his illness recurred with increasing frequency and finally led to his tragic suicide.

The literary output of Garshin is not great, but among his 20-odd stories and sketches are a number of minor masterpieces. Acute sensibility and moral earnestness, qualities which he shares with the giants of Russian literature, compensate for his lack of creative force. Garshin's ideas closely parallel those of the Populists; submerging his ego in the life of the people was with him a consuming desire, particularly in his youth. For a time he found peace in military life, but he never minimized the horror of war; it is his keen awareness of it that gives poignancy to such stories as "Four Days" and "Trus" (1879; Eng. tr., "Coward"). For Garshin war was first of all an unavoidable evil. The wounded man who spends four days on a battlefield does not know the answer to war's fundamental contradictions, and the "coward" simply resolves to undergo that evil without finding the reason for its existence. "Iz vospominani ryadovovo Ivanova" (1883; Eng. tr., "From the Reminiscences of Private Ivanov"), on the same theme, has a larger sweep, but is calmer and pervaded with sadness. The same year saw the appearance of Garshin's acknowledged masterpiece, "Krasny tsvetok" (Eng. tr., "The Scarlet Blossom"); the author's experiences as well as his interest in psychiatry made him particularly qualified to give an accurate portrayal of a madman striving to eradicate all evil, which to him was concentrated in the three poppies growing in the hospital garden. While this story represents Garshin's most direct approach to the problem of evil, the issue pervades much of his work. In "Proisshestviye" (1878; Eng. tr., "An Incident") and "Nadezhda Nikolayevna" (1885; Eng. tr., "Nadezhda Nikolayevna") his idealized prostitutes inspire true love, but nevertheless precipitate tragedies. In "Vstrecha" (1879; Eng. tr., "The Meeting") a predatory individual confronts a well-meaning but ineffective man. In "Khudozhniki" (1879; The Artists) a painter fails because he cannot find moral justification for his art. "Attalea Princes" (1880; Eng. tr., "Attalea Princes") is a negation of violence, its symbolism foreshadowing "Skazaniye o gordom Aggeye" (1886; The Tale of the Proud Aggei); the latter, as well as the "Signal" (1887; Eng. tr., "The Signal"), clearly shows the influence of Leo Tolstoy (q.v.).

See: V. G. Korolenko, "V. M. Garshin," in D. N. Ovsyaniko-Kulikovski, ed., Istoriya russkoi literatury XIX veka, IV (1910), 335-361; G. A. Byaly, Garshin; literaturnaya borba vosmidesyatykh godov (1937).

P. A. P.

Geijerstam, Gustaf af (1858-1909, Swedish novelist, short-story writer, and publicist), was born in Västmanland. Brought up in a staid, conservative family tradition with which he broke during his years as a student at Uppsala (in the late 70's and early 80's), Geijerstam became one of the most active proponents of the new realistic and liberal literary movement of the 80's. His first work was a collection of scarcely distinguished short stories Gråkallt (1882; Gray Cold), dealing with themes characteristic of the reform-minded literature of the day, such as the conflicts between parents and children and between young men and their beloved resulting from differing views on social and religious questions. Two partly autobiographical novels, Erik Grane (1885) and Pastor Hallin (1887), develop similar themes at greater length but scarcely with more distinction. Geijerstam's realistic peasant tales—Fattigt Folk (2 vols., 1884-1889; Poor People) and Kronofogdens berättelser (1890; The District Bailiff's Stories)—are more important, chiefly, perhaps, because they are far more objective, much less concerned with pressing home current ideals of social reform. In some of these tales one finds a strong preoccupation with certain primitive criminal types, studied sympathetically in terms of subconscious and unconscious motivations; in this he was obviously influenced by Dostoevski (q.v.). This new emphasis upon a psychological, as distinguished from a social or ethical, approach became characteristic of Geijerstam in the 90's and later. From about the middle of the 90's Geijerstam was very productive, turning out until his death in 1909 a steady stream of novels, short stories, plays (chiefly broad peasant farces in an old Swedish burlesque tradition), and essays. Among the more popular of these later works are the hopelessly sentimental Boken om lillebror (1900, 17th ed., 1910; Eng. tr., The Book about Little Brother, 1921) and Kvinnomakt (1901; Eng. tr., Woman Power, 1927). None of this late work, however, weighs at all heavily in the literary scales, though it was exceedingly popular with a broad public (in Germany as well as in Sweden), and though much of it gives apparently sincere, if superficial, expression to the reaction current in the early years of the century against an oversimplified view of human life and human psychology characteristic of the earlier social reform literature of the 80's. Geijerstam may be said to be a first-class journalist and a publicist of some distinction rather than a literary genius of real originality and power.

See: G. Castrén, Den nya tiden, 1870-1914 (1932), Vol. VII of H. Schuck and K. Warburg, Illustrerad svensk litteraturhistoria, 3d ed., pp. 203-208; M. Johnsson, En åttitalist: Gustaf af Geijerstam, 1858-1895 (1934).

A. G.

Gentile, Giovanni (1875-1944, Italian philosopher, educator, and statesman), was born in Castelvetrano, Sicily, of poor parents. After studying classics at the Trapani Lyceum, he attended the Normal School of Pisa, where through Donato Jaja he became acquainted with the Hegelian philosophy of Bertrando Spaventa, the most important influence on his intellectual formation. He has held chairs of philosophy at the universities of Naples, Palermo, Pisa, and Rome. In 1903 he began to write for Croce's (q.v.) Critica and in 1920 started his own Giornale critico della filosofia italiana.

Gentile's doctoral thesis, Rosmini e Gioberti (1898), the first volume of his series of outstanding contributions on the history of Italian philosophy since the Renaissance, was followed by Dal Genovesi al Galluppi (1903), Studi vichiani (1915), Le Origini della filosofia contemporanea in Italia (1917–1923), Giordano Bruno e il pensiero del Rinascimento (1920), Bertrando Spaventa (1920), Studi sul Rinascimento (1923), I Profeti del Risorgimento italiano (1923), and Il Pensiero italiano del secolo XIX (1928). His most important works as an educator are Sommario di pedagogia come scienza filosofica (2 vols., 1913–1914), La Riforma dell'educazione (1920; Eng. tr., The Reform of Education, 1922), and La Riforma della scuola in Italia (1932). His main books in political philosophy are La Filosofia di Marx (1899), I Fondamenti della filosofia del diritto (1916), Che cosa è il fascismo (1925), and Origini e dottrina del fascismo (1929). His contributions in the philosophy of religion include Il Modernismo e i rapporti fra religione e filosofia (1909) and Discorsi di religione (1920). In the field of æsthetics and literary criticism are Frammenti di estetica e letteratura (1921), Dante e Manzoni (1923), Manzoni e Leopardi (1929), and La Filosofia dell'arte (1931).

Gentile's political activities were intensified with the March on Rome in 1922, at which time he was made a senator and became virtually the "official philosopher" of the new Fascist state. This political change was destined to bring about an unfortunate rift between him and his former colleague, Benedetto Croce. Gentile was minister of public instruction under Mussolini from October, 1922 to June, 1924, during which time he devoted himself zealously to the reform of the Italian school system. He was president of the following organizations: Committee to Reform the Italian Constitution; Fascist Institute of Culture, whose organ is Educazione fascista; Higher Council of Public Instruction; Leonardo Foundation; and Inter-University Institute. He also directed the monumental work of the new Enciclopedia italiana. However, with the Second World War, he lost practically all of his political influence and a considerable amount of his philosophical influence in Italy. He was shot and killed by political enemies outside his house in Florence on April 15, 1944.

Gentile calls his philosophical system by the double name of "actual idealism" or "actualism." This system is developed in La Riforma della dialettica hegeliana (1913), Teoria generale dello spirito come atto puro (1916; Eng. tr., The Theory of Mind as Pure Act, 1922), and Sistema di logica come teoria del conoscere (2 vols., 1917). The "actualistic" philosophy represents historically a great and persistent effort to "out-Hegel" Hegel and reach an idealism that is absolutely absolute. Actualism is based on the method of "absolute immanence," in which absolutely nothing is presupposed by the process of thinking because the "thinking ego" posits everything. Reality is "pure experience" or philosophy itself, which is the synthetic "moment" or aspect of the spirit; and art, on the one hand, science and religion, on the other, are respectively the subjective and objective "moments" of spiritual reality, which is at once both the knowing and willing, the thinking and doing of man. The unification of intellectual and practical activities leads Gentile to identify actualism with Fascism. Actual idealism as a philosophy, which is an original form of Hegelian neo-idealism, is important for both historical and logical reasons. The Gentilian system remarkably recapitulates the subjectivistic trend of modern thought and thus serves as the crucial test of the entire idealistic tradition, of which it claims to be the "most rigorous form." In this sense, Gentile is the "last" of the moderns.

See: E. Chiocchetti, La Filosofia di Giovanni Gentile (1922); V. La Via, L' Idealismo attuale di Giovanni Gentile (1925); M. M. Thompson, The Educational Philosophy of Giovanni Gentile (1934); R. W. Holmes, The Idealism of Giovanni Gentile (1937); P. Romanelli, Gentile: The Philosophy of Giovanni Gentile (1938).

P. R.

George, Stefan (1868–1933, German poet), was born in the village of Büdesheim near Bingen on the Rhine. He spent his childhood in Bingen and at the Greek and Latin school in Darmstadt where he completed his schooling in 1888. Subsequently he devoted himself to the study of modern languages, first in French Switzerland and Paris, later at the University of Berlin. During his frequent long stays in Paris, he had personal contacts with Mallarmé, Verlaine, R  gnier (qq.v.), and Rodin. In London he met Ernest Dowson, and in Belgium and the Netherlands he formed friendships with Van Lerberghe, Verhaeren, Verwey (qq.v.), and the painters Ensor and Toorop. His journeys took him north as far as Copenhagen, east to Vienna, west and south to central Spain and to Paestum in Italy. After 1914, he left Germany only for vacations in the Swiss Alps, which he preferred to the windy seashore. He refused honors and funds offered him by the Nazi government and died a voluntary exile in Locarno, Switzerland, on December 4, 1933. He is buried in Locarno.

His work may be divided into five periods. The first period includes poems written up to his 21st year. At this time George intended to become a painter. These poems show that blend of emotion and philosophy dear to youth and are full of tormenting questions about the meaning of life. Some of them were written in a language he himself had invented and later transcribed into German. Only selections are extant, published by George himself in the Fibel (1901) and in the last volume of his works.

The second period comprises the Hymnen (1890), Pilgerfahrten (1891), Algabal (1892), and Die B  cher der Hirten und Preisgedichte, der Sagen und S  nge und der h  ngenden G  rten (1895). The poetry of this period may be termed symbolistic and impressionistic. It is in strong opposition to the naturalistic trend of the German poetry of that time. Not only did George incorporate the elements of the French symbolist poets (see French symbolism) and impressionist painters, but he also set his stamp on the language of his country. He made it more stern and sparing and utilized the vowel sounds in new and richer combinations. Emotions are not described or analyzed, but conveyed by ear and eye impressions. As is the case with many other works of the poet, the composition of Hymnen covers the period of a year, the eternal cycle which nature and the human soul, in tune with the changing seasons, require for their renewal. In Pilgerfahrten he is no longer satisfied with the creatures of his imagination, but searches among his contemporaries for a gesture of deeper understanding. It was at this juncture that, together with the young Austrian poet Hugo von Hofmannsthal (q.v.) and the Belgian Paul G  rardy, he founded the journal Bl  tter f  r die Kunst (1892-1919), which was published at irregular intervals and only for subscribers. In Algabal he dramatizes the young Roman emperor Heliogabalus, but he deviates from the historical data: his Algabal feels himself close to the passions of the people and is imbued with a sense of remoteness from his environment. "Hirten und Preisgedichte" represents the poet's recovery from this feverish and futile search for companionship. He takes refuge in the world surrounding him, in the unpolluted woods and valleys of his native land and in the simple life of fishermen and shepherds, untouched by the changing centuries. The curves and points and windings of a Gothic town, more French than German, and those aspects of knighthood that are still valid in the modern world form the background for the "Sagen und S  nge." In "H  ngende G  rten," an impetuous inner life, in which each moment is savored to the utmost, is set against oriental scenery.

The next sequence, the monochrome and linear period, embraces Das Jahr der Seele (1897) and the volume Der Teppich des Lebens und die Lieder von Traum und Tod, mit einem Vorspiel (1899). In Das Jahr der Seele George is almost reconciled to not finding a companion. An undercurrent of gentle and steadfast melancholy combines even the most contrasting colors into a delicately tinted, homogeneous whole. The poems speak of an "I" and a "you," but more often these terms do not represent two persons but the poet in discussion with himself. From the heights of his solitude he beholds men and objects spread before him like a tapestry of life, and he draws the figures as one sees them on the wall hangings of the Middle Ages, where the most characteristic gesture is arrested at the peak of motion. In the dramatic rise of the "Vorspiel" to "Der Teppich," the poet expresses his philosophy in a dialogue with an angel who is none other than his own soul. "Die Lieder von Traum und Tod" supplies a mystical and transcendent close to this period of despair.

The fourth, his classical period, comprises Der siebente Ring (1907) and Der Stern des Bundes (1914). The poet found the companion for whom he had been searching in a boy who died at the age of 15, after George had known him for about a year. In the poet's life, this companion, called Maximin, played a role similar to that of Dante's Beatrice. In Tage und Taten (1903), George's only volume of prose, he describes his first encounter with Maximin. Der siebente Ring reveals the realms thrown open by this friendship. The laws of the new world and the new life are given in Der Stern des Bundes. The language of these poems is terse and forceful, and its beauty does not depend on poetic devices or sustaining power of rhyme.

In his last period, George is the judge and seer of his time. Das neue Reich (1928) treats of the actual problems of his age. The subject matter is wide in scope, ranging from poems on the basic significance of the First World War to lyrics akin to folk songs in their poignant simplicity of symbols and of meaning.

George translated Shakespeare's Sonnets (Sonette, 1912), selected cantos from Dante's The Divine Comedy (Göttliche Komödie, 1909), the major part of Baudelaire's Les Fleurs du mal (Die Blumen des Bösen, 1901), and poems by Rossetti, Swinburne, Dowson, Jacobsen (q.v.), Kloos, Verwey, Verhaeren, Verlaine, Mallarmé, Rimbaud (q.v.), Rénier, D'Annunzio (q.v.), and Rolicz-Lieder.

See: F. Gundolf, George (1930); F. Wolters, Stefan George und die Blätter für die Kunst (1930); E. L. Duthie, L'Influence du symbolisme français dans le renouveau poétique de l'Allemagne; les Blätter für die Kunst de 1892 à 1900 (1933); E. Morwitz, Die Dichtung Stefan Georges (1934); Stefan George, Poems, tr. by C. N. Valhope and E. Morwitz (1943), German text included; B. von Bothmer, Stefan George Bibliography (in preparation).

E. M.

Géraldy, Paul (pseud. of Paul Le Fèvre, 1885–, French poet and dramatist), was born in Paris, where he resides. His poems and plays concern the behavior of men and women of the rich, leisured class. His characters are tense, nervous, fastidious materially if not spiritually; they have no moral code except that they demand integrity from each other in their own relations; they are insecure and desperately seeking momentary happiness with each other.

Petites Ames (1908) reflects the poet's adolescence, Toi et moi (1913; Eng. tr., You and Me, 1923) his growing concern with the psychological aspects of love between man and woman—a problem which he continues to dissect in Aimer (1921), Robert et Marianne (1925), and Christine (1932), all presented with considerable success at the Comédie Française. In these plays he is more lyrical than profound. Les Noces d'argent (Eng. tr., condensed version, Nest, 1922) concerns the estrangement of parents and children in a rich middle-class family. It was produced at the Comédie Française in 1917 and failed. In 1928 at the same theatre it was presented again, this time with success, and subsequently appeared in translation all over Europe and in America. The vigorous treatment of the subject is occasionally reminiscent of Henry Becque (q.v.), but for the most part Les Noces d'argent is just another "well-made play." Duo (1938), adopted from the novel of the same name by Colette (q.v.), has, on the other hand, not only virile dramatic action but plausible characterization and real pathos. Géraldy has written three pieces with Robert Spitzer, Do Sol Mi Do (1925), L'Homme de joie (1929), and Son Mari (1927), all produced successfully in the boulevard theatres, and one play with Laveline, La Princesse (1919), produced at the Odéon. His one-act plays include Les Spectateurs (1906), La Comédie de Famille (1908), and Les Grands Garçons (1922; Eng. tr., Just Boys: Father and Son, 1933). "Le Grand-Père," a dramatic poem, was declaimed by Féraudy at the Comédie Française (May 22, 1915). Géraldy has also written the novels La Guerre, Madame (1917; Eng. tr., The War, Madame, 1917) and Le Prélude (1922); L'Amour (1929; Eng. tr., L'Amour; or, The Art of Love, 1930), maxims; and Clidindin (1937), a children's story.

See: John Palmer, Studies in the Contemporary Theatre (1937).

E. B. M.

German literature. In the movement of German literature between 1870 and 1940, two themes recur with striking persistence—the gradual emancipation of the writer from the bourgeois tenets of the 19th century and the emerging sense of the artist's increased responsibility within the changing social and political life of the nation. The Franco-Prussian War is no casually chosen point of departure; it represents the meaningful date at which, in Germany, the achievement of nationalistic aspirations coincided with the first decisive signs of cultural self-criticism. Soon after the recognition of Germany as a preponderant factor in European politics, German writers themselves began to insist upon the dangers of intellectual isolation and hoped to share in the spiritual life of the continent. None of the German literary movements, in which the endeavors of the three successive generations were to be crystallized, could have taken shape or direction without the influx of ideas, gratefully though never uncritically received, from all parts of Europe. Nationalistic and cosmopolitan tendencies were, at the end of the century, curiously intermingled, and it is well to remember that in the cardinal figure of Friedrich Nietzsche (q.v.) elements of Teutonic self-assertion and equally blunt expressions of contempt for the narrow-minded men of the new Reich exist fruitfully side by side.

The 19th century was, in Germany, on the whole, not favorable for the literary artist. In many respects the lingering memory of the idealistic and romantic tradition had paralyzed, rather than enhanced, the creative will, and in spite of many a remarkable individual work the total impression is one of imaginative frustration and indecision; between 1848 and 1870 only one or two novelists contributed to the permanent greatness of the German tradition, and the lyrical achievement of the generation between Heinrich Heine and the realistic poets is platitudinous and uneven. Apart from an academic sort of prose in the considerable body of memoirs, the most vigorous writing of the period and the most distinctly creative intellectual criticism came from the historians and political pamphleteers. The novelists, dramatists, and poets, with a few interesting but hardly striking exceptions, chose, before 1870, to keep aloof from the disquieting preoccupation with the new political issues. Indeed, even where the German writers of the 70's or 80's turned to the pressing subject matter of the changing social scene, they did so with a self-conscious effort of preserving their identity as artists, whose responsibilities were not primarily political.

The German novelist in particular remained ineffectual for so long and his work never reached more than a limited international or even national public because, throughout its history, German fiction has been provincial in setting and parochial in subject matter, whereas the urgent social themes of the advancing century have been predominantly related to the world of the city. In dealing with urban themes and problems the German novelist has, on the whole, been least at ease.

The most distinguished exception to this general observation, and the most urbanely civilized portraitist of Prussian society, both aristocratic and bourgeois, between 1860 and 1890, is Theodor Fontane (q.v.). By seizing upon the narrow yet significant Prussian scene, and by the keenness of his observation, he established himself as the one novelist of the age who succeeded in bridging the gulf that usually exists in German fiction between the provincial theme and the craftsmanship of a cosmopolitan storyteller. The motivating elements of his work are a lively sense of historical continuity and a quick perception of the speech and gestures by which the people of his world reveal their special virtues. Moreover, unlike all his other contemporaries, Fontane is wholly unsentimental. In his early journalistic work, he developed a sense of detached and intelligent precision that served him supremely well in his major novels. While it may not be just to compare Fontane to Henry James or Joseph Conrad or, for that matter, to any of his distinguished European contemporaries, he is the only writer of German fiction in the late 19th century who could, now and again, have held his own in their company.

No less significant a narrative artist, though a writer of an entirely different temperament, is Wilhelm Raabe (q.v.). In the originality of his idiom, in the breadth of his vision, and in the warmth of his sympathy, he surpasses, at times, Fontane himself, who has much of the cool detachment of Flaubert (q.v.) while Raabe continues the fertile tradition of the German baroque imagination. His novels, from Die Chronik der Sperlingsgasse (1857) to the somber trilogy Der Hungerpastor (1864), Abu Telfan (1867), and Der Schüdderump (1870), reflect an ever growing concern with the disintegration of the quaint but organic life in the German provinces. As early as 1864 (Der Hungerpastor) and 1876 (Horacker) and as late as 1891 (Stopfkuchen), he interprets apprehensively the implications of the far-reaching achievements of the Prussian armies between 1864 and 1871. Again and again he ponders the disturbing transformation of the nation's emotional life and the conversion of a contemplative people into the efficient but barren organization of the German state. Whatever virtues may illuminate Raabe's world, his is the humor, often bookish and tortuous, of a patient and understanding but never uncritical observer of a society which threatened to substitute sham values for genuine belief.

Few novelists of the time can match the sustained storyteller's craft of Fontane or Raabe. One of them, the Swiss Gottfried Keller (q.v.), greatest of all the mid-century realists, issued in 1879 a carefully considered revision of his most impressive novel, Der grüne Heinrich (1854-1855); but apart from a late "political" tale, Martin Salander (1886), he confined himself at that time to the more congenial medium of the Novelle, a form of the short story in which the romantics had excelled and which was now, in the 70's and 80's, once again the favorite German narrative vehicle. Twenty-four volumes of Paul Heyse's (q.v.) Deutscher Novellenschatz (1871-1876) testify to the popularity of this attractive genre in which genuine fabulists—such as the North German, Theodor Storm (q.v.); Gottfried Keller and C. F. Meyer (q.v.) in the firm, round manner of the Southwest; and the accomplished Austrians, Ferdinand von Saar (q.v.) and Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach (q.v.)—spoke authoritatively and appealingly.

It is true that in most of these shorter narratives the provincial themes of German fiction predominate; but the soundness of their form and the steadiness of their human appeal is so striking that, in retrospect, the work of these realistic craftsmen overshadows on the whole the emerging discussion of the new "naturalistic" point of view (see German naturalism). Compared to the substantial and lasting achievements of these five or six conservative prose writers, the naturalistic controversy now seems little more than a brief interlude, but—like the subsequent challenge of the "expressionistic" point of view—it served as a climactic shock without which the new "modern" idiom of the 20th century could not have been finally established. This critical skirmish was conducted with vigor and some bitterness, mainly in those cities in which the recent European reorganization had vested economic and social strength—in Berlin, Leipzig, and Munich. Some of the new literary journals sustained the controversy between the rearguard of the idealistic tradition and the cosmopolitan advance of the pseudoscientific and mechanistic-minded forces. In their pages and in the belligerent pamphlets of the outstanding protagonists, the voices of a new generation were first heard, and a distinguished group of European writers (Ibsen, Zola, Tolstoy, Maupassant, Strindberg, Hamsun, Gerhart Hauptmann, qq.v.) broke for the first time, with concerted effort, into the established world of bourgeois belief.

The compelling influence of the mid-century's three most persuasive analysts, Taine (q.v.), Darwin, and Marx, left the German writers especially preoccupied with the determinist pattern of life. At the beginning of the 80's the fascination of the idealistic tradition seems to be coming to an end: whether optimistic at the prospects of evolutionary progress or resigned to pessimistic immobility, the artist finds himself compelled to abandon the humanistic faith in the creative will of the individual. At a time when German imperialism begins its most aggressive career, the work of Schopenhauer seems, paradoxically, to find its belated fulfillment in the naturalistic philosophy.

At the same time, the earlier predominance of the provincial and idyllic themes now gives way to a deliberate emphasis upon the social issues of the city and of those human types and classes that had not yet actually entered the main stream of self-conscious literature.

In the flourishing tradition of the German popular fiction and poetry, the subjects of class conflict and social tension had, of course, not been uncommon. Even the technique of minutely detailed observation and description was not the contribution of the young naturalists alone. But the new matter was now being employed with an aggressive baldness of gesture and design that makes any comparison between the German naturalists and their English, French, or Russian contemporaries difficult. The popularity of the novelist and dramatist Hermann Sudermann (q.v.) is not due to the superiority of his achievements; in such works as Der Katzensteg (1889) or Frau Sorge (1887), he turns the impartial conscientiousness of Zola or Tolstoy into German sentimentality and fails to accomplish more than a transparently crude artifice.

The new and somewhat naïve critical belief in the staccato reproduction of a narrow segment of life, applied, as it was, with the stubbornness of the smaller German naturalistic talents, made any fiction of real distinction impossible. The instrument of the German language which had, since the days of Goethe, become so impressive an organ of thought and eloquence now failed to serve and discipline the narrative artist. Fontane, one of the first to recognize the courage and justice of the naturalistic idiom, bestowed his earliest and generous praise not upon a work of fiction, but upon the paradigmatic play of Arno Holz and Johannes Schlaf (qq.v.), Die Familie Selicke (1890). It was in the drama—or the theatre—that the nervous manner of meticulous reporting proved to be most effective.

The German drama of the immediate past had not been undistinguished. Still bound to the idealistic conventions of belief and technique, its subject matter had philosophical substance, patriotic fervor, and, here and there, popular appeal. Throughout the age, Richard Wagner's (q.v.) influence was compelling, even irresistible. In 1876 his festival house at Bayreuth was finally opened with his Nibelungen tetralogy, and six years later Parsifal concluded the spectacular career of an artist whose creative work and critical convictions, with all their one-sidedness, were more widely disturbing than those of any other of his European contemporaries.

The naturalistic drama differed in essential respects, however, from Wagner's romantically conceived and emotionally strenuous notion of the Gesamtkunstwerk. With something like pedantic consistency, the new playwrights proceeded to dissolve the heroic center of the classical drama into a dull variety of involuntary gestures and episodic situations; even in its subject matter the naturalistic drama was at first tiresome and monotonous, but it soon abandoned the narrow preoccupation with crime, hunger, and disease. In the hands of its most vigorous and gifted artist, Gerhart Hauptmann, it became a remarkably telling and flexible form.

Hauptmann's achievement is not easily summarized. In many respects he has been an awkward and at times even irresponsible artist, whose long career has been filled with surprises and disappointments. But in the company of his more superficial and less courageous—and now generously forgotten—contemporaries, he remains in Germany the only genuine representative of the modern realistic drama. The spectacular aspects of his early success (Vor Sonnenaufgang, 1889) are now a matter of record. What gives him lasting distinction is that, within the brief period of 10 or 15 years, he enlarged the indistinct medium of naturalistic speech and action into a variety of impressive dramatic accomplishments. The influence upon him of Ibsen's, Björnson's, (q.v.) and Dostoevski's (q.v.) religious idealism is strong at first, and compassion remains his most persistent trait. Die Weber (1892), a stirring account of exploited and tragically charged human beings, has proved to be Hauptmann's most straightforward work, free of the cliché and claptrap of similar "propaganda" plays. Both in comedy (Der Biberpelz, 1893) and in historical tragedy (Florian Geyer, 1895), he develops the naturalistic style by the force and detachment of his own temperament into a superbly final type of 19th-century epic-drama. Two later and even more powerful plays, Fuhrmann Henschel (1899) and Rose Bernd (1903), reaffirmed his skill in human portraiture; but he had then already passed beyond the strict pattern of naturalistic doctrine, for in Hanneles Himmelfahrt (1893) and his most widely played lyrical drama in verse, Die versunkene Glocke (1897), he had made use of newly developed symbolic poetic devices. Throughout his later career he has shown himself to be resourceful and versatile. Characteristically, he has remained immune to the disturbing influence of Nietzsche—his strength is drawn not from the philosophers, but from a deep sense of the nervous energy and delicate contour of the individual human being.

Hauptmann's work, as well as that of his lesser naturalistic contemporaries, owes much to the flourishing theatrical culture of the time. Three events indicate the memorable advance of the Berlin theatre: the production in 1874, by the duke of Meiningen's troupe, of Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, a display of "realistic" staging and mass scenes which was not to be easily surpassed; the establishment, in 1883, of the Deutsches Theater which, under the directorship of A. L'Arronge, was to devote itself both to the classics and to the more drastic new portrayals of Berlin life; and the founding, in 1889, of the Verein Freie Bühne. With its first production (Ibsen's Ghosts) and by its sensitiveness to the new contemporary idiom, it gained at once, under its director, Otto Brahm, the respect and enthusiasm of the younger generation. The work of Max Reinhardt (1873–1943), the most agile theatrical talent of the past 50 years, gave to the newly invigorated medium particular distinction. With an extraordinary feeling for the spectacular elements of the old Austrian baroque theatre he combined a metropolitan instinct for the subtleties of poetic effect and a flair for the new function of actor and stage designer. His wide range from Molière to Strindberg, from Gorky's Night Asylum to Johann Strauss's Die Fledermaus, from Goethe to Georg Kaiser, suggests the measure of his contribution to the vitality and elegance of the stage which long has been, and is especially at the present time, the one artistic area within which the collective devotion of the Germans to the symbols and images of art finds conspicuous public expression.

It was the imaginative strength of the new theatre which directly or indirectly facilitated for the younger writers the transition from the unpromising doctrine of naturalism to more flexible and more specifically poetic forms. Whether the generation of poets, painters, or musicians which now began to reexamine the sources and aims of the work of art declared its allegiance to an "impressionistic," "symbolist," or "neo-romantic" group, its common concern was with the irrational source of the artist's vision. The new poetry did not, of course, at once abandon its preoccupation with the pressing contemporary subject matter of social issues. On the contrary, two of its most forceful representatives, the poets Detlev von Liliencron and Richard Dehmel (qq.v.), with all their nervous impressionistic perception were intensely, at times even hectically, concerned with the current issues of sex, social tension, and the city. Those were relevant themes, and the conservative talents assembled in Heyse's Münchener Dichterbuch (1882) are the poorer for their want of them. Wilhelm Boelsche in an influential essay, Die naturwissenschaftlichen Grundlagen der Poesie (1887), the young Arno Holz (q.v.) in his first volume of lyrics, Das Buch der Zeit (1885), and the avant-garde writers in Arent's Moderne Dichter-Charaktere (1885) had stressed the link between the poet and the new "scientific" or the "French" manner of seeing the world. But the stirring example of poetic inspiration and political fervor was Walt Whitman, whose poetry had long been vigorously defended by Freiligrath and was now energetically recognized by Johannes Schlaf (Walt Whitman, 1897, 1904). Against the lean and formalized imagery of the German mid-century poets, Whitman represented the voice and rhythm of unself-conscious imagination.

In Dehmel and Liliencron, in the later poetry of Holz (Phantasus, 1898–1899), and in one or two minor impressionist poets, the curiously delicate and on the whole unmartial sensibility of the post-Bismarckian era was to find its appropriate idiom. Their perception was not merely precise and accurate, but subtle, and the pulse of their verse was more passionate and restless than might have appeared tolerable, even to the most understanding poets of the older generation. But, for the first time since the flowering of the romantics in the 1820's and 1830's, the poet spoke with the aggressive ardor of the genuinely inspired singer.

The year 1890 indicates the beginning of a far-reaching imaginative movement, of which Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Rainer Maria Rilke, and Stefan George (qq.v.) are the most striking representatives. About George's strange and masterly personality gathered the proud apostles of the aristocratic and antimaterialistic faith, who, in the Blätter für die Kunst (1892–1919), denounced the pedestrian dullness of naturalism. Hofmannsthal was bound to the new attitude, if not directly at least indirectly, by the patrician delicacy and depth of his intelligence. Rilke, the sensitive Easterner, the pater seraphicus, kept cautiously apart from the slowly forming circle of George's followers. But all three, throughout their work, are concerned with the question of the poet's position in an antipoetical world.

In the lyrical poetry at the turn of the century, a feeling of the artist's self-consciousness is especially obvious. To the young Nietzsche, who had met Wagner in 1868, it was axiomatic that civilization and culture should culminate in the artist; with him in 1872 (see Die Geburt der Tragödie), as it had also been with Schopenhauer, no creative activity transcended that of the musician. But the poetry of the 90's, whether it came from the East, the West, or the South, reflected the precarious situation of the man of feeling and vision in a fundamentally incoherent society. The Kaiser's refusal to patronize the naturalistic playwrights was merely obtuse, the overwhelming public embarrassment in the face of Baudelaire (q.v.), Dehmel, Wedekind, and Strindberg was more serious. The word decadence, which was to become so symptomatic of the intellectual climate of the 90's, meant, of course, more than degeneracy and moral degradation; it conveyed the pathetic increase of spiritual and nervous energies at the expense of biological strength and bourgeois efficacy. Thomas Mann's Buddenbrooks (1901), a prodigiously gifted young man's first novel, paraphrases this theme, and his tales, from Der kleine Herr Friedemann (1898) to Der Tod in Venedig (1913), even the entertainingly moralizing Königliche Hoheit (1909), reflect with singular perspicacity some of the spiritual elements which now motivate the young neo-romantics—a lively sense of the irrational heritage of the German past, an insistence upon the traditional responsibility of the man of letters, and the ever more pressing concern with the virtues and destiny of man.

These were, in substance, Nietzsche's problems; and Nietzsche's work is the gigantic gauge by which not only those immediately under his influence but also each generation since his death in 1900 have measured their world. His peremptory challenges, formulated in the most brilliant and disciplined prose of the century, were ultimately directed at the nature of man, at the biological source of his perception, the depth and fiber of his emotional and intellectual constitution, and above all his moral obligation to a society in a state of precarious crisis.

Impressionists, symbolists, and expressionists alike were profoundly affected by Nietzsche's complex work. Among the early impressionists, those who were indebted to the brothers Goncourt (q.v.) and the French painters from Monet to Renoir, the preoccupation was, clearly, with a new understanding of the artist's private sensibility. In Germany, Eduard von Hartmann (1842–1906), the philosopher of the "unconscious," had some time before (1869) dissolved the round individuality of the ego into a series of atomic and fleeting perceptions which were, in the subsequent intuitive and metaphysical philosophy of Bergson (q.v.) and the psychology of Wundt and Freud, confirmed as the new units of experience. The symbols of Baudelaire and Mallarmé (q.v.), the light gestures of Marées and Liebermann, and the "small sensations" of Cézanne and Debussy make up some of the most generally distinctive elements of the intellectual climate of the European fin de siècle.

Vienna, always delicate and melancholy in its temper, became the scene of much of the new writing: the emotional refinements of Arthur Schnitzler (q.v.) found their most appropriate setting in a society more urbanely, more naïvely preoccupied with the transitoriness of life than was the weary Claudio in Hofmannsthal's Der Tor und der Tod (1893). Peter Altenberg (q.v.), with his extraordinary feeling for the brittle, revealing detail, is the characteristic Austrian master of a literary chamber music for which Johannes Schlaf's (q.v.) Chekhov-like sketches, In Dingsda (1892), with their blurring and lyrical overtones, supplied a minor German melody.

Hugo von Hofmannsthal, the most sensitive of the Viennese poets of the 90's, developed the resources of his Austrian heritage into a body of disciplined verse and prose so distinguished that the impressionistic idiom of his early poetry was but the promising beginning of a literary career which surpasses in variety, breadth, and wisdom that of any of his contemporaries. His association with Max Reinhardt and Richard Strauss links him to the baroque theatrical and musical splendor of the post-Wagnerian and neo-romantic generation; his rich, measured, and classical prose is, in modern German literature, unrivaled.

If the gravity of tradition and cultural responsibility dominate Hofmannsthal's work, it is the religious crisis of the age which gives direction and significance to Rilke's poetry. He, too, began as an impressionist. His earliest poems, before Das Buch der Bilder (1902), have little specific weight. But the contrasting experiences, first of Russia and later of Rodin's masterly absorption in work, and the instability of his own restless life produced, before the First World War, poetry which for wealth and steadiness of vision is, in retrospect, strikingly consistent and impressive. His cardinal theme, elaborated with an ever more severe measure of self-denial and objectivity, is the loneliness of modern man. The issues of Kierkegaard's Christian radicalism, the religious speculations of subsequent Protestant theologians such as Barth and Brunner, even the prominent psychotherapeutic reflections of men like Jung, are all touched tangentially in Rilke's work. It may be that one source of Rilke's perception was private and romantic; but in an age which was overcharged with a disturbing variety of shifting attitudes and concerns, his total contribution is both unique and convincing. His poetry is never, except by profound implication, "political"; neither in his magnificent late work nor in his voluminous correspondence is there evidence of any concern for the simpler and institutional social ties that hold men together. Even the events of the First World War drove Rilke only into a more intense search for the stable realities in which the supremely conscious man, the poet, could find his place.

In George, the third of the great modern German poets, the paradoxical tensions that sustain the pattern of the past 50 years become most sharply visible. His influence upon the German scene of the last two generations is incalculable. Beginning as the self-willed center of a small group of antipositivist minds, he ended not only as a poet who had achieved an extraordinary manner of his own, but as a prophet of national resurgence. George, the master and seer, and his Kreis of devout followers belong in the succession of Nietzsche; aristocratic and pointedly disciplined, but never divorced from the broad current of a common historical heritage—on the contrary, intensely aware of the cultural and traditional responsibilities of the poet—this group represents the extreme measure of the deliberate and stylized, even "heroic" gesture.

The images of past greatness, to which George and his circle were devoted, became the objects of a peculiarly sensitive and exalted form of mythography, and the group's Blätter für die Kunst, at first confined to an esoteric circle, provided a guarded platform for men who have since become conspicuous representatives of the new historical sensibility. Few of the disciples attained distinct poetic significance, but George himself, both in his rigorously cultivated idiom and in his gradual focusing upon the political subject matter of the "Reich," achieved an incomparable degree of poetic intensity. His translations from many European poets indicate the range of his spiritual indebtedness.

More palpably than any other major poet George demanded the return to categorical values; indeed, the relativism of the natural sciences and the conciliatory perspectivism of the historical school had gradually given way to a stricter concept of the humanities (Geisteswissenschaften), for which the philosopher and historian, Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911), had given far-reaching and suggestive definitions and which was now to bear fruit in almost all phases of contemporary thinking. The philosophical writings of the time, whether they are concerned with sociological, aesthetic, or religious problems, are, therefore, of outstanding importance for the appraisal of German literature. Historians not only of the German past, but of the European literatures as well gave new and remarkable impetus to the critical examination of literary patterns and values.

The intellectual currents among the creative writers of the Wilhelmian era are not easily analyzed, but in a comprehensive sense they can be called political, for all impulses of the time spring from a deep-rooted sense of unprecedented change in the outer and inner life of the nation. To divide them into liberal and conservative is perhaps to give unwarranted unity to a large variety of revolutionary attitudes; but the direction of their attack is in almost all cases anti-bourgeois, and much of their aggressive terminology is no less Nietzschean than was the privately poetic temper of the impressionistic and symbolist poets. At the turn of the century, so it seemed, the aftermath of 1870 merged into a premonition of 1914. For their genuine and vigorous comments upon all forms of cultural hypocrisy the South German satirists, with their mocking but prudent strength, were especially effective. Jugend and Simplicissimus, two of the sharpest and wittiest of the semipolitical papers, both founded in Munich in 1896 provide genuine and biting social criticism; Karl Kraus (q.v.) and the belligerent but securely rooted Bavarian, Ludwig Thoma (q.v.), were early contributors; the ironical and devastating Biedermeier cartoons of Thomas Theodor Heine became, 25 years after Wilhelm Busch (q.v.), the inimitable signature of oblique social pessimism.

In the North, it was Paul Ernst (q.v.) who, socialist in politics but conservative in temperament and neoclassicist in form, analyzed in his extensive and varied writings the collapse of German idealism. Nietzsche's influence upon his thinking is unmistakable. With ceaseless energy of thought he challenged, in his austere tragedies as well as in his expert narrative works, the determinism and fatalistic concepts of the naturalistic doctrine. Others (Ferdinand Avenarius, 1856-1923; Arthur Moeller van den Bruck, 1876-1925; Wilhelm von Scholz, Wilhelm Schäfer, Heinrich Mann, qq.v.) also stated the case for a more resolutely "political" literature.

Perhaps no part of the literary life profited more from the seriousness with which the place of the arts was now being discussed than German fiction at the turn of the century. Even though the new novel is highly individualistic, it reflects nevertheless the strong interest of the time in matters of a broader cultural kind. Eduard von Keyserling (q.v.), in temperament and style related to the widely read Danes, J. P. Jacobsen and Herman Bang (qq.v.), observes the oppressively thin atmosphere and the self-conscious paralysis of an enervated and overbred Baltic aristocracy. Even in the work of Thomas Mann, the formal detachment of the Flaubert-Fontane tradition now merges more expressly with the emotional temper of the German romantic heritage. Yet Thomas Mann soon transcends his early proficiency in the impressionistic idiom. The scope and texture of his work have steadily grown; the many memorable figures of his distinguished world, the Tonio Krögers and Buddenbrooks, the Aschenbachs and Castorps, even the recent mythological characters of a re-created past, have appeared before us as ever more urgent reminders of the novelist's concern with the human chance of spiritual self-justification. If, in the earliest tales, it was the socially suspect "artist" who failed to assert himself against an uncomprehending bourgeoisie, the problem of man's adjustment to society and his mastery of the irrational has of late become Thomas Mann's dominant theme. With his work the German novel has undoubtedly attained European rank, but in spite (or because) of the accuracy and refinement of his observation, he has, to some extent, remained the characteristic representative of an atomistic age. When in the late 20's the mood of the time became revolutionary, it seemed to many that his voice and his preceptorial humanism had lost much of their persuasive force. Since his arrival in the United States he has, once again, taken an active part in the discussion of political issues. Many other less brittle novelists may in their work have recorded the changing tide of contemporary feeling more directly and often with more absorbing passion, but in intelligence, moral seriousness, and craftsmanship Thomas Mann has rarely been surpassed.

Of the numerous women writers in whom the delicacy of naturalistic and impressionistic observation is successfully united with a lively sense of plot and character, only one, Ricarda Huch (q.v.), has attained lasting significance. Her early patrician novel, Erinnerungen von Ludolf Ursleu dem Jüngeren (1893), was followed by a series of broad historical works in which scholarly solidity and expertness of narrative style are happily combined. The sense of obligating tradition, so pronounced in Ricarda Huch, is at the same time one of the dominant traits of the period itself; it is the quality by which many of the impressionist novelists and poets succeeded in giving permanence to their talent.

The initial phases of this return to significant values were inevitably critical of the very foundations of the time. Nietzsche's cultural pessimism, his anticipation of the century of nihilism, his doubts of the validity of current values, his insistence upon biological rather than ideological standards—all merged into an apocalyptic sense of crisis without which neither the generation before nor that after the First World War can be rightly understood. The acid work of the dramatist Frank Wedekind (q.v.) is an indication of the cynical despair and skepticism with which, even before the astringent social challenge of Heinrich Mann, Georg Kaiser (q.v.), Alfred Döblin (q.v.), and Hermann Broch (q.v.), all contemporary values were being regarded. In the years between the appearance of Raabe's Horacker (1876) and Heinrich Mann's Der Untertan (1918), the form of cultural criticism had hardened and its intention had gained in bitterness.

The sense of instability and crisis was, however, not confined to the disillusioned older generation, for the establishment of communal youth organizations and ideologically militant Bünde, such as the "Wandervogel" (1896) and the "Pfadfinder" (1911), represents an early and far-reaching mobilization of the younger generation itself; both the hopelessness of youth and its revolutionary mood henceforth remain prominent pathological themes. Even the enormous success of Hans Breuer's songbook, Der Zupfgeigenhansl (1908), by which much of the popular poetic feeling and imagery of the subsequent period was being determined, has had considerable political significance.

The lively interest in Strindberg and Kierkegaard, in Rilke and the French symbolist poets (see French symbolism), and the ever more fashionable preoccupation with Eastern, especially Russian, literature are sufficiently telling signs. The rebarbative, almost oriental, fiction of Wassermann (q.v.) represents in its subject matter the most persuasive statement of the prevailing sense of the individual's merging into humanity or, better, of man's individual responsibility for the whole of mankind. In their form these and other popular novels avoid the radical idiom which was to become characteristic of the expressionistic generation. Impressionistic delicacy and naturalistic determinism had, of course, become equally suspect during the years before 1914. The Blätter für die Kunst had prepared the attack upon both attitudes. Now the artist demanded images which were not accidental, but essential and absolutely valid; he insisted not so much upon an adherence to formal principles of external accuracy as upon imaginative re-creation, an "ex-expression" of the commonly concealed core of any given thing or experience. Not the artist's "impression" of a stable world, but the intensity of his intuitive emotional grasp was now to be the source of his work. The reality which he was to represent was not to be a mere copy, a literal transcription of casual living, but a vision different from it in shape and more intensely spiritual in quality.

In music and painting, in the early works of Munch, Gauguin, Van Gogh, Picasso and Kokoschka, the disintegration—or, it would be better to say—the deliberate reorganization of the pattern of things seen and felt, became plainly apparent. In Schönberg's Pierrot lunaire (1912) and in the statues of Wilhelm Lehmbruck (1881–1919) and Ernst Barlach (q.v.), the characteristic manipulation of purposeful distortion suggested the striking range of the new sensibility. In all of these artists, most movingly, perhaps, in the work of the painter Franz Marc (1880–1916), the ecstatic intensity of feeling breaks conventional forms and a new, inner organ of perception seems to be at work. The "expressionist" idiom was, of course, not confined to German literature—in the poetry of Rimbaud, Claudel, and Jammes (qq.v.) it found significant French representatives—but in the revolutionary and hectic decade after the First World War, it had its most enthusiastic supporters in Germany. As early as 1910 some of its tenets were expounded in two periodicals with the indicative titles Sturm and Aktion. Hermann Bahr (q.v.), the mercurial Viennese who had in 1891 proclaimed the end of naturalism, Die Überwindung des Naturalismus, now outlined in his brief and popular Expressionismus (1916) its main features. A vast literature of enthusiastic and pseudocritical adherence to the new creed paraphrased the anti-bourgeois, pacifist, and revolutionary (activist) nature of the new theses.

But only in the work of the lyrical poets did the expressionistic doctrine release poetic energies that were to become a living part of the literary tradition. Kurt Pinthus's comprehensive and crystallizing anthology, Menschheitsdämmerung (1920), reveals the variety of expressionist themes and temperaments. The early poets, the visionary Georg Heym, the evanescent Georg Trakl, the religious Ernst Stadler, and August Stramm (qq.v.), prophetically anticipate the apocalyptic shadows of the war years. In the poems of Gerrit Engelke (1892–1918), Max Barthel (1893–), Karl Bröger (q.v.), Heinrich Lersch (q.v.), and J. R. Becher (q.v.), the fervor of inspiration and rebellion against the demons of a mechanized age illuminates proletarian and humanitarian motives. The younger generation, emphatic in their denunciation of war, nevertheless reflect the political currents of the time. Only in the baroque work of a few of these poets does the private experience predominate. The early poetry of Franz Werfel (q.v.), with its brilliant musical cadences and its religious groping reminiscent of the young Rilke, has in spite of its anti-war sentiments few of the strident artificialities of the expressionist fraternity. Only now and then does it break into the rebellious cry of the later drama.

For it was in the expressionistic drama that the conventions of feeling and form were most strikingly and most consistently denied. Here, in the lyrical and monodramatic plays of R. J. Sorge, Walter Hasenclever, Fritz von Unruh, and Ernst Toller (qq.v.) and in the sharp and bizarre social indictments of Carl Sternheim (q.v.), Georg Kaiser, and Arnolt Bronnen (1895-), the shiftless and fearful undercurrents of life were cast into startling images and intellectualized symbols and represented in actions and characters which were stripped of their superficial plausibility. At the same time the typically flamboyant "cry" uttered in an unresponsive "space" demanded new patterns of presentation: the expressionistic theatre (Jessner, Martin, Fehling, Piscator), with its grotesquely dissolved architectural frame and the distorted but intense and rhythmical tones and gestures of its depersonalized actors, provided an adequate if puzzling medium for a revolutionary and uprooted generation. Few of the expressionist plays have survived the psychological climate in which they were conceived. They remain essentially the telling documents of a period of frenzied vertigo and of an idealistic resurgence in which the collective experience of social instability and political defeat found its compensating poetic form in hyperbolic effusion and frantic commotion.

The same measure of formal dissolution was not, perhaps, feasible in the realm of expressionistic prose fiction. But the German novelist of that time shares with his contemporaries in France and England a will to redefine in theory and practice the shape and function of narrative art. In the works of Kasimir Edschmid (q.v.), Döblin, E. G. Kolbenheyer (q.v.), and Hermann Stehr (q.v.), the spirit of social and private rebellion and the quest for a new faith are pressed into an explosive and belligerent narrative idiom. The memory of Nietzsche's intellectual criticism and Freud's insistence upon the symbolic nature of all explicit human acts is now apparent in every form of prose writing, especially in the remarkable neo-romantic and surrealist novels of Franz Kafka (q.v.), whose influence upon the present generation, particularly in England and America, has been lasting and profound. Near Kafka and Rilke stands Franz Werfel as the third representative of a specifically Eastern form of religious seriousness and inward idealism.

By 1924, the year in which Thomas Mann's Der Zauberberg sums up the conflicting tendencies of a bewildering age, the expressionistic interlude had come to an end. It is true that, for a short time, the radical theses of social revolution continued to be advanced in the shrill and dissonant manner of the political theatre. But the dramatist's voice had lost the dithyrambic note of private agony. If a new social and intellectual order had not yet been found, if a common denominator of accepted beliefs had not been established, there nevertheless began to emerge from among the poets and artists strong and striking signs of a recovery of the emotional equilibrium. The terms "matter-of-factness" (Neue Sachlichkeit) and "magic realism" offered themselves conveniently for the critical discussion of the change in perspective. Actually, the firmer and unsentimental frame in which life now seemed to gain coherence and which was to give stability of vision to the poets owed its preliminary strength to more than one element. It was not, certainly, a casual reflection of temporary economic prosperity; rather it was, in the work of the significant writers, a "decision" to survey with utmost soberness the moral resources from which the contemporary life was to derive its validity.

First among these was the attempt to focus more sharply upon the memories of the First World War. The impact of those four cataclysmic years had been immense. To the expressionists, they had conjured up eschatological visions of radical evil; now in a mood of recollection and recovery, the poets of the late 20's seem more disposed to accept the moral challenge of a supremely precarious life. Remarque's justly popular Im Westen nichts Neues (1929) may not have been the most substantial of all war books, but in the moving pages of Carossa's unheroic yet resolute and steady Rumänisches Tagebuch (1924), in the volume Kriegsbriefe gefallener Studenten (1928), in Ludwig Renn's documentary Krieg (1928), in R. G. Binding's disciplined Aus dem Kriege (1925), and in the sharply realistic and detached work of J. M. Wehner, E. E. Dwinger, and especially Ernst Jünger (qq.v.), there emerges a poetic sensibility which in many respects far transcends the mere subject matter of the war and leads away from speculation directly into the stern idiom of what contemporary German critics sometimes broadly term existential issues.

But the war, whether contemplated as an individual experience or a collective effort, is only one of many tentative motives of recollection and reorientation. Among them themes of German history have, especially in the "political" fiction of the past years, become more and more frequent. Spengler's spectacular Der Untergang des Abendlandes (1918) produced no more than a cursory wave of pseudohistorical interest; the startling and appalling complexity of its weave left no direct impression upon the poets. Hans Grimm's (q.v.) cumbersome but widely discussed Volk ohne Raum (1926) and his far superior Die Olewigen Saga (1918) represent a popular type of semihistorical fiction in which the pride and tribulation of Germans abroad supply the appealing subject matter. Josef Ponten's (q.v.) Volk auf dem Wege (5 vols., 1930-1941) and the numerous novels of German life in the diaspora are likely to remain documents of the tenacity of the national character. Most of these works are not easily appreciated and will remain, at best, tempting hieroglyphs to the foreign reader. They lack the transparent ease of such successful writers of historical fiction as Alfred Neumann, Bruno Frank, and Stefan Zweig (qq.v.), whose works state not so much the weight of conservatively conceived "perennial" values as, rather, the contemporary problems of liberal living.

In Hermann Hesse's Der Steppenwolf (1927), in Broch's broad trilogy, Die Schlafwandler (1930-1932), in Robert Musil's (q.v.) ironically brittle Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften (1930-), even in Erich Kästner's (q.v.) Fabian (1931), the moral deflation of the age finds its most effective expression: all bourgeois forms of life seem here permanently broken, there remains only (as in the memorable world of Kafka) the oppressive reality of man's preoccupation with the plain business of living. The younger generation, disturbingly dislocated, now surveys the shattered frame of its life; in some of its books, aspects of powerful social criticism are mixed in masterly fashion with elements of demonic force.

At the same time, a curious preoccupation with nature, understood as accepting life not only within the desiccated limits of the city, but in a more loosely defined frame of elemental though deeply civilized obligations, is the subject of much of that literature which has sprung up in the monotonous ideological climate of the past 10 years. Without doubt a few of the younger novelists have produced distinguished, though seldom original, work and have achieved novels with the peculiarly provincial and emotional strength inherent in the tradition of German fiction. But their work, where it promises to remain alive, draws in the main on the literary forms of the past; it owes as much to the serene 19th-century world of Richter, Stifter, and Keller as it does to the ironic formal tradition from Flaubert to Hamsun and Thomas Mann.

The narratives of Binding and the autobiographical tales of Carossa point in another direction; they are, together with the remarkable prose of Jünger, documents of a specifically humanistic concern for the spiritual and moral heritage. Thomas Mann's work, from Der Zauberberg to his pointillist portrait of Goethe (Lotte in Weimar, 1939) and the most recent Joseph tales (1933-1944), although different in its fundamental premises, indicates this resolution most clearly.

Whatever the sources of the emotional cohesion which the contemporary writer in Germany hopes to establish, whether historical, regional, or religious, whether reasoned or irrational, the idiom of the past 15 years is tranquil and collected. It conveys a calm which is not always free of strain and which is the evidence of something like a deep sense of renunciation. Its dominant character, in remarkable contrast to the experimental temper of the war generation, is a self-conscious obligation to tradition. While the expressionist and revolutionary poets dealt with problems of the social and political crisis in large and metaphysical gestures, many of their less militant contemporaries withdrew deliberately, without even an indication of protest, from a disappointing present. The form of their work, different from the loose, sharp "cry" of the years of the First World War, was severe, their melody restrained. The poetry of the late Rilke, of R. A. Schröder (q.v.) and Rudolf Borchardt (q.v.) is indicative of a palpable shift from expressionist abandon to the austerity of a disciplined idiom. Another phase of the recent progress of poetry began with Bert Brecht's (q.v.) Hauspostille (1927), the catching and ironic rhymes of Kästner's "Gebrauchslryik," and the melancholy and reticent verses of Joachim Ringelnatz (1883-1934). These poets, in form though not in content indebted to Christian Morgenstern (q.v.), hoped for the response of a politically alert public; it was their aim to produce "quotable gestures," and whether they represented the ideology of right or left, they advanced, underneath their attitude of deceptive detachment, the strongest claim to political action.

The latest aspect of poetry owes its peculiar character first of all to a striking and not always organic change in subject matter—a change away from collective and "liberal" social themes, towards the more irrational subject of a man's place in the total natural frame of his earthly life. It is a poetry of being and not of speculation and knowledge. After the pungent and caustic short verses of the Gebrauchslryiker, the modern poet is once again, in Germany and elsewhere, ready to experiment with more sustained and demanding forms of expression. He cultivates classical meters; hymn, ode, philosophical poem, choral chant, and ballad are popular. But in the more distinguished representatives the quality of this latest poetry is also determined by the confluence of certain impersonal and "objective" elements drawn from Rilke's later elegies and the elevated pathos of Germany's greatest "pure" poet, Hölderlin. In the poems of both of these paradigmatic and widely praised artists, private emotions and the imagery of individualistic experience are subordinated to the acceptance of the inescapable realities of the world. Most of the National Socialist poets lived, of course, only by the artificial inner (and outer) support of a rigid and narrow ideological framework. Their work served the demands of a brief day; and not the limitations of subject matter alone, but their blunt and defective poetic perception has deprived most of them of permanent significance.

Something of the declamatoriness of the poets is also apparent in the more recent drama, for which the early expressionist, Hanns Johst (q.v.), has been a vociferous though by no means distinguished spokesman. The combination of modern technical resources (radio, film, mass meeting, open-air stages) and an urgent sense of the dramatist's propagandistic function have produced a peculiar theatrical idiom in which strained solemnity alternates with palpable doctrine and broad popular appeal. Here, as in the novel or ballad, historical themes predominate. In the plays and critical utterances of some of the younger playwrights, there is a lively concern about the relevance to modern tragedy of man's "religious" and political dependence.

Many of the German writers whose work illuminated and reflected the European world between 1914 and 1934 have, during the Nazi decade, lived abroad. Many have passed through years of the deepest despair, some have adjusted themselves in Russia, England, or the Americas to new languages and a new public. German literary magazines abroad have carried the convictions and visions of the exiled across more than 10 years of enforced separation. Among those in Germany who have survived the war and the final collapse of their world, some will again be able to speak freely. The years to come will challenge these poets, young or old, to reassert against the evidence of destruction and incoherence their destined power of evoking and sustaining the permanent signs of human virtue and resolution.

See: Albert Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 1.-3. Folge (1911-1934); Ludwig Lewisohn, The Spirit of Modern German Literature (1916); Friedrich von der Leyen, Deutsche Dichtung in neuer Zeit (2d ed., 1927; supplement, 1931); Heinz Kindermann, Das literarische Anlitz der Gegenwart (1930); Werner Mahrholz, Deutsche Literatur der Gegenwart (1930); Arthur Eloesser, Modern German Literature (1933); H. Naumann, Die deutsche Dichtung der Gegenwart (1885-1933) (1933); T. Rosler, Bildnisse aus der neueren deutschen Literatur (1933); Felix Bertaux, A Panorama of German Literature from 1871 to 1931 (1935); J. W. Nagel and Jakob Zeidler, Deutsch-österreichische Literaturgeschichte, Bd. 4 (1890-1918), ed. by Eduard Castle (1937); Paul Fechter, Die deutsche Literatur vom Naturalismus bis zur Literatur des Unwirklichen (1938); Jethro Bithell, Modern German Literature, 1880-1938 (1939); Richard Samuel and R. Hinton Thomas, Expressionism in German Life, Literature, and the Theatre (1910-1924) (1939); Josef Nadler, Literaturgeschichte des deutschen Volkes, Bd. 3 (1814-1914), Bd. 4 (1914-1940), (1938-1941); Victor Lange, Modern German Literature, 1870-1940 (1945).

V. L.

German naturalism. In 1880 German literature began to play a role in the European naturalistic movement and in the ensuing two decades contributed some of its outstanding documents. The German movement started in the field of literary theory under the influence of the theory and practice of Emile Zola (q.v.). Its first phase was the defense and interpretation of Zola (whom German criticism was vilifying) by four enthusiasts: Michael Georg Conrad (q.v.), the only German naturalist to make personal contact with Zola; Oskar

Welten, who gave the most complete German analysis of Zola; and the brothers Heinrich and Julius Hart (q.v.). These men offered a favorable interpretation of the French naturalist's activity and explained the theories on which his works were based. In the second phase an attack was launched on the popular German literature of the day for its backward-looking and trivial rumination of the German literary tradition and its lack of contact with the contemporary world. Outstanding in this phase, when with the rise of Germany to the stature of a world power in 1870-1871 there came a desire for a literature commensurate with the nation's new position, were the Harts, Karl Bleibtreu (q.v.), Klaus Hermann, and the group of writers gathered in the literary club "Durch" (q.v.) and the lyric anthology Moderne Dichter-Charaktere (1885). Common to the work of all these writers was the conviction that German literature was not alive to the needs of the day and needed revitalizing. In the third phase there was an attempt to formulate an aesthetic theory along naturalistic lines. Leaders in this endeavor were Wilhelm Boelsche (q.v.), a scientist who analyzed literary problems in terms of contemporary scientific hypotheses, and Conrad Alberti, who sought to formulate an even more complete naturalistic theory along social and scientific lines. Around 1890 a final phase developed in which a critical theory arose that was to undermine the naturalistic position. This took the form of an attack on naturalism's demand for extreme objectivity and first appeared as a recognition by Georg Brandes (q.v.) of the strongly subjective elements in Zola's works. The tendency was then further developed by Julius Langbehn, Max Nordau, and Hermann Bahr (q.v.). Arno Holz (q.v.) sought to counter this attack against the naturalistic position by formulation of so-called konsequenter Naturalismus, in which he stated a theory of the nature of art that excluded the subjective element; in reality his essay, criticized by his naturalistic colleagues, served to bring about the final downfall of naturalistic theory in Germany.

Naturalistic creative activity was most effective in the fields of the drama and the novel. The lyric played a brief part in the early years of the movement in Germany with Arno Holz's Das Buch der Zeit and the anthology Moderne Dichter-Charaktere, more important for its introductory essays by Karl Henckell and Hermann Conradi (q.v.) than for its poetic offerings. In the later naturalistic period, however, the lyric was considered a genre unsuited to modern needs. The major influence on German naturalistic drama was that of Henrik Ibsen (q.v.), whose social dramas were hailed enthusiastically by the German naturalists and produced by the Freie Bühne. The leading dramatic critic of German naturalism was Otto Brahm (q.v.), director of the Freie Bühne, outstanding interpreter of Ibsen in Germany, and one of the most incisive of the modern German critics. The founding of the Freie Bühne in 1889 on the model of the Théâtre Libre gave the naturalistic drama a testing ground where the works of Ibsen, Zola, and the German naturalists were brought before the public. Holz and Johannes Schlaf (q.v.) collaborated on prose sketches and the drama Die Familie Selicke, which, employing an extremely naturalistic treatment of language and detail, played a central role in the rise of the German naturalistic drama. Under their influence, Gerhart Hauptmann (q.v.) began his career with Vor Sonnenaufgang, which had a stormy presentation by the Freie Bühne, and he produced in the ensuing years the outstanding dramatic works of German naturalism, Einsame Menschen and Die Weber. Only partly within the naturalistic movement, Hermann Sudermann (q.v.) combined the well-made play with naturalistic elements in such dramas as Die Ehre and Heimat. The naturalistic repertoire was increased by dramas from the pens of Max Halbe (q.v.), whose Jugend was a contemporary hit, Georg Hirschfeld, Max Dreyer (q.v.), Ernst Rosmer, Otto Erich Hartleben (q.v.), Paul Ernst (q.v.), in his early period, and others. In Austria, Ludwig Anzengruber (q.v.) was a forerunner of naturalistic tendencies, and Arthur Schnitzler (q.v.), in his early works, a contributor to the naturalistic repertoire. The development of naturalistic drama was broken off by the rise of neo-romanticism around 1896.

Zola's Rougon-Macquart novels were the major influence on the German naturalistic novel wherein, after several abortive attempts by Karl Bleibtreu, Conrad Alberti, and Hermann Conradi to portray contemporary life naturalistically, there was a widening of the field of the German prose narrative to include new social subjects and a new interpretation of modern life. Leading novelists were Max Kretzer, author of Berlin novels, Clara Viebig, Wilhelm von Polenz (qq.v.), with novels of peasant life, and Georg von Ompteda, novelist of the German aristocracy. Hermann Sudermann once again stood on the periphery of the movement. Again Anzengruber was a forerunner of naturalism with his novels of Austrian village life. Theodor Fontane (q.v.) contributed some of the best novels of the period.

Leading naturalistic journals were Die Gesellschaft, edited by M. G. Conrad in Munich from 1885, which gave German naturalism a rallying point and played a major role in its development, and the Freie Bühne, published in Berlin under the editorship of Otto Brahm from 1890. The Harts' Kritische Waffengänge, a series of essays published 1882–1884, and their short-lived Berliner Monatshefte (1885) and Kritisches Jahrbuch (1889) were major contributions to German naturalistic journalism.

See: E. Wolff, Die jüngste deutsche Literaturströmung und das Prinzip der Moderne (1886); L. Berg, Der Naturalismus (1892); A. von Hanstein, Das jüngste Deutschland (1901); M. G. Conrad, Emile Zola (1906); O. Brahm, Kritische Schriften (2 vols., 1913–1915); H. Röhl, Der Naturalismus (1927); W. H. Root, German Criticism of Zola (1931); Georg Brandes, "Emile Zola," Deutsche Rundschau, LIV (1888), 27–44.

W. H. R.

Gershenzon, Mikhail Osipovich (1869–1925, Russian literary historian), born in Kishinev of a Jewish family, graduated from a local Gymnasium in 1887. He studied in Berlin and then at Moscow University, where he followed courses on the history of ancient Greece under P. G. Vinogradov and wrote a thesis, "The Athenian Polity of Aristotle," for which he was awarded a gold medal. In 1893 his articles began to appear in Russkaya mysl (Russian Thought). He visited Italy in 1896 as a correspondent of a leading Russian daily. On his return to Russia, Gershenzon became a contributor to a number of the so-called "thick" periodicals. Eventually he became absorbed in the study of Pushkin and his milieu and gained recognition as a leading authority in this field. As a result of these studies Gershenzon published in 1908 a monograph on P. Y. Chaadayev; later came his Istoricheskiiye zapiski (O russkom obshchestve) (1910; Historical Notes on Russian Society), Obrazy proshlogo (1912; Images of the Past), Griboyedovskaya Moskva (1914; The Moscow of Griboyedov), Mudrost Pushkina (1919; The Wisdom of Pushkin), Stati o Pushkine (1926; Essays on Pushkin). Gershenzon also edited Russkiiye Propilei (6 vols., 1915–1919, The Russian Propylaea).

After the Revolution of 1917 Gershenzon served in the Department of Education, Central Archives; he also organized and was elected first president of the All-Russian Congress of Writers.

See: Andrei Bely, "M. O. Gershenzon," Rossiia, 5 (14), 1925.

O. M.

Gezelle, Guido (1830–1899, Flemish poet), was born at Bruges. He studied for the priesthood and after his consecration was appointed an instructor at the Roman Catholic seminary of Roesselare. There he won the lifelong affection of a group of young enthusiasts in whom he stirred that love of poetry which lies dormant in many Flemish souls. But the Francophile higher clergy frowned on his popularity with the boys, in whom he aroused a nationalistic Flemish spirit, and in 1860 he was transferred to Bruges and given the humble office of curate. By that time there had been published Dichtoefeningen (1858; Poetic Exercises), which contains his famous poem "O 't ruischen van het Ranke Riet" (O Rustling of the Rushes' Throng), Gedichten, Gezangen en Gebeden (1859; Poems, Songs, and Prayers), and Kerkhofblommen (1860; Churchyard Flowers). But after his transfer he remained silent for 30 years, perhaps under compulsion of his superiors. He consoled himself with the study of languages—he was an able linguist—and especially of his own beloved Flemish. The love of words was a passion with him. He collected them as an 18th-century virtuoso collected rare cameos. He gathered them out of old books, out of the rough speech of the day laborer by the roadside, no matter where he found them, as long as he thought them beautiful. "Old words are of more value than old jewels," he used to say. He edited for 14 years a linguistic monthly called Loquela (1881–1895), in which he published the treasures he discovered. After Gezelle's death this valuable material was rearranged into a dictionary under the same title, Loquela (1907). In 1893 the poet broke his long silence with the publication of Tijdkrans (Time Garland), which was followed by Rijmsnoer (1897; String of Rhymes). In these he gave his very best. He died in 1899, hardly known, outside the circle of his former students, as the great poet he was. It remained for the young leaders of the literary revival, the editors of Van Nu en Straks (Today and Tomorrow) in Flanders and of De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide) in Holland, to make him known to lovers of poetry and spread his fame.

The charm of Gezelle's poetry is not in its thought. He was a thinker, though not original enough to create great poetry out of his meditations. But as a visionary and an interpreter of nature's beauty he was original to a great degree. All the innumerable sounds of nature, the rustling of the reed on the water's edge, the calls of birds, the song of the scythe among the wheat, the roar of thunder, are reechoed in his verse; all the variegated hues of his Flemish country, the blues of its summer skies, the grays of its November days, are described with a profusion of words set to melodious rhythms. Among his works is a masterly translation (1886) of Longfellow's Hiawatha which shows the best characteristics of his uncommon talent. His native town gave him belated recognition by the erection of a fine statue.

See: A. J. Barnouw, "The Voice of Flanders," Nation, C (New York, 1915), 106-107; G. L. van Roosbroeck, Guido Gezelle, the Mystic Poet of Flanders (1919); A. de Ridder, La Littérature flamande contemporaine (1923).

A. J. B.

Ghéon, Henri (pseud. of Henri Vanglon, 1875-1944, French playwright), was born in Bray-sur-Seine. In spite of a precocious talent for drama (at the age of eight he had written a play entitled Un Mari trompé), Henri Ghéon chose medicine as his profession. As early as 1897, however, he contributed articles of literary criticism to various reviews and magazines. In 1899 his play Le Fils de M. Sage was published in Ermitage, and in 1911 he presented Le Pain, a symbolic drama of proletarian and revolutionary character, followed in 1914 by L'Eau de vie, a tragic picture of the degrading effect of alcoholism on a family.

André Gide and Jacques Copeau (qq.v.), with whom he founded the Nouvelle Revue française in 1909, strongly influenced Ghéon. His conversion to Catholicism during the First World War was another powerful element in the development of his art. While still in the army he wrote two religious dramas, Les Trois Miracles de Sainte Cécile and Le Martyre de Saint Valérien (published in 1922). In 1921 Copeau presented at the Vieux Colombier Le Pauvre sous l'escalier, in which Ghéon, mixing comedy and tragedy, uses the familiar and naïve style that remained his favorite means of expression. He believed that the mission of the theatre was a return to the simplicity of the old miracle plays. In order to help the diffusion of his religious dramas Ghéon founded in 1924 a company, the Compagnons de Notre Dame, which became the Com- pagnons de Jeux in 1931, under the direction of Henri Brochet.

Ghéon not only wrote a considerable number of plays (Jeux et miracles pour le peuple fidèle, 2 vols., 1922; Saint Maurice, ou l'Obéissance, 1923; Thomas d'Aquin, 1924; Le Comédien et la grâce, 1925; La Merveilleuse Histoire du jeune Bernard de Menthon, 1926; La Mort de Lazare, 1931); he also published volumes of poems (Chansons d'aube, 1897; Solitude de l'été, 1898; Foi en la France, 1916), essays (Nos Directions, 1911), and novels (Le Consolateur, 1903; Les Jeux de l'Enfer et du Ciel, 3 vols., 1929; La Jambe noire, 1941).

See: Marcel Raymond, Henri Ghéon; sa vie, son œuvre (1939); Marcel Raymond, Le Jeu retrouvé (1943).

M. E. C.

Ghil, René (1862-1925, French poet), was born in Tourcoing, French Flanders. He studied in Paris at the Lycée Condorcet, where he shared the friendship of Ephraïm Mikhaël, Pierre Quillard, Stuart Merrill (q.v.), and André Fontainas, all of whom were soon to play a part in the symbolist movement. His first book of poems, Légendes d'âmes et de sang (1885), written under the influence of Mallarmé (q.v.), was an attempt at applying his scientific conception of poetry. The following year, in the Traité du verbe, he defined and expanded his theories. His main purpose was to submit the art of verse to a scientific method by applying to the sounds of speech the principles of instrumental music, creating thereby what he calls instrumentation verbale. Taking Rimbaud's (q.v.) "Sonnet des voyelles" as a starting point, Ghil claimed that vowels, and even consonants, not only possess color suggestions, but also a particular timbre corresponding to such and such a musical instrument and capable of evoking by sound alone a variety of emotions. He then began to apply this musical technique to the exposition of his philosophical and scientific concepts, and to that effect several books of poems were published. As if to leave no doubt concerning their unity of design, these works bear a unique title, Œuvre (1889-1909), divided into three parts, Dire du mieux, Dire des sangs, Dire de la loi. Although verbal orchestration was his main intent, the author dreamed of fusing together all the forms of art, literary, pictorial, plastic, as well as musical. By such means Ghil aimed at giving a complete synthesis of man since his remotest origins. In spite of the elaborate treatises in which he explained his intentions—De la poésie scien- tifique (1909), La Tradition de la poésie scientifique (1920), Les Dates et les œuvres (1923)—he has had no disciple, but his work remains a curious example of experimentation in the domain of poetic technique.

See: André Barre, Le Symbolisme (1912); C. A. Fusil, La Poésie scientifique (1918); Adolphe van Bever and Paul Léautaud, Poètes d'aujourd'hui (1929).

M. D.

Giacosa, Giuseppe (1847–1906, Italian dramatist), was born and died at Colletterto-Parella, in a mountain valley in Piedmont. The region itself, with its crags and torrents and medieval castles, has been the site through the centuries of plentiful romantic action; it is no wonder that it gave scene and mood to Giacosa for many of his early plays.

After a false start in the law, he turned to the writing which was to be the main business of his life. Within the period 1870–1904 he wrote some 25 plays, most of the earlier ones in verse, the later ones in prose. He was clearly the leading Italian dramatist of the latter part of the 19th century. His first success came with Una Partita a scacchi (1872), a brief romantic idyl in a medieval setting. Il Trionfo d'amore (1875) is of the same general character. Then came comedies of Goldonian type, of which the best are Sorprese notturne (1875) and Acquazzoni in montagna (1876). Presently, however, the Middle Ages return—this time not in idyllic form, but in the full panoply of historical romance. The two best plays of this kind are Il Fratello d'armi (1877) and Il Conte rosso (1880). Il Fratello d'armi is perhaps the best product of pure romanticism in Italy. It is somewhat incoherent in structure and uses the romantic stops somewhat too relentlessly, but it is a very good play none the less—stirring, passionate, unexpected, and with more realization of character than one might expect to find in such a work. After 1880 Giacosa reverted occasionally to traditional comedy or historical romance, notably in La Dame de Challant, a historical play written in French for Sarah Bernhardt and first produced by her in New York in 1891. But he devoted himself mainly to social dramas, finding his themes among the ordinary problems of modern social and business life (after the naturalist fashion), and treating them, when he is at his best, with a restraint that is almost classic and with a direct simplicity and a common-sense sanity of judgment that are quite his own. The three most notable of these plays are Tristi Amori (1888), Come le foglie (1900), and Il Più Forte (1904). Tristi Amori is the best of all, a play so good and so satisfying that it seems to render quite unnecessary and insignificant most of the mass of modern plays that deal with the triangle theme. Giacosa's persons are not of heroic stature: they are everyday people, neither very admirable nor very villainous, mixed in their motives, and not too effectual in their attempts to deal with the forces that play around them and through them. Yet they are well worth knowing and observing, and some of them are permanently likable. Giacosa never preaches, but can at times cut through to remarkably telling statements of essential fact. No triangle play ends with words more memorable than the culminating words of Tristi Amori: "Things like this have no ending . . . they just drag on hopelessly."

In collaboration with Luigi Illica, Giacosa wrote the libretti for three familiar operas by Puccini: La Bohème (1896), Tosca (1899), and Madama Butterfly (1903). He wrote also three volumes of good historical and descriptive prose: Novelle e paesi valdostani (1886), Castelli valdostani e canavesani (1898), and Impressioni d'America (1898). The last one was written on the basis of a stay of several months in the United States, to which he came, in 1891, to superintend the rehearsals for La Dame de Challant.

See: S. A. Smith, "Introduction," in Giacosa, Tristi Amori, ed. by R. Altrocchi and B. M. Woodbridge (1920).

E. H. W.

Gide, André (1869–, French novelist, critic, essayist, and dramatist), is among the most disturbing and controversial of great contemporaries, for hesitations and contradictions mark all his thought. He insists that he writes to be reread; and if he admirably fulfills his function, which is to disturb and provoke the reader, it is also true that each of his books contains the precise antidote for the poison that it apparently distills.

Born in Paris, André Gide descends, on his father's side, from Cévennes Huguenots and, on his mother's, from Norman Catholics recently converted to Protestantism. In these divergent influences he sees the source of his intellectual contradictions and the reason for his writing, since only in art could he harmonize his opposing tendencies. His father's death in 1880 left André in the care of three austere women whose rigid principles did not prevent their pampering the boy—his mother, his Aunt Claire, and the English spinster Anna Shackleton. An indifferent pupil afflicted with nervous disorders, he studied at the Ecole Alsacienne and under private tutors. The conflict between his intense religious fervor and his awakening to manhood found expression in Les Cahiers d'André Walter (1891), begun at 18 and published anonymously as the posthumous diary of an unhappy youth. Though telling in romanticized form the story of his own pure love for his cousin Emmanuèle, this little volume of lyrical prose, soon to be followed by Walter's Poésies (1892), also reduced to its essence the philosophico-literary idealism of the epoch and hence opened to its author the doors of the cénacles. For two or three seasons Gide circulated among the symbolists, a stiff and artificial figure whose uncomprising intellectualism and devout faith embarrassed his friends. Meanwhile his subtle Traité du Narcisse (1892), Tentative amoureuse (1893), and Voyage d'Urien (1893) further identified him with French symbolism (q.v.). But in the fall of 1893 he undertook a trip to North Africa which, as he had foreseen when he left his beloved Bible at home, marked the great turning point in his life. Falling ill at Biskra, he narrowly escaped death, and his convalescence taught him the value of life, of the present moment, and of that ardent fervor which gives life its zest. He also learned the secret of his tormented nature and resolved not to stifle his inclinations. Deliberately he renounced his past, seeking the primitive man under the veneer of education. After a year in the desert he recanted his former life in an ironic epitaph, Paludes (1895); in 1897 his break with symbolism was confirmed by Les Nourritures terrestres, a breviary of revolt which preaches the joy of living by the senses, restlessly eager for every eventuality. On his return to Paris in 1895 he had witnessed his mother's death and married his cousin. Henceforth, with Paris and his two Norman estates as headquarters, he was to travel frequently, to Africa, Italy, Germany, England, and eventually Russia.

"To free oneself is nothing; it's being free that is hard"—this is the problem which Gide examines from all sides during the next 20 years. The too receptive Saul and the over-generous Candaulus, heroes of his beautiful verse dramas Saül (1903) and Le Roi Candaulé (1901), together with the Michel of L'Immoraliste (1902), end tragically because of breaking with conventional morality in their search for self-fulfillment. The Alissa of La Porte étroite (1909), counterpart of L'Immoraliste, illustrates the dangers of the other extreme, renunciation. In Le Retour de l'enfant prodigue (1907) Gide's prodigal, while admitting his errors, helps his younger brother to escape. Finally, the seductive Lafcadio of Les Caves du Vatican (1914) finds himself the prisoner of a free, unmotivated act he has committed to prove his own liberty. Indeed, even during his period of maturity between the two wars, Gide consistently returns to the problem of personal freedom: in his dialogues on the subject of homosexuality, Corydon (1924), in his outspoken memoirs, Si le grain ne meurt (1926), and in Les Faux-Monnayeurs (1926)—the only novel he has written, for he has classified the frankly ironic works as solies (Paludes; Le Prométhée mal enchaîné, 1899; Les Caves du Vatican) and the soberly classical works recounted by one of the protagonists as récits (L'Immoraliste; La Porte étroite; La Symphonie pastorale, 1919; and a few others). In treating the three themes of his novel—the adolescent revolt, the decaying of bourgeois families, and the creation of a work of art—Gide reveals many of the antinomies upon which his dynamic equilibrium rests: the soul and the flesh, life and art, expression and restraint, the individual and society, classicism and romanticism, Christ and Christianity, God and the Devil. Here, moreover, his predilection for the complex form of a book within a book, which he had originally indulged in his first work, yields its happiest results.

It is natural that his lifelong preoccupation with freedom and his keenly sympathetic nature should have made André Gide a champion of the oppressed. As mayor of a commune in Normandy (1896), later as a juror in Rouen (1912), and finally as a special envoy of the Colonial Ministry (1925–1926), he had ample opportunity to observe social injustice. His Voyage au Congo (1927) and Retour du Tchad (1928), in fact, led to legal reform and eventually to curbing of the industrial concessions in the colonies. When, in the early 30's, he declared his admiration for Soviet Russia and his sympathy toward Communism, Gide shocked the men of his generation, as he had so often done before, and raised another barrier between himself and official honors. After a trip to Russia his Retour de l'U.R.S.S. (1936), which told of his disappointment and criticized the Soviets for abandoning their original principles, momentarily alienated even his young admirers. But Gide has always been an independent.

Gide's critical writings, found chiefly in Prétextes (1903), Nouveaux Prétextes (1911), Dostoïevsky (1923), and Incidences (1924), have won him a place as one of the most perspicacious literary critics of his time. His double nature permits him to admire the classical (Goethe, Racine, Bach) while nourishing a predilection for tormented and complicated souls (Nietzsche, q.v., Dostoevski, q.v., Blake, Whitman, Baudelaire, q.v.). These and a few others (Montaigne, Browning, Chopin) are the spiritual brothers having most intimate influence on the man who, in a lecture in 1900, made a most eloquent apology for all influences. The same broad sympathies are shown in his clairvoyant criticism of contemporaries, for he has often been the first to discern and encourage authentic talent. In 1909 he was a prime mover in founding the Nouvelle Revue française, a focal point in recent French literature. His own influence has been as wide as that of any writer of his generation; suffice it to mention two Academicians and a Nobel prizewinner who have felt that influence, Mauriac, Lacretelle, and Martin du Gard (qq.v.), and certain leaders of the group born around 1900, Giono, Green, Malraux, and Saint Exupéry (qq.v.).

A skeptic, questioning all values, like Montaigne vaunting his uncertainty and his inconsistencies, Gide early dedicated himself to the study of man. In a style which varies from the colored, ejaculatory prose of his early works to the voluntarily bare understatement of his mature works, he has explored the most complex and most disturbing characters, emotions, and ideas. Though "le gidisme" has frequently exerted an unfortunate influence upon those who failed to read to the end his maxim, "It is good to follow your penchant provided you go upward," nevertheless Gide's position as a moral philosopher only grows with time. He can be best read in the 15-volume edition of the Œuvres complètes (1932-1939), to which should be added the 1300 pages of the definitive Journal (1939), supplemented by Pages de journal, 1939-1942 (1944).

See: C. Du Bos, Le Dialogue avec André Gide (1929); R. Fernandez, André Gide (1931); L. Pierre-Quint, André Gide; sa vie, son œuvre (1932); J. Hytier, André Gide (1938).

J. O'B.

Gil, Augusto (1873-1929, Portuguese poet), was born near Oporto, in Lordelo de Oiro, but from early childhood lived in A Guarda, Beira. He held important administrative positions in the Department of Public Education.

This poet is perhaps the best Portuguese example in recent times of one who drew his inspiration from folkloric elements. Although literary influences from contemporary modernistic formalism can be seen in his first book, Musa cérulea (1894; Cerulean Muse), there are already apparent a simplicity of expression and a spontaneous grace which point to the folkloric orientation of his later work. Indeed, Augusto Gil belonged to a group of poets who passed through the last 10 years of the last century and the first third of the present one without allowing their personalities to become permanently stamped with any of the dominant tendencies, although they continued to appropriate discreetly from each of them. In Gil is another instance of that miracle which at times touches folkloric poets—when their verses are attributed to the people owing to the authenticity of their form and sentiments. The triads of the folk song backed by the tradition of centuries, the quality of the cradle songs, the wittiness of the erotic couplet, the objective emotion which characterizes his treatment of landscape (valley of the Mondego), have made the poet one of the best known and most enjoyed by the Portuguese public. Luar de janeiro (1909; January Moonlight), O craveiro da janela (1920; The Carnation Pot in the Window), and Avena rústica (1927; Rustic Wheat) are his most representative books. In the religious vein, Alba plena (1916; Full Dawn) is the story of the Virgin Mary, presented in short poems. At times, owing to the nature of the theme, these deviate somewhat from the poet's characteristic folkloric technique. Gil's Rosas desta manhã (This Morning's Roses) was published posthumously in 1931.

See: Agostinho de Campos, Antologia portuguesa: Augusto Gil (1923).

R. M. L.

Gil, Ricardo (1855-1908, Spanish poet), was born in Murcia. His poetry is contained in two books, De los quince a los treinta (1885) and La caja de música (1898), which antedate the appearance of the Spanish poets of the modernist period. He has, therefore, the distinction of being one of the few Spanish forerunners of the great poetic movement at the end of the past century, whose greatest creative figures and precursors were Spanish American, not Spanish. Ricardo Gil distinguished himself in his day as an independent, who drank directly at the fount of French poetry and, under its influence, produced a poetry of his own, characterized by its intimate lyric quality, its delicacy, its elegance. The rest of his work is contained in a posthumous volume, El último libro (1909).

See: F. Balart, Impresiones (1894), pp. 131-143; E. Díez-Canedo, "Ricardo Gil," Lectura, Año VIII (Madrid, 1908), Tomo I, pp. 56-57.

F. de O.

Gilkin, Iwan (1858-1923, Belgian poet and dramatist), was born in Brussels, studied law at the University of Louvain, then lived in Brussels and devoted himself exclusively to literature. He is a purely intellectual poet. His first two volumes of verses, La Damnation de l'artiste (1890) and Ténèbres (1892; published under the title La Nuit in 1897), written with Parnassian correctness, are like an echo of Baudelaire's (q.v.) Les Fleurs du mal, amplified in the search for perverted sensations. Led on by a pessimism which "darkened his inner life for seventeen years," he describes with diabolical pleasure the perversity of mankind: "If evil were not attractive, evil would not exist." According to him the only outcome of this state of corruption is death, and death itself is fearful because of the mystery of the great beyond. It is hard to believe the assertion of his intimate friend Albert Giraud (q.v.) that Gilkin's inspiration was original and not inspired by Baudelaire. La Nuit was to be followed by two volumes of a more optimistic and redeeming nature, L'Aurore and La Lumière, yet these never appeared. Le Cerisier fleuri (1899) sounds a more cheerful note. It is a collection of poems written in a lighter vein; the versification is freer, the tone is gay, the general theme is the enjoyment of life. The change in philosophy is complete in Prométhée, a dramatic poem, also published in 1899. In this work Gilkin has admittedly been inspired by Goethe's outlook on life as well as by the tragedy of Æschylus. Now the author believes in the final triumph of spirit over matter, and he has gone over to a restricted type of free verse, using occasionally lines of nine or eleven syllables, and rhyming masculine endings with feminine ones or a singular with a plural.

Gilkin has written two dramas in prose: Savonarole (1906) and Les Etudiants russes (1906). In the first he powerfully evokes the ascetic figure of the great Dominican monk and the irresistible influence of his persuasive personality on the Italian people of his time. Les Etudiants russes gives a picture of the various phases of the "Russian soul" at the end of the 19th century, where oriental fatalism is mixed with the social philosophies of the western world.

See: H. Liebrecht, Histoire de la littérature belge d'expression française (1910); F. Castillo Nájera, Un Siècle de poésie belge (1931; with Spanish translations and notes); G. Doutrepont, Histoire illustrée de la littérature française en Belgique (1939).

L. V.

Gille, Valère (1867-, Belgian poet), was born in Brussels. He studied at the University of Louvain and after the death of Max Waller succeeded to the editorship of the Jeune Belgique (see Belgian Literature in French). Then he became librarian of the Royal Library in Brussels. His weekly critical articles on historical, literary, and artistic subjects in the daily paper Dernière Heure were much appreciated. His first volume of verses, Le Château des merveilles (1893), is composed of delicate short poems in the manner of Théophile Gautier. La Cithare (1897), a collection of beautifully chiseled, plastic and serene pictures of ancient Greece, was crowned by the French Academy; it is reminiscent of the art of Chénier and of Leconte de Lisle (q.v.). Gille is a poet of Parnassian correctness and great purity of expression whose constant care seems to have been to keep in check the potential outbursts of his lyricism. The passing touch of Baudelairean pessimism (see Baudelaire) found in Le Coffret d'ébène (1900) is completely offset by Le Collier d'opales (1899), La Corbeille d'octobre (1902), and Joli Mai (1905), which are like hymns of freshness and youth moderated by an epicurean outlook on life. It is in La Corbeille d'octobre that the poet reaches the height of purity in his nobly subdued lyricism. Gille also wrote short plays: Ce n'était qu'un rêve (1903) is a fairy tale full of refreshing grace, Madame reçoit (1908), a comedy of customs.

See: Henri Liebrecht, Valère Gille (1906).
L. V.

Giménez Caballero, Ernesto (1899-, Spanish essayist and journalist), born in Madrid, is one of the most representative prose writers of the generation following the First World War. In 1927 he founded the Gaceta literaria, a journal which for several years was an organ of the then so-called vanguardismo. As an active littérateur, founder of publishing firms, of clubs, and organizer of banquets, he was one of the most outstanding theorists, propagandists, and directors of this movement—now well forgotten except for its renovating impulse. The books of Giménez Caballero himself which were written according to the ruling patterns of that time—the cult of machinery, the cinema, sports, horror of the romantic and the sentimental, devotion to metaphor and to "the new"—show today a surprising and melancholy oldness (e.g., Hércules jugando a los dados, 1929). In Spain, once the brief moment of literary revolution had passed, the young innovators accepted their seniors; in poetry the influence of Juan Ramón Jiménez (q.v.) is seen, and in thought patterns that of Unamuno and of Ortega (qq.v.). The influence of Ortega is especially discernible in Giménez Caballero. Appraisal of Spain, so common with the Generation of '98, can already be observed in the author's first book, Notas marruecas de un soldado (1923). The critical approach to Spanish matters becomes pronounced in one of his most representative works, Los toros, las castañuelas y la Virgen (1927); a clever and arbitrary book, written in an agile and purposeful prose on themes concerning the common people, it seeks, as he declared later, "Hispanic awakenings." His lack of accord with the pessimistic attitude of the earlier generation, which he accepted at first, and later his disagreement with middle of the road positions (Manuel Azaña, 1932) lead him to adopt a nationalistic position which carried him to fascism. Much more attune to the Italian than to the German spirit, just as he was the "impresario" of vanguardism he was also one of the first and most active theorists of a Spanish Falangism inspired by Rome. To this phase belong Genio de España (1932), one of his most popular works; Arte y Estado (1935); Roma madre: Apología del fascismo, el Duce y Roma (1939), awarded the International Prize of Fascism.

As facile and prolific as he is acute, Giménez Caballero is a cross between essayist and journalist. A man with university training and a wide field of interests, but no exclusive specialization, he possesses a fund of literary and historical information. His devotion to contemporary themes, his predilection for current innovations, the transfer to the essay of the journalistic treatment of actuality, assume in Giménez Caballero the appearance of nonconformity and protest. What will prevail of his work when the contemporary aspect vanishes will presumably be his distinctive personality, his notable agility as a writer, his constant zeal for literary endeavor, and the light shed, independent of his grasp of current happenings, on certain aspects of the Spanish soul.

See: Samuel Putnam, ed., The European Caravan (1931).

F. G. L.

Giner de los Ríos, Francisco (1839-1915, Spanish educator and philosopher), was the guiding spirit of the educational renaissance in modern Spain. Born in Ronda, he studied at the universities of Barcelona and Granada, but it was not until he went to Madrid in 1863 and heard the lectures of Sanz del Río

(q.v.) that he found the philosophy that was to direct all his thinking and action for the rest of his life. In 1868 he won an appointment to the chair of philosophy of law, a position he was to hold for over 30 years, with several interruptions. One of these came in 1875 when Giner protested against the unconstitutional infringements made on academic freedom by the Restoration Government and as a result was arrested and imprisoned in Cádiz. On his release, in 1876, together with some kindred spirits he founded the Institución Libre de Enseñanza, a private corporation free from any religious communion, philosophical school, or political party, "for the purpose of cooperating in the general progress of education." Beginning as a college, the Institución was soon obliged to add preparatory and then elementary instruction. Its innovations were quite revolutionary: education was to be not only intellectual but physical and moral as well; students were encouraged to develop a spirit of free inquiry and to form independent judgments; textbooks and examinations were abolished; history of art classes were held in the Prado Museum; students and teachers went on week-end walking trips into the Sierra de Guadarrama or on short journeys to discover the art treasures of some old Spanish town. It was Giner's profound conviction that the regeneration of Spain could be brought about only by the slow process of education, by making men better, and to this cause he devoted all his fervor and energy for over 40 years. The Institución was Giner's greatest work. Its greatness was due not so much to the new educational ideas and methods that came from England and Germany as to Giner's own vibrant personality and glowing spirit which left a deep imprint on the minds of some of the greatest poets, thinkers, and teachers of modern Spain.

Giner's writings, from his first published volumes (Estudios jurídicos y políticos, 1875; Estudios de literatura y arte, 1876; Estudios filosóficos y religiosos, 1876), reveal a multiplicity of interests and an inexhaustible curiosity, and though they deal with the most varied themes—literary, aesthetic, juridical, religious—all have in common a philosophical spirit and a deep social consciousness. On the philosophy of law he wrote a number of works which were widely used—Principios de derecho natural (1872) and Resumen de la filosofía del derecho (1898), both of these in collaboration with his student Alfredo Calderón, and La persona social (1899). On educational topics he wrote innumerable studies, Estudios sobre educación (1886), Educación y enseñanza (1889), Pedagogía universitaria (1910). All of his essays and longer works were gathered together by his friends and disciples in the edition of his Obras completas (18 vols., 1916-1927).

See: Boletín de la Institución Libre de Enseñanza, 1915 (entire issue devoted to Giner de los Ríos); J. B. Trend, Origins of Modern Spain (1934), pp. 50-132.

E. F. H.

Giono, Jean (1895-, French novelist), born at Manosque in Provence, near the relatively barren plateaus of the Lower Alps and the valleys of the Upper Durance, partakes of the same mixed Italian and French blood as Pierre Gassendi and Emile Zola (q.v.), to whose basic naturalism he has given new meaning. His semi-autobiographical work, Jean le bleu (1932; Eng. tr., Blue Boy, 1946), is an account of his home life with his Piedmontese Protestant shoemaker father and his Parisian mother and of early educational influences. At the age of 14 he enthusiastically read in translation the great books of classical antiquity. His imagination was kindled by the pantheism of the Greeks no less than by their primitivism, which recalled to him the people and scenes of his own frontier land. His early poems reveal the obsession of this Hellenistic cult. Caught in the First World War at the age of 19, he saw nothing in war but its horrors, which he described, at times in magisterial fashion, in Le Grand Troupeau (1931). His complete failure to be touched by the spirit of heroism and sacrifice led to the anarchistic pacifistic creed of Refus d'obéissance (1937) and Précisions (1939). Over these later works hovers the shadow of the greater war to come.

Giono's position is in an occidental tradition that stems from Homer and the Bible. His prose has epic characteristics, more Dionysian than Apollonian, more pantheistic than Christian. He has a poetic gift for direct imagery, born of sensation, for bold and sensuous metaphors that search out the innermost nature of reality and link man intimately with objective nature, with the soil of the earth under his feet (Les Vraies Richesses, 1936) and the clear starry firmament just above his head (Le Serpent d'étoiles, 1933, and Le Poids du ciel, 1938). His best works include an early group of three short novels, Colline (1920; Eng. tr., Hill of Destiny, 1929), Un de Baumugnes (1929; Eng. tr., Lovers Are Never Losers, 1931), and Regain (1930; Eng. tr., Harvest, 1939); a later, more ample trilogy, Le Chant du monde (1934; Eng. tr., The Song of the World, 1937), Batailles dans la montagne (1937), and Que ma joie demeure (1935; Eng. tr., Joy of Man's Desiring, 1940); and a number of excellent short stories of which the best known are La Femme du boulanger (1935; cinema version, The Baker's Wife, 1939) and Solitude de la pitié (1932; Eng. tr., The Solitude of Pity, 1935). On the technical side Giono is unique in the direct (indirect from the author's viewpoint) presentation and characterization of simple peasants, nature's true noblemen, through naturalness of gesture, quaintness of speech, and sincerity of act. His interest in symbol and metaphor undoubtedly was the motive of his Pour saluer Melville (1940); Triomphe de la vie (1942) is an indication that his literary career is far from completion. A play, Lanceurs de graines, was successfully presented in 1937 in several European capitals.

Giono's revolt against modern civilization and the machine age is genuine, if utopian. Certain aspects of his thought recall the American writers Thoreau and Whitman. His primitivism is not the soft pastoral longing of a Rousseau—because of the boldness and persistence of his imagery Giono has often been charged with préciosité—but the hardy physiological naturalism of a Diderot or a D. H. Lawrence. His supreme good is life itself, superior to all political ideologies and containing its own religious mysticism.

See: C. Michelfelder, Jean Giono et les religions de la terre (1938).

N. L. T.

Giraud, Albert (pseud. of Albert Kayenberg, 1860-1929, Belgian poet), was born in Louvain, the old university town, where he spent his childhood and his youth and studied at the law school. As a student he joined the Jeune Belgique group, a movement for the rebirth of an autonomous, national Belgian literature (see Belgian literature in French). After receiving his degree Giraud went to live in Brussels and, having no interest in the practice of law, devoted himself to journalism and poetry. Of an artistically haughty disposition, filled with bitterness and disdain for the indifference and unintelligence of the crowd, he seemed to live outside of his time and aloof from his fellow citizens. An admirer of Vigny and of Leconte de Lisle (q.v.), he was an uncompromising partisan of "art for art's sake." In his sonnets (Hors du siècle, 1888-1894; La Guirlande des dieux, 1910) he chisels his lines with a sculptural perfection equaled only, perhaps, by Heredia (q.v.), but with more subjective expression than the Parnassians. One feels his soul vibrate through the cold precision of his style. It is interesting to notice that the first volume of Hors du siècle appeared five years before Heredia's Trophées. Contemptuous of the commonplaceness of his contemporaries, Giraud likes to evoke in colorful strokes the sumptuous splendor of the past, of ancient Rome, of the bygone glory of his own country of Flanders (La Frise empourprée, 1912). At times he reminds the reader of the rhythmical incantation of Baudelaire's (q.v.) suggestive phrases. His technical mastery is especially apparent in two collections of his youth, Pierrot lunaire (1884) and Pierrot narcisse (1891; published together in 1898 under the title Héros et pierrots). In these volumes of subtle badinage his mirth is without joy, his gaiety is only external and bears the mark of the misery and hopelessness hidden in his proud soul. Between 1884 and 1921 Giraud wrote all told 10 volumes of verses.

See: J. Chot and R. Dethier, Histoire des lettres françaises en Belgique (1910); H. Liebrecht, Histoire de la littérature belge d'expression française (1910); G. Doutrepoint, Histoire illustrée de la littérature française en Belgique (1939).

L. V.

Giraudoux, Jean (1882–1944, French novelist, dramatist, and essayist), was born in Bellac, Haute-Vienne. He was an excellent student, graduated with highest honors from the Ecole Normale Supérieure, and passed the examinations for diplomatic service at the Quai d'Orsay. His earliest publication is Provinciales (1909). The First World War, in which Giraudoux saw active service, inspired him to write Lectures pour une ombre (1918) and Adorable Clio (1920). A mission to the United States resulted in Amica America (1918). Following the peace, he resumed his duties as a diplomat, but continued to write. His best-known books of this time, built around charming young girl characters, were Suzanne et le Pacifique (1921; Eng. tr., 1923), Juliette au pays des hommes (1924), Bella (1926; Eng. tr., 1926), and Eglantine (1927).

From his very first book it was evident that Giraudoux represented in literature the school of impressionism that had already succeeded in the fields of painting and of music. His masters could only be Claude Monet and Claude Debussy. His earlier works are entirely lacking in plot. They seem to consist merely of trifling incidents, unrelated details, brusque transitions, and lengthy, irrelevant digressions. The merit of these earlier works lies in their style. It is extremely poetic, with striking use of imagery. Figures of speech flow in an unending stream, some poignantly beautiful, some delightfully extravagant, some frankly humorous ("La mort est si ancienne qu'on lui parle latin").

Although such a style would seem eminently unsuited to the drama, the first play of Giraudoux, Siegfried (1928; Eng. tr., 1930), adapted from a particularly desultory novel, was highly successful. It was followed by Amphitryon 38 (1929; Eng. tr., 1938), La Guerre de Troie n'aura pas lieu (1935), and Electre (1937), all based on ancient Greek myths, but adapted to modern circumstances. The limitations of the stage obliged Giraudoux to discipline the exuberant fantasy which had characterized him as a novelist. On the other hand, he contributed to the freeing of contemporary French drama from the bonds of a pseudo realism. He restored its inherent artistic dignity by the only feasible means, i.e., by the emphasis he placed on dialogue and the magic of his style, at a moment when films clearly pointed to the fact that the rebirth of the theatre depended on its reversion to type. Giraudoux discovered the secret of composition which, in the plays of Racine and of Shakespeare as in those of the ancient Greeks, transforms the puppets on the stage into symbols of humanity.

Giraudoux became commissioner of information just before the Second World War, and his last important work, of a quite different tenor, was a series of political essays, Pleins Pouvoirs (1939), concerning the duty of France to remain "a first-rate power."

See: A. Gide, Nouveaux Prétextes (1911); R. Brasillach, Portraits (1935); A. Rousseaux, Le Paradis perdu (1936); G. E. Lemaître, Four French Novelists (1938); P. Brodin, Les Ecrivains français de l'entre-deux-guerres (1942); C. E. Magny, Précieux Giraudoux (1945.)

P. B.

Giulioti, Domenico (1877–, Italian journalist and religious writer), founder with Federigo Tozzi (q.v.) of the Torre (Siena) and contributor to Italian and French reviews, was born in San Casciano in Val di Pesa, not far from Greve, in the province of Florence, where he has always resided. He gave up the study of law to devote himself entirely to writing.

His poems, Ombre d'un ombra (1910), written prior to his conversion, are romantic in style and pessimistic in tone. After wandering from Catholicism to atheism to theosophy, Giulioti was influenced by the reading of French Catholic reactionary authors such as De Maistre, Veuillot, Hello, and Bloy (q.v.) and returned to the faith of his childhood. The Antologia dei Cattolici francesi (1920), translated from the French, may be considered a tribute to these writers. In his L'Ora di Barabba (1920), in a manner not unlike that of Hello and Bloy, he gives vent to his odium for corrupt society, the wealthy bourgeoisie. In forceful and plebeian language he flays those Christians whose lives are not in keeping with the tenets of the faith they profess. The book brought a storm of protests from those offended by his invectives or by his seeming "holier than thou" attitude. Giulioti was not displeased by this, thinking that he was accomplishing what he had set out to do, shocking the perverted bourgeois back on to the path of righteousness. The Dizionario dell'omo salvatico (a first installment published in 1923), written in collaboration with Papini (q.v.), brought a still greater storm of protests. This time the authors were really perturbed, for Papini answered with L'Omo salvatico si difende (1923), a 45-page explanation, hoping thereby to justify the language and the style of the Dizionario. He promised that in the future they would be very careful not to scandalize their faithful coreligionists. Papini closed by asking the readers to pray for the authors. No other part of the Dizionario has ever appeared. Indeed one notices a marked change in Giulioti's subsequent works. In his Pensieri d'un malpensante (1936) he is still the fervid and fervent apologist of former years, but not the vehement, bitter polemist of L'Ora di Barabba. Polvere dell'esilio (1929) has a decided serenity. Papini said this book is "a church on a mountain, built of stones of theology and pillars of prayer, all lighted and embellished by the radiant richness of poetry." Giulioti's S. Francesco (1931) and his Il Ponte sul mondo (1932) are so orthodox, both in style and in content, that they were given the imprimatur of the ecclesiastical authorities. The last named book, an explanation and commentary on the Mass, has been translated into English (The Bridge over the World, 1935).

See: G. Papini, "Domenico Giulioti" and "L'Omo salvatico si difende," in La Scala di Giacobbe (1932), pp. 299-323, 137-184.

S. M. S. M.

Gjalski, Ksaver Šandor (pseud. of Ljubo Babić, 1854-1935, Croat novelist), was born in the house of the conservative and wealthy vice-governor of Zagorje, Tito Babić. His mother belonged to the aristocratic house of M. S. Gyalya, whence the pen name Gjalski. A lifelong civil servant, he led a sheltered existence, but often changed his residence and thus acquired intimate knowledge of all Croatia. In politics he joined the Serb-Croat coalition against the pro-Hapsburgs and was elected to the Croat Diet. Later he became governor of Zagreb county and after the foundation of Yugoslavia he was sent to the first Yugoslav Parliament.

Gjalski is one of the most fecund Croat writers of the realistic period. His first piece of prose, Illustrissimus Battorich (1884), describing the life of the semi-aristocratic Croat bourgeoisie, made him famous. From then on virtually every year a new novel of his appeared and became a best seller. Most of the novels were of patriotic inspiration. In the fight between the younger and older generations Gjalski allied himself with youth and wrote in their reviews, Mladost (Youth), Hrvatski salon (Croat Salon), and Život (Life). His complete works were published by himself in 1913.

See: D. Prohaska, Pregled savremene hrvatsko-srpske književnosti (1921).

M. H.

Gjellerup, Karl (1857-1919, Danish novelist), born at Roholte on the island of Zealand, was the son of a clergyman and, true to family tradition, studied theology. But the influence of Brandes (q.v.) and reading Darwin and Spencer made him a pronounced atheist, even before he had taken his degree. His first book, En Idealist (1878; An Idealist), declared his break with Christianity and foreshadowed the devotion to the German spirit and culture which found full expression in Germanernes Lærling (1882; The Disciple of the Teutons). Gjellerup read widely, and many intellectual currents are traceable in his works. He abandoned the naturalism of his Danish contemporaries to worship the humanism of Goethe and Schiller. He essayed tragedies in the grand style with choruses patterned after those of Schiller. Among these the best is his Brynhild (1884), in which he endeavors to combine his northern theme with the Greek spirit. A similar effort is to be traced in his drama on a Greek theme, Thamyris (1887). In his novel Minna (1889; Eng. tr., 1913), considered his finest work, he pays a tribute to the German spirit in the person of his German-born wife, with the scene laid in Dresden.

Møllen (1896; The Mill) marks a return to a Danish background. It is a broadly conceived story of crime and atonement and has suggestions of Dostoevski (q.v.). At the same time its doctrine of renunciation points to the ideals of Buddhism which engrossed Gjellerup in his last period, when he wrote Pilgrimen Kamanita (1896; Eng. tr., The Pilgrim Kamanita, 1911) and Verdensvandrere (1910; World Wanderers). In the latter he tells the story of a modern Englishman and a German girl, meeting in India, where they learn from an ancient tale of a former incarnation in which they were lovers. The man, whom he calls Sir Edmund Trevelyan, is in part modeled on Byron's piratical friend, Edward John Trevelyan, and Shelley figures with Hindu kings and sages among those who were associated in a former incarnation. In spite of much erudition and an exotic imagination hardly equaled in Danish literature, the story leaves the reader rather cold. Gjellerup's last work, Den gyldne Gren (1917; The Golden Bough), has the scene laid in ancient Rome at the time of Tiberius. It breathes unrelenting hatred against the Roman world together with an increased sympathy for Christianity. During the last years of his life Gjellerup made his home in Dresden, wrote many of his books simultaneously in German and in Danish, and was an ardent champion of Germany. In 1917 he shared the Nobel prize in literature with Henrik Pontoppidan (q.v.).

See: Karl Gjellerup, der Dichter und Denker; sein Leben in Selbstzeugnissen und Briefen, I-II (1921-1922); Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934).

H. A. L.

Gladkov, Fyodor Vasilyevich (1883-, Russian novelist and dramatist), was born in the former Government of Saratov, of peasant stock. For many years he led a precarious existence, for he did not achieve success until after the Revolution, although he began writing early. Exile to Siberia gave him new material, and in 1912 he wrote Izgoi (The Outcasts), a novel of political prisoners, their torments and aspirations, a theme to which he returned in Staraya sekretnaya (1927; The Old Dungeon). His drama Vataga (1923; The Band), an episode from the 1905 Revolution, portrays the unleashing of violent passions among the primitive Caspian Sea fishermen. Ognenny kon (1923; The Fiery Steed), an apocalyptic novel of the civil war, is another characteristic work. The early Gladkov was strongly influenced by Gorky, and more remotely by Dostoevski (q.v.). A proletarian realist, he also showed romantic tendencies; his tone was high-pitched, his language hyperbolic.

In 1926 Gladkov scored his greatest popular success with Tsement (Eng. tr., Cement, 1929), the first novel devoted to post-revolutionary reconstruction. The hero succeeds in reorganizing a cement factory, but does not solve the problem of his relation to his wife, who represents the "new woman." The over-documented Energiya (1933; Energy) deals with similar themes and dwells particularly on the new attitude toward work as expressed in the building of Dneprostroi. Novaya zemlya (1931; The New Land) and Tragediya Lyubashi (1935; Lyubasha's Tragedy) explore the subject of human relationships against the background of collective society. Malenkaya trilogiya (1936; A Little Trilogy) satirizes certain objectionable types among the Communists. Opalyonnaya dusha (1943; The Scorched Soul) and Klyatva (1944; The Oath), two collections of short stories, represent Gladkov's contribution to war literature, but the emphasis falls on the accomplishments of the home front. His mature work is more subdued in tone, and conforms to the theory of Socialist Realism.

See: Fyodor Gladkov (1928); "Gladkov," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vol. I (1929); I. Astakhov, "O tvorchestve F. Gladkova," Literatura i iskusstvo, 1931, Nos. 11-12, pp. 56-72.

P. A. P.

Glesener, Edmond (1874-, Belgian novelist), was born at Liège, where he received an excellent education—Greek and Latin, natural sciences, and finally law. In 1900 he entered government service as a clerk at Brussels. When he retired, shortly before the Second World War, he was director of fine arts and letters. His literary work has profited from all his experience: study of the classics enhanced his appreciation of the power of restraint and simplicity in style; scientific method sharpened his observation; his profession gave him insight into political life; while memories of his youth in the provinces have proved an inexhaustible treasure trove. "We wrack our brains for matter," he declares, "and for years the richest of all has been under our eyes." He has written four novels and seven collections of stories, all composed with a meticulous cult of form. He acknowledges study of Flaubert, and the content of his work often recalls Maupassant (q.v.), occasionally Stendhal. He is a realist, as uncompromising as the limits of art allow, but his interest in human nature brings humor, social satire, and vastly more psychological acumen than most realists possess.

His first volume, Aristide Truffaut (1898), is almost without plot; it is a whimsical portrait of his father, whose passion for bracket sawing arouses protests from a practical-minded spouse and reflective chuckles from the author. The epigraph is from Candide, and at the end Aristide has turned to cultivation of his garden. Voltaire must certainly be included among Glesener's masters. Le Cœur de François Remy (1904) is replete with action, chosen for the revelation of character, and with poetry. An ultrasensitive basket weaver, fascinated by a gypsy girl, deserts his home to join a family of nomads. A subordinated side of the author's temperament has found expression here: he avows his youthful passion for the open road. The spell of the Romany alternates with the hero's sense of degradation to form an intensely human drama, and François Remy has often been hailed as Glesener's masterpiece. Doubtless life in the capital quickened nostalgia for the Campine around Liège, and this contributes to the poignancy of the work. With the two volumes of Chronique d'un petit pays (1913) is found the full-fledged satirist of contemporary manners. The hero, Honoré Colette, is a scion of Maupassant's Bel Ami, making his way by impudence and by the fascination he exercises over women. Playing the game according to the rules of organized society, he pushes himself from the slums to a place of dignity and degenerates as he rises. The major interest is in individuals, but politics provide a colorful frame. There is a galaxy of subtly drawn characters, the most amusing being the imperturbable Arthur Boileau, mouthpiece of the author. He indicates Gil Blas as his main inspiration and states that he was attempting to revive the picaresque novel. But while Le Sage created a marionette, father of the protagonists of the contes philosophiques, Honoré Colette lives by his own right. Complicated psychology would be misplaced in these elemental beings, but each one is adequately presented. Une Jeunesse, also in two volumes, appeared in 1927. This is a study of adultery among the bourgeoisie, viewed more from the psychological reactions of the principals than as a triangle. Attention is concentrated on them and on their relations to their families. The action is placed in Liège and in the Ardennes, whose calm beauty contrasts with the unbridled passions of the actors. The author never indulges in moralizing; even his noble priest, l'Abbé Faniel, is content to let life teach its own lesson. Here is adultery in its fairest light, but the lovers soon find the aliquid amari which lies in wait for men of honor when they violate their code. The sense of ruin in their career is ever-present to both and is impressed on the reader by the logic of an objective narrative. The hero recalls at times Frédéric Moreau of Flaubert's L'Education sentimentale.

Glesener shows the same variety in his short stories as in his novels. The first three collections (1921-1923) center around the First World War, now stigmatizing the atrocities of the invasion or mocking the champions of Kultur, now exposing the unedifying activities of Flemish separationists and of profiteers across the Dutch frontier—where, threatened with arrest, the author had taken refuge in 1917. The best of the regionalistic collections, L'Ombre des sapins, (1934) represents the complete fruition of his powers. Here his dramatic talent is at its height; objective narrative deepens into terror the pity inspired by François Remy. The inevitability of ancient tragedy hovers over peasants caught in the meshes of fate; perennial traits of their class—avarice, sensuality, blind obstinacy—constitute the flaw which draws Nemesis upon them, and they appear as symbols of humanity in agony. The reading of any of Glesener's volumes brings the conviction that, as stylist of the classic tradition and as artisan of the novel, he has not received from foreign critics due meed.

See: B. M. Woodbridge, "Edmond Glesener," Publications of the Modern Language Association, LII (1937), 1191-1203 (with bibliography).

B. M. W.

Głowacki, Aleksander, see Prus, Bolesław.

Gnoli, Domenico, Conte (pseud. Giulio Orsini, 1838-1915, Italian poet and critic), was born in Rome. He remains known in modern Italian literature for one successful literary deceit—or transformation. He was already a patriarch and a somewhat effete man of letters, whose earlier poems had won him only a respectful silence, when he succeeded in making himself famous under the very well kept and exciting secret of a pseudonym. As a presumably young, fresh, revolutionary poet, he became admired by the generation of the turn of the century, in large part on account of the new lilt of a single quatrain ("Giace anemica la musa. . .") which was soon on all lips. In a confession published posthumously and similar to that of Poe on the creation of "The Raven," Gnoli has explained that he formed his celebrated quatrain only "for metrical reasons" in one of those "experiments" which are the re-creations of pure artists. From this germ of metric experiment there really sprang a new poet.

The old poet, i.e., the "first" Domenico Gnoli, a charming gentleman in charge of the National Library of Rome and then of the Lancisiana in the same city, wrote, before and also after this literary adventure, several books and an indefinite number of articles (he was editor of the Nuova Antologia and created the Archivio storico dell'arte) in which erudition is enlivened by a poetical feeling of love for the Eternal City. He had something in common with Ferdinand Gregorovius (1821-1891), German interpreter of Italy, whom he would have been happy to emulate. His poems, well written, in a classical style, and in "pure" Italian, assure him a place of honor among those poets who lived between 1849 and 1870 in the old Rome faithful to Italy and to "purism." They were published in one volume in 1913 by Laterza (I Poeti della scuola romana, 1850-70); they are patriotic, dignified—and boring. On the other hand, his three books, published when he was over 60 years old and related to his other and really important poetic personality, Orpheus (1901), Fra terra ed astri (1903), Jacovella (1905), win him a place among the poeti crepuscolari who flourished in the new century. These books are full of direct, nostalgic, simple, resigned, and disconsolate poesy.

G. P.

Gobetti, Piero (1901-1926, Italian political writer and critic), born in Turin, was the foremost representative of the intellectual sphere of Turin, where he lived all of his short life. Even in his student days he stood out as an intellectual leader. His first venture was Energie nuove, a weekly (1919). He drew for a collaboration on his masters, Francesco Ruffini and Luigi Einaudi, as well as on his fellow students. As a Piedmontese of the educated middle class, he was strongly conscious of the Cavourian classical liberal tradition, which he felt as a "moral religion." Amid the intellectual confusion of the post-war years and many escapes into extremist doctrines, he formed the idea of a thorough revision of Italian political values—a "liberal revolution." He was the first among the writers of the bourgeoisie to study without preconception the Russian Revolution in its background and achievements. Undeterred by the threatening insurrectional atmosphere of Turin in 1920, he established close ties with the group of young Communist intellectuals around Antonio Gramsci and became the literary editor of their paper, the Ordine nuovo. In 1922, he founded his own weekly, Rivoluzione liberale, which became the chief organ of anti-Fascist intellectuals. In it he subjected to a pitiless critique not only Fascism, but also the many interests, moderate and conservative, which had put themselves at the service of the new regime, and tried to trace the causes of Italian political decadence as a whole. He stood up under the threats and attacks of the local Fascists. But after 1924, the order came from Mussolini "to make life impossible for him." He was repeatedly beaten up, his friends silenced, his presses destroyed, until he realized that the only alternative left was to quit or go abroad. Accordingly, he moved to Paris in 1926. But a few days after his arrival, owing to his frail health and to the maltreatment he had suffered, he died of a heart attack.

The sum of the work that Gobetti put into the 25 years of his life is prodigious and should be multiplied by the work of the whole group which he brought into being and kept going singlehanded (periodicals published later, like the Caffe and the Baretti, go back to his influence). Apart from incisive polemical articles, which provided memorable analyses of the political scene, he has left Risorgimento senza eroi (1926; a series of historical studies), Giacomo Matteotti (1924; a biography), and one comprehensive book, Rivoluzione liberale (1924), which is an analysis of Italian political life since the time of Cavour and also a statement of Gobetti's doctrine. His revision of values may be defined in his own words: "Marx instead of Mazzini, Cattaneo instead of Gioberti," or, not a society of artificially unified emotional currents and confusions, but instead an active and ordered conflict of "autonomies," i.e., individual and group initiatives, with the statesman as a "diplomat" who steers without suppressing or degrading any of the original forces. Hence his respect and sympathy for the rising young Communists. The sorry experience of Italian Socialism in the first decades of the 20th century, degenerating into demagoguery and subsidy-hunting, had not driven him like other liberals into the advocacy of bribery or repression, for he considered fear the cardinal sin of a ruling class; but instead had showed him the need for new energies from the working class to take up the formative struggle of modern society. The role of the liberal is to recognize such forces and give them moral leadership.

G. de S.

Gobineau, Arthur, comte de (1816–1882, French publicist, novelist, and social philosopher), was born in Ville-d'Avray near Paris on Bastille Day, an anniversary he was to deplore all his life. He was brought up in France, then in Switzerland, and then again in France (Lorient and Paris). He became especially interested in oriental languages and, like many a young man, wrote his first verses at the age of 16. Between 1841 and 1849, in which year Tocqueville made Gobineau his chef de cabinet, many articles, poems, and novels were published in the most important newspapers and magazines and afterward collected in book form (e.g., Ternove, Mademoiselle Irnois, Nicolas Belavoir, all 1847; L'Abbaye de Typhaines, 1848).

In 1853 appeared the first part of L'Essai sur l'inégalité des races humaines, a work of many weaknesses and considerable charm, which for purely political reasons has up to now made the reputation of Gobineau. After the coup d'état of Napoleon III he entered the diplomatic service and went as first secretary to Persia. While his career took him to Newfoundland, to Teheran again as minister, to Greece, Brazil, and Stockholm, he kept on with literary activities. After retirement from the diplomatic corps he traveled in Italy, England, and Germany; he became an intimate of Wagner (q.v.) and was greatly attached to the comtesse de la Tour, for whom he neglected his wife (née Gabrielle Clémence Monnerot). But still he wrote, to the very end of his days, producing a great variety of books, from works as debatable and vulnerable as Lectures des textes cunéiformes (1858) and Histoire d'Ottar Garl et de sa descendance (1879) to others worthy of esteem and admiration such as Les Religions et les philosophies dans l'Asie centrale (1876), Les Pléiades (1874; Eng. tr., 1928), and Nouvelles asiatiques (1876). Posthumous volumes, which show a letter writer of the highest quality (correspondence with Tocqueville, Prokesch, Keller, Adolphe Franck, Marie Dragoumis; see Correspondance entre Tocqueville et Gobineau, 1908, etc.), confirm the true nature of his political and philosophical position, which is very different from common report as built up by the press and misinterpreted by Hitlerian and other fascist propaganda.

Although it is possible to find in the abundance of his writings many contradictory texts (the letters to Prokesch, for example, are inconsistent with L'Essai, and the Deux Etudes sur la Grèce moderne, 1905, nullify what these same letters affirm about Hellas), the essential Gobineau is not really elusive to impartial scholarship. Gobineau is feudal, accepting nothing which has come since the days of the great barons; autocracy, if reactionary and at the same time "moderate," appears to him the least unsatisfactory solution. The vigorous criticisms in La Troisième République française et ce qu'elle vaut (1907) are by no means all unfair. At the same time Gobineau considers it idle to resist democratic degeneration: since the death of the last Aryan, some two thousand years ago, humanity is destined to decrepitude and aestheticism. Germany and Italy are not more estimable than other countries, perhaps less so. It becomes clear that Gobineau is remote from all fascist doctrine; he believes only in a hereditary aristocracy, scorns war and imperialism, speaks of the Jews with sympathy, often with friendliness, at times with admiration. He is not in the least a "discovery" of the Pan-Germans. From his very youth he was celebrated by Frenchmen.

But it is not particularly his political views or his historical fantasies which promise any permanence to Gobineau as a writer—those pages of L'Essai which deal with China abound in ignorant mistakes that in themselves destroy the whole thesis of the book. It is for his narrative gift, for his genius as a conteur, that this "descendant of kings" is likely to remain known, and also perhaps for the scope of his mind. The originality of his novel Les Pléiades (too suggestive of an inferior Stendhal) may be impugned, but Gobineau stands completely on his own in his masterpiece, the Nouvelles asiatiques. His style, direct, sober, exact, is never spoiled by the modes of the times; there are none of the defects of romanticism or of realism. With due allowances made for his eccentricity and his nobleman's fanaticism, Gobineau is still definitely one of the geniuses of the French 19th century. When recent conflicts of fascism and liberalism have passed into history, this really great man will have his deserved recognition.

See: R. Dreyfus, La Vie et les prophéties du comte de Gobineau (1905); M. Lange, Le Comte de Gobineau (1924); "Gobineau et le gobinisme," Nouvelle Revue française, XLII (1934), 161-310 (special number devoted to this author); Etiemble, "Gobineau, juez del fascismo," Sur, February, 1942.

E.

Goetel, Ferdynand (1890-, Polish novelist and publicist), was born at Sucha in the Tatras, the son of a poor railroad conductor. Both his parents were of German origin, his father the son of a German colonist in the Bochnia salt mines, his mother the daughter of a retired Austrian soldier, and both parents were intelligent beyond their circumstances. After the death of his father in 1896, Goetel came under the influence of an uncle, the proprietor of the café Pod Pawiem (At the Sign of the Peacock), which was one of the principal meeting places of the Young Poland (see Polish literature) group. At school Goetel was lazy and indifferent to routine tasks but, under the influence of socialism, active and enthusiastic in extracurricular projects for spreading enlightenment, especially in the new folk universities. After studying architecture at the Vienna Polytechnic (1908-1912), Goetel abandoned this and went to Warsaw, intending to take up writing as a profession. On the outbreak of the First World War he was interned by the Russians and deported to Turkestan. The experiences he underwent there, first as a common laborer at road construction, later as a highway engineer, together with those he suffered in his subsequent flight by way of Persia and India back to Poland, gave him the material for a series of tales, among these Przez płonący wschód (1923; Through the Flaming East), Kar Chat (1923), and the widely translated Z dnia na dzień (1926; Eng. tr., From Day to Day, 1931). Goetel's Eastern stories and also his later description of Iceland, Wyspa na chmurnej północy (1928; An Island in the Cloudy North), together with the Icelandic tale Serce lodów (1930; Glaciers' Heart), won swift popularity, answering as they did the post-war craving in Poland for something at once exotic and realistic. In the 30's, after an isolated bid for fame as a dramatist with the tendentious Samuel Zborowski (1929), Goetel gradually abandoned belles-lettres to become one of Free Poland's leading publicists. Identifying himself with the curious, pseudoarchaic, self-consciously "Old Polish" journal Merkuryusz (Mercury), he came to be known as the very high priest of the would-be "Polonizers of Polish literature." With the publication in 1938 of his Pod znakiem faszyzmu (Under the Banner of Fascism), in which "an heroic attitude toward life" is held up as an ideal, Goetel's ideological sympathies became suspect and, despite his high position in the P.E.N. Club, he began to be regarded as dangerously reactionary. In 1939, with Cyklon (Cyclone), a weak and diffuse tale based on an old journey back from India, Goetel endeavored, without success, to recapture the public that had admired his earlier novels. During the Second World War, Goetel remained in Poland.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, II (1928), 351-367; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 246-258, 692-694; A. P. Coleman, "Ferdinand Goetel Today," Books Abroad, XIII (1939), 420-423.

K. Z.

Gojawiczyńska, Pola (pseud. of Apolonia Gojawiczyńska, 1896-, Polish novelist), was born in Warsaw of poor and humble parents. Through her talent for writing, discovered by a teacher, and her great capacity for work, she won the interest and support of Ignacy Matuszewski, then secretary of the treasury. Her semi-autobiographical story "Maryjka" was published in the official Gazeta polska (1932) through his help. Thus auspiciously launched, she continued to write, and when a brief residence in Silesia removed her from the center of the literary world, she took advantage of the temporary exile to produce a fine portrait of the mining district and especially of its women in Ziemia Elżbiety (1934; The Land of Elizabeth). On her return to Warsaw, Gojawiczyńska proceeded to recreate in the two novels Dziewczęta z Nowolipki (1935; The Girls from Nowolipki) and Rajska jabłoń (1937; The Apple Tree of Paradise) the hard, drab world from which she herself had sprung, thereby making Warsaw's "lower depths" literary material. Interested primarily in exploring not society as a whole but woman, Gojawiczyńska next pursued, in Słupy ogniste (1938; Pillars of Fire), her favorite theme, the tribulations of woman in a man's world. Though this work was distinctly inferior to those which preceded it, Gojawiczyńska was regarded, on the eve of Poland's collapse, as one of the most promising and serious of the younger writers.

See: K. Czachowski, Najnowska twórczość literacka (1938), pp. 117-121; A. P. Coleman, "The Literary Scene in Poland," New York Times Book Review, April 9, 1939, pp. 8, 24.

A. P. C.

Gómez de Baquero, Eduardo (pseud. Andrenio, 1866–1929, Spanish journalist and critic), was for the first 25 years of this century the leading literary critic in Madrid. He was born in Madrid and studied both law and letters in its university. An attempted political career was ill-starred, for he attained no post of importance either by election or by appointment. His vocation as a writer, however, was soon revealed. When he was but 16 his articles were appearing in the Revista de España on such weighty topics as “El panslavismo y la paz europea.” Later he wrote for many of the important journals and newspapers of the day: España moderna; Epoca, in which he first used the pseudonym Andrenio (1904); Imparcial, where he succeeded Clarín (see Alas, Leopoldo) as literary critic; Sol, Voz, and other publications of Spain and Latin America. In 1924 he was elected to the Spanish Academy.

The variety of subjects on which Andrenio wrote reveals the range of his intellectual interest as well as his competence in diverse fields—legal, social, and historical questions, modes and manners, short fictions, literary topics above all. Andrenio's literary criticisms are uniformly benevolent but not blindly laudatory, for he had the discrimination necessary to select the good qualities of a book, leaving the defects unmentioned. His style is simple, lucid, and gently ironical. His literary studies, such as those in Novelas y novelistas (1918), are in no sense exhaustive, but they point out aspects of the subject which are evocative and significant. Andrenio's tranquil objectivity and his real literary insight made it possible for him to write with equally sympathetic appreciation of men of hostile literary schools. El renacimiento de la novela española en el siglo XIX (1924) is a brief but excellent résumé of the development of this genre. Taken all together, Andrenio's criticisms form a kind of literary history of the period which is most valuable for its freshness and contemporaneity.

Other published collections of articles include the following: Letras e ideas (1905), Aspectos (1909), De Gallardo a Unamuno (1926), Pirandello y compañía (1928), Nacionalismo e hispanismo (1928), Guignol (1929), Pen Club (1929).

See: R. Menéndez Pidal, “Prólogo,” in Andrenio, Guignol (1929); F. de Onís, introduction to Antonio Alonso, Antología de ensayos españoles (1936).

K. R. W.

Gómez de la Serna, Ramón (1891–, Spanish novelist, dramatist, critic, and aphorist), was born in Madrid, a city that was to be the scene of many of his descriptive and interpretative pages. There he studied at the university. Writing is his unmistakable vocation, and few authors have been as prolific. He has lived in Portugal and France and more recently in Buenos Aires. His personality abounds in picturesque characteristics, and in his autobiographical pages he has woven around himself a sort of legend. For many years he had in the old café Pombo in Madrid a literary tertulia which without doubt was the most animated and colorful of the period; he wrote the history of this group in his book Pombo (1918). His frank and jovial character and eagerness to amuse, so evident in his radio talks and in his lectures, give him the appearance of a modern buffoon, completely anti-academic and lacking in any sort of solemnity.

Gómez de la Serna's inherent need to create has led him to cultivate many different kinds of writing, and in all his peculiar temperament, which he has himself labeled “Ramonismo,” is discernible above the characteristics of the genre. “Ramonismo” consists of a grotesquely dramatic vision of the world, ranging from simple caricatural deformation, with an elemental comic intent, to deep insight into the pathetic side of life. His novels, among which La viuda blanca y negra (1918), El doctor inverosímil (1921), Cinelandia (1927; Eng. tr., Movieland, 1930), El torero Caracho (1927), and Policéfalo y señora (1932) are outstanding, are an attempt to express through characters and their actions all the bustling and heterogeneous content of his creative imagination. He finds happiest outlet in books of very personal cast—El rastro (1915), Senos (1918), El circo (1922). Without doubt one of his masterpieces is El rastro, in which the author gives us the motley spectacle of the secondhand market in Madrid, a whole world in itself, composed entirely of worn-out things thrown away in their final agonal stage. In these various books the author's span reaches from insignificant details of observation to the weightiest moral considerations. The critico-biographical works, Oscar Wilde (1921), Azorín (1923), Goya (1928), and El Greco (1935), are not objective historical treatments, but personal reconstructions of figures whom the author reshapes in order to bring out more fully their natures. His Retratos contemporáneos (1942) contains authentic if impressionistic likenesses of some of the best writers of the present day. Among his dramatic works are El drama del palacio deshabitado (1909) and Los medios seres, which was produced in Madrid in 1929. He has essayed art criticism in his book Ismos (1931).

Gómez de la Serna is the inventor of a minor genre, the greguería, to which he turns continually and which might be described as the cell of his literary organism. The suggestion of the Spanish word, "confused noise" or "jargon," applies to his fashioning in this small mold of all the phases of his creative restlessness. A greguería is necessarily short, aphoristic, and very closely related to the Japanese haikai. Everything can be expressed in the greguería, all that is comic, all that is lyric, sudden revelations arising from a new association of ideas, condensed and instantaneous in their effect. The author has composed several books made up entirely of such little pieces; the most important are Greguerías (1918) and Flor de greguerías (1933), selections from which are translated in Some Greguerías (1944). The greguería also finds its way, with or without the author's express design, into his novels, his stories, and indeed all his work. Occasionally this form turns into a small poem of lyric intensity.

At first this author was considered merely extravagant and whimsical, yet his total product now shows an urge for literary creation not less serious than fervent. Shunning all appearance of the sacerdotal solemnity inherited from certain 18th-century conceptions, he gives free rein to intellectual capers, but his frivolity, only apparent, hides feelings of torment and desperation about the insoluble problems of human existence. He is a victim of his own profound sense of paradox when he declares that literature is a matter "of working in order not to produce, of working so that everything will be quite destroyed." He typifies the struggle between the propensity for disorder and the need for order in the modern world. By virtue of his desperate individuality, his gift for contrasts, and his plasticity of expression, he is attached today to the Spanish baroque, in the manner of Quevedo; his work is a genial modern version of that tradition.

See: J. Cassou, "La Signification profonde de Ramón Gómez de la Serna," Revue européenne, N.S. III (1928), 175-178; M. Pérez Ferrero, Vida de Ramón (1935).

P. S.

Goncourt, Edmond de (1822-1896) and Jules de (1830-1870; French realistic novelists, diarists, and historians), les frères Goncourt, are an amazing example of harmonious unity in literary collaboration. Born one in Nancy, the other in Paris, they were the only children of a cavalry captain who had served Napoleon. Their education at the Collège Bourbon was unusual in that it failed to imbue them with the ordinary national prejudices. In 1848 their dying mother pledged her sons to unite their lives; they never married and, it is said, were separated only once for as much as 24 hours. With a modest inheritance, the Goncourts needed no careers. They first practiced art, later shifted to literature. On December 2, 1851, when their first novel was published, the brothers inaugurated their Journal, one of the world's best-known literary diaries. They widened their circle of friends and began to gratify a taste for the unconventionally beautiful by collecting pictures, correspondence, and souvenirs of the 18th century. They were already successful as historians and art critics; their representative works of this period are Histoire de la société française pendant la Révolution (1854), Portraits intimes du XVIIIe siècle (2 vols., 1857-1858), L'Art du XVIIIe siècle (3 vols., 1859-1875). As historians the Goncourts advanced their craft by their new approach to the history of manners, a skillful use of the apparently insignificant document. As writers they laboriously practiced an individual impressionistic style marked by neologisms and labeled by them le style artiste. This style, the fruit of their exacerbated nerves and mental modernité (a word coined by the Goncourts in 1858), has restricted their circle of readers.

The Goncourts' representative novels appeared in the last decade of Jules's life. They are documentary fiction, with keys duly set down in the Journal, and as such they place Edmond and Jules with the 19th-century realists like Murger and Flaubert (q.v.), although the brothers' flair for exceptional subjects and pathological cases supports their claim to have anticipated Zola's scientific naturalism (see French naturalism). Charles Demailly (1860) is a tableau of Parisian journalism and letters, whose themes are extracted from the Journal. Sœur Philomène (1861) springs from an incident in a Rouen hospital. Renée Mauperin (1864), their most widely read novel, retells their father's biography, and its heroine is drawn after a childhood playmate. Germinie Lacerteux (1864) anticipates Zola's proletarian novels; it is based on the posthumous revelation of the "uterine furors" of their own model housekeeper. Manette Salomon (1867), perhaps the only adequate novel of artist life in the French language, will always deserve a reading. The tale embodies a Goncourt thesis, that marriage prevents success in art, and contains furthermore the first eulogy of the Japanese color print to be found in European literature. Madame Gervaisais (1869) contains the exact story of the life and conversion of an aunt of the Goncourts. Five years after Jules died, prematurely exhausted, Edmond began to publish again—catalogues of Watteau and Prud'hon; the first monographs on the Japanese color-print masters, Outamaro (1891) and Hokousai (1896); and his own novels, La Fille Elisa (1875) on prostitution, Les Frères Zemganno (1879) on the pathetic tragedy of a circus team, La Faustin (1882) about a star actress, Chérie (1884) about the modern society girl. Dramatizations of nine of these tales were made, a few for the Théâtre Libre of Antoine (q.v.).

In 1885 Edmond inaugurated Sunday receptions in the upper story of his Auteuil house, his "grenier," where the opportunity to meet Alphonse Daudet, Zola, and Turgenev (qq.v.) served to attract the younger generation of writers and diffuse the cults of style artiste, le XVIIIe siècle, le japonisme. This house and its contents are described in La Maison d'un artiste (1881). It fostered the fashion of studios hung with Japanese embroideries and overcrowded with bibelots. Edmond published three volumes of Le Journal des Goncourt in 1887, which were followed by six others. The unexpurgated diary was to have appeared 20 years after the death of the surviving writer. Its entries reflect the humors of their friend Gavarni, preserve the whims and ideals of the brothers, and record the many sayings of Sainte-Beuve, Gautier, Flaubert (q.v.), and Renan (q.v.), plus gossip about the celebrities of half a century. In 1882 Edmond let it be known that his collections were to be sold to endow an academy of 10 members. The Goncourt Academy, inaugurated in 1900, elects its members without declaration of candidacy. They receive annuities and at an annual luncheon award the coveted Prix Goncourt to the author of "le meilleur ouvrage en prose paru dans l'année."

See: Alidor Delzant, Les Goncourt (1889); Marcel Sauvage, Jules et Edmond de Goncourt; leur œuvre (1932); Georges de Traz, Edmond et Jules de Goncourt (1941).

W. L. S.

Goris, Jan-Albert (pseud. Marnix Gijsen, 1899–, Flemish poet and essayist), was born in Antwerp and studied at Louvain, where he was graduated with the degree of Doctor of History in 1925. He became successively professor at this same university, chief of the cabinet of the mayor of Antwerp, director in the Fine Arts Service of the municipality of Antwerp, chief of the cabinet of the minister of economic affairs, high commissioner for tourism in Belgium, and finally commissioner of information for Belgium in the United States.

After he had spent a year in the United States in his youth (among other things, he studied at Seattle), he paid several visits to this country and in 1927 wrote Ontdek Amerika (Discover America; French tr., Le Cœur de l'Amérique, 1933). Goris's poetry, collected in one volume entitled Het Huis (1925; The House), is not extensive, but of high value and importance. Het Huis, regarded exclusively as poetry, contains some of the richest poems written in the Dutch language and has had a profound effect on the development of poetry in the Netherlands. He is without any doubt the greatest of the poets who came to the fore in Flanders after the First World War. His critical and theoretical work is likewise of genuine value and significance.

During the Second World War, his Belgium in Bondage (1943) and Strangers Should Not Whisper (1945), written in English, and Du génie flamand (1943), written in French, were published in New York. At Pretoria, South Africa, there appeared from his pen in 1944 an anthology of Flemish lyric poetry Vlaamsche Lyriek, with excellent characterizations of the poets.

J. G.

Gorky, Maxim (pseud. of Aleksei Peshkov, 1868–1936, Russian novelist, playwright, and essayist), had the unique distinction among Russian authors of playing an equally important part in his country before and after the Revolution. He could also claim a practically equal significance as man and as writer. So interwoven were the events of his life with those of Russian history and with his literary expression that both in his life and in his work one loses sight of the borderline between Dichtung and Wahrheit. Born in Nizhni-Novgorod (now renamed Gorky) on the Mother Volga, the restless wanderer learned to know this great river and all his vast native land by tramping and by plying the widest variety of trades, from errand boy, ragpicker, bird catcher, apple peddler, gardener, kitchen boy on a steamer, to apprentice at a draughtsman's, at an icon shop, in a bakery, to railroad watchman and stevedore. This intimate contact with men and life gave Gorky his sense of reality, which co-existed in him with a perpetual dream of a different world and a better life. Realism coupled with romanticism—such was the outlook of Gorky the man and the author.

In the very first story he published, "Makar Chudra" (1892), he displayed his robust knowledge and understanding of actual conditions among groups as disparate as intellectuals and horse thieves and at the same time his dreamy yearning after a seemingly unattainable fairyland. Similarly in life he lived actively and dreamed dynamically, throwing in his lot with the revolutionary movement, supporting the tsar's opponents with pen and substance, and often risking his freedom and very life in behalf of the people's cause. The contradiction between his realism and romanticism seemed glaring. On the one hand, he knew and portrayed the bulk of humanity as stupid, mean, cruel, stagnant, ignorant, and shortsighted. On the other hand, even from the lowest depths of human degradation he had his Satan proclaim, "Man—that sounds proud!" (Na dne, 1902; Eng. tr., The Lower Depths, 1912), and in his poem in prose Chelovek (1903; Eng. tr., Man, 1926) he sang a hopeful hymn to potentially free man, armed with reason and vision, master of nature and machine. In his tramp stories (1895–1902) he exposed truthfully the squalor and brutality of the "Lumpenproletariat," but by implication he expressed his preference for the hobos' freedom from walls and possessions as against the thralldom of things and traditions that weighed down the life of "smug citizens" (Meshchane, 1902, Eng. tr., The Smug Citizen, 1906; Foma Gordeyev, 1899, Eng. tr., 1901; Troye, 1901, Eng. tr., Three of Them, 1902). Hatred for seamy reality sharpened his yearning for the remote and ideal, for the legendary vistas of such of his early tales as "Old Woman Izerghil" (1895). Free from illusions about the human race as it is and as he so well knew it, Gorky nevertheless kept his faith in man's eventual triumph over his own stupidity and slavery. Only such a faith can explain the fundamental buoyancy of his masterly autobiographical works, notably Detstvo (1913; Eng. tr., My Childhood, 1915), in which the sunny religiosity of Grandmother lends hope and courage in the face of sordidness, cruelty, and misery. Only such a faith could hearten Gorky in his support of the revolutionary movement at a time when it seemed "impractical" to dream of any positive outcome of the struggle of a handful of idealists against the double enemy of a powerful autocracy above and mass inertia below.

Gorky's faith in man evolved from the naïve individualism of his early tales to the collectivism of his mature productions. Mat (1907–1908; Eng. tr., Mother, 1907) was the first portrayal in Russian literature of the factory proletariat as a nascent force destined to break down the existing order. One may follow Gorky's gropings in his Ispoved (1908; Eng. tr., The Confession, 1916), with the seeker Matvei, who discards religion after religion, ideal after ideal, until he finally embraces the one "god"—the people, "creator of all gods . . . creator of miracles." The collective mass of humanity, when organized by an intelligent will, is invincible and knows no barriers on its forward march. Such was the final formula of Gorky's views, at the end of a long and tortuous quest. His faith was put to hard tests again and again, during the mass madness of the First World War and the excesses of the Revolution of 1917 and the resultant civil war. There were times when Gorky vacillated and seemed to reel on the brink of despondency about the human race. He rallied, however, at the lowest ebb of the Bolshevik experiment, when the new state appeared doomed, with war and intervention on 16 fronts and inner breakdown and starvation. Gorky drew strength from the sight of a collective mass united by an intelligent will under the guidance of understanding leaders. The inveterate dreamer once again undertook to champion a "lost cause." Despite his distaste for the Bolshevik methods, he came out in their support, against the opposition of virtually the whole world. His faith in collective man was revived and sustained.

For some 40 years Gorky suffered from tuberculosis of the lungs. He defied medical experts, as he had defied other authorities and institutions, and survived more than one death sentence pronounced by famous specialists. It was necessary for him, however, to reside in a congenial climate, which he found in southern Italy, for many years his second home. In 1928 he threw all considerations of health to the winds and returned to Russia, where he spent his last eight years in variegated activity. He had the rare satisfaction for a dreamer of living to see his dreams come true. The land which had treated him to persecution, prison, and exile received him now with universal enthusiasm. He actually saw the transformation, within a few years, of a backward patriarchal country into a highly industrialized union of numerous nationalities, cemented by a sense of equality and loyalty to an order free from masters and slaves. He saw man rise from darkness, stupidity, and pettiness to the height of his potentialities. It was natural that his spirits were high during these last years and that he eagerly participated in numerous cultural undertakings. Aside from editing various periodicals and editions of classics and foreign authors, Gorky managed to write in this period a prodigious number of essays and much fiction. Most notable is his unfinished dramatic trilogy, the first of which, Yegor Bulychov (1932; Eng. tr. in The Last Plays of Maxim Gorki, 1937), won considerable success on the stage, and the second, Dostigayev i drugiye (1934; Eng. tr., Dostigaev and the Others, in The Last Plays), was moderately acclaimed. His four-volume novel, Klim Samgin—Sorok let (1927–1936; Eng. tr., Bystander, 1930; The Magnet, 1931; Other Fires, 1933; The Specter, 1938), is an ambitious survey of Russian events from 1880 to 1924. Had Gorky lived longer, he would probably have revised and shortened this somewhat lumbering novel. With all its flaws, it is a valuable record and has some of Gorky's memorable portraits.

Both at home and abroad Maxim Gorky remains a living challenge to environment and circumstances, a symbol of dynamic optimism and faith in man.

See: K. Chukovski, Dve dushi M. Gorkvo (1925); R. Grigoryev, M. Gorky (1925); A. Kaun, Maxim Gorky and His Russia (1931); V. Desnitski, M. Gorky (1940).

A. K.

Gorter, Herman (1864–1927, Dutch poet), was born at Wormerveer, studied classic philology at the University of Amsterdam, and took his Ph.D. with a dissertation on Aeschylus. He was 25 years old when the publication of Mei (1889; May) won him a leading place among the poets of his generation. Mei defies all attempts of the literary historians to label it with some descriptive name from their list of genres. It is not an epic, though its length and form make it look like one. The tone is lyrical, and much of its verse is verbal painting of the beauty that is Holland, the Dutch landscape and all that makes it lovely to the artist's eye—meadows, inland lake and seashore, birds, flowers, herds of cattle, and the clouds that graze the pasture of the sky. But Mei is also a myth, resembling, not in form but intent, the Icelandic Edda, and it is at the same time a lyrical autobiography. The myth is the story of May, personification of short-lived physical beauty, who seeks to perpetuate herself by marrying the blind God Balder, embodiment of the world soul. But physical beauty cannot immortalize itself through the soul. May is transitory, Balder alone is eternal. He can be realized only through music, and Gorter, the poet, who attempted to marry the beauty of May to the music of his verse only succeeded in expressing his frustration. Language proved inadequate to voice the life of the soul, which can be rendered by music only. Hence Gorter, in Verzen (1890), tried the impossible by divorcing his verse from all word meaning, stringing words together that carried no sense, but appealed to the hearer only through the beauty of melodious sound and rhythm. There is much in Mei that is equally elusive and must be emotionally savored rather than understood. But it remains, for all that, a magnificent poem that will be read when the bulk of the output of Gorter's generation has ceased to find an echo in the hearts of posterity.

This highly individualized art, however, could not satisfy Gorter for long. In the introduction to De School der Poëzie (1897; The School of Poetry) he declared that he strove "to know not only the emotional life of man and the superficial aspect of the world, but the very laws that govern mankind and the world," because he believed that only through that knowledge could he rise to the highest poetry. Pan (1912) is the outcome of this ambition. The fundamental idea of this epic, which he expanded in a revised edition to three times its original length, is that the poet, or Pan, the God of the universe and the spirit of mankind, sees the past, present, and future of humanity (represented by the proletariat) pass by him in review and experiences in his mind humanity's oneness with the universe. That concept of unity as the desirable goal became the dominant thought of Gorter's life. He strove for social unity as a theoretical exponent of Marxism. But the intellectual effort was detrimental to the poetry. Gorter published a definitive edition of his verse in 1916. "In these two volumes," he wrote, "I have collected all the poems which were written by me between 1890 and 1906 and which, as attempts, attained a certain degree of perfection." The second volume included Het kleine Helden-dicht (Brief Epic; originally published in 1906). There are blind admirers of Gorter in Holland who accept his own estimate of his poetry as final. But it is highly doubtful whether posterity will agree with them. It is more likely that Gorter will live as the poet of Mei.

See: W. van Ravesteijn, Herman Gorter, de Dichter van Pan; een heroisch en tragisch Leven (1928); J. C. Brandt Corstius, Herman Gorter (1934).

A. J. B.

Gött, Emil (1864–1908, German dramatist and philosopher), born in Jechtingen am Kaiserstuhl, strikes the casual observer as being one of those problematic characters whose great gifts never seem to bear full fruit. He completed only a few works: three plays, Edelwild (1901), Der Schwarzkünstler (1905), and Mauserung (1908), and a small number of short stories. The stern demands he made on himself not only left most of his literary projects unfinished—they even induced him to question whether literature in general has more than ephemeral significance. Time and again he tried to escape from reflection and imagination into the sphere of action, as a farmer, as a small manufacturer and inventor. Yet it would be wrong to attribute such restlessness to some subconscious realization of insufficient literary ability, for there is the evidence of his comedies which combine great formal skill with dramatic verve and deep serenity. Worthy of the old Spanish tradition from which they stem, they form a welcome addition to the repertory of the German stage, which is none too abundantly endowed with plays of an entertaining and at the same time thought-provoking character. If Gött could not apply himself exclusively to writing, it was because he felt in all seriousness that more urgent problems were pressing on German civilization, calling for a practical solution rather than for theoretical discussion. However, the seemingly hopeless diffuseness of Gött's interests became, in the form of innumerable entries in his Tagebücher (1914), a constructive reckoning with the skepticism of his time and a steady reorientation towards lasting values. These diaries contain stores of ethical wisdom just as Amiel's disseminate psychological insight. With Nietzsche (q.v.) and Tolstoy (q.v.) as his initial mentors, he visualized a form of culture which would add to the intellectual honesty and fearlessness of the former the Christian candor of the latter, leaving no place for either Nietzsche's brusqueness or Tolstoy's sentimentality. Gött's most cherished vision was of a life which would, in the measure of human possibilities, become a new imitatio Christi, with as little dogma and externalized religion as possible, but with the full enactment of the one universal truth that to be good is to know that all men are brothers under the skin. It is not too much to say that in Gött's Tagebücher a new spiritual vitality and a fresh confidence in life slowly gain ascendancy over all ancient and modern prophets of gloom.

See: R. Woerner in Gött, Gesammelte Werke, I (1910), pp. xii–cx; A. von Grolman, Werk und Wirklichkeit (1937), pp. 45–164.

H. B.

Gourmont, Rémy de (1858–1915, French critic, essayist, and writer of fiction), was born in Normandy, of an old aristocratic family. After studying at the Lycée of Coutances and the University of Caen, he went to Paris and became an assistant librarian at the Bibliothèque Nationale, a position which he was forced to resign after the publication of an "unpatriotic" article (1891). He was very active in the literary circles of the capital and soon enjoyed considerable prestige, especially among the poets of the symbolist school. His Le Livre des masques (1896) is an interesting portrait gallery of the leading writers of that time. In 1889 he joined the group that was founding the Mercure de France, to which he contributed regularly until the time of his death in 1915. When he was in his 30's, a mysterious disease disfigured him almost completely, and thereafter he withdrew more and more among his books to live the semi-recluse life of a lay Benedictine.

Gourmont's numerous writings all bear the mark of a brilliant mind endowed with a wide and eclectic curiosity and often attracted by very esoteric studies. His first book of criticism, Le Latin mystique (1892), an essay on medieval hymnology, shows his interest in little-known subjects and gives at the same time a key to his own poetry (Divertissements, 1912). "Litanies de la rose," "Les Saintes du Paradis," and "Oraisons mauvaises" are all characterized by a Baudelaire-like (see Baudelaire) mixture of mysticism and sensuality and reveal an artist enamored of rare and melodious words rather than a really inspired poet. In his short stories also, in Le Pèlerin du silence (1896) and Couleurs (1908), he appears more concerned with the artistic arrangement of musical words than with the telling of his sensuous tales. His first novel, Sixtine (1890), he himself described as a "novel of the cerebral life," and his later ones, Les Chevaux de Diomède (1897), Une Nuit au Luxembourg (1906), Un Cœur virginal (1907), if they may be called novels at all, are likewise largely cerebral. These strange books evince their author's constant preoccupation with sex: both passionate and cold, ardent and ironical, they leave the reader with a sense of unreality. The heroines especially, fleshly and yet ethereal, have the unsubstantial quality of Pre-Raphaelite virgins. Curiously enough, it is Eve, in Lilith (1892), a dramatic treatment of Paradise Lost, that one remembers as a real woman.

Gourmont's love for words led him to a study of their derivations. This new interest engendered some of his most original works, L'Esthétique de la langue française (1899), La Culture des idées (1900), Le Problème du style (1902). To him words were not chilly and abstract symbols but living organisms which should be kept alive in all their savor and freshness. From this conception sprang also his theory of the "dissociation of ideas," his desire to break up associations of ideas which have become encysted in stereotyped phrases and threaten to harden a language into deadly woodenness. New fields of study were constantly attracting him—history, philosophy, theology, sociology, biology. His Physique de l'amour; essai sur l'instinct sexuel appeared in 1904 when he thought he had discovered a scientific basis for his theory that man's love is only animal instinct. In 1902 was published Le Chemin de velours, a reevaluation of the old quarrel between the Jansenists and the Jesuits, favorable in its conclusions to the less inhuman ethics of the latter. He was the most influential of the Mercur's collaborators. His articles cover an ever wider range of subjects, further revealing his insatiable curiosity, his truly encyclopedic knowledge, and no matter what their subject, they open new vistas illuminated with flashes of insight. They appeared later in volume form, Promenades littéraires (7 vols., 1904–1928), Promenades philosophiques (3 vols., 1905–1909). The articles on literature reveal a critic of catholic taste, partial perhaps to the very modern writers or to the lesser known of the distant past—"I feel at home before Boileau and after Baudelaire"—a comprehending judge with no set code or doctrine, whose viewpoint is always novel, whose conclusions are always challenging. In his commentaries on current events, on contemporary life and manners (Epilogues, 1903–1907), he often displays an elegant cynicism, the detached irony of a modern La Rochefoucauld.

The last years of his life were brightened by the visits of a beloved American woman, "l'Amazone" (Lettres à l'Amazone, 1914; Lettres intimes à l'Amazone, 1928). But the outbreak of the First World War gave his commentaries a new and sadder tone (Pendant l'orage, 1915; Dans la tourmente, 1916; Pendant la guerre, 1917). This lover of beauty, this hater of the coarse and vulgar, died on September 29, 1915, as he was working on an indignant article protesting the German shelling of Reims Cathedral. Many of Gourmont's works have been translated into English.

See: Legrand-Chabrier, Rémy de Gourmont; son œuvre (1925); P. E. Jacob, Rémy de Gourmont (1931).

V. Gu.

Gozzano, Guido (1883–1916, Italian poet), was born in Agliè Canavese in the province of Turin. When he entered law school at the University of Turin he was already threatened with tuberculosis, which was to carry him to an early death. Of a restless, dissatisfied nature, he was attracted by distant worlds where he also hoped to recover his health. Gozzano wrote impressions of a journey to India in the form of letters, and these were collected and published posthumously under the title Verso la cuna del mondo (1917). Other posthumous works are a series of charming fairy tales for children, La Principessa si sposa (1917), and two volumes of not very successful short stories, L'Altare del passato (1918), and L'Ultima Traccia (1919). But it was through his lyrics—first published in 1907 as La Via del rifugio (collected and republished in a revised edition in 1927 as I Primi e Gli Ultimi Colloqui)—that Gozzano achieved instant fame and became the most popular of those poets who because of their passive attitude towards life and their predilection for nuances, half tones, and shadows were called i crepuscolari. Their poetry, which is sensuous, with no object or ideal, gives evidence of deriving from D'Annunzio (q.v.), although in a certain sense it represents a reaction to him.

Besides the decadent D'Annunzio of Il Piacere and Poema paradisiaco, the French poets Jules Laforgue and Francis Jammes (qq.v.) seem to have influenced Gozzano. The poet is melancholic and wants to get away from himself, he yearns for ordinary healthy living, but he cannot achieve this—his inborn love for simplicity has been dissipated by a literary education which has reduced him to indifference and made him a sophist. He is disgusted with being a poet, a refined, modern man, he is tired of affected women and bemoans not having a plain, primitive soul, like his old servant described in "L'Analfabeta." His dreams of purifying himself by marrying a peasant girl and by living in the country never materialize. But if the poet is too weary to make a fresh start toward a realization of his dreams, he is nonetheless able to crystallize them into perfect poetical units, as in "La Signorina Felicità." His beautiful and most popular poem, "L'Amica di nonna Speranza," shows him a real virtuoso in creating verbal effects. With the most commonplace words, by means of redundant repetitions and implacable rhymes, he succeeds in creating an unforgettable poetic picture of the world of 1850. This sentimental bourgeois world of the Risorgimento, long since forgotten and considered decadent, appeals to Gozzano's imagination; it affords him pleasure to enumerate the knickknacks, to describe the salons, to report the conversations, to share the dreams of the young girls of that past era. But this poem—like most of the others—ends on a forlorn, desperate note. Gozzano's experiences in the present and his visions of the past—actual everyday life and the life of his dreams—remain vague; he makes a continuous effort to escape from one into the other without finding refuge or peace in either one. He celebrated many erotic adventures, but never real love; he sang of many women, but not one of them appears to have been his spiritual guide or inspiration.

In contrast to Carducci (q.v.) who had a passion for heroic deeds and to D'Annunzio who had developed a rhetoric of sensualism, Gozzano had no dominant feeling—only these blurred sensations. He was incapable of setting a goal for himself. His poetry is nothing but the sometimes impressively lyrical outpourings of his ambiguity. He was not averse to displaying his torture, to criticizing himself and his works. He saw clearly what the future held for him; in one of his poems he said that nothing of his would remain save a few verses. These, he said, sprang from his dry heart, like flowers sprouting from a ground which fire has seared. They constitute a mirror in which Gozzano's desperate, poetical soul has come face to face with itself. The critics could add but little.

See: Pietro Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1934), pp. 1-13; Giuseppe Petronio, "Poeti del nostro secolo: I Crepu-scolari: Guido Gozzano," Leonardo, July-August, 1935, pp. 294-303; Benedetto Croce, "Guido Gozzano," Critica, XXXIV (1936), 87-95.

D. F.

Graf, Arturo (1848-1913, Italian poet, critic, and scholar), was born at Athens of a German father and an Italian mother. Graf was precocious in his studies, showing particular interest in poetry. At 15 he went to Italy where, in 1870, he received his degree in jurisprudence from the University of Naples. Here he also studied under the critic Francesco de Sanctis (q.v.) and formed an enduring friendship with Antonio Labriola, a leading economist and sociologist. The practice of law did not interest him, and he turned to studies in philology and literature, which he was forced to interrupt in order to aid his brother, who had met with financial reverses in Rumania. In November, 1874, Graf returned to Rome, devoting himself entirely to investigations of the literature of the Middle Ages. The following year he began teaching and had such success that in 1876 he was appointed to the professorship of Italian literature at the University of Turin. Graf was a forceful speaker and combined in unusual degree gifts of exposition and scholarship. His La Crisi letteraria (1888), Per la nostra cultura (1898), and L'Università futura (1906) show the development of his ideas on education and culture. He contributed regularly to the important periodical, Nuova Antologia. He was the founder and for seven years (1883-1890) the codirector with Francesco Novati and Rodolfo Renier of the Giornale storico della letteratura italiana.

The characteristic note in all the poetical production of Graf is the tragic destiny of mankind: evil, sorrow, and death. His lyrics are replete with images of dead monks, dead virgins, dances of skeletons, and abandoned cemeteries. They contain also many mythological and legendary characters who symbolize the mystery of life—Prometheus, Ulysses, Christ, Faust, Charlemagne. The thought of death and sorrow occurs so frequently in his poems that the reader is often reminded of Leopardi, but Graf's pessimism is more intellectual. Like Leopardi he does not believe that man can improve his condition. In Medusa (1880, 1881, 1890), his first and most significant book of poems, Graf portrays a world of fearful imagination. Later collections are Dopo il tramonto (1893), Le Danaïdi (1897), Morgana (1901), Poemetti drammatici (1903), and Rime della selva (1906). All his poems were published together under the title Poesie in 1922. Graf labored over his verse and not always with success. Some sonnets, such as "Notte di luglio," "La Martire," and certain other pieces do suggest poetical genius.

Graf also wrote fiction. Il Riscatto (1901) is a psychological and, in part, autobiographical novel of some quality. His most important works on history, criticism, and literature are Studi drammatici (1878), Roma nella memoria e nelle immaginazioni del medioevo (1882-1883), Attraverso il cinquecento (1888), Il Diavolo (1889; Eng. tr., The Story of the Devil, 1931), Miti, leggende e superstizioni del medioevo (1892-93), Foscolo, Manzoni, Leopardi (1898), L'Anglomania e l'influsso inglese in Italia nel secolo XVIII (1911).

Graf was intensely interested in researches in the biological sciences and psychology, especially in those topics that concerned the transmutation of the species, heredity, dreams, hypnosis, and the hidden world. He also showed great interest in current ideas on evolution, socialism, mysticism, neoclassicism, and Neo-Catholicism.

See: G. A. Cesareo, Critica Militante (1907); R. Renier, "Arturo Graf," in Annuario della Regia Università di Torino (1913-1914); V. Cian, "Arturo Graf," in Atti della Reale Accademia delle Scienze di Torino (1918) pp. 973-1007; B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 2d ed., II (1921), 203-212.

H. R. M.

Grandmontagne, Francisco (1866-1936, Spanish essayist), of French-Basque parentage, was born in the Castilian province of Burgos and combined in personality and style the best features of Basque and Castilian character. When still very young he emigrated to Argentina; he worked in cities and in the Pampa, accepting, at his different tasks, the hard schooling of the emigrant. He became a noted newspaper man in Buenos Aires and one of the editors of Prensa; he returned numerous times to Spain (first in 1903), where he stayed only the last years of his life. Highly esteemed by Unamuno (q.v.) and other figures of the Generation of '98 for his straightforward, ironic, and critical mind, for his deep feeling of Hispanic values and the force and purity of his style, he interpreted Argentina and the Spanish American world for Spain, and the Spanish world for Argentina. As the poet Antonio Machado (q.v.) said of him, he was "the chronicler of two worlds." A great admirer of the Argentine, he studied its modern development, especially in the volume Orígenes del progreso argentino: Una gran potencia en esbozo (1928). His works, most of them of Argentine background, include two early novels, Teodoro Foronda (1896) and La maldonada (1898), and books of sketches, stories, and essays about types and customs, such as Vivos, tilingos y locos lindos (1901) and Los inmigrantes prósperos (1933). He also wrote, perhaps with less sagacity, about Spanish problems.

See: "El escritor y el hombre en Francisco Grandmontagne," Prensa (Buenos Aires), February 24, 1935.

A. del R.

Gras, Félix (1844-1901, Provençal poet and novelist), was born in Malemort, a small village of the Comtat Venaissin. Most of his life was spent in Avignon, where he was for many years a justice of the peace. He came of an old family of prosperous farmers and received his education at the Collège of Béziers. While still a student, he became interested in the Felibrige. This literary school, whose object was the revival of the language and literature of Provence, had steadily been growing in influence. Félix Gras was completely won over to its cause after he had seen his sister crowned as "queen of the Felibrige" by Roumanille (q.v.), whom she later married. Having joined her in Avignon, he was soon in direct contact with the already famous Felibres, attending their meetings and taking part in their activities. Thus he stands as one of the first Provençal poets to owe their literary vocation to the founders of this movement. Gras is the greatest of the "second generation of Felibres," towering far above the others. In contrast with his masters, however, he was to remain all his life an outspoken "red of the south," i.e., a liberal in politics and religion, a firm believer in the ideals of the French Revolution. He was to enjoy also the distinction of being the Provençal writer most read in the United States—not excepting Mistral (q.v.).

His important works in verse consist of two somber epic poems in 12 cantos, Li Carbounié (1876; The Charcoal Burners), dramatizing the life of rustic Alpine mountaineers, and Tolozà (1880), dealing with the Albigenian crusade, as well as Lou Roumancero prouvençau (1887), composed of lyrics evoking the history and legend of medieval Provence. Some of these had appeared previously in L'Armana prouvençau, the organ of the Felibrige. Having thus established a solid reputation as an epic and lyrical poet, Gras turned to prose. He published Li Papalino (1891; Stories of Papal Avignon) and Li Rouge dóu Miejour (1 vol., with French tr. on opposite pages, 1896; 3 parts, in French, Les Rouges du Midi, 1898-1900; Eng. tr., The Reds of the Midi, 1896, The Terror, 1898, and The White Terror, 1899, the last two being the second and third volumes of the series). He also published a little pamphlet, Lou Catechisme dou bon felibre (1892), which defines the ideals of the Felibrige.

Li Papalino comprises picturesque and colorful stories permeated with good humor and gaiety, told in an energetic, yet light and harmonious language. It was Li Rouge dóu Miejour, however, that won him a prominent and even original place among the authors of historical fiction. This is the story of the famous battalion of patriots from Marseille to whose enthusiasm we owe the name of the French national anthem. It is extraordinarily alive, rich in color, swift in action, epic-like in its rhythm. It was published simultaneously in Provençal, French, and English. The English translation has had several American editions.

Félix Gras was third capoulé (honorary head) of the Felibrige, succeeding Mistral and Roumanille. In that capacity he made many speeches which added not a little to his popularity. He distinguished himself as a French patriot and an intelligent leader of Provençal regionalism.

See: C. P. Julian and P. Fontan, Anthologie du Félibrige provençal (1924); M. Jouveau, "Félix Gras," Feu, XX (1926), 321-330; F. Bertrand, Félix Gras et son œuvre (1935).

A. V. R.

Grau, Jacinto (1877-, Spanish playwright), born in Barcelona, is perhaps Spain's greatest living dramatist. But his plays have been boycotted silently and consistently in Madrid, even while received with glowing acceptance in Paris, Berlin, and Prague. Grau's unflinching sincerity, his deeply rooted purpose to renovate the Spanish stage, and his irascible temperament combined with a self-acclaimed egotism have incurred for him the dislike of many critics and theatre managers among his compatriots. A Spanish commentator said some years ago that there are two literary generations in present-day Spain, the Generation of 1898 (including such men as Unamuno, Ortega y Gasset, Baroja, Benavente, Valle-Inclán, qq.v.) and the Unknown Generation. Grau would belong to the latter. In the long run Grau may well emerge, in his measured dignity and even apparent aloofness from social problems, as sounder and more wise and more sincere than many of his contemporaries. With him there have been no fanfares of words, no merely sonorous denunciations; his artistic productions have vigor and a constant eloquence.

Grau has worked diligently during the last 40 years for a new Spanish stage. Younger participants in the conflict over Spanish drama have acclaimed his plays as "vanguardistas." Trasuntos (1899) was the first and already very characteristic literary product of this half-Catalonian, half-Andalusian author. In the introduction to this work the great Catalan poet, Maragall (q.v.), pointed out Grau's qualities: a subtle, poetic vision of reality (symbolized in the very title); a strong tendency to philosophize; a really dynamic style. To these must be added a sense of a new way of life, freed from provincialisms and outmoded routines, and the already-mentioned urge to renovate dramatic technique, specifically by combining with contemporary symbolization in stage production the restrained dignity of classical tragedy and the underlying human vitality of the golden-age period of the Spanish theatre. No other modern playwright in Spain has succeeded so well in going back to Calderón. Grau has simplified the baroque complications into a very tense unity and has created situations and characters that transcend prosaic reality; he searches the ultimate meaning of man and all his passions.

Human love in its multitudinous and conflicting aspects is the leitmotif of his plays. His themes are those that constantly recur in dramatic endeavor. The prodigal son is represented in El hijo pródigo (1918), a biblical play which attains the human grandeur and desperate dignity of Calderón's tragedies. El conde Alarcos (1917), based on an old Spanish ballad, combines poetic medievalism and a "vanguardist" presentation; it suggests Edwin Arlington Robinson's Tristram. In Don Juan de Carillana (1913) and El burlador que no se burla (1930) is found the treatment of the Don Juan theme in two very different aspects, without the baroque complications in style and the eschatological or teleological elements of Tirso's famous play and without the sexually romantic or romantically sexual imitations which followed it. El burlador que no se burla exalts natural love. Its ending is disconcerting to squeamish moralists who think of this love as sin: after Don Juan's death, the women he has loved—not deceived—and who have loved him remember him with nostalgic gratitude. Love as triumphant in varying aspects is treated in El tercer demonio (1908); in El caballero Varona (1929), a play really liked by the Madrid public; in La Señora guapa (published 1943 but first produced about 1930). The tragedy of man in relation to the mysteries of illusion, destiny, and death is worked out with a poetic realism and impressive dramatic technique in Los tres locos del mundo (1930). El señor de Pigmalion (1921), which bears a strong resemblance to Capek's (q.v.) R.U.R. and was in fact printed before the latter play was performed, had a turbulent stage career; its première had to be given at Paris, whence it traveled triumphantly to Berlin and Prague, but Madrid hardly knows it. All these plays and a dozen others show a sensitive, dramatic genius rare in present-day Spain. They are far different from the products of such writers as the Alvarez Quintero brothers, Linares Rivas, and even Benavente (q.v.). They all convey a feeling that they are "new."

Today Grau, an exile in Buenos Aires, is having his plays republished, with commentaries and essays which throw a great deal of light on the Spanish stage of the last 40 years. He has also written more recently a study entitled Unamuno y la España de su tiempo (1943), which is an admirable interpretation as well as a tribute to one who like himself suffered much for a nobler Spain.

See: J. Cejador y Franca, Historia de la lengua y literatura castellana, XI (1919), 234-244; Federico Navas, "Jacinto Grau," in Las esfinges de Talía, o encuesta sobre la crisis del teatro (1928), pp. 55-58; E. Estévez Ortega, "El teatro moderno de Jacinto Grau," in Nuevo escenario (1928), pp. 42-49; J. M. de Osma, "El conde Alarcos, tragedia de Jacinto Grau," Hispania, XII (1929), 179-184.

F. S. y E.

Greek literature. Modern Greece has lacked, almost up to the present, the sine qua non of a representative literature, namely, a standardized literary idiom. The spiritual revival of Greece which began about 1800 with the founding of the revolutionary society, Philike Hetairia, produced the War of Independence (1821-1829) and freed most of the Greek realm from political servitude within the Ottoman Empire. It did not, however, free the Greek language. This continued, long after the creation of an independent Greek state (1832), to labor under its old bondage to the classical tongue of Hellas and the language of the New Testament. Through snobbishness and traditionalism the very ones who were most sincere in their desire to see a living native literature in Greece were those most responsible for the trend which actually retarded this. Adamantios Korais (1748-1833), for example, a great patriot, "reformed" the language for literary purposes, but followed the Hellenic pattern, choosing a mold far removed from the living tongue of the klephts whose gallantry had won Greece her freedom. The language of Korais has often been dubbed satirically "korakistika," or "learned jargon."

A pioneer in the countermovement to that represented by Korais was Athanasios Christopoulos (1772-1847), who wrote drinking songs and love verses in the popular idiom, the most popular of which were Lirika (1811; Lyrics); but it was Dionysios Solomos (1798-1857) who first made outstandingly successful use of the vernacular (or demotiki, as opposed to the katharevousa, or pure Greek) as literary material. A native of the Ionian island of Zante, Solomos turned his back on a brilliant career as an Italian poet in order to found a school of Greek poetry deriving its inspiration from the klephtic ballads of his native islands. His own most celebrated work was "E odi tis elephtherias" (1824; Ode to Liberty) which, set to music, has become the national anthem of Greece. To the Ionian school belonged also the gifted poet Andreas Kalvos (1796-1869); the satiric Andreas Lascaratos (1811-1901); and Aristotle Valaoritis (1824-1879), whose poems in praise of the patriot-revolutionaries were widely read and admired.

The outstanding representative of the classical trend in Greek letters was the distinguished scholar, linguist, archaeologist, and diplomat, Alexandros Rizos Rhangavis (1810-1892), generally known as Rangabe. Rangabe's fame as a literary figure is based especially on his dramas, chief among which are the classical tragedy, in verse, Triakontai tirani (1866; The Thirty Tyrants) and the Aristophanic comedy Tou Koutrouli o gamos (1845; The Marriage of Koutroulis).

At the opposite pole to Rangabe was Iannis (Jean) Psichari (1854-1929), a native of Odessa, who, like so many Greeks of his day, was educated in Paris. Like Iannis Papadimantopoulos who, under the pseudonym Jean Moréas (q.v.), became one of the poets of the French symbolist school, Psichari aspired to a literary career in French, but turned, under the influence of Emile Legrand, whom he succeeded as professor of philology at the Paris Ecole des Langues Orientales Vivantes, to the propagation of modern Greek. His satirical account of a journey to Greece, To taxidi mou (1888; My Journey), written in the demotic tongue, played an immeasurable part in the conversion of Greek writers of his day and later to the vernacular. Besides philological essays, written in French, Psichari wrote plays and short stories in his native tongue. One short story, Arosti doula (1907; The Sick Girl), has sociological implications. Outstanding in the field of the short story was Alexandros Papadiamantis (1851–1911). Unlike most of his generation, Papadiamantis kept himself free for the most part from foreign influences, and his short stories, 120 of which are to be found in the collection Ta rodina akrogalia (1913; The Happy Shores), possess a native charm and freshness rarely found in modern Greek. To be noted also are the Ionian tales of Argyris Eftaliotis (1849–1923) which appeared under the title Nisiotikes istories (1894; Eng. tr., Tales from the Isles of Greece, 1897).

The drama, long shackled by the romantic tradition and hampered by the servility of its authors, especially Demetrios Vernadakis (1834–1907) and Spyridon Vasiliadis (1845–1874), to the katharevousa, began to emancipate itself with Iannis Kambisis (1872–1902), the Greek Ibsen (q.v.), and his realistic, often grimly satirical dramas of Athenian life. Kambisis was followed by Spyros Melas (1880–), a disciple of Gorky (q.v.), and Gregorios Xenopoulos (1867–), the outstanding playwright of modern Greece. Best known for his Stella Violanti (1909), which has been called the Greek Doll's House, Xenopoulos is the dramatist par excellence of the modern woman. All three of the above wrote in the language of the people, as does also Demetrios Tangopoulos (1867–1926), whose Zontani kai pethameni (1905; The Live and the Dead) represents the recent trend to symbolism in Greek drama.

Poetry flourished in Greece above all other literary forms in the late 19th century and more recently, especially lyric poetry. The influence of the Ionian school mentioned above is seen in the poems of Stephen Martzokis (1855–1913) and of the French symbolists (see French symbolism) in those of Konstantinos Hadzopoulos (1868–), especially in To phthinoporo (1917; Autumn). Hadzopoulos is known also for his illuminating critical essays.

The poet to win the highest favor popularly was George Drossinis (1859–), who began by writing in the katharevousa with interpolations of verse in the demotiki. Later he wrote exclusively in the popular tongue, and his poems from this period—found in the collections Photera skotadia (1903–1914; Light Shadows) and Klista vlephara (1914–1917; Closed Eyes)—are among the most popular in modern Greek. Less popular with average readers but more widely recognized by the critics both at home and abroad was Kostas Palamas (q.v.). A native of Patras and educated in Athens, Palamas began his literary career as a partisan of the katharevousa, only to become converted to the demotiki at the time of the celebrated linguistic riots, which took place in Athens in 1901 over the publication of Pallis's vulgate translation of the New Testament, and to become, along with Psichari, an advocate of this allegedly sacrilegious translation. One of the most profound and patriotic thinkers of his day, Palamas produced his finest poetry in the series Assalephti zoi (1904; Eng. tr. of first part, Life Immovable, 1919, of second part, incomplete, A Hundred Voices and Other Poems, 1921). In these, as in his Grammata (1913; Letters), the lyrical genius of Palamas is often, unfortunately, overshadowed by excessive cerebration and too great use of symbolism. The recent trend to free verse in Greece is represented by the poet Angellos Sikelianos (1884–) whose long poem Aphierosi (1922; Consecration) is one of his finest. A leader in the movement to produce Greek classical drama on the modern stage, Sikelianos is master to the young poets of today.

See: H. Pernot, Etudes de littérature grecque moderne (1918); D. C. Hesseling, Histoire de la littérature grecque moderne (1924); A. Kambanis, Hystoria tis neas ellinikis logotechnias (1925).

S. A. V.

Green, Julien (1900–, French novelist), was born in Paris of American parents; his father came from Virginia and his mother from Savannah. Obsessed as he has been by the mysteries of heredity and of remote ancestral influences, he discovered in his sensibility the complex traces of Irish blood (visionary mysticism), of Scottish blood (fear of death and haunting of predestination), and of his American origins (a morbid preoccupation with the violent and supernatural forces of evil, which he shares with Poe, Melville, Hawthorne, and William Faulkner). French was to him not only the language in which he thought and wrote, but also the much needed influence of clarity, sanity, and order which alone could fuse into an artistic whole his conflicting tendencies. He was educated in a Paris lycée, enlisted in the French army at the end of the First World War, studied at the University of Virginia from 1919 to 1922, tried painting in Paris, and began his career as a French novelist in 1924. His early volumes, Le Voyageur sur la terre (1924; Eng. tr., The Pilgrim on the Earth, 1929, and in the volume Christine and Other Stories, 1930) and Mont-Cinère (1926; Eng. tr., Avarice House, 1927), while spoiled by some crude melodramatic elements, give, in the French language, a counterpart to the novels of the Brontë sisters and of Hawthorne. Their theme is hallucination, fear, haunting remorse, and madness. At the same time a series of critical essays (Suite anglaise, 1927) was published, on Samuel Johnson, Blake, Charles Lamb, Charlotte Brontë, and in 1928 a study of Hawthorne. His literary and artistic tastes, his inner torments, and his fear of love, of death, and of life after death are discreetly but fully revealed in the two volumes of his Journal (1938–1939; Eng. tr., Personal Record, 1928–1939, 1939). His best novels are probably Adrienne Mesurat (1927; Eng. tr., The Closed Garden, 1928), Léviathan (1929; Eng. tr., The Dark Journey, 1929, and in Christine and Other Stories, 1930), Le Visionnaire (1934; Eng. tr., The Dreamer, 1934), Minuit (1936; Eng. tr., Midnight, 1936). Between 1940 and 1945 Green lived in the United States, where a novel, Varouna (1940; Eng. tr., Then Shall the Dust Return, 1941), a volume of reminiscences in English, Memories of Happy Days (1942), and translations from Péguy (q.v.) were published.

Although he at times recalls Balzac (in his imaginative realism and his haunting evocation of French provincial life) and at times Kafka (q.v.), Julien Green stands out as one of the most original novelists of the 20th century. He succeeds in creating a world of his own, weird and unreal, which the reader enters with full suspension of disbelief. Murder, suicide, rape, madness, are the usual incidents in Green's novel of terror and of sadistic violence. No poetic description of nature, no touch of humor, relieves the tense atmosphere. The characters are often morbid and hysterical, and yet convincing, and are conceived with a rare imaginative power. Beneath these tales of horror there runs a strain of metaphysical anxiety: life is a wasteland of perpetual frustration, and man, try as he may, is powerless to escape from a hideous reality and to communicate with other human beings. A skillful technique, which often divides the nightmarish visions into two or three distinct episodes, emphasizing the solitude of the heroes, adds to the credibility of Green's novels. The style lacks originality and power and does not always do justice to the intensity of the author's hallucinations.

H. P.

Grieg, Johan Nordahl Brun (1902–1943, Norwegian poet, novelist, and dramatist), was, while he lived, the foremost exponent of Norwegian fighting spirit in the Second World War and became through his death its most striking symbol. Born in Bergen of a distinguished family, distantly related to Edvard Grieg, and destined for university training, he early showed talents of a stormier kind than would normally lead to a life of scholarship. He interspersed his student days with adventures in journalism, with a voyage as common seaman on a Norwegian freighter, and with tramps across the continent of Europe. The salient traits of his authorship were already present in his first collection of verse, Rundt Kap det Gode Haab (1922; Around the Cape of Good Hope)—his eager appetite for adventure, his passionate espousal of the common man, his patriotic, near-bombastic lyricism. A year at Oxford (1923–1924) led to the writing of a long essay on "Rudyard Kipling and the British Empire" (published in Edda, Vol. XXVII, 1927, pp. 75–108, 196–249), significant for the kinship which is clearly present between these two poets. Grieg's Anglo-Saxon orientation appears also from an essay collection entitled De unge døde (1932; The Young Dead), on Keats, Shelley, Byron, Rupert Brooke, and other English poets who died young. Meanwhile he had tried his hand as columnist, theatre critic, detective-story writer, poet, and novelist. He awakened attention, even scandal, by his frankly naturalistic story of sailor life, Skibet går videre (1924; Eng. tr., The Ship Sails On, 1927). But the rest of his books from the 20's added little to his stature: two collections of verse, Stene i strømmen (1925; Stones in the Stream) and Norge i våre hjerter (1929; Norway in Our Hearts); and three plays, En ung manns kjærlighet (1927; A Young Man's Love), Barrabas (1927), and Atlanterhavet (1932; The Atlantic Ocean).

A new phase of his life began when he went to live in Russia (1933–1935). Here he studied the Russian theatre and found his proletarian sympathies strongly reinforced. Social problems became the central theme of his next three plays, which established him as the leading youthful dramatist on the Norwegian stage: Vår ære og vår makt (1935; Our Honor and Our Might), attacking the greed of Norwegian ship owners during the First World War; Men imorgen (1936; But Tomorrow—), on the conflict between Nazism and labor; and Nederlaget (1937; Eng. tr., The Defeat, 1944), a picture of the Paris Commune in 1871. In 1936 and 1937 he carried on the battle against fascism by publishing a periodical, Veien frem (The Road Ahead). In 1937 he went to Spain as correspondent and helper behind the front on the republican side. He published a volume of correspondence, Spansk sommer (1937; Spanish Summer), but more important was his remarkable novel Men ung må verden ennu være (1938; But Young the World Must Be), a panorama of world events from Norway, Russia, and Spain, including an analysis of the Moscow trials.

In 1939 he joined the Norwegian army for neutrality service. He was on furlough in Oslo on April 9, 1940, when the Germans invaded, but stole out to rejoin the army. He was given a special assignment, carried it through at great personal risk, and accompanied the Norwegian government to England in June, 1940. From that time to his death in an American bomber over Berlin on December 2, 1943, he was in constant active service, rising to the rank of captain. His particular task became that of strengthening the spirit of his countrymen in exile and at home. He participated in all the activities of the fighting forces without regard to personal safety and poured into his verse the impression of all that he saw. His lyrics of war, though few in number, were a notable contribution to the Norwegian and Allied cause. That patriotic fervor which sometimes seemed extravagant in peace found its transmutation in times of war. The bombast is gone, leaving only a deep passion for his native land and the shattered values of peace: "We kill, that our children may not become as we are." The appeal of his poetry lies in its immediacy of experience and its breadth of spirit. Grieg was able to keep his idealism intact and his courage young, until he himself joined "the young dead" of whom he once had written.

See: K. Elster, "Johan Nordahl Brun Grieg," in Norsk biografisk leksikon, IV (1929), 618-620; Halvdan Koht, "Nordahl Grieg," American-Scandinavian Review, XXX (1942), 32-40; Olav Rytter, "Nordahl Grieg," Norseman, I (1944), 113-120. There are translations of Grieg's poetry in American-Scandinavian Review, XXIX (1941), 109-110, XXXII (1943), 15-16; C. W. Stork, Anthology of Norwegian Lyrics (1942); Joy Davidman, War Poems of the United Nations (1943); Norse- man, I (1943), 68, 110, 243-247, II (1944), 112. E. H.

Griese, Friedrich (1890-, German novelist), was born of an old peasant family at Lehsten, a village in Mecklenburg. After attending the village school there and two teachers' colleges, in 1911 he became a teacher. Immediately after the outbreak of the First World War he volunteered for the front; he went nearly deaf in 1916, was discharged from military service, and resumed teaching. The peaceful life of a village schoolmaster and the solitude of his rural surroundings helped Griese toward literary creation. Since 1921 he has written and published a long series of novels and stories, firmly rooted in the ideas of the rural world and usually located in his homeland Mecklenburg. Griese's place in German literary history is in the long tradition of the regional novel. In an autobiographical sketch he has pointed out that he has always attempted to make transparent the secret background of things, the dark and uncanny powers which, dreaded by the peasant, are still the fountainhead of life. Not unlike another representative of the "Heimatkunst" movement, Timm Kröger (1844-1918), also a native of Lower Germany, Griese became "Heimatsdichter" without intention or design, "letting himself be driven where his visions and the flood of his yearning wanted to go."

After a few vigorous tales which he himself regarded later only as a preparation for his spacious sagas and legends, his first well-balanced full novel, Alte Glocken, was published in 1925. Soon afterwards he completed a collection of short stories, Die letzte Garbe (1927). In the same year appeared his first outstanding novel, Winter (Eng. tr., 1929), in which a long winter of almost supernatural cold engulfs a Low German village and elevates men and animals into gigantic mythical dimensions. A number of gloomy and stirring short stories were soon followed by the novels Der Sohn seiner Mutter (1929), the mysterious and grave tale of a peasant boy, and Das Tal der Armen (1929), in which a remote village is slowly absorbed by the outside world. Der ewige Acker (1930) shows how the miserable years during and after the First World War cleansed the earth for a new beginning. Griese's latest novels, Das letzte Gesicht (1934), Bäume im Wind (1937), and Die Weissköpfe (1939), bring him closest to his literary model, Knut Hamsun (q.v.). Between 1931 and 1936 his interest in history resulted in impressive and popular historical novels as well as a biography of Fritz Reuter (1938). Less successful were three plays Mensch aus Erde gemacht (1933), Wind im Luch (1937), and Der heimliche König (1939).

Griese was elected a member of the Prussian Academy of Letters and awarded the Lessing prize in 1934. The state of Mecklenburg decided to make a present of Rethus, an old water mill near Parchim, "to its greatest living poet." He still resides there, after having resigned from his position at a primary school in Kiel where he had been teaching since 1926. There is no doubt that Griese's literary work makes him preeminent among the many modern German writers whose glorification of peasant life, soil, and countryside is typical of the "Heimatkunst."

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Dritte Folge: Dichter aus deutschem Volkstum (1934), pp. 207-231; K. Melcher, Friedrich Griese (1936).

H. Sch.

Grimm, Hans (1875-, German novelist, short-story writer, and essayist), is widely known, not so much for his strictly creative writing in the field in which he is indisputably the greatest living master—the longer short story—as for the authorship of his stupendous novel Volk ohne Raum (1926). The title became instantly a new designation for the German nation and a slogan offering to the German politicians the long-sought "political synthesis." Despite its 1352 pages and the measured tempo of its style which seems to echo the patient, plodding feet of the German peasant and emigrant Cornelius Friebott, despite the epic retardation and the repetition of both narrative and conversational formulae, more than a million copies were sold between its appearance in 1926 and the outbreak of the Second World War in 1939. Volk ohne Raum is one of the most harrowingly painful fictionalized records ever penned by an earnest and heart-torn patriot. The suffering recounted is senseless, whether it be that of the Germans in their overcrowded fatherland or of those who emigrated only to become involved in the Boer War and impoverished by it and then dispossessed and shipped like cattle back to a fatherland even less able to contain them at the close of the First World War. It is the suffering of protagonists who are mere struggling victims of a relentless fate, patiently enduring a passion without any scheme of redemption. The same theme is treated, in fact with greater objectivity, conciseness, and artistry, in an earlier and perhaps Grimm's best story, Die Olewagen Saga (1918).

Prior to the unexpected success of his novel Hans Grimm had been from 1895 to 1910 a merchant apprentice in England and clerk and independent merchant in Cape Colony. In 1910 he returned to Germany to become a writer. He studied political economy in Munich, fought in the First World War, and then settled at Lippoldsberg on the Weser, to discover subsequently that his new home adjoined the farms and glassworks that had belonged centuries before to his ancestors. Thus his return to Germany, followed closely by the war, with its intensification of his patriotism, and later by his accidental settling near the earliest-known home of his family—that he chanced to be born in Wiesbaden is without significance for him—became in the deepest sense a return of the native and served to shape the "African writer's" determination to become a "German writer," a "political writer."

Regardless of the chronology in which his works appeared, they fall into two distinct, but organically related groups, the creative writing of the artist and the political writing of the patriot. To the latter category belong, besides the political novel Volk ohne Raum, the documentary volumes dealing with the sufferings and injustices wantonly inflicted on the South African Germans during and after the First World War, Der Ölsucher von Duala (1918), Die dreizehn Briefe aus Deutsch-Südwest-Afrika (1928), Das deutsche Südwest-Buch (1929). Here also belong the series of 34 short essays which were written between 1911 and 1931 and make up the volume Der Schriftsteller und die Zeit (1931); the longer essay Von der bürgerlichen Ehre und der bürgerlichen Notwendigkeit (1932); the essays that have appeared in the pages of the magazine Das Innere Reich, founded in 1934 by Paul Alverdes and Karl Benno von Mechow (qq.v.); and the Englische Rede: Wie ich den Engländer sehe; Deutscher und englischer Wortlaut (1938).

His purely creative writing consists of the 30-odd stories that make up the volumes Südafrikanische Novellen (1913), Der Gang durch den Sand (1916), Der Richter in der Karu (1930), Lüderitzland (1934), and the already mentioned Olewagen Saga. All except one of these stories are African in theme, substance, feeling, and style. This preoccupation with the colonial world and its sharp social cleavage is doubtless the direct result of Kipling's influence on Grimm. But Kipling's "white man's burden" is scarcely to be recognized in the realistic race antagonism depicted in "Der Gang durch den Sand." In this story Grimm's conception of race is still that of the white man versus the colored, but subsequently in his political writings it was to develop into the more narrowly exclusive conception of the Nordic man, to all intents and purposes the British and the German man. He did not follow but rather blazed the trail for the still narrower racial theory developed by his younger contemporaries. Grimm is not a party man. He is himself thoroughly sincere and without arrière-pensée. What his earlier political writings had lacked—a scheme of redemption to put an end to the German passion—his later essays, and particularly his Englische Rede, develop in a plan for understanding between Germany and England. This is but the logical consequence of his inordinate admiration for the British Empire and British justice. The finest paean of praise ever hymned to the British colonial official is "Der Richter in der Karu," and significantly Grimm considers this his finest work. What he expresses here and elsewhere indirectly and subtly he proclaims directly and emphatically in the Englische Rede.

See: G. K. Brand, "Hans Grimm" (with biography and bibliography), Die neue Literatur, XXVII (1926), 529-537; A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Dritte Folge: Dichter aus deutschem Volkstum (1934), pp. 43-58; G. H. Danton, "Hans Grimm's Volk ohne Raum," Monatshefte für deutschen Unterricht, XXVII (1935), 33-43; W. Steinborn, "Der unbekannte Hans Grimm," Das Innere Reich, V (1938), 674-703, 790-816; R. T. House, "The South-African Stories of Hans Grimm," American-German Review, VI (1939), 16-17, 34.

J. F. G.

Gripenberg, Bertel (1878-, Finnish poet writing in Swedish), who was born in St. Petersburg, Russia, but comes of the old Swedish-Finnish aristocracy, has brought to Swedish poetry a fire and intensity lacking since the time of Fröding (q.v.). Beginning in Dikter (1915; Poems) with the perennial themes of love and wine, he turned later to descriptions of nature, to Finland's heroic past, and then to contemporary political and social conflicts, emphasizing in particular the debt of his country to Swedish culture. Gripenberg is temperamentally a modernist, with a clarion ring in his lines. He is a fine sonneteer and has translated effectively Oscar Wilde's

"Ballad of Reading Gaol" and Edgar Lee Masters's Spoon River Anthology.

See: C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930); G. Bach, The History of the Scandinavian Literatures, ed. by Frederika Blankner (1938).
C. W. S.

Gröndal, Benedikt Sveinbjarnarson (1826-1907, Icelandic scholar, poet, and dramatist), was born at Bessastaðir near Reykjavík, the son of Sveinbjörn Egilsson, famous Icelandic scholar. He was named after his maternal grandfather, who also was a poet. At home and in the Latin school of his father, Gröndal became imbued with the love of the classics, those of Greek and Roman antiquity as well as the Old Icelandic sagas and Eddas. He grew up into the romantic movement, becoming himself more romantic than most in his poetry. Nature impressed him deeply, and he remained a faithful natural scientist until his death. His artistic nature also found outlet in calligraphy and drawing.

Though brilliantly gifted, Gröndal was an erratic genius. He studied natural history, philosophy, aesthetics, literature, and "northern antiquities" at the University of Copenhagen, becoming an M.A. (the first one) in the last-named subject in 1863. A decade of literary work in Copenhagen followed, after which he went home and taught school for another decade (1874-1883). After that time he was his own master until death overtook him.

Among Gröndal's most important works are the following: Heljarlóðarorusta (1861; The Battle of Hel's Field); Clavis poetica antiquae linguae septentrionalis (1864), an excellent tool; Þórðar saga Geirmundssonar (1891; The Saga of Þórður Geirmundsson), a Rabelaisian satire; Kvæðabók (1900; Poems); and Dagradvöl (1923; Autobiography). His poetry and prose have many facets, but he is most effective when giving rein to his unbridled imagination. In that mood he wrote some excellent nonsense poems and parodies, as well as Aristophanic plays and Rabelaisian satire. Best of all his works is the inimitable burlesque, Heljarlóðarorusta, a mock romance on the battle of Solferino in 1859. It is also his most popular work.

See: Benedikt Gröndal áttæður (1906); S. Einarsson, "Benedikt Gröndal and Heljarlóðarorusta," Journal of English and German Philology, XXXVI (1937), 307-325, 543-550.

S. E.

Grubiński, Wacław (1883–, Polish dramatist, critic, and short-story writer), was born in Warsaw of a theatrical family. Educated at school in the social sciences, Grubiński steeped himself privately in literature, philosophy, and the arts pertaining to the theatre. In 1909 he began his career by having a somewhat daring play presented on the Warsaw stage (Pijani, The Drunks) and was regarded thereafter in bourgeois circles as a bad moral influence. Like his masters Wilde, Anatole France (q.v.), Flaubert (q.v.), and Przybyszewski (q.v.), Grubiński had no desire to be an influence at all, good or bad. "The author," he said in his confession (1925), "exhibits his hero objectively, like a tiger, or bull; you observe how he looks, thinks, and acts, but you make up your own opinion of him, as you would of a bull. . . ." A detached, sybaritic, amused observer of the human animal, Grubiński was a master showman of the animal's foibles and a superb stylist, a fact publicly recognized in 1939 by an Academy award for the "exquisite Polish" of his Listy pogańskie (1938; Pagan Letters). Of his short stories, the collection Człowiek z klarnetem (1927; Man with Clarinet) is representative, and of his plays, the following are the most popular: Kochankowie (1919; The Lovers), Piękna Helena (1919; Fair Helen), Lenin (1921; a comedy), Lampa Aladyna (1923; Aladdin's Lamp), and Niewinna grzesznica (1926; The Sinless Sinner). A relic of the last phase of Young Poland (see Polish literature), Grubiński was somewhat out of place in the Poland of the 1930's. His plays gradually disappeared from the boards, as the older generation passed from the scene and the neurotic dandyism of the fin de siècle went out of fashion.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, II (1928), 271–286; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, II (1934), 171–174, 375–376; J. Lorentowicz, Teatr Polski w Warszawie (1938), passim.

A. P. C.

Guðmundsson, Kristmann (1902–, Icelandic novelist), was born at Þverfell in Borgarfjörður. His mother's family was deeply rooted in the soil, his father was a temperamental rover. The youth of Guðmundsson was marred by lack of parental care and by sickness, yet he grew up to be a healthy boy whose optimism and enterprising nature nothing could curb. Having been a jack-of-all-trades, he finally (1924) decided to go to Norway and become a writer. Two years later his first book of short stories, Islandsk kjærlighet (1926; Icelandic Loves), was an immediate success. Many novels and a host of short stories have appeared in Norwegian. Since 1939 Guðmundsson has lived in Iceland and written in Icelandic.

Kristmann Guðmundsson is a master of the modern romance. Like no other Icelandic novelist he understands the psychology of love, especially young love, and describes it with a realism that nevertheless seems ethereally romantic. With him the spiritual and the physical aspects of love unite in harmony without the bad conscience that troubles some of the pre-war writers, such as Kamban (q.v.) who, during the 1920's, fought a struggle of emancipation from the older ideology of love. Next to love, character interests Guðmundsson. This is especially evident in his family sagas: Brudekjolen (1927; Icelandic tr., Brúðarkjöllinn, 1933; Eng. tr., The Bridal Gown, 1931), Livets morgen (1929; Icelandic tr., Morgunn lífsins, 1932; Eng. tr., Morning of Life, 1936), Det hellige fjell (1932; The Holy Fell), Jordens barn (1934; Children of Earth), and Gyðjan og uxinn (1937; Eng. tr., Winged Citadel, 1940). The last is a historical romance from the Crete of Minoan times, but it is full of allusions to modern psychoanalysis and modern world politics. Perhaps finest of Guðmundsson's characters is the hero of Morning of Life; in him the heroic ideal of the sagas is once more incarnated. Not the least source of Guðmundsson's charm is his facile narrative talent, his obvious joy in telling a story. His books have been translated into many languages.

See: G. G. Hagalín, "Kristmann Guðmundsson," Íðunn, XIV (1930), 55–70.

S. E.

Guerra Junqueiro, Abílio (1850–1923, Portuguese poet), was born in Freixo-de-Espada-a-Cinta, Trás-os-Montes, the son of well-to-do farmers. In 1868 he matriculated in the University of Coimbra. He arrived there in a revolutionary moment and joined the group known as the Generation of Coimbra (see Portuguese literature), of which he became an outstanding member. Before he reached the age of 20 some of his writing had already been published, and about the time he entered the university, Baptismo de amor (Baptism of Love) appeared. Already he showed verbal opulence, notable metrical flexibility, and a certain oratorical and grandiloquent tendency. Upon obtaining his degree (1873), Junqueiro was employed in government administration. Later he was identified with the republican movement and carried out a violent campaign against the monarchy and the Church.

He matured artistically in a devotion to the Hugo of La Légende des siècles and went on to become the most typical and worthy representative of the social and liberal poetry of Portuguese realism. He was one of those who rescued Portuguese poetry from the stagnant waters of an exhausted romantic-Arcadian lyricism. In 1874 was published the work which established his reputation, A morte de D. João (Don Juan's Death), a collection of poems without great continuity but held together by the eternal theme of the Seducer, whom he makes the symbol of social corruption, a product of romantic sentimentalism. In these lyrical and satirical poems the main character is grotesquely debased; he is reduced to an extreme state of pauperism and is made to die in an alley, weak and diseased. Junqueiro was immediately charged with degrading poetry and taking the themes of his verses from the privy, the hospital, and the brothel. He retorted that the basis for the new poetry lay in science and not in the transports of romantic lyricism and explained the principles of his aesthetic. Art should express effectively the results of science; it must be progressive and help in giving "a methodical and definite idea" of the universe, its ultimate aim being justice. Everything opposed to justice could be symbolized in Don Juan as corruption and in Jehovah as tyranny. The moral scandal aroused by A morte de D. João was followed in 1885 by the religious scandal of A velhice do Padre Eterno (The Old Age of the Eternal Father). With the same virulence with which he had attacked the libertinism personified by Don Juan, he now assailed the figure of Jehovah. The Church, religious fanaticism, and intolerance are the targets of these poems, characterized by a rabid sarcasm, in verse of resounding sonority and of extraordinarily daring richness of rhythms and images. In both works he definitely incorporated prose into poetry and introduced elements which until then had been considered outside the realm of the poetically beautiful, an extreme reaction against the decorous fastidiousness of the reigning poetry. In the taste for the repulsive and the ugly there is a satanic element reminiscent of Baudelaire (q.v.), but by and large the model is Hugo, from whom Junqueiro took the alexandrine, to acclimatize it in Portugal.

On the occasion of the English ultimatum of 1890 Junqueiro's lyre gave expression to national wrath in Finis Patriae (1891), a collection of poems, and Pátria, a dramatic poem not published until 1896, both full of the fury aroused by the humiliation of his impotent native country. The bitter, lyrically passionate vision of national downfall and the accusation against the supposedly guilty element, the dynasty, furnished a poetic fulfillment of the historical negativism of Oliveira Martins (q.v.). Pátria was read avidly, and its mysterious and spectral atmosphere, the sinister symbolism of some of its characters—especially O Doido, personification of past Portuguese glory—and its Messianic pessimism made a deep impression. Certain technical characteristics of this lyrical libel, the symbolistic repetitions and the morbid cadences, had a notable influence on much of the poetry which followed. Junqueiro's art, essentially pictorial and descriptive, reached its apogee in some of the pages of Pátria. In 1892 the publication of Os simples (The Simple Ones) marked a new phase in his work. Here, in keeping with the impulses of a new generation, he abandoned social and philosophical themes and with a more intimately contemplative attitude turned his attention to the objects and humble souls of Portuguese rural life. Images lost their oratorical brilliance, were fitted to the candid simplicity of the themes. With a delicately restrained lyricism he gave himself over to an intimate communion with nature, desirous of calm for his disillusioned soul and in search of the tranquil faith of village life. Even so he endeavored to understand by systematic processes the essence and evolution of the surrounding world. His scientific obsession, which he never lost, led him to write a mystico-philosophical poetry of allegorical character, in which he tried to translate poetically the postulates of scientific naturalism and impart a lyric expression to the discoveries of the laboratory. The result is seen in Oração ao pão (1902; Prayer to Bread) and Oração a luz (1904; Prayer to Light), his last estimable productions.

Shortly after the republic was proclaimed (1910) Junqueiro was sent to Switzerland as minister. There he composed an essay, Notas sobre a Suíça (1911), which is his best work in prose (later included in Prosas dispersas, 1921, Collected Prose). The last years of his life, during which he underwent a mystico-Christian evolution, were spent in retirement on his property at Barca d'Avila. In this phase, which has been called Tolstoyan (see Tolstoy, Leo), he devoted himself to the cultivation of his vineyards and to radiological experiments.

See: A. da Veiga Simões, A nova geração (1911), pp. 77-83; F. de Figueiredo, História da literatura realista, 1924 ed., pp. 112-132; P. Hourcade, Guerra Junqueiro et le problème des influences françaises dans son œuvre (1932).

E. G. D.

Guglielminetti, Amalia (1885?-), Italian poetess and novelist), was born in Turin. In her verse she aroused curiosity and interest by her bold treatment of sensuous love and was even hailed by some as a "new Sappho." However, upon a closer scrutiny, it was seen that she was merely recounting personal experiences which she was unable to translate into authentic lyricism or suffuse with the breath of true poetry. The myth of a new, realistic poetess of power was soon dissipated, although she has continued to have readers. What intensity she attained is intellectual rather than emotional. The most passionate and most intimate moments are described with a calculating precision and coldness which make one realize their falseness and lack of sincere human emotion. Her works, sensuous and audacious, lack the human spark which might have made her really great.

Her principal writings are Voci di giovinezza (1903), Le Vergini folli (1907), L'Insonne (1913), Anime allo specchio (1917; short stories), Le Ore inutili (1919), Gli Occhi cerchiati d'azzurro (1920).

E. F

Guillén, Jorge (1893-, Spanish poet), was born in Valladolid. The external events of the life of this most remarkable lyricist present no special interest. At one time he was a lecturer in Spanish at the University of Paris and later professor of Spanish literature in the universities of Murcia and Seville; more recently he traveled to the United States and has been professor of Spanish at Wellesley College.

If the poetry of a great contemporary, García Lorca (q.v.), can be described as the overflow of lights and sounds, as suggestive of juice of fruit bitten when ripe, the art of Guillén can be called a search for the stark, the precise; it always involves care to hit the mark exactly. Guillén has produced only one book, Cántico (1928; 3d ed., enl., 1945), yet it is enough to place him among the poets who can confidently await the judgment of posterity. The verses of Guillén are for a limited number of readers and will never attain wide popularity, although this is not because they contain strange words or recondite allusions. On the contrary, his terse lines include scarcely any references to the complicated or the mysterious. His soul retreats candidly within itself, fearful of drawing away from the first bubbling of the poetic spring. There is neither action nor anecdote; there are no catalogued emotions. The difficult thing in his work is the "poetic quality" of the poetry.

In Cántico every theme is connected with the anguish or joy caused by impressions received in complete innocence, along with a vehement desire to possess the present moment as part of a vehement longing for eternity. The author is master of his art—of the frame, the portrayal, the coloring. It is almost unbelievable that creative power can reach this degree of intensity with no more ingredients than empty spaces, limiting outlines which encompass the infinite, early lights of dawn, nothings of pre- and of post-existence, fleeting, yet nevertheless eternal, instants.

Guillén's poetry is integrated by a succession of "astonishments" before a world which the poet always contemplates as though in an initial moment, at the beginning of existence. In the 20 lines of "Niño" the child and the world in which he is seen are both children: "An instant without history, obstinately peopled with myths among things: sea alone with its birds." For most poets the world is there, given, present in its primary elements, though indeed these can be combined later in an infinite number of ways. But Guillén shows surprise before something which is not yet completely world, which is not yet experience already created around about him; he stands at the point of intersection between the creative intent and the act of creation, that is to say, at "wild surmise" between nothing and being.

This is difficult poetry, although clear once the reader has grasped its dense meaning. Sequence is obtained through effective chords and cadences, as in a language in which modulations of tone replace stress. We are far removed from the surrealistic seismograph that will register the obscure chaos in the subterranean conscience.

See: Andrenio (E. Gómez de Baquero), Pen Club: Los poetas (1929), pp. 109-114; P. Salinas, Literatura española siglo XX (1941), pp. 263-277; Frances Avery Pleak, The Poetry of Jorge Guillén (1942).

A. C.

Guilloux, Louis (1899–, French novelist), was born in Saint-Brieuc, Brittany, of poor working-class parents. From childhood he was connected with socialism: his father was a leading member of the Socialist Party in Saint-Brieuc, and Guilloux's first position was that of secretary to Augustin Hamon, the socialist, sociologist, and translator of Shaw. The work of Gorky and Romain Rolland (qq.v.) had a great influence on him, Guilloux says; and to this must be added the impression made by the philosopher Georges Palante, whose pupil he was at the lycée at Saint-Brieuc.

After working on various Parisian newspapers, Guilloux began to write seriously about 1925. His early books, La Maison du peuple (1927), Compagnons (1931), and Hyménée (1932), written in a deliberately simple style and drawing strongly on his early memories of working-class life, can be best described as mystical literature, the expression of the dreams of the pre-war socialist movement, tender, tragic, pervaded by a somewhat inarticulate love for humanity. Le Sang noir (1935; Eng. tr., Bitter Victory, 1936), his most important work, revealed a new power. This massive, closely packed story of the last day in the life of Merlin, a teacher in an obscure provincial lycée, is in one sense an epitome of modern European history. The year is 1917, the soldiers are revolting, the professional patriots of the town are declaiming empty phrases; in the eyes of the intellectual nihilist, Merlin, the town, France, all modern civilization is an obscene, meaningless joke. Yet Merlin himself is made equally impotent by conflicting ideals. Attacking society and the bourgeoisie, he still stores away his money in securities and real estate; believing in nothing, he commits suicide because he feels he has lost his "honor." The one faint ray of hope expressed is Guilloux's rather indefinite suggestion that some of the younger generation, Merlin's pupils, seeing the hollowness in him as well as in the society which surrounds him, will be able to avoid his errors and to carry his confused and tragic negation on into something positive. What this positive position is to be Guilloux does not say, but from his early work and his articles up until the Second World War in Ce Soir and André Chamson's leftist weekly Vendredi, it is clear that for him the solution is to be found in the political and economic liberation of the working class.

See: Frédéric Lefèvre, "Une Heure avec M. Louis Guilloux, romancier," Nouvelles litté- raires, December 21, 1935; Eleanor Clark, "Death of a Thinker: A Note on the French Novel, 1925–40," Kenyon Review, III (1941), 322–334.

C. W., Jr.

Guimerà, Angel (1849–1924, Catalan playwright, orator, and poet), was born in Santa Cruz de Tenerife, Canary Islands, of a Catalan father. At the age of seven he went with his parents to Catalonia and received his first impressions of the landscape of the Bajo Penedés, rich in memories of the passage of the Romans. He studied in Barcelona and returned to his father's village, El Vendrell, to aid his family in the wine business. But he was really interested only in the cultivation of literature and after 1872 lived in Barcelona, since he considered this the most suitable place in which to make himself known in the field of letters. He was an assiduous competitor in the poetic contests called Jocs Florals; in 1877 he was named mestre en gai saber (master troubadour) upon winning the three prizes necessary to obtain this title. He was a frequent collaborator on the newspaper Renaixença, converted to a magazine by him and other literary men; from 1872 he was the editor of the publication. In 1874 he identified himself with the patriotic organization Jove Catalunya and in 1895, in a memorable presidential speech, in Catalan, he enthroned this language in the Ateneo. Never playing party politics, he dedicated his efforts to preaching the good news of the renaissance of the Catalan soul, with the breadth of vision shared by all those identified with the Renaixença movement. His patriotic speeches are collected in Cants a la pàtria (1906; Songs to the Fatherland). Some of his verse had been gathered in Poesies (1887); here already he shows himself to be an exalted patriot and employs an energetic language, replete with brusque images and outlines. Segon llibre de poesies, which appeared in 1920, is very inferior to the first volume of poems.

For the theatre Guimerà wrote Gala Placidia (1879), Judith de Welp (1883), and El fill del mar (1886; The Son of the Sea), which already reveal a tragic dramatist of full stature. Mar i cel (1888; Sea and Sky) has the energy of the great German romantic dramatists, but the psychological verisimilitude of the characters and the humanness and naturalness of the situations elevated it beyond any school. There follow Rei i monjo (1890; King and Monk); L'ànima morta (1892; The Dead Soul); and Les monges de Sant Aymant (1895; The Monks of Sant Aymant), based on the legend of Count Arnau, a sort of Don Juan, Faust, and Satan rolled into one, whose memory is alive in all Catalonia. La boja (1890; The Insane Woman) inaugurates his modern dramas, which include: En pòlvora (In Gunpowder); Maria Rosa (1894); La festa del blat (1896; The Wheat Festival); and Terra baixa (1896; Eng. tr., Marta of the Lowlands, 1914), a very original play based on the contrast between the purity of the people of the high mountain region and the abject passions which animate those who live in the flatlands. La farsa (1899; The Farce), La filla del mar (1899; The Daughter of the Sea), La pecadora (1902; The Sinner), and others follow. In his final period he cultivated a theatre based on very abstract ideas and of relatively slight value. His sainetes, La sala d'espera (1890; The Waiting Room) and La baldirona, still appear occasionally on the Catalan stage. Guimerà's tragedies and dramas were translated into Portuguese, German, Italian, Czech, Dutch, Russian, Spanish, English. Several attempts were made to set his dramas to music, including the German Tiefland, based on Terra Baixa, with music by D'Albert; La Catalane, with music by the French master Leborne; Euda d'Uriach, based on Les monges de Sant Aymant, in collaboration with the Catalan composer Vives. Guimerà, genial and irregular, has been criticized frequently as guilty of bad taste. This is occasionally true of both his poetry and plays, but many of his creations are magnificent, and his work is notable for imaginative quality—as well as for a certain predilection for macabre ideas and the presentation of hallucinations. He saw his country submerged, resigned, unaware of its great racial heritage; he devoted all of his life—in literary works, in speeches, in poems—to the task of shaking off its lethargic conformity. He is not only one of the most representative but also one of the noblest men among the instigators of the great movement of revival, the Renaixença. As man and artist he never felt that he was a member of a learned caste separate from the people. He died the 18th of July, 1924, the object of the adoration of his compatriots, although opposed until the end of his life by certain literary intellectuals out of touch with the national struggle.

See: J. Prepatx, La Renaissance des lettres catalanes (1883); J. Yxart, prologue, in Guimerà, Poesies (1887); J. L. Pagano, Attraverso la Spagna literaria (1902); M. de Montoliu, Estudis de literatura catalana (1912); A.

Rovita i Virgili, "Angel Guimerà," Revista de Catalunya (Barcelona), August, 1924.

F. de P.

Guitry, Sacha (1885–, French actor and dramatist), son of the famous actor Lucien Guitry, was born at Saint Petersburg (Leningrad). A skillful, versatile artist, he is perhaps the best-known actor on the French stage of recent times. His reputation abroad, where he has played in many countries, is equally great. His more successful roles, most of which he has written and created himself, have been in that light, vivacious comedy so typical of the modern French stage. Following in the tradition of Molière, with whom some of his more ardent admirers have compared him, he has used to good account his extensive knowledge of acting and stagecraft. In the composition of more than a hundred plays, he frankly sets out to amuse and entertain. Fantastic plots and impossible situations are redeemed by sparkling, witty dialogue and excellent dramatic construction. Brilliant rather than profound, he views his fellow men realistically rather than ideally. He has no illusions as to the fundamental egotism of mankind. His frankness and audacity have made him a favorite even with such men as Anatole France, Bergson, Octave Mirbeau, and Tristan Bernard (qq.v.), and many other similar and equally important writers have expressed their admiration for him. George Bernard Shaw, in a presentation copy of his Saint Joan, wrote: "To Sacha Guitry, who, like myself, does not write in chains and who, indeed, should have written this play."

His earlier plays, such as Nono (1905), L'illusionniste (1921), and L'Amour masqué (1923), are frequently nothing more than brilliant improvisations. In Le Veilleur de nuit (1911) a kindhearted professor refuses to be jealous of his mistress's second lover and in the end finally wins the sympathy of the audience and embarrasses the guilty couple by his generous attitude. La Prise de Berg-op-Zoom (1912), in spite of its military title, turns out to be merely a sprightly comedy of gay-hearted philandering. Jean, ou l'Irresistible Vocation du fils Mondoucet (1912) shows the stage aspirations of the son of a good bourgeois who is horrified at his son's infatuation with the theatre and finally at the son's appearance in a kingly role. Later Guitry turned to more serious subjects and inaugurated a series of dramatic biographies, such as Jean de la Fontaine (1916), Deburau (1918), Pasteur (1919), and Mozart (1925). In each case Guitry has admirably caught the spirit of the titular personage in a number of interesting but detached scenes. Le Comédien (1921) and the autobiographical Un Sujet de roman (1923) take us to the backstage he knows so well. Mariette (1928), with its charming background of the Second Empire, is a good example of his operettas.

He has also collaborated with A. Willemetz in several typical Parisian revues. In more recent years he has become even better known throughout the world by his successes both as director and as actor in the cinema. Les Perles de la couronne and Le Roman d'un tricheur are typical of his films. In his autobiography, Souvenirs (1935), he has given us an amusing account of his life. Both on and off the stage he has earned the reputation of a wit, and his private life as well as his public has entertained France.

J. F. M.

Gullberg, Hjalmar (1898–, Swedish poet and translator of the Greek classics), born in Lund, is among the more sober, intellectual, and disillusioned of contemporary Swedish poets, though his work is not without a strain of deep personal pathos. Aside from his poetic production he has made magnificent translations of Euripides (Hippolytus, 1930; Medea, 1931; Alcestis, 1933) and Sophocles (Antigone, 1935) and has collaborated with Ivar Harrie in the translation of Aristophanes (The Birds, 1928; Lysistrata, 1932) as well as Calderón (Casa con dos puertas mala es de guardar, 1934). As a poet Gullberg leaves on a first reading a rather confused impression, partly because of his complex, frequently paradoxical style, partly because his subtle, probing intellectual temperament is little conducive to sharply expressive perspectives or to obvious forms of intellectual or spiritual confessions. That which is most characteristic of both the form and the content of the bulk of his early verse—I en främmande stad (1927; In a Strange City), Sonat (1929; Sonata), Andliga övningar (1932; Spiritual Exercises), Kärlek i tjugonde seklet (1933; Love in the 20th Century), and Ensamstående bildad herre (1935; Unattached Cultured Gentleman)—is a precarious poetic balance between the ironic-grotesque and the elevated, between the modernity of an age of jazz and sensationalism and the past of a sober classical and humanistic tradition. In form, Gullberg's early verse combines with amazing virtuosity modern slang and banal journalese with echoes of the Bible and of classical drama; in content, his poetry frequently employs the most obvious and trivial of motifs from everyday life as the point of departure for an interpretation of the highest spiritual values. He looks upon the contemporary scene in general with complete disillusionment, with a pessimism which falls short of the most devastating cynicism only because the poet is, in the last analysis, seeking values above and beyond this life. The religious-metaphysical strain has always been more or less apparent in Gullberg's work, in the earliest work in rather baffling and perhaps largely superficial forms, later in somewhat more tangible, clearly defined outlines, and finally (particularly in Att övervinna världen, 1937, To Conquer the World) in a wholly elevated and sublime form of lyrical expression which is concerned with purely absolute, nameless, and all but indefinable values beyond both the world of the senses and of thought. In this last phase of Gullberg's development he joins hands with Vilhelm Ekelund (q.v.), whose long and restless search for the World of the Absolute beyond the ken of human thought has gained for him the admiration of his countrymen even though it has necessarily left him all but spiritually isolated in the rarified regions of the spirit where the heroic ideal has inevitably led him.

See: S. Ahlgren, "Teknik och poesi: en studie i Hjalmar Gullbergs diktning," Bonniers litterära magasin, VII (1938), 26–31.

A. G.

Gumilyov, Nikolai Stepanovich (1886–1921, Russian poet, essayist, short-story writer, and translator), born in Kronstadt into the family of a navy physician, spent his childhood in Tsarskoye Selo. In 1895 he entered the Gurevich Gymnasium in St. Petersburg; several years later the family moved to Tiflis, where Gumilyov became interested in radical political activities. He returned to Tsarskoye Selo in 1903, however, and entered the Gymnasium; here, under the guidance of its principal, I. F. Annenski (q.v.), he became interested in Nietzsche (q.v.) and symbolism and soon changed his political views. After finishing at the Gymnasium, Gumilyov entered the historico-philological faculty of the University of St. Petersburg and on completing the course in 1906 went to Paris, where he attended lectures at the Sorbonne. While there he published a nonperiodical miscellany, Sirius. He traveled extensively, visiting France, Italy, Germany (1906–1912), Egypt (1907), and Abyssinia (1909–1910), where he collected folk songs. In 1908 Gumilyov returned to Tsarskoye Selo once more and soon made fast friends with Annenski and later with Vyacheslav Ivanov (q.v.), under whose guidance he organized the Academy of Verse, which eventually became the Society of Enthusiasts of the Artistic Word. With the founding of the periodical Apollo (1909–1917), Gumilyov became one of its leading spirits and was soon the acknowledged leader of the "Acmeist" school of poetry centering about the Apollo. In 1910 he married A. A. Gorenko (see Akhmatova, Anna).

Gumilyov's interest in the ethnography of exotic lands continued to absorb him. In 1913 he headed a scientific expedition to Somaliland for the Museum of Anthropology and Ethnography. With the outbreak of war in 1914 Gumilyov volunteered for army service and went to the front as an officer; here he was twice awarded the cross of St. George for bravery. In the spring of 1917 he was dispatched to Paris by the Provisional Government. He returned to Russia in 1918 and became a member of the editorial board of the "Universal Literature" publications. From 1919 to 1921 he lectured in various studios ("Proletarian Culture," "Baltic Fleet," "Translations") and at the Institute of the Living Word; he also headed the Third Poet Workshop. In June of 1921 he went to Sevastopol. He was accused of complicity in the Tagantsev conspiracy, found guilty, and on August 25, 1921, executed by a firing squad.

Although Gumilyov began his literary career as a disciple of symbolism, he eventually rebelled and led the revolt against its theories. By 1912, together with Gorodetski, he had gained an extensive following among the poets who wished to establish the tangible world, with all its sounds, scents, and colors, as a legitimate province of poetry. To this purpose Gumilyov organized these "Acmeist" poets into a Poet Workshop. The Acmeists countered the mysticism, vagueness, abstractness, and diffusiveness of the symbolists with realism, precision, concreteness, and laconism of expression. Gumilyov and other leading exponents of Acmeism tremendously influenced the verse technique of many of the Leningrad poets.

Gumilyov's first published poem appeared in 1902 in a Tiflis daily. His first book of verse, Put konkvistadorov (The Path of the Conquistadors), was published in 1905 and reflected his predilection for what is exotic, romantic, foreign. His subsequent books, Romanticheskiye tsvety (1908; Romantic Flowers); Zhemchuga (1910; Pearls), Chuzhoje nebo (1912; Foreign Skies), Kolchan (1916; The Quiver), Kostyor (1918; The Campfire), Ditya Allakha (1918; Child of Allah), Shatyor (1921; The Tent), show this same trait and often contain his own observations made during his many travels. His African scenes and landscapes became famous in Russian poetry. In his last book, Ognenny stolp (1921; The Pillar of Flame), Gumilyov returns to the mystical tradition of symbolism, vividly reflected in his poem "Zabludivshisya tramvai" (The Strayed Trolley). His translations include poems of Théophile Gautier, Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, a book of Babylonian epics and one of French folk songs. His critical essays are contained in the volume Pisma o russkoi poezii (1923; Letters on Russian Poetry).

See: G. Ivanov, "O poezii Gumilyova," Letopis doma literatorov, Vol. I (1921); V. Sayanov, "N. Gumilyov," Na literaturnom postu, 1927, Nos. 17–18.

O. M.

Gunnarsson, Gunnar (1889–, Icelandic novelist, dramatist, and poet), was born at Valbjófsstaður in Fljótssdalur, East Iceland. His father came of a long line of parsons and sturdy farmers, his mother was the daughter of a picturesque farmer-fisherman on the coast. The boy grew up with his family in Fljótssdalur and Vopnafjörður until 1907, when he went to Denmark to seek his fortune. Though he had little schooling, he worked steadily towards the goal of becoming a writer. He joined the small group of Icelandic writers in Copenhagen who aspired to write in Danish in order to win a wider public, but he was out of tune with their Bohemian life and their Nietzschean aspirations. Yet he shared with them the romantic view of their faraway homeland, and his first work, Borgslægtens Historie (4 vols., 1912–1914; Eng. tr. Guest the One-eyed, 1920), became an Icelandic family saga. It contained the beautiful legend of Guest the One-eyed and won instant popularity throughout Scandinavia. During the First World War, Gunnarsson struggled bravely, in a series of novels (Livets Strand, 1915, The Shore of Life; Varg i Veum, 1916, The Outcast; and Salige er de Enfoldige, 1920, Eng. tr., Seven Days' Darkness, 1930), to find meaning in a war-mad world. In part these novels may have represented his growing pains during the difficult development from the simple faith of his fathers to his own equally simple but newborn faith in the Icelandic race and its immortality; in part he was undoubtedly influenced by the expressionistic tendencies of the time (Strindberg, q.v.).

His new faith finds unobtrusive expression in studies of his nation's history and his own past. Edbroðre (1918; Eng. tr., The Sworn Brothers, 1920), about the first settlers in Iceland, was the first of a planned series of 12 novels that was to depict on a broad canvas the fate of his people. Six more of these historical novels have appeared, the last being Graamand (1936; Gray Man), on a subject from Sturlunga saga. The story of Jón Arason (1930), last Catholic bishop of Iceland, and the phantasy Vikivaki (1932; Vigil Dancing) also belong to this class. But already in the 1920's Gunnarsson had found time to write the story of his own life in Kirken paa Bjerget (5 vols., 1924-1928, The Church on the Mountain; Eng. tr. of Vols I-III, Ships in the Sky, 1938, and The Night and the Dream, 1938). In this great work burns the quiet flame of Gunnarsson's admiration for his heroes in homespun. Here is also eloquent testimony to Gunnarsson's love of the soil, if the rocky coasts and stony plains of his homeland may be given such an epithet. At his best Gunnarsson merges land and people in a single vision of humanity's burning bush in the wilderness. With Hamsun and Duun (q.v.) in Norway and Johannes V. Jensen (q.v.) in Denmark, Gunnarsson is one of the great interpreters of the common people of the North. As such he has won a stable reputation in Europe.

In 1938 Gunnarsson went back to his home district to live at Skriðuklaustur in Fljótisdalur. Here he has written his latest work, Heiðaharmur (1940; The Heath Laments), in elegant Icelandic despite his long Danish exile. Apart from the novels he has also written several volumes of short stories, plays, and poetry.

See: K. Elfelt, Gunnar Gunnarsson (1927); S. Einarsson, "Gunnar Gunnarsson," Skirnir, CXII (1938), 138-160, and in Jón Bjarnason Academy Year Book (1940), pp. 9-24; H. de Boor, "Gunnar Gunnarsson," Nordische Stimmen, IX (1939), 180-183.

S. E.

Günther, Agnes (née Breuning, 1863-1911, German novelist), was born in Stuttgart and died in Marburg; she was the wife of the professor of theology Rudolf Günther. Her one novel, Die Heilige und ihr Narr (1913), published posthumously, is a veritable kitchen midden of all the leitmotifs, stage properties, and scénic effects of romanticism unrestrained. The life of the "saint" and her "fool," who appear in the novel only as ghosts, is the subject of the fragment Von der Hexe, die eine Heilige war. For a few years the novel topped the list of best sellers and then disappeared.

See: K. J. Friedrich, Die Heilige: Erinnerungen an Agnes Günther, 2d ed., (1918).

J. F. G.

Gyulai, Pál (1826-1909, Hungarian critic, story writer, and poet), was born in Kolozsvár and died in Budapest. His father was a government clerk. As a young man Gyulai hesitated between studying law and Calvinistic theology. His solution was to study both. But his real aspirations were literary. He taught in various secondary schools, was a tutor in aristocratic homes, and finally went to Budapest where he became acquainted with the younger writers. In 1858 he married Mária Szendrey, sister of the wife of Sándor Petöfi, Hungary's great lyric poet. His wife died in 1866. Gyulai spent about a year abroad, mostly in Germany and in France, and upon his return to his native land centered his activities exclusively on literature. He assisted in the publication of several literary periodicals, but his critical vigilance was especially felt when he edited Budapesti Szemle (Budapest Review), one of the most scholarly literary publications Hungary ever had. Gyulai was a militant critic; his persistent criticism of Móricz Jókai (q.v.), the most popular novelist of his time, implied the courage to defy public opinion without fear. Sometimes his righteousness made him seem unpleasant but never to such an extent as to interfere with his prestige. His poems, influenced by Byron and Arany (q.v.), reveal him as a minor creator; his stories were more original; it was his critical work that revealed the essence of his nature. His nation respected him: rich and poor knew that he had dedicated his life to Hungarian culture and that his recognition was well merited. He was a member of the Hungarian Scientific Academy, president of the Kisfaludy Társaság (Kisfaludy Society), professor of Hungarian literature at the University of Budapest, a member of the House of Magnates. His collected works appeared in 1902.

There is a resemblance between Gyulai's sense of values and that of the Victorian era in English literature. The complacency of the age in moral matters was less felt in Hungary than in England only because Hungary's social, political, and economic position was less favorable and less secure. Yet the guidance that critics were expected to offer to writers and readers had to be moral, and it was assumed that the social structure was more or less stable. However, it speaks for Gyulai's critical intelligence and desire for impartiality that he never ignored world literature and that he sought an understanding of its organic relationship to Hungarian literature. He allowed, as it were, Western critical ideas to descend upon his spirit and tried to apply them to the creative works of Hungarian writers and poets. But the real source of his work was Hungarian. He was a nationalist, reluctant to identify nationalism with slogans and verbal flag-waving. In such patriotic poems as "Hadmagy uram" (My Lieutenant), in such romantic poems as "Éji látogatás" (Night Visit—in which mother love is glorified), in such stories as "Egy régi udvarház utolsó gazdája" (The Last Owner of the Old Homestead), one senses the romantic, emotional intercourse between national and universal human issues. His elegies, his satirical poems and stories, though greatly prized by his contemporaries, are only slightly above the average of similar works written at that time; most of them probably would have been forgotten without Gyulai's critical reputation. In fact, in their form they are romantic or semi-romantic crumbs of a pre-Victorian age; in their ideas they are a mixture not only of nationalism and humanitarianism, but of puritanism, sentimentalism, and idealism. Gyulai, like many other critics of world literature, served the interests of literature more forcefully in the realm of criticism than in that of creative imagination.

As a critic he had no equal among his contemporaries. His observations were original, his analytical intelligence genuine, his intuitive and acquired knowledge unusual. He wrote political and literary essays; he collected Transylvanian (Székely) folk songs and ballads; he wrote monographs about Arany, Petőfi, Vörösmarty, Katona, Eötvös, and other outstanding Hungarian writers and poets; he participated in critical activities that before him seemed outside the jurisdiction of Hungarian literary critics; indeed through his fruitful criticisms other literary critics were encouraged to remain true to their own aesthetic sensibilities. His best critical essays were published under the title Bírálatok és kritikai dolgozatok (1854; Criticisms and Critical Essays). Gyulai objected to cleverness, to verbosity, to eccentricity, to seeming modernity. He was conservative in a noble sense, interested in conserving values that deserved to remain precious to a nation's culture. He was the professional critic with insight; this made him intolerant of catchwords and somewhat suspicious about the exhibitionistic propaganda of "progress." He may have been overcautious at times when a more sympathetic understanding of a new writer would have justified a freer approach to his work. Yet even as an old man he did not close his eyes to the compelling and strange poetic personality of Ady (q.v.); this shows that as a critic he recognized ability even when it did not meet his taste.

See: S. Galamb, Gyulai Pál novellái (1919–1922); T. Dóczy, "Gyulai Pál kritikai elve," Nyugat (1922); Gy. Mitrovics, Gyulai Pál esztetikája (1926).

J. R.

H

Hagalín, Guðmundur G. (1898–, Icelandic novelist, poet, and playwright), was born at Lokinhamrar in Vestfirðir, of robust farmer-fisherman stock. He soon determined to become a writer and after a brief attendance at school acted as editor of several ephemeral newspapers, thus having an opportunity to indulge in his desire to write. He visited Norway in 1925–1927. In 1930 he became a librarian in Ísafjörður in his home district and has remained there ever since.

Hagalín made his start in the lyric and national romantic period of the early 1920's. Soon he found his field, however, in short stories and novels describing with humor and gusto the life of the fishermen of Vestfirðir. Sometimes he contrasted the old generation with the new, to the latter's detriment. After 1930 Hagalín, like Laxness (q.v.), gave up the classical style of his early works for one more redolent of the earth and sea. In rough and robust dialect, assumed in order to depict the primitive characters close to the soil, he has written several short stories and the novels Kriustrún í Hamravík (1933) and Sturla í Vogum (2 vols., 1938). The first pictures an old woman in an isolated cottage facing the Arctic, a widow poor yet perfectly content and self-contained, fearing neither God nor man, a master of her small world. The second describes a rugged, individualistic farmer in his development towards a social consciousness that finds outlet in practical cooperation with his fellow men. Hagalín has also written two adventure biographies of a shark fisherman and a skipper.

See: S. Einarsson, "Guðmundur Gíslason Hagalín," in Íðunn, XVIII (1934), 65–88.

S. E.

Halbe, Max (1865–1945, German dramatist and novelist), was born in northeastern Germany near Danzig, in a district where German and Polish racial elements have intermingled for centuries. Growing estrangement between his parents and social ostracism which their Protestant neighbors imposed upon them for being Catholics cast early shadows upon his youth. From 1883 to 1888 he studied first law, then languages and history at the universities of Heidelberg, Berlin, and Munich. In Berlin he became acquainted with Gerhart Hauptmann (q.v.) and other naturalistic writers, and their influence, together with that of Ibsen (q.v.), is apparent in his first dramatic attempts. In the play Eisgang (1892) a social and psychological problem is pictured against the background of a great natural panorama in his homeland. Encouraged by the success of this play, Halbe wrote the drama which was to become his only lasting contribution to German letters, Jugend (1893; Eng. tr., When Love Is Young, 1904). The new element was the psychology of adolescence: two young people, carried away by their love to a fateful end, express their feelings in highly poetical language. Again the scene was laid in the Polish-German borderland. The performance of the play was given an enthusiastic reception. From then on, however, Halbe's rich dramatic output was a series of bad failures alternating with mild successes. Mutter Erde (1897; Eng. tr., Mother Earth, 1913-1915), Haus Rosenhagen (1901; Eng. tr., The Rosenhagens, 1910), and Der Strom (New York, 1903; Berlin, 1904) are perhaps the only plays that deserve to be saved from oblivion. In 1895, after a short stay in Switzerland, Halbe went to Munich, which was to become his second home. There he joined the groups of writers who made the Bavarian capital a center of literary activity at about the turn of the century. He was particularly intimate with Frank Wedekind and Graf von Keyserling (qq.v.). His theatrical ventures, such as an "Intimate Theatre for Dramatic Experiments" and, in 1899, a "People's Theatre," were rather short-lived. By 1908 Halbe reached the end of his first period. After some sad failures among his plays, he turned to writing fiction which, with the rural novelette Frau Meseck (1897), had brought him some success earlier in his career. His two novels, Die Tat des Dietrich Stobäus (1910) and Jo (1917), are written with a surprising mastery of style and form strangely absent from the historical dramas he wrote during the same period. The publication of his Gesammelte Werke (1917-1923) marked the conclusion of Halbe's second period. His later Jahrhundertwende: Geschichte meines Lebens, 1893-1914 (1935) has significance for its picture of naturalism.

Halbe belongs to those artists who, after initial successes, do not live up to expectation. The reason for his failure is to be seen in a lack of inner balance. Soergel calls him "a naturalist with the soul of a romanticist." In fact, his lyrical and moody tendencies though effectively supporting the dramatic development in Jugend tend in many other plays to slow down the action and to divert attention from the main theme. The background of nature is rarely sufficiently integrated with the action and the characters, nor does the racial conflict between Germans and Poles ever attain dramatic significance. His contemplative mood and the plastic descriptions of the landscape stand him in good stead in his prose writings. Yet the great epic of his homeland, West Prussia, which Germans expected of him at the time of its greatest ethnological and territorial tribulations never came from his pen. As a result of his boyhood experiences, Halbe could have been a rebel and a writer of social drama. But his characters only speak about the social conflict, and compared with Wedekind's Frühlings Erwachen (1891), his Jugend breathes the sad, mellow air of fall. Oddly enough, Halbe tried to give vent to his inner conflicts in the form of comedies, all of which were failures simply because they lack humor. Similarly, his historical plays, e.g., Das wahre Gesicht (1907), never succeed in reviving the past and suffer from baroque language and psychological twists. In an introductory poem to his Gesammelte Werke Halbe pictures himself as a "wanderer, fighter, and searcher." He never arrived at his goal, and to this day Alfred Kerr's benevolent judgment of him still stands: "What characterizes Halbe is the fact that he never quite succeeded."

See: A. Kerr, Die Welt im Drama, I (1917), 163-179; H. von Hülsen, "Max Halbe," Der Türmer, XXVIII (1925), 56-61; A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 19. Auflage (1928), pp. 394-400.

W. N.

Hálek, Vítězslav (1835-1874, Czech poet, novelist, and dramatist), was born in Dolíněk near Mělník (north of Prague), became a journalist, made two trips to Slovakia and to the Balkans and Turkey, and died in Prague. Hálek was at first a romantic poet in the wake of Byron and Heine and in his later work moved towards realism. Večerní písně (1858; Evening Songs), a sentimental imitation of Heine, established his local fame as a lyric poet, but his best work is V přírodě (1872-1874; In Nature), which belongs to his last years. These are fine descriptive poems full of a rather naïve nature worship. His epical poetry shows a similar evolution towards realism: from Alfred (1856), an imitation of Byron's stories, through different Balkan legends, to a Slovak idyl, Děvče z Tater (1871; The Girl from the Tatra Mountains), and Pohádky z naší vesnice (1874; Tales from Our Village), which versify little anecdotes and genre pictures of peasant life with skill and charm. His prose also moved away from conventional romanticism to sensitive studies of real social problems of the Czech countryside. Na statku a v chaloupce (1871; In the Manor House and in the Cottage) and Pod pustým kopcem (1874; Under the Bare Hill) show already traces of his reading of Turgenev (q.v.). His dramas, pseudo-Shakespearean history plays, are of little value. Hálek's position in his own time was very considerable, but his prestige declined sharply after his work was attacked by the poet Machar (q.v.) in 1894. Recently his historical importance and genuine though narrow talent have again been appreciated.

See: J. S. Machar, Knihy feuilletonů, Vol. II (1902); L. Čech, Literatura česká 19. století, Vol. III (1907); J. Mukařovský, "Vítězslav Hálek," Slovo a slovesnost, I (1935), 73-87.

R. W.

Hallström, Per (1866-, Swedish poet, dramatist, and short-story writer), was born in Stockholm and trained as a scientist. He spent a few years abroad, working as a chemist in London and in Chicago, before settling down in his own country and turning definitely to literature. Hallström made his debut as a lyric poet in 1891, but soon found his perfect medium in the short story. His novel, En gammal historia (1895; An Old Tale), a sad and graceful idyl of the late 18th century in Sweden, is in fact an expanded short story. He has also essayed the drama, and his comedy Erotikon (1908; Eroticism), an attack on the modern cult of free love, was a decided success. A Shakespearean type of play, Greven av Antwerpen (1899; The Count of Antwerp), was better received by the critics than by the public of the theatre. Hallström has more recently been working on a new translation of Shakespeare into Swedish. For some years he has been secretary of the Swedish Academy, to which he was elected in 1908, and chairman of the committee for awarding the Nobel prize in literature.

It is, as suggested, upon his collections of short stories, particularly those in such volumes as Purpur (1895; Purple) and Thanatos (1900; Death), that Hallström's reputation is most securely based. His type is as far as possible removed from that of his contemporary, Hjalmar Söderberg (q.v.); he employs the generous and somehow epic manner of Balzac rather than the crisper idiom of Maupassant (q.v.). There is something almost monumental in a Hallström story. "The Falcon," which is set in the Middle Ages, gives a complete picture of the life of certain French nobles, their pride, their cruelty. In "A Florentine Fantasy" is the glow of the Italian Renaissance. "Out of the Dark" presents the mysterious figure of a young girl suddenly brought at midnight into a sophisticated group of modern Swedish artists. Each of these stories is arresting, unforgettable.

There is an underlying philosophy in Hallström's stories. Combined with a strong sense of beauty are a deep pity and a faith in human ideals and character. It is this which gives a peculiar nobility to his art. He is often attracted to the theme of death, which he treats much in the manner of Shakespeare, as not the end but the fulfillment of life. Hallström is not an author likely to appeal to the popular taste of any time, but it is doubtful whether any modern Swedish prose master, not even excepting Verner von Heidenstam (q.v.), has a more valid claim on the recognition of posterity.

See: J. Mortensen, Från Röda rummet till sekelskiftet (1919); Hallström, Selected Short Stories, tr. by F. J. Fielden (1922); C. W. Stork, tr., Modern Swedish Masterpieces (1923); H. A. Larsen, ed., Sweden's Best Stories (1928); G. Bach, The History of the Scandinavian Literatures, ed. by Frederika Blankner (1938).

C. W. S.

Hamp, Pierre (pseud. of Pierre Bourillon, 1876-, French novelist and sociologist), born at Nice, was the son of a chef-cuisinier who regarded his art as equal in dignity to any profession—an authentic descendant of the legendary and immortal Vatel. Pierre was brought up in this tradition. He went to Paris for an apprenticeship as pastry cook and chef and was then employed at the Savoy in London and at a hotel in Brighton. Having saved some money, he returned to France, where he began to acquire an education at the then flourishing Université Populaire. His life up to the time when he left the kitchen is told in his capital little book, Mes Métiers (1931). It was in England that he had begun to realize the appalling, not to say humiliating, conditions that a youth of his social stratum had to endure, however cheerfully, and to contrast all this with the dignity attached to the condition of the English workingman. Although he was later completely identified with the world of letters and of general ideas, he never disowned his past, saying he would have liked to be known as Frère Hamp, religieux du travail, and continuing to advocate honor for servants and workingmen.

Hamp is one of the talented writers of the time who found their way into print through Péguy (q.v.) and the Cahiers de la quinzaine. He had first been encouraged to take to his pen and become the "narrator for labor" by Paul Desjardins (q.v.), author of Le Devoir présent and the organizer of the meetings of Pontigny (a literary and social forum, continued during the Second World War at Mount Holyoke College in New England by French scholars in exile). Hamp relates these beginnings in another autobiographical book, Il faut que vous naissiez de nouveau (1936), a sequel to Mes Métiers. The great social achievement in his view would be happiness for the worker. The series of his books published under the general, and very relevant, title La Peine des hommes shows how shockingly distant from this goal we now are. The best known of this dramatic series are Marée fraîche (1908), Vin de Champagne (1909), Le Rail (1912), Cantique des Cantiques (1922; on making perfumery), Le Lin (1922; on the feminine dress industry), La Laine (1931), Mineurs et métiers de fer (1932).

For the most part Hamp lets facts speak for themselves; the human lesson is clear enough. Sometimes he cannot refrain from sounding a personal note of indignation or of hope, as in La Victoire mécanicienne (1920; partly on conditions in the great markets of Paris) or in L'Enquête (1914; an investigation into the starvation wages of the textile workers of Lille).

Hamp's Trilogie de guerre (Le Travail invincible, 1918; Les Métiers blessés, 1919; La Victoire mécanicienne), contains a formidable indictment of the German method of systematic destruction of the industries of France during the First World War, a destruction which to Hamp betrays more than anything else the sheer stupidity on the part of the leaders of Germany—since the cooperation of French and German industry could have done wonders for the prosperity of continental Europe. Similar ideas pervade a series called Gens (Eng. tr., People, 1921), with the following tableaux: S.A.R. Philippe d'Orléans, L'Epidémie (on the Goncourt Academy), Monsieur Curieux, Mlle Moloch, Vieille Histoire.

Hamp has also written a number of plays, Prologue pour une pièce sans cocu, La Maison avant tout (a four-act play first published in the Petite Illustration in 1923), La Campagne, Monsieur l'Administrateur, Madame la Guerre.

The style of Hamp is often pungent because of its very sobriety. His documentation seems faultless and his originality cannot be denied.

See: A. Beaunier, "Les Idées de Pierre Hamp," Revue des deux mondes, April 1, 1923, pp. 689-701; T. W. Bussom, "Pierre Hamp, Prophet of the French Proletariat," South Atlantic Quarterly, XXVII (1928), 376-390.

A. Sz.

Hamsun, Knut (1859-, Norwegian novelist), is one of the most sharply developed literary personalities in modern Scandinavia. Most of his work, in fact all of his best work, is a direct expression of a highly individualized personality. This accounts for the pulsing intimacy of his work, for its freshness and vigor, its inexhaustible narrative inventiveness, its intensely personal lyric quality, and its impatience with anything that places bonds upon the free development of purely individual values in human life. The figures from Hamsun's generation who have had the greatest significance for him are Strindberg, Nietzsche, and Björnson (qq.v.)—Strindberg and Nietzsche because of their passionate, revolutionary individualism, Björnson because of his rich natural vitality and his highly personal literary style. Björnson's almost promiscuous social-mindedness, on the other hand, has always been to Hamsun something to be deprecated. As the mouthpiece for his own highly developed individualism Hamsun has created as the central figure in many of his novels the antisocial vagabond type he calls en tilvaerelsens udlanding (an outcast from society). Though some of the components of this character type are drawn from the novelist's Strindberg-Nietzsche enthusiasms, Hamsun's early experience of life, with its restless shifts of scene and occupation, suggests the more immediate autobiographical origins of the recurrent vagabond type in his work.

Hamsun was born in the mountain valley of Gudbrandsdal in central Norway, his parents on both sides being of very old peasant stock. When scarcely three years old, he moved with his parents to Hamarøy in the Far North, where he remained until he was 20, except for a year in his early teens in Gudbrandsdalen. At 15 he was again back in the North Country where, for the next five years, he carried on a strenuous wandering existence, being in rapid succession a clerk in a general store, an itinerant merchant, a shoemaker's apprentice, a sheriff's deputy, a schoolteacher, and finally an author in a small local way. At the age of 20 he set out again for more southern parts of Norway, with the intention of establishing himself as a journalist and lecturer. Unsuccessful in these plans, he emigrated in 1882 to America, where he spent some two years at miscellaneous occupations, chiefly in Wisconsin and Minnesota. Finding a semifrontier middle-western United States hardly more appreciative of his talents than the Old World had been, Hamsun returned to Norway in 1884—only to go back to America for another two year period, 1886–1888, during which time he was a streetcar conductor in Chicago, harvest hand in North Dakota, and lecturer on literary and general cultural subjects before small Scandinavian groups in Minneapolis. Though most of his lectures dealt with contemporary European literary figures (Ibsen, Björnson, Strindberg, Lie, Kielland, Garborg, Zola, Dostoevski, Leo Tolstoy, qq.v.), he developed in his farewell appearance in Minneapolis his impressions, almost exclusively negative, of the contemporary American scene, a subject on which he shortly afterwards published the book (Det moderne Amerikas aandsliv, 1889; The Cultural Life of Modern America) that first attracted to him some general Scandinavian attention.

It was, however, with Sult (1890; Eng. tr., Hunger, 1899) that he had his first real literary success. Sult was an amazingly mature novel for one whose literary apprenticeship had been so miscellaneous and on the whole so unpromising as Hamsun's. Objectively conceived and yet starkly intense in its execution, this novel is a study in the strange vagaries of the human mind under the disintegrating stress of physical starvation. In its preoccupation with purely psychological phenomena, Sult represented the young Hamsun's reaction against the current Scandinavian "problem literature" of the 80's. This reaction he further developed in a series of lectures in which he mercilessly satirized the chief Norwegian exponents of this problem literature (Ibsen, Björnson, Lie, and Kielland) and called for a "new literature" whose primary concern would be the individual as such rather than the individual as a mere cog in a piece of social or political machinery. During the two decades following these critical pronouncements, Hamsun wrote almost a score of volumes (including novels and plays as well as one volume of poems), most of which gave direct creative expression to the literary program propounded in his lectures. The plays are prevailingly closet dramas, not easily adapted to the stage. Some of the poems are among the best in Norwegian, particularly the famous tribute to Björnson on his 70th birthday and a number of the nature lyrics.

The novels, 10 in all, contain some of Hamsun's very best work. Of the better novels may be mentioned two early ones, Mysterier (1892; Eng. tr., Mysteries, 1927) and Pan (1894; Eng. tr., 1920), and the later Under höstsjernen (1907; Eng. tr., Under the Autumn Star, in Wanderers, 1922) with its sequel, En vandrers spiller med sordin (1909; Eng. tr., A Wanderer Plays on Muted Strings, in Wanderers, 1922). In Johan Nagel, the central character in Mysterier, we are introduced for the first time in Hamsun's work to the typical Hamsun vagabond figure, a young man, sensitive to nature and to love, highly critical of urban society and the pretenses of "civilization," full of irrational impulses and provocative paradoxes. Thomas Glahn is a parallel figure in Pan, though Glahn is a far less negative character than is Nagel. He is just as antipathetic to "civilization" as Nagel; but while the latter lives constantly on the periphery of civilization, gaining a kind of perverse pleasure out of his feeling of superiority to it, Glahn expresses his antipathy positively by an escape from society into the great wilderness solitude of arctic Nordland. Both of these novels illustrate Hamsun's prose style at its best, spontaneous, flexible, full of haunting irregular rhythms, an infinitely sensitive instrument which handles with seemingly effortless ease the shifting moods of character and landscape and points of view in these tales. In Under höstsjernen and En vandrers spiller med sordin we again meet the wanderer-vagabond type—but with a difference. Since he had written Pan Hamsun had undergone a profound inner crisis, one associated with the passing of the splendid vigor of youth and the coming of middle age; and this finds central expression in the new novels. Nagel and Glahn, both in the full flower of young manhood, had been sufficient unto themselves, superior to their environment even during moments of partial outward defeat. The hero of Under höstsjernen and En vandrers spiller med sordin is, in contrast, a man in his 40's, little given to polemics, seeking rather than attacking—seeking his way back to the sources of his youth, sources which he can find now only in part, chiefly in memory and contemplation rather than in fact and action. And unlike Nagel and Glahn, Hamsun's new wanderer-hero is a laborer, a worker with his hands. There is a fine self-irony in the picture, a quiet at least half-resignation to life as it is; and the tale is suffused with a delicate poetic melancholy.

Hamsun's final phase of development as a novelist takes a twofold aspect. In the first group of novels, including Börn av tiden (1913; Children of the Time), Segelfoss by (1915; Eng. tr., Segelfoss Town, 1925), and Markens grøde (1917; Eng. tr., Growth of the Soil, 1920), he departs from his sharp focus on the individual and takes up problems concerned broadly with society as a whole. In the second group of stories from the last two decades (Landstrykere, 1927, Eng. tr., Vagabonds, 1930; August, 1930, Eng. tr., 1931; Men livet lever, 1933, Eng. tr., The Road Leads On, 1934; Ringens slutet, 1936, Eng. tr., The Ring Is Closed, 1937), he again returns to a consideration of the wanderer type; this time it is subjected to a searching, largely negative analysis, though he retains no little sympathy for the type even when he finds its rootlessness essentially sterile in the last analysis if not actually destructive of human values. Hamsun's departure from a preoccupation with the "outcast from society" in Börn av tiden, Segelfoss by, and Markens grøde reveals him at the height of his powers. The first two of these novels provide a broadly conceived attack on a modern industrial civilization which tends to cheapen human life and destroy society's moral stamina, while Markens grøde, a paean of praise to man at work on the soil, is by common consent Hamsun's greatest novel, if not the most impressive peasant novel ever written. In this saga Hamsun has combined a heroic theme with a simplicity of manner and a warm human feeling that make it unique among primitivistic novels. Its action avoids specification in both time and place, and in style it resembles the best of biblical narrative far more than it does the tradition of the modern novel. It is the work which won for its author in 1920 the Nobel prize in literature.

As a very old man Hamsun has had the dubious distinction of being the only Norwegian author of first rank who welcomed the Nazis upon their invasion of Norway in April, 1940. However little one is prepared to condone this step, it should be pointed out that Hamsun was at any rate consistent in thus expressing his sympathy for the German cause in the Second World War. He was an admirer of Prussian militarism in the First World War, and he apparently remained one. It should be noted also that the primitivism which lies at the base of all his social criticism is not without direct points of contact with central tenets in the Nazi philosophy.

See: John Landquist, Knut Hamsun (1917, in Swedish); Hanna Astrup Larsen, Knut Hamsun (1922, in English); Walter A. Berendsohn, Knut Hamsun (1929, in German); Einar Skavlan, Knut Hamsun (1929); Alrik Gustafson, Six Scandinavian Novelists (1940), pp. 226-285.

A. G.

Handel-Mazzetti, Enrica, Freiin von (1871-, Austrian novelist and poet), was born in Vienna. Her grandfather Heinrich had married an Italian baroness, Carolina Mazzetti of Milan. A posthumous daughter of an Austrian army officer, she was educated by her Hungarian mother and in later years by private tutors. One year (1886-1887) she spent at the institute for the Englische Fräulein in St. Pölten. As early as 1892 she was writing her first verse and fiction, but she acquired no literary fame until the appearance of her great historical novels. In these she draws with masterful strokes a picture of the Reformation in her homeland, with all its fury and devotion, its rage and passion. Reminiscences of one of her ancestors who in 1674 was accused as a witch and tortured to death may have influenced her when, in true baroque style, she paints those gruesome scenes of torment with which her work abounds. The first cycle of novels written in this spirit about the Counter Reformation consists of Meinrad Helmpersgers denkwürdiges Jahr (1900), Jesse und Maria (1906; Eng. tr., 1931), Die arme Margaret (1910), and the trilogy Stephana Schwertner (1913-1914). She returns to her own times in a second group of novels, Brüderlein und Schwesterlein (1913), Ritas Briefe (5 vols., 1915-1921), and Ritas Vermächtnis (1922), in which the social life of Vienna and her favorite idea of the sponsa Christi play an important part. Then, perhaps recognizing that her great strength lay in the historical novel, she turned her attention to the Napoleonic era. At short intervals appeared Der deutsche Held (1920) and the volumes comprising the trilogy on the murderer of Kotzebue, Karl Sand (1924-1926). Her latest works take us back once more to the 18th century. In the Novelle entitled Johann Christian Günther (1927) she pictures the death of the 18th-century poet, and in another trilogy, Frau Maria (1929-1931), the Reichsstift Quedlinburg. As for her lyric poems, mention should be made of the collection Deutsches Recht und andere Gedichte (1908).

In her boundless loyalty to the Church she is a fervent defender of the Catholic faith, at the same time treating all problems with greatest charity. As a writer she has found recognition in seeing many of her great novels translated into several languages, in having bestowed upon her (1932) the Goethe medal, and in being elected (1933) a member of the Dichterakademie in Berlin.

See: E. Korrodi, Enrica von Handel-Mazzetti; die Persönlichkeit und ihr Dichtwerk (1908); P. Siebertz, Enrica von Handel-Mazzetti Persönlichkeit, Werk und Bedeutung (1931).
F. S.

Hansson, Ola (1860-1925, Swedish poet, short-story writer, and critic), was born in Hönsinge in southernmost Skåne. Throughout his literary career he retained no small measure of admiration for the solid, healthy peasant stock from which he came; but an even stronger strain in his art was an extreme tendency toward decadent and pathological themes nurtured by his reading of Jens Peter Jacobsen, Paul Bourget (qq.v.), and others. Because of the hostility which much of his early work aroused in Sweden, he came early to live an expatriate's restless, wandering existence, in Germany and France, and late in life in Denmark. His most significant work is doubtless to be found in his two early collections of poems, Dikter (1884; Poems) and Notturmo (1885), in which he gave the most delicate, hypersensitive impressionistic expression to various aspects of life in his native Skåne, particularly to its natural phenomena and its landscape moods. Ola Hansson was the first poet of Skåne to capture its peculiar natural charm in finely modulated, softly melodious verse; and later poets from his province, such as Vilhelm Ekelund and Anders Österling (qq.v.) admit freely their indebtedness to Hansson.

The volume which first aroused nearly universal reaction against Ola Hansson in Sweden was Sensitiva amorosa (1887), a series of daring "case studies" in pathological eroticism, conceived in terms of the budding pseudo psychiatry of the day and couched in a prose style which was the last word in the overrefined and the précieux. In the late 80's and early 90's Hansson was occupied chiefly with prose criticism, writing in rapid succession a considerable number of critical essays published in Germany, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. These essays were concerned at first with Scandinavian authors of the day, but they soon came to have a wider scope, including lengthy studies of Edgar Allan Poe and a number of French authors (Bourget, Huysmans, Richépin, qq.v.) as well as effusive panegyrics on Nietzsche (q.v.) and Julius Langbehn, late 19th-century prophet of Pan-Germanism in his Rembrandt als Erzieher (1890). Practically everything that Ola Hansson wrote in the 90's was strongly influenced by Nietzsche and Langbehn: they provided him with the metaphysical basis for his rejection of naturalism as an art form in the extended essay Materialismen i skönlitteraturen (1892; Materialism in Literature); they inspired the overstrained superman complex as developed in Ung Ofegs visor (1892; Eng. tr., Young Ofeg's Ditties, 1895); and they were the origin of the racial theories which were at the basis of the social and economic theorizing in Resan hem (1895; The Trip Home). None of this work can be said to be of first importance. It is too uncritically enthusiastic, losing itself in apostrophe and paradox and getting nowhere in particular. After 1900 Ola Hansson produced more sparingly and somewhat more solidly; but on the whole his later work rises only occasionally, in his lyric poetry, to something resembling a significant creative art. Despite the falling off in quality of this late work, however, Ola Hansson had the satisfaction during his last years of tardy recognition from his countrymen for the unquestionably important contribution which he had made to Swedish lyric poetry in his early works Dikter and Notturmo.

See: F. Vetterlund, "Ola Hansson," in Skissblad om poeter (1914), pp. 205-248; F. Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of O. Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919-1921), pp. 347-362; E. Ek, Ola Hansson (1925); H. Gullberg, "Ola Hanssons Skåne," in Skåne: årsbok (1925), pp. 196-201; E. Ekelund, Ola Hanssons ungdomsdiktning (1930).

A. G.

Hardt, Ernst (1876-, German dramatist, story writer, and poet), was born in Graudenz, West Prussia. After graduation from the military academy of Lichterfelde, he traveled for four years in Greece and Spain, then lived as a writer in Dresden and Weimar. From 1919 to 1924 he was director of the Weimar theatre, and after 1924 director of the Cologne radio station. In 1898 appeared his first stories, in the volume Priester des Todes, and his first drama, Tote Zeit. Never of great originality, he wrote dramas and stories under the influence of Hugo von Hofmannsthal (q.v.) and poetry (Aus den Tagen des Knaben, 1904) under that of Stefan George (q.v.). Hardt became internationally known as a representative of the eclecticism of neo-romanticism and its craving for psychological abnormalities. For his drama Tantris der Narr (1907; Eng. trs., Tantris the Fool, 1909, Tristram the Jester, 1913) he received the national Schiller prize. Of his other dramas, only the tragedy Gudrun (1911) and the comedy Schirin und Gertraude (1913) were successes. The best among his stories is An den Toren des Lebens (1904). Gesammelte Erzählungen was published in 1909.

After the First World War, Hardt seems to have felt that his creative days were over. From that time on he has devoted his stylistic gifts to rendering excellent translations from the French (Taine, Flaubert, qq.v., Balzac, Vauvenargues, Rousseau).

See: O. Nieten, Über den Neuromantiker Ernst Hardt (1914). A Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 19. Auflage (1928), pp. 1011–1015.

W. R. G.

Hart, Heinrich (1855–1906) and Julius (1859–1930; German critics, dramatists, and poets), were so completely united in their literary careers that it is impossible to treat them separately. Heinrich was born in Wesel and Julius in Münster. After their school and university years, Heinrich left their Westphalian home and went to Berlin, whither he was soon followed by Julius. The two brothers at once entered actively into the literary life of the Prussian capital, joining forces with the group of young writers who were endeavoring to reform contemporary German literature. They soon became leaders in the early phases of German naturalistic development—as members of the literary club “Durch” (q.v.), as contributors to the anthology Moderne Dichter-Charaktere (1885), and, later, as members of the Friedrichshagen group gathered around Wilhelm Boelsche (q.v.) and Bruno Wille. Throughout the naturalistic revolution they were active as critics and theorists; their critical position was that of a balanced and reasonable aesthetic theory, and they may well be considered with Otto Brahm (q.v.) the leading naturalistic critics. Their most important contribution was Kritische Waffengänge (1882–1884). This collection of essays gave powerful expression to the demands made by the radical literary youth of the day on contemporary German literature, analyzed Zola (q.v.) and his importance for modern German letters, and directed brilliant attacks against the modish literati of the day, Hugo Bürger, Albert Träger, et al. Somewhat more conservative than their naturalistic confreres, the Harts none the less worked for a literature that should be contemporary in subject matter and spirit, base its portrayals on a wide understanding of current scientific hypotheses, and, avoiding imitation of outmoded classicism and romanticism, seek to create a balanced realism. Of lesser importance in the history of modern German literature were the short-lived journals edited by the Harts, Berliner Monatshefte (1885) and Kritisches Jahrbuch (1889), in which they carried on their campaign for a reawakening of contemporary German letters. Their critical activity was continued in the Freie Bühne with articles on various aspects of naturalistic aesthetics during the heyday of German naturalism and, after its decline, in Die deutsche Zeitung, Die tägliche Rundschau, and other papers. They were also active in various religious and socialistic movements during their later years.

Heinrich Hart's literary works include lyric poetry, Weltpfingsten (1878); drama; an unfinished epic of human history, Das Lied der Menschheit (1888–1896); and two volumes of short stories, Kinder des Lichts (1884) and Heilige und Tänzerinnen (1905). His Gesammelte Werke appeared in four volumes in 1907.

Julius Hart's literary career led him to the field of the lyric, Sansara (1878), Homo Sum (1890), Triumph des Lebens (1899). In the drama he attempted lyric tragedy, Juan Tenorio (1881), and a bourgeois tragedy, Der Sumpf (1885). His literary output also includes several volumes of short stories, e.g., Fünf Novellen (1888), and an anthology of Spanish poetry.

See: L. H. Wolf, Die ästhetische Grundlage der Literaturrevolution der achtziger Jahre: Die Kritische Waffengänge der Brüder Hart (1921); K. Tillmann, Die Zeitschriften der Gebrüder Hart (1923).

W. H. R.

Hartleben, Otto Erich (1864–1905, German lyric poet and dramatist), was born at Clausthal, an old mining town in the Harz Mountains where his paternal ancestors had been surveyors of mines for many generations. Early in his life he lost his parents. In 1885 he took up the study of law, which he pursued at the universities of Berlin and Tübingen. He was, however, mainly devoted to the social amenities of university life. Although he had passed the first of two examinations required for admission to the bar, he decided to become a free-lance writer—and combined this with an entirely undisciplined existence. Almost all his literary works owe their production to an occasional sober hour. Later, failing health forced him to give up the merry revels with his boon companions, and he retired to Salo near Lake Garda in northern Italy. There he built his famous villa Halkyone, which was supposed to become the center of a new academy of poetry. But before he was able to carry out this and similar plans Hartleben died, at 41. After his death the literary world witnessed the strange and unhappy spectacle of two women each claiming the legal rights of a wife.

There can be no doubt that Hartleben had great gifts; his humor was genuine, and many of his verses are full of music and almost flawless in form. He began as a disciple of Count A. von Platen (Meine Verse, 1895; Von reifen Früchten; meiner Verse zweiter Teil, 1904). His first books were two "delightfully nasty" short stories, Die Geschichte vom abgerissenen Knopf (1893) and Der gastfreie Pastor (1895), in which he looked at small-town ways with the perspective of a skillful but unkind observer. His characters are often caricatures. Of his plays, only one was a real stage success—Rosenmontag (1900; Eng. tr., Love's Carnival, 1904), more theatrical than truly dramatic. It had merit as an attack upon Prussian militarism.

On the whole Hartleben was only a moderately capable follower of Maupassant (q.v.) who never equaled his master. Belonging to the shock troops of his literary generation, he liked to irritate, tease, and alarm the bourgeois, without seriously questioning the latter's form of life and without being really wicked.

See: W. Mahrholz, Deutsche Literatur der Gegenwart (1930), pp. 82–83; J. Bithell, Modern German Literature, 1880–1938 (1939), pp. 68–69.

H. Sch.

Hašek, Jaroslav (1883–1923, Czech novelist and journalist), is the creator of the "Good Soldier Švejk," a humorous type which became the symbol of the Czech "go-slow" attitude towards Austria during the First World War. Hašek was born in Prague and became a journalist. In the First World War he served in the Austrian army and was taken prisoner by the Russians. He joined first the Czech legions in Russia, but later changed over to the Communists. After his return to Prague, he was a free-lance writer leading a merry bohemian life, which gave rise to many legends and anecdotes. Hašek produced a number of ephemeral books of humorous sketches, but Osudy dobrého vojáka Švejka za světové války (4 vols., 1920–1923; Eng. tr., The Good Soldier Schweik, 1930) established his reputation at home and abroad. A stage version was a great success in post-war Germany, and some critics hailed Švejk as a second Don Quixote. But Švejk, a loosely organized series of coarse farcical scenes interspersed with naïve reflections, is no great work of art. The main figure, Švejk, a fat dogcatcher from the Prague area, is vivid and convincing enough; he gets into trouble with the Austrian authorities for a supposed insult to His Majesty, is drafted, gets to the Russian front, and finally becomes a Russian prisoner. Švejk is a coward and shirker who assumes the innocence and stupidity of an idiot to disarm the railing officers, a happy-go-lucky skeptic as to war and military glory, an endless talker and coarse jester. The many hilarious scenes and the grotesque figures of the Austrian army (insolent officers, drunken chaplains, and the like) pleased a post-war audience which remembered the Austrian Empire and the war as a horrible dream and a bad joke. Švejk was unfinished when Hašek died and was concluded, rather lamely, by a fellow humorist, Karel Vaněk.

See: J. Durych, Ejhle, člověče (1928); E. A. Longen, Jaroslav Hašek (1928); V. Menger, J. H., zajatec č. 294, 217 (1934) and J. H. Doma (1935).

R. W.

Hasenclever, Walter (1890–1940, German dramatist and poet), was born in Aachen. He saw something of the world in his student years, attending not only the University of Leipzig but those of Oxford and Lausanne as well. He was wounded in the First World War and spent a year or more in a hospital.

Hasenclever was nothing if not sensational. His first poems, Der Jüngling (1913), were, to be sure, not exciting except for their subject matter: they were the warnings of a confessed libertine. With the play Der Sohn (1914), however, the theme of revolt breaks out. A boy of 20 who refuses to be intimidated any longer by his tyrant of a father escapes from home, becomes a revolutionary both socially and politically, and when the bailiffs hale him again before his outraged parent threatens his father with a pistol, with the result that the latter dies of a stroke. This play, produced for the first time in 1916, was one of the early shots fired in the battle of expressionism; it also introduced the motif of father-son hatred which ran like a lurid thread through the literature of the period. As he was drawn into the war in 1915 Hasenclever became more politically conscious. In that year he wrote a dramatic poem, Der Retter, in which a poet, prophet of peace and of the brotherhood of man, goes down before the firing squad of the field marshal; his message, we are assured, will live on after him. Spiritual and political leadership is also attributed to the poet in Der politische Dichter (1919), which contains poetry of a highly revolutionary sort. The most violent of all Hasenclever's works is his drama Antigone (1917). The Greek story is used as a framework for antimilitary arguments: Creon, a mask for William II, becomes the most brutal of tyrants, who is brought to book by the rage of the people; the proud Antigone turns democrat and pacifist.

Eventually Hasenclever found revolution unprofitable. Two experiments with dramatic technique followed, Die Menschen (1918), which approaches pantomime since the text consists mostly of interjections, and Jenseits (1920), a ghostly tragedy with two characters and an implied spook. Latterly Hasenclever had taken the path of comedy with Ein besserer Herr (1927), Ehen werden im Himmel geschlossen (1929), and Napoleon greift ein (1930). In 1917 he was awarded the Kleist prize.

See: K. Martens, Die deutsche Literatur unsrer Zeit (1922), pp. 500 ff.; A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 706-716.

H. W. P.

Haulleville, Eric de (1900-1941, Belgian poet, novelist, and essayist), was born in Brussels. He came from a family which for generations had devoted itself to arts and letters. His grandfather, Baron Prosper de Haulleville, a well-known historian and a leader of the Belgian Catholic press, was a personal friend of Montalembert and Louis Veuillot. His father, Baron Alphonse de Haulleville, was one of the founders of the Colonial Museum of Tervueren (near Brussels), devoted to African ethnography. Eric, from his childhood, was familiar with Negro statues and African art. In his first poems, Dénouement (1921), he displayed a marvelous imagination together with a Baudelairean "sens de la surprise," a particular taste for the unexpected and for lyrical contrast which constitutes his principal poetic qualities.

Haulleville lived in Paris for nearly 10 years and was intimately connected with the leading personalities of contemporary literature and art. Le Genre épique (1928) is an original attempt to render a prismatic view of the visible and the interior world of a poet in short poems, fairy tales, dialogues, and brief dramatic scenes. Le Voyage aux Iles Galapagos (1934), a poetic novel in which the influence of the surrealist technique can be retraced, won the Albert I prize in 1935. Haulleville returned to Brussels after his marriage to Rose Nys, Mrs. Aldous Huxley's younger sister. He became the private secretary to Burgomaster Adolphe Max, and after the death of the heroic Brussels mayor remained in the same position with Burgomaster Vandemeulebroeck. In fleeing Belgium during the Second World War, the poet, already worn by a long illness, walked many miles, with his wife and their little girl, through areas devastated by bombs and cities aflame. When at last they arrived in the south of France, there was no longer hope of saving him. He passed the final months of his life in bed correcting the copies of his last manuscript, L'Anneau des années (posthumously published, 1941), which contains his best poems. He died in St. Paul de Vence (Var, France) on March 20, 1941.

Haulleville's poetry in his more significant works, despite the ironical fantasy which always gives them a particular color, is inspired by deep and moving thoughts of a metaphysical and cosmic character. More than once his lyrical outcry reaches a Shelleyan grandeur rarely equaled by a poet in this century.

L. K.

Hauptmann, Carl (1858-1921, German dramatist and novelist), was born in Obersalzbrunn, Silesia, the elder brother of Gerhart Hauptmann (q.v.). Silesian mysticism, especially the works of Jakob Böhme and Meister Eckhart, early attracted his attention. Interested in the metaphysical approach to natural science, he took his doctorate at Jena under Haeckel in zoology and Avenarius in natural philosophy. Although he gave great promise as a scientist, his brother Gerhart's literary success started Carl on a new career. When the dramas Marianne (1894), Waldleute (1895), and Ephraims Breite (1898; Eng. tr., 1900) appeared, the critics proclaimed him a late naturalist, an imitator of his brother Gerhart, and a talented, forceful writer who, however, might more profitably have confined his endeavors to natural science. But the collection of aphorisms and lyrics, Aus meinem Tagebuch

(1900), helped create a better understanding of the man and the poet. In this work he denied all connection with the naturalistic doctrine. He did not share the naturalist's reticence about the "idea"; in fact, the "force of the idea" is a predominant theme in his works.

His dramatic efforts cover an extensive field: tragedy in Die Austreibung (1905), realism in the dramatic poem Moses (1906), symbolism in Die Bergschmiede (1902), Hauptmann's best-known drama. In Napoleon Bonaparte (1911), his crowning dramatic achievement, he reconstructed the career of the French emperor within the framework and spirit of Napoleon's own time. Supernatural and realistic elements are interwoven in Die lange Jule (1912) and Die armseligen Besenbinder (1913). Hauptmann turned to comedy in Die Rebhühner (1916), to tragicomedy in Tobias Buntschuh (1916), the first play in the trilogy Die goldenen Strassen, of which the second and third parts are Gaukler, Tod und Juwelier and Musik (both 1919). Der abtrünnige Zar and Krieg, ein Tedeum (Eng. tr., War, a Tedeum, in Drama, Vol. VI, 1916, pp. 597-653), both published in 1914, predict the coming catastrophe; words are subordinated to plot for a more vivid picture of the nature of things to come.

In the field of prose two works appeared in 1902, the short stories collected under the title Aus Hütten am Hange and the novel Mathilde—descriptions of milieu and characterizations without the naturalistic undertone of social significance. Hauptmann's striving for perfection in the moral sense reached a climax in the novel Einhart der Lächler (1907), in which he portrays the life of a misunderstood artist; here again he combined dream with reality. Ismael Friedmann (1913), Nächte, Schicksale, and Das Rübezahlbuch (all three 1915) have their setting in Silesia. Hauptmann also commanded the lyric form, as in Der Sonnenwanderer (1896).

He died in 1921 in his native and beloved Silesian mountains, where he spent the greater part of his life. A sojourn in Italy and a trip to America in 1907 were his only extended travels. Had not his brother Gerhart overshadowed him, Carl would have stood out in clearer relief as the poet he was—a conformer to no literary "ism," a discerning and sensitive master of words, a man whose outlook was tempered by Silesian mysticism and environment, and a soul striving to envisage the future.

See: H. H. Borchardt, ed., Carl Hauptmann, er und über ihn (1911); H. Razing, Carl Hauptmann; Gestalt und Werk (1928); W. Goldstein, Carl Hauptmann; eine Werkdeutung (1931).

W. J. M.

Hauptmann, Gerhart (1862-1946, German dramatist and novelist), was born in Obersalzbrunn, Silesia. Reared in Protestant orthodoxy, but early exposed to the more emotional teachings of Moravian pietism, he was as a young man subjected to the impact of an almost religious belief in scientific causality and materialistic determinism, tempered by a vague kind of socialistic meliorism, which at that time attracted the young intellectuals of Germany. A failure as a Gymnasium pupil, he turned to farming, sculpture in Breslau and Rome, desultory academic study in Jena and Berlin, and finally to literature. His marriage to a beautiful young heiress, who supported him throughout the four years of their engagement, freed him from the necessity of literary hack work. Marital incompatibilities and a passionate attachment to a young violinist led to more than 10 years of self-torturing inner conflicts, terminating in divorce and a new marriage in 1904. He received the Nobel prize in literature (1912) and honorary degrees from Oxford (1905), Leipzig (1909), Prague (1921), and Columbia (1932). The Weimar Republic bestowed on him the order Pour le Mérite (1922). The Third Reich ignored him, but he remained one of the most popular dramatists on the German stage.

Hauptmann's work will perhaps go down in history as the most complete artistic expression of the so-called historicism and the relativistic skepticism of the last 50 years. In the fact that he is essentially a product of a time of transition and of uncertain groping lies his distinction as well as his limitations. In a manner unparalleled in German literature he demonstrated a receptivity to the varied intellectual currents of the age and a sensitivity to new literary movements, without persistently following any of them. Few other writers have delved so deeply into the contradictions and irrationalities of human behavior, few have looked at the facts of life and of nature with the same honesty and candor. While he believed in a Supreme Being and felt a cosmic oneness with nature, he could not reconcile with the existence of evil and suffering the Christian concept of God as a loving father. Life was to him a non-rational mystery which must be accepted. It can be portrayed; it cannot be explained.

After dabbling with epigonic dramas, epics, and social ballads, Hauptmann began to experiment with realistic sketches, some unpublished fragments containing painstaking and minute reproductions of various dialects. When he met Arno Holz (q.v.) he was already well along the road to the naturalistic style of which Holz claimed to be the originator. What he most owed to Holz was encouragement to apply the new technique to the drama. Vor Sonnenaufgang (1889; Eng. tr., Before Dawn, 1909) marks the birth of the naturalistic drama. This and the other early plays, except for a greater illusion of realism in speech and in situations, were still reminiscent of Ibsen (q.v.) with his emphasis on milieu, heredity, or education. An entirely new dramatic form was evolved in Die Weber (1892; Eng. tr., The Weavers, 1899). Five seemingly independent tableaux are organically bound together in a climactic action of overpowering force. From the more than 70 characters no individual hero stands out. The hero is in fact the whole proletarian group. A similar structural principle is observed in Der Biberpelz (1893; Eng. tr., The Beaver Coat, 1912), one of the few great comedies in German literature. The success of The Weavers prompted Hauptmann to apply the same technique to a theme from the Peasants' War of the 16th century, Florian Ceyer (1895; Eng. tr., 1929). The dramatist has succeeded here in combining the speech forms, the psychology, and the cultural and social background of a forgotten age in such a stupendous historic pageant that it took the German public nearly 30 years to appreciate its accuracy and its artistic cogency. Both plays are typical naturalistic tragedies. There is no clash of ideas—only the collision of great natural forces. No divine order of eternal justice and righteousness is vindicated as in the Hegelian type of tragedy. As in Oedipus Rex and King Lear, the reader is left with the depressing feeling of the senselessness of human events, the brutality of life, and the dominating role played by error and chance. The neo-romantic movement is reflected in the touching dream play Hanneles Himmelfahrt (1893; Eng. tr., Hannele, 1894), the first drama in world literature making a child the heroine. In this play the romantic supernaturalism could still be explained on purely psychologic grounds as figments of a feverish mind. A complete surrender to romanticism was made in Die versunkene Glocke (1897; Eng. tr., The Sunken Bell, 1898), the most personal as well as the most popular of Hauptmann's dramas. In most of the plays up to The Sunken Bell the tragic outcome is generally the result of man-made causes and could be avoided by man-made reforms. When Hauptmann became more engrossed in his own personal problems, he envisaged tragedy as inherent in human nature itself. Out of man's nature grow not only his most glorious and idealistic impulses, but also the most disgusting and brutal of his instincts. It is largely a matter of chance in which direction nature asserts itself in any given individual. Hence there is no guilt and no poetic justice. And so sex reveals itself in its highest sublimation as self-sacrificing love in Hauptmann's most beautiful verse drama, Der arme Heinrich (1902; Eng. tr., Henry of Auë, 1914), as well as in one of its most pathological expressions, that of nymphomania, in Kaiser Karls Geisel (1908; Eng. tr., Charlemagne's Hostage, 1915).

The emphasis on nature and character found its most adequate expression in the two greatest German tragedies of the last 50 years, Fuhrmann Henschel (1899; Eng. tr., Drayman Henschel, 1913) and Rose Bernd (1903; Eng. tr., 1913). As in the other naturalistic plays, dialect predominates, but the structure is more closely knit and the characters are no longer examples of static and plastic analysis. They are human beings undergoing an evolutionary change. As if to escape from the brutality of everyday life, Hauptmann turned more and more to legendary, romantic, and balladesque subjects, even though they were often given a realistic background. The most fascinating and beautiful of these, symbolizing the varied reactions of men to beauty, is found in Und Pippa tanzt (1906; Eng. tr., And Pippa Dances, 1907), which the poet loved best of all his plays. As a sort of summing up of a lifelong preoccupation with the figure of Christ, he wrote the most profound religious novel of his time, Der Narr in Christo, Emanuel Quint (1910; Eng. tr., The Fool in Christ, Emanuel Quint, 1911). With sympathetic insight Quint is drawn as a modern mystic who tries to carry out literally the simple social precepts of Jesus and meets with a somewhat similar fate. A journey to Greece produced in the travel diary Griechischer Frühling (1908) a unique appreciation of a pastoral, pre-Socratic, essentially Dionysiac Greece with its serenity and joyous acceptance of life even in its most tragic implications. This new outlook was reflected in the forceful drama Der Bogen des Odysseus (1914; Eng. tr., The Bow of Odysseus, 1917), in which the hero appears at first almost as a dreamy German who has actually lost the sense of his own identity, until he regains his former prowess by contact with his native soil. Der Ketzer von Soana (1918; Eng. tr., The Heretic of Soana, 1923), a dithyrambic praise of pagan assertion of life and of the senses, is stylistically and structurally the most finished of Hauptmann's narrative works. In a number of books appearing before the outbreak of the First World War he had expressed a presentiment of a catastrophic collapse of Western civilization. The war caused him to withdraw within himself and to continue work on the exotic themes selected earlier. Der weisse Heiland (1920; Eng. tr., The White Saviour, 1924) is an exquisite tragedy in melodious trochaic tetrameters, holding up to scorn Christian fanatic zeal over against the guilelessness of the Christlike Montezuma. Indipohdi (1921; Eng. tr., 1925) is steeped in Buddhistic longing for nonexistence. The epic Till Eulenspiegel (1928) is the work which Hauptmann considered his greatest. It contains grandiose and realistic pictures of the depressing and chaotic conditions in post-war Germany and finally takes the hero to Greece, where he lives for a thousand years a characteristically bucolic existence with Baubo, the handmaiden of the gods. After the centaur Chiron has shown him the realm of the Platonic ideas, he returns to the phenomenal world and finally seeks death in the Swiss glacier ice. Later works were two dramas, Iphigenie in Delphi (1941) and Iphigenie in Aulis (1944).

Hauptmann wrote more than 60 books. It is impossible as yet to trace a definite line of development. Some of his works are known to have gone through long periods of gestation, others were finished years before they were published. Of many others the history is unknown. Das Abenteuer meiner Jugend (1937) is a detailed and illuminating autobiography of the first 26 years, but Hauptmann published practically nothing about his later life or about his works. Aphorisms and fragments were brought together in Ausblicke (1922), collected speeches in Um Volk und Geist (1932). So-called conversations, Gespräche (1932), were written down from memory and arranged by Josef Chapiro.

C. F. W. Behl and F. A. Voigt have been at work on a definitive edition of Gerhart Hauptmann's works, of which 17 volumes appeared in 1942.

See: P. Schlenther, Gerhart Hauptmann (1897; revised by A. Eloesser, 1922); J. Röhr, Gerhart Hauptmanns Dramen (1910); E. Sulger-Gebing, Gerhart Hauptmann (1916; revised by W. Linden, 1932); H. von Hülsen, Gerhart Hauptmann (1927); V. Ludwig, Hauptmann-Bibliographie (1932); Felix A. Voigt, Antike und antikes Lebensgefühl im Werke Gerhart Hauptmanns (1935), Haupt- mann-Studien (1936), and Hauptmann-Jahrbuch (1936, 1937).

F. W. J. H.

Hazard, Paul (1878–1944, French scholar and critic), was born in the village of Nordpeene, Nord, the son of a schoolmaster. He became himself one of the most eminent teachers and investigators of his generation, joining high professional competence and scrupulousness with qualities of imagination and grace that endeared him to students in two hemispheres. Trained at the Ecole Normale Supérieure, which he entered in 1900, he was appointed to the chair of comparative literature at the University of Lyon in 1910; he was called to Paris to the Sorbonne in 1919 and became a member of the faculty of the Collège de France in 1925. He lectured extensively abroad and received honorary degrees from the universities of Turin, Santiago (Chile), Mexico, Sofia, Harvard, and Columbia. He was visiting professor at Columbia University in alternate years from 1932 to 1940. Near the end of 1939 he was elected a member of the French Academy.

Hazard's doctoral thesis, La Révolution française et les lettres italiennes (1910), has been called a model; here, as constantly in his subsequent writing, he is substantial, documented, but with no suggestion of the ponderous, he is hospitable to general ideas, never irresponsibly affirmative. The multiplicity of his interests is indicated by such titles as Leopardi (1913), Lamartine (1926), Stendhal (1927), Don Quichotte (1931). In 1932 appeared Les Livres, les enfants et les hommes (Eng. tr., Books, Children & Men, 1944), a sensitive appraisal of works written for very young readers, or taken over by them, throughout Europe and through the centuries. The comprehensive Histoire de la littérature française (2 vols., 1923–1924), compiled with Joseph Bédier (q.v.), ranks with the Histoire of Gustave Lanson (q.v.). Hazard was long an editor of the highly reputed Revue de littérature comparée founded by him and Fernand Baldensperger (q.v.).

La Crise de la conscience européenne (3 vols., 1935) is a study of the mind and the heart of Europe in the decades from 1680 to 1715. One reviewer said that the title of the first chapter, "De la stabilité au mouvement," might have served the entire work, but Hazard while he had the boldness of his lucidity—and he has had to endure the not over-devastating reproach of being "un esprit trop clair"—was capable of both seeking and distrusting simplicity. This book is indispensable for any student of the period and of the genesis of a relativistic attitude in modern Europe.

Hazard came to New York for another semester at Columbia University in 1940; he returned to France in January, 1941, to remain with his own people in their tragic ordeal. The enemy refused to accept him for the post to which he was then nominated, the rectorship of the University of Paris. He continued to teach, at Lyon and at Paris, and to study. Before his death in April, 1944, he had completed, in cruel circumstances and with a true humanist's steadiness, a continuation of his report on the European "conscience," a large new work to be entitled Les Origines intellectuelles de l'Europe contemporaine: Le Dix-huitième Siècle de Montesquieu à Lessing. A clandestine review, France de demain, early in 1944 published Paul Hazard's characteristically moving exhortation to his countrymen, "Pour que vive l'âme de la France" (republished in the Romanic Review, December, 1944).

See: Jean Marie Carré, "Paul Hazard," Revue de littérature comparée, XX (1940), 5-12; Henri Peyre, "Paul Hazard," French Review, XVII (1944), 309-319.

H. S.

Hedberg, Tor Harald (1862-1931, Swedish dramatist, novelist, and poet), born in Stockholm, the son of a writer, served for 10 years as literary and dramatic critic of the newspaper Svenska dagbladet (The Swedish Daily Paper), and from 1910 to 1922 was the director of the Dramatic Theatre. He was also a member of the Swedish Academy.

Hedberg's literary career is marked by an early and fruitful beginning. He began writing shortly after leaving Uppsala, and by the time he was 30 had 10 titles to his credit. Although he was a member of the group of writers who called themselves "Det unga Sverige" (Young Sweden), his work was little marked by the views of fellow authors. While his companions were struggling with the problems involved in representing objective reality, Hedberg was concerning himself with psychological studies. His earliest writings were in the field of prose fiction. In works like Johannes Karr (1885), Judas (1886), and På Torpa Gård (1888; At Torpa Estate), he invariably treated the main character from the standpoint of inner stress. In the 90's Hedberg turned his attention to the drama. With Judas (1895) he repeated an earlier choice of subject, and the focus once more is on a psychological battle. Judas seemingly can resolve his conflict only by betraying Jesus. In Gerhard

Grim (1897) there are tendencies that are obviously derived from Faust. The most successful of Hedberg's dramas, however, is Johan Ulfstjerna (1907). The setting is contemporary and laid in a province of Finland that was formerly Swedish. The figure of Johan Ulfstjerna is very well drawn; indeed, Hedberg has succeeded in investing him with truth and reality. Whereas Judas is the label for a psychological problem presented in dramatic form, Johan Ulfstjerna is a human being who offers himself for the benefit of his fellow men.

See: J. Landquist, Essayer (1913); A. Brunius, Ansikten och masker (1917); H. Ahlenius, Tor Hedberg (1935).

C. E. W. L. D.

Heiberg, Gunnar Edvard Rode (1857-1929; Norwegian dramatist, essayist, and critic), was one of the most defiantly aristocratic individualists of his generation, carrying the spirit of Ibsen (q.v.) through the neo-romantic reaction and into the 20th century. Born in Christiania of a highly cultivated family, he was early conversant with European culture, "the first trueborn European in Norwegian literature" (Helge Krog). His first foreign journey took him to Rome, where he met Ibsen; in later years he spent much time in Copenhagen and other European centers, but most of all in Paris, which stood nearest to his own cosmopolitan esprit. Even as a university student, he had broken with the family conservatism, making friends with the extreme naturalists, the so-called bohème, and choosing, as he said, "two teachers, Johan Sverdrup and Georg Brandes" (see Brandes), the banner men of political and literary radicalism in his day.

His literary début (1878) consisted of two poems in the spirit of Shelley and Wergeland, praising the free human spirit and the pure intellect personified in the rebel Cain. His first drama, Tante Ulrikke (1883; Aunt Ulrikke), was Ibsenian in technique, but more violent and explosive. For four years (1884-1888) he was artistic director of the National Theatre in Bergen, doing brilliant work, but being forced out of the position because of his uncompromisingly contemporary choice of repertoire. The play Kong Midas (1890; King Midas) was a satire on such dogmatic and self-appointed truth-tellers as Björnson (q.v.), but with its plea for a more inclusive and artistic humanity in literature it became a turning point in his production. From now on he avoided surface realism and developed a lyric-satiric style of his own, which is often charming, even exalted, but can also be dramatically baffling. A series of plays in the 90's developed his idea that human beings are more important than theories, that mass action is harmful, and that the lone, self-assertive creator is the highest form of human being. The high points of his dramatic production are Balkonen (1894; Eng. tr., The Balcony, 1922) and Kjærlighedens tragedie (1904; Eng. tr., The Tragedy of Love, in T. H. Dickinson, Chief Contemporary Dramatists, Ser. 2, 1921), both picturing in lyric prose the conflict between erotic passion and intellectual culture; Jeg vil verge mit land (1912; I Shall Defend My Land) and Paradesengen (1913; Bed of State), satires concerning true and false patriotism. He had a talent for disrespect, mixing the most vicious lampoons with a luxuriant lyricism. His women were creatures of untamable, primitive passions, while his men were delicate, lyrical, overrefined, when they were not brutal and unreflective. His fundamental, almost mystic devotion was to the wholehearted, all-consuming passion, whether in the form of selfless agitation for social justice, uncompromising, defiant patriotism, or the erotic demands of his uncivilizable women. He worshiped the genuine and flayed without mercy every touch of the meretricious.

Heiberg developed his ideas at length in the many brilliant essays and theatrical criticisms which he reprinted in such volumes as Pariserbreve (1900; Letters from Paris), Ibsen og Bjørnson paa scenen (1918; Ibsen and Bjørnson on the Stage), Franske visitter (1918; French Visits), Norsk teater (1920; Norwegian Theatre), Salt og sukker (1924; Salt and Sugar). The title of the last-named is suggestive of Heiberg's spirit: an occasionally inorganic blend of scoffer and worshiper, but first and last an artist. His style is nervous, agile, unrheterical, sometimes jerky and mannered, but always sparkling with malicious wit and dramatic indignation. He is, as one critic remarks, most unlikely ever to be canonized, but he towers high as an uncompromising portrayer of the beauty and the bitterness of life.

See: Schou, et al, "Heiberg," Samtiden (1917, 1923, 1929, 1937); Julius Bab, Das Drama der Liebe (1925); E. Skavlan, "Gunnar Edvard Rode Heiberg," in Norsk biografisk leksikon, V (1931), 576-581.

E. H.

Heidenstam, Verner von (1859-1940, Swedish poet and novelist), was born in Västergötland

(Olshammar, on Lake Vätter), where, in a magnificently picturesque countryside rich in famous historical traditions from the Swedish middle ages, he spent most of his childhood and youth. After brief attendance at a private school in Stockholm, interrupted by illness when he was 16, he left Sweden to travel for his health in the south of Europe and the Near East. He remained abroad for something over 10 years, not returning permanently to his native land until March, 1887. A year later his first volume of poetry, Vallfart och vandringsår (Pilgrimage and Wanderyears) attracted wide and favorable attention in Sweden. During the next few years he composed chiefly in prose a number of relatively unimportant autobiographical volumes and two significant antinaturalistic critical essays, one in collaboration with Oskar Levertin (q.v.). His first important volume of poetry, Dikter (Poems), appeared in 1895 and firmly established Heidenstam as one of the most significant literary figures of the 90's. In the late 90's and the early years of our century he wrote some distinguished historical fiction, including Karolinerna (1897-1898; Eng. tr., The Charles Men, 1920), Heliga Birgittas pilgrimsfärd (1901; Saint Birgitta's Pilgrimage), and Folkungaträdet (2 vols., 1905-1907; Eng. tr., The Tree of the Folkungs, 1925). His richest and most mature volume of poems, Nya dikter (New Poems), appeared in 1915. Some of his poems have been translated into English (Sweden's Laureate: Selected Poems, tr. by C. W. Stork, 1919). In 1916 the Nobel prize in literature was awarded to Heidenstam, with the significant Swedish citation "the leader of a new era in our literature." Only occasional poems and essays came from Heidenstam's pen after 1915. His contribution—one of the most important in modern Swedish literature—had already been made.

Heidenstam's significance in the history of Swedish literature lies chiefly in the fact that he was among the first consciously to break with the spirit of sober reason characteristic of the utilitarian social-reform prose literature of the Swedish 80's, the literature which, following the critical dictum of the Dane Georg Brandes (q.v.), had sought primarily "to put problems into debate." Heidenstam's first volume of poems, with its riot of color and its youthful exuberance of feeling and utterance, pointed a new way in terms of creative literature; and his critical essay "Renasce" (1889) contained a direct conscious attack on the realism of the 80's. He maintained that by the early 90's this realism had already exhausted its possibilities and that it was furthermore essentially irreconcilable with the Swedish national temper. In place of the realism of the 80's, deriving largely from foreign sources, Heidenstam championed a new, more purely Swedish literary program, one that would favor the subjective and the personal and would seek to unite the imaginative strain with a sense of the beautiful and also with a bold, racy realism. The challenge of these ideas was met immediately, not only in Heidenstam's own creative work, but also in Selma Lagerlöf's early novels and in the magnificent lyric flowering of such poets of the 90's as Fröding, Karlfeldt, and Levertin (qq.v.), Heidenstam's own work illustrates these ideas both in the genre of lyric poetry and in historical fiction—most brilliantly, no doubt, in his lyrics, though his novels and short stories are among the best Swedish historical fiction that there is. His poetry, which early revealed some excesses in the overuse of color and in imaginative exuberance, came with the years to be more disciplined, more concentrated, more firmly classical in form and spirit, though it lost little if any of the essential freshness and vigor of conception that characterized his early poems. In his attitude toward life Heidenstam is essentially pagan, more in the Greek, perhaps, than in the early Scandinavian sense. Though his subjects, particularly in some of the historical novels, are not infrequently drawn from an at least semibarbaric Scandinavian past, he reveals everywhere the sensitive aristocrat's born distrust of barbarism as such, favoring always a kind of harmonious classical humanism, not without a strong admixture of the heroic, as his final cultural ideal. Heidenstam is chiefly indebted for his poetic ideal, it would seem, to the Swedish-Finn Johan Ludvig Runeberg, and, in a lesser degree, to Goethe.

See: John Landquist, Verner von Heidenstam (1909); Ruben Gustafsson Berg, Före 'Vallfart och Vandringsår' (1919); Fredrik Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of O. Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919–1921), pp. 185–211; Alrik Gustafson, Six Scandinavian Novelists (1940).

A. G.

Heijermans, Herman (1864–1924, Dutch playwright and short-story writer), was born at Rotterdam. His father intended him for a business career, but he loathed the prospect of spending his life among account books and figures. He went to Amsterdam in 1892 and entered the literary profession as a reporter for the Telegraaf. His first dramatic venture, Dora

Kremer (1893), was a failure. But shortly afterwards another play of his, in one act, scored a sensational success. He had it produced as a translation from the Russian and considered the applause which it earned both from the public and the press as confirmation of his belief that only foreign plays had a chance of success with people who, in their foolish ignorance, judged things by their origin instead of their intrinsic value. But this Ahasverus (1893; Eng. tr., 1934), by the fictitious Ivan Jelakowitch, was undeniably a better drama than Heijermans's first play, and the success that he afterwards won in his own name seems to vindicate the public and the critics. The successful presentation of Ghetto (1898; Eng. tr., 1899) and its subsequent vogue in London and Paris gave him the certainty of his own power. From then on he wrote for the stage with never lagging productivity. Het Zevende Gebod (1899; The Seventh Commandment), a satire on bourgeois morality, Op Hoop van Zegen (1900; Eng. tr., The Good Hope, 1912), a tragic picture of seafaring life, and a long series of other plays of varying force and quality followed in rapid succession during the next 20 years. Most of these plays have been translated into German. De rijzende Zon (Eng. tr., The Rising Sun, 1926), in which Meggie Albanesi scored one of her earliest successes in London (1925), completes the list of Heijermans's plays available in English. However, others have been performed before English-speaking audiences: A Case of Arson (De Brand in de Jonge Jan) and Links (Schakels) by the London Stage Society (1908); The Hired Servant (De Meid) by the Pioneer Players in St. Martin's Theatre, London (1917); and Eva Bonheur in New York (1925).

The secret of Heijermans's popularity in Holland is in the intensely Dutch character of his work. A fondness for the minute portrayal of reality akin to the art of the Dutch genre painters of the 17th century and coupled with it a strong sense of the humorous and farcical, such as those painters had, made his plays colorful pictures of life in a style that was enjoyed as a truly native art. Their popularity was no doubt due in part to the author's tendency to champion the cause of the underdog and the victims of our social order. Still Heijermans's fame among his countrymen is a distinctly artistic triumph such as no social reformer could have achieved. A social reformer he was and meant to be, but he owed his success in that field to the persuasive power of his art. His most famous play, The Good Hope, started an agitation for better government control of seagoing craft, which resulted in the Ships Act of 1909. When Heijermans died, leaving a widow and two little children in straitened circumstances, the crews of Holland's merchant marine contributed to a fund for their relief, in recognition of the great service his art had rendered them and their families.

It would be difficult to say to what extent foreign influences molded Heijermans's art. In his later years he conceived a deep admiration for Gerhart Hauptmann (q.v.), which may partly account for his turning from realistic to symbolical drama. Uitkomst (1907; Deliverance), which deals with the dream visions of a child on its sickbed, shows affinity to Hanneles Himmelfahrt. But otherwise he does not seem to have been greatly dependent on literary inspiration. Not literature, but life was his source book.

Heijermans was also a master of the short story. Most of his short stories were written, during his residence in Germany, for the Telegraaf and the Handelsblad, both Amsterdam dailies. They were published under the pseudonym Samuel Falkland, and the collected edition of these Falklandjes, as they are called in Dutch, fills 20 volumes. These alone—and many a precious gem they contain in the midst of less noble matter—would secure for him a place among Holland's writers. The fact that the author's pseudonym in the diminutive has become the recognized name for these stories affords a measure of their popularity.

See: A. J. Barnouw, "Herman Heijermans," New York Times, December 21, 1924, Section 7, p. 2, "Herman Heijermans," Theatre Arts Monthly, IX (1925), 109–112, and The Dutch; a Portrait Study of the People of Holland (1940), pp. 189–214, especially pp. 201–205.

A. J. B.

Heiseler, Henry von (1875–1928, German poet, dramatist, and critic), father of the poet Bernt von Heiseler (1907–), was born and educated in Russia and moved to Germany in 1905. He chanced to be in St. Petersburg at the outbreak of the First World War and had to serve in the Russian army, in a noncombatant capacity. After many harrowing experiences he was able to return to Germany in 1922. Bilingual in the practical, everyday sense of the word and as much at home in German culture as in Russian life, Heiseler nevertheless experienced all the difficulties of a writer who works in a medium which is not fully and utterly his native tongue. His desire to go back to Germany clearly indicated that he was painfully aware of how unsatisfactory it is for a poet to live and to create abroad, severed from direct contact with his cherished tradition. This is not to say that he ever came close to the borderline of dilettantism which is encountered so often in the work of other German writers abroad, notably among those who content themselves with speaking to a linguistic minority whose limited vernacular they acquire or those who drift into a kind of glorified reportage destined for consumption in their faraway home country. Heiseler kept to the high level of neoclassical art, drawing his inspiration from Stefan George (q.v.). Nevertheless the trained ear will often discern a lack of native rhythm in his poems (Der Engel des Krieges, 1914) or the absence of idiomatic raciness in his stories. Similarly, his preference for Russian scenes and subjects—his best plays (Peter und Alexej, 1906; Grischa, 1916; Die Kinder Godunófs, 1923) all deal with Russian life and history—accentuates the dualism of his cultural allegiance.

It is in his thought rather than in his emotions that he overcame the handicap of a man with two countries, turning it indeed into the advantage of a well-informed observer of both Russian and German civilization, if not of European life in general. For this reason his critical essays deserve the closest attention; they contain seeds which may yet bear rich fruit in literary criticism and political thought. His fondest hope was for an intimate cultural union of Germany with England and the United States which he felt was bound to issue from their common instinct for order and justice and from the identity of their spiritual aspirations as he discovered them in Shakespeare, Keats, Browning, Walt Whitman, Bach, Goethe, and George. Heiseler's masterly translations of English and also of Russian and French literary works form his practical contribution towards this cultural alliance which would then lead to some sort of political confederation. The spadework was to be done by writers and philosophers; creative writing Heiseler considered to be of immensely greater significance in the evolution of mankind than the doings of so-called men of action, of rulers, conquerors, or industrialists.

See: W. Schneider, Die auslandsdeutsche Dichtung unserer Zeit (1936), pp. 120–129; André von Gronicka, Henry von Heiseler, a Russo-German Writer (1944).

H. B.

Hellens, Franz (pseud. of Frédéric van Ermengem, 1881–, Belgian novelist, poet, and art critic), was born in Ghent. His father was a university professor; he himself studied law, traveled widely, and has been for years in charge of the Parliamentary Library at Brussels. There is as yet no biography of Hellens, although Belgian critics count him as one of their most original authors, and his books have been much translated. His own writings vividly reflect emotional reactions to his experiences, but, living in the midst of what he calls "réalités fantastiques," he attaches small importance to the concrete facts of his existence. "I have gone through life like a somnambulist," he says. The biographer's task will not be an easy one. Fortunately he gave his own account of the origin of many of his works in Documents secrets, published in a limited edition in 1931. From it one learns that he composes with difficulty—a fact hardly to be surmised from a glance at his bibliography. He is among the most productive of Belgian novelists.

His earliest interest was in music, and its influence is clearly traceable in the structure of his stories. But, true to the national tradition, his first literary inspiration came from painters. He mentions specifically two contemporaries, Lemaire and Jules de Bruycker, to whom, and to their common master, the elder Breughel, he was indebted for his initiation into the picturesque quarters of Ghent. His first novel, En ville morte (1906), and collections of stories such as Hors-le-vent (1909) and Clartés latentes (1912) bear titles significantly characteristic of this period. He has written critical studies of artists, e.g., Gérard Terborch (1911) and James Ensor (1921), but the overtones of music and line rather than color in the plastic arts have held his attention. He avows the fascination that Poe's stories always awoke in him, adding that while Poe proceeds from the unknown to the known, he begins with reality to end in mystery which lies in an inner crisis of consciousness. Réalités fantastiques (1923), in which he declares he has put the essence of himself, reveals his kinship with Poe. Of special interest for the conception of his art are his remarks about the composition of Melusine, written in 1917, which baffled the publishers and appeared only in 1920. It is distinctly in the surrealist manner. He declares that it was all composed in a feverish trance which lasted for months. The uninitiated would be ill-advised in attempting to make his acquaintance through this novel. Œil-de-Dieu (1925) will prove an easier approach. Hellens says that this book was inspired by his admiration for the multiple personality revealed in Charlie Chaplin's art. The hero is at once Harlequin, Pierrot, and Don Quixote. At the start the intention seems to be a parody of the detective novel; little by little the author falls under the spell of his own creation, who is idealized as a champion of frankness, nobility, and courage in a pusillanimous world. Another novel, Bass-Bassina-Boulou (1922), is the exteriorization, to use one of his favorite words, of the fascination exercised by an African fetish found in a junk shop. The imagined odyssey of this deity includes tragedy, comedy, and social satire, but there is nothing of the reformer in Hellens; he appears rather as an elfish explorer of the uncanny for its own sake. Another source of inspiration comes from memories of his childhood and youth. Le Naïf (1926), Les Filles du désir (1930), and Frédéric (1935) belong to this group. Autobiography? Doubtless, but in Hellens's peculiar manner. "I have only confused memories of objects, but I cannot forget the atmosphere, which is the sonority of things," he says. This sonority of things, real or imaginary, has always guided him. Two psychological novels in more realistic vein are La Femme partagée (1929) and Grippe-cœur (1931). The potentially scabrous theme of the first is handled with extraordinary restraint; the second evolves around little ironies that fester in a tormented spirit to breed tragedy, and the slight action exists only to furnish reminiscences which become half-conscious directors of the heroine's life.

There appear in Hellens's work at the same time unity of inspiration—he is always the seeker of untouched realms of mystery within the familiar—and great variety of execution. Alert to every trend in contemporary literature and often himself a forerunner, he is usually less recondite than his fellow craftsmen of the vanguard. The personal mark is easy to distinguish in all his writing; direct literary influences, if they exist, are so subtle as to defy precision.

See: Nervie, 1932, No. 6 (special issue on Hellens); M. J. Hachelle, L'Œuvre de Franz Hellens; essai bibliographique, critique et iconographique (1937).

B. M. W.

Hellström, Gustaf (1882–, Swedish novelist, short-story writer), educated at the University of Lund, has spent a great deal of his life outside Sweden (in London, Paris, and New York) as foreign correspondent of a leading Swedish newspaper, Dagens nyheter (The Daily News). Because of this extensive residence abroad, Hellström has been able to maintain in the later phases of his work a much more objective attitude toward developments in his homeland than most of his Swedish contemporaries. His heavy, rather serious artistic temperament was ill-adapted to the airy skepticism of some of the turn of the century literature in Sweden which he affected in his earliest tales; but soon after his first residence abroad (in London) he had his first real literary success with Kuskar (1910; Drivers), a volume of tales which reveals a strong English influence in its direct, unassuming realism and its sensitive responsiveness to the fascinating variety of life in a large modern city. During the First World War he continued his literary work in France, writing in addition to a couple of rather unimportant novels with Parisian backgrounds (Kring en kvinna, 1914, About a Woman; Bengt Blancks sentimentala resa, 1917, Bengt Blanck's Sentimental Journey) two serious semijournalistic studies on modern France (Joffre, 1916; and Kulturfaktorn: franska stämningar under världskriget, 1916, The Cultural Factor: French Reactions during the World War). In these he attempted to correct the popular Swedish notion that France was a basically degenerate nation, her higher culture spending itself in a mere play of essentially empty intellectual and artistic subtleties. A clever, broadly ironic book on American upper-class life entitled Ett rekommendationsbrev (1920; A Letter of Introduction) brought to an at least temporary close Hellström's books on the foreign scene. He then turned again to Sweden for material in a number of arresting novels, first in a series of fictionalized autobiographical volumes appearing under the collective title En man utan humor (1921 ff.; A Man without Humor) and then with two works of more purely literary importance, Snörmakare Lekholm får en idé (1927; Eng. tr., Lacemaker Lekholm Has an Idea, 1930) and Carl Heribert Malmros (1931).

Snörmakare Lekholm får en idé is Hellström's one indubitable masterpiece. It is a detailed, unhurried story of three generations of a typical middle-class Swedish family in all of its fortunate and less fortunate ramifications, with the central action of the tale taking place in a small Swedish garrison town, but with appropriate periphery material from other localities being provided to fill in the broader outlines of the family picture. Its general literary model may well have been Arnold Bennett's Clayhanger cycle, though its humor seems to owe more to Dickens and possibly Fielding. Basically, however, Hellström's novel is a fresh, original work, in which comic and half-tragic action are blended in rich human profusion, and in which the elements of narrative structure, characterization, dialogue, and the handling of milieu are everywhere intellectually and aesthetically satisfying. It ranks unquestionably among the few very best Swedish genealogical novels.

See: K. Strömberg, Modern svensk litteratur (1932), pp. 69-70, 134-137; H. Ahlenius, Gustaf Hellström (1934).

A. G.

Hemmer, Jarl (1893-, Finnish poet and novelist writing in Swedish), born in Vaasa, Finland, is the leading younger poet of his country. He lives at Borgå (now called Porvoo), on the southwestern coast near Helsinki, where Finland's great epic master, J. L. Runeberg, spent his declining years. Traditional in form, there is in Hemmer's lyrics the fresh, unmistakable glow of beauty. Love of nature is his predominant theme. Typical of his many volumes is Över dunklet (1919; Above the Dark). Hemmer is also a prose writer of distinction. Best known abroad is his prize novel En man och hans samvete (1931; Eng. tr., A Fool of Faith, 1935), a strong, highly realistic, psychological tale of suffering and hopelessness, describing the tragic experiences of a priest during the Finnish Revolution, 1917-1918.

See: C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (revised and enlarged ed., 1930); G. Bach, The History of the Scandinavian Literatures, ed. by Frederika Blankner (1938).

C. W. S.

Hémon, Louis (1880-1913, French novelist and short-story writer), was born in Brest. He was educated at the Lycée Montaigne and Lycée Louis-le-Grand of Paris. He then studied law at the University of Paris and at the same time attended courses at the School of Oriental Languages, in preparation for entrance into the colonial service of France, a career which, however, he never pursued. In 1903 he went to England as a commercial clerk, remaining in that country until 1911. He had become a devotee of sports and physical fitness, and during this period he wrote many articles and short stories dealing with these subjects for sporting magazines in France. "Lizzie Blakestone," a roman-feuilleton on English life, appeared in 1908 in the Temps of Paris.

In 1911 he went to Canada, working as a translator in Montreal. During a sojourn in the back country north of Quebec in 1912, he was profoundly impressed with the life and character of the French Canadian pioneers of that region, and returning to Montreal in 1913, he wrote his great novel of French Canadian life, Maria Chapdelaine (Eng. tr., 1921). This was published serially, January–February, 1914, in the Temps of Paris, receiving but scant attention from the public and none from the critics. In the meantime Hémon had set out on a walking tour to the Far West. As he was walking along the railroad tracks near the town of Chapleau, Ontario, on the evening of July 8, 1913, he was run over and killed by a train.

His masterpiece, on which his reputation rests, received little attention until it was published in book form in Montreal in 1916 and in Paris by Grasset in 1921. Since then the critics, become enthusiastic, have been practically unanimous in proclaiming it as one of the world's great novels. After his death a number of his short stories were found in manuscript and have been published.

See: René Bazin, "L'Auteur de Maria Chapdelaine: Louis Hémon," Revue des deux mondes, October 1, 1921, pp. 528–554; L. J. Dalbis, Le Bouclier canadien-français (1928); Allan McAndrew, Louis Hémon; sa vie et son œuvre (1936).

L. G. M.

Herczeg, Ferenc (1863–, Hungarian playwright, novelist, and short-story writer), was born in Versecz, but has been a resident of Budapest most of his life. His father was the mayor of Versecz; the family was cultured, and the educational and social opportunities of young Herczeg were very good indeed. He studied law at the University of Budapest, but never practiced. There was a short interlude in his life when he hesitated between German and Hungarian writing; then he chose the Hungarian language as his medium of expression. His life is a success story. While he is not intense, he provides a perfect example of a human destiny governed by a rather exceptional ability and by a sense of decorum that has harmonized with the attitude of the gentry. Herczeg's family belonged to the middle class, but his taste—and perhaps his vanity—induced him to seek the company of the ruling "historical classes"; he was accepted by them, in fact he lived, reflected, and acted exactly as a member of that particular social stratum was expected to live, reflect, and act. He knew how to portray the individuals of this class and their idiosyncrasies; his devotion made him observant and forgiving. As the editor of Uj Idők (New Times), a popular weekly, and of Magyar Figyelő (Hungarian Observer), a political review under the guidance of Count István Tisza, the Hungarian statesman, Herczeg reached both the "bourgeois" and the "historical" elements of the country. In his capacity of writer he represented that sort of entertaining imagination and observation which stimulates but does not profoundly stir. In his ideology he rarely went a step farther than was permissible for a Hungarian gentleman. He made use of almost every literary genre, but it is difficult to say how much of his work promises permanent value. He was appreciated by his nation, especially by his own class, in various ways—politically, socially, in a literary sense. His collected works appeared in 1926.

Herczeg wrote comedies, farces, tragedies, "light" and "heavy" historical and social novels and stories; some of his work has been translated into foreign tongues. Several of his plays were produced on the English and American stage. Yet despite a certain flavor of savoir-vivre that reveals a cosmopolitan temperament, Herczeg wrote as a Hungarian spectator for Hungarian spectators and readers. His literary output is extensive, and few of the foibles of human life and the heroic gestures of its nobility have escaped his observation. With the exception of some short stories, one misses a certain warmth in his work, perhaps the kind of warmth without which one is unable to feel the common lot of mankind. It is this lack of warmth, this detachment, that induced certain critics to call Herczeg a snob, yet it would be wrong to say that he was always emotionally arid. He is the literary gentleman with a monocle, unprepared and unwilling to mingle with those not sufficiently well bred to respect good manners. At first glance it seems that problems interested him merely in relation to his prejudices. A more thorough analysis of his entire work, however, shows that his creative spirit recognized deeper problems, and as a result he has written a few novels, stories, and plays where warmth prevails over his customary aloofness. Trifles and great things alike—in plays as well as in stories—were expressed by Herczeg with a certain mastery of composition, albeit in his earlier works his Hungarian language was sometimes stilted and the manner of phrasing seemed rather Teutonic than Magyar. In his later years he conquered this defect.

Of his gay but superficial stories (several of them dramatized) Gyurkovics lányok (1893; The Gyurkovics Girls) and Gyurkovics fiúk (1895; The Gyurkovics Boys) are the best known. Ludicrous, hilarious, but essentially meaningless scenes and incidents are appropriately portrayed in a light manner. In dealing with his characters—and this applies to later stories and novels too, e.g., Szabolcs házassága (1904; The Marriage of Szabolcs) or Egy leány története (1904; The Story of a Girl)—Herczeg does not seem dismayed by the shallow existence of his “heroes” and “heroines.” He perceives their emptiness, but is amused by their charm or is detached about them. Gradually the atmosphere of his fiction became more serious. In his historical novels, e.g., Pogányok (1902; Pagans) and Az élet kapuja (1919; Life’s Gate), the writer makes us understand certain problems that the Hungarian nation has had to face during its history; he writes with the conscience of a patriot and with the meticulousness of an artist. In his social novels, e.g., Idegenek közt (1900; Among Strangers) and Az arany hegedű (1916; The Golden Violin), Herczeg reached a level of creative honesty that did not allow him to be blinded by the prejudices of his class. Of course his sympathies and antipathies were always conditioned by the ironic intelligence of one who belonged to the privileged classes; but greed, selfishness, tactlessness, rudeness, “gogetting,” received condemnation from him, even when observed in “gentlemen.” His comedies are romantic, pleasant, yet somehow second-rate, though never cheap. Of his psychological plays Kék róka (1917; Blue Fox) is the best; his best tragedy is Bizánc (1904; Byzantium). Some of his historical plays are paraphrased presentations of modern Hungarian problems, e.g., A hid (1925; The Bridge). The play Ocskay brigádéros (1901; Brigadier Ocskay) is patriotic pyrotechnics. The most definite criticism one might make of Herczeg is that there is no haunting magic in his art; it is efficient, perplexing, entertaining, biased, but never overwhelming.

See: J. Horváth, Herczeg Ferenc (1925); M. Rubinyi, Herczeg Ferenc (1926); J. Gassner, Masters of the Drama (1940).

J. R.

Heredia, José Maria de (1842–1905, French poet), was, in the words of his biographer Ibrovac, an offspring of the Vikings and the conquistadores: he was born in Cuba to a Spanish father, descendant of Don Pedro de Heredia who in 1532 founded a city on the South American coast, and a French mother, one of whose ancestors, Girard d’Ouville, had been président à mortier of the Normandy Parliament under Louis XV. Except for two years at the Royal College of Havana, he received his entire education in France, so that it was easy for him to adopt as his own the country and language of his mother. His financial independence enabled him to devote himself to the career of amateur man of letters. In his early 20’s he became associated with a group of young poets who, under the leadership of Leconte de Lisle and Banville (qq.v.), launched the Parnassian movement, and it was later to be his proudest boast that he was the élève bien-aimé of Leconte de Lisle. The six sonnets which he contributed to the 1866 Parnasse contemporain and the 25 printed in that of 1876 furnished the nucleus for his only original literary production, Les Trophées, a volume projected as early as 1866 but not published until 1893. This work was composed of 118 sonnets, three poems in terza rima on episodes from the Spanish Romancero, and a 700-line prologue, in alexandrine couplets, to a projected epic on the conquest of Peru (Les Conquérants de l’or, which never advanced beyond this stage). It was enthusiastically received, and in the very next year Heredia was elected to the French Academy, where his discours de réception evoked high praise. During his last 20 years his apartment, first in the Rue Balzac and then at the Arsenal, of which he was appointed librarian in 1901, was the rendezvous of the literary tout Paris. Of his three daughters, the eldest became the wife of the critic René Doumic (q.v.), the second, a poet and novelist in her own right who signed herself Gérard d’Houville (q.v.), married Henri de Régnier (q.v.), and the third married Pierre Louÿs (q.v.).

Heredia’s place in the history of literature is unique, resting as it does upon a single volume of poems, all but four of which are written in the same form—the strictly regular Petrarchan sonnet. Les Trophées is, in several essential respects, a very remarkable work. Unlike most other lyric poets, Heredia is here, in the main, rigorously impersonal in his treatment of his subject matter which is nothing more or less than the history of civilization. The sonnets, grouped under five rubrics (“La Grèce et la Sicile,” “Rome et les barbares,” “Le Moyen Age et la Renaissance,” “L’Orient et les tropiques,” and “La Nature et le rêve”), form a series of thumbnail sketches of episodes, personages, and scenes which make of them a miniature Légende des siècles. These sketches are written in a language which, for flamboyance and rarity of vocabulary, for sonority of rhythm and richness of rhyme, and for pictorial and sculptural effect, has rarely been surpassed. The sonnets are marvels of condensation and suggestion; whatever their theme—Perseus’ rescue of Andromeda, Anthony and Cleopatra before the battle of Actium, the visit of the Three Wise Kings, the discovery of a hemisphere, a Breton landscape—they are, at one and the same time, as clear-cut as cameos and as evocative as Chopin preludes. They are poetry transmuted into painting, sculpture, and architecture and as such a supreme achievement in the realm of the transposition d'art. What they lack in depth of feeling they compensate for in perfection of form. Les Trophées constitutes one of the culminating points in the objective and plastic phases of Parnassian poetry.

Heredia also contributed to periodicals a few poems (not included in Les Trophées) and articles and made two translations, Véridique Histoire de la conquête de la Nouvelle Espagne (4 vols., 1877–1887) from the Spanish of Bernal Díaz del Castillo and La Nonne Alferez (1894) from that of Catalina de Erauso. He was co-editor, with André de Guerne, of Leconte de Lisle's Derniers Poèmes (1895), and on his death he left a critical edition of André Chénier's Les Bucoliques, which was published in 1905.

See: Miodrag Ibrovac, José-Maria de Heredia; sa vie, son œuvre (1923) and Les Sources des Trophées (1923).

A. S.

Hermann-Neisse, Max (1886–1941, German poet, novelist, and dramatist), was born in Neisse, Silesia, and as a youth went to Berlin. Here, a little man with a large hunchback and a face like the mask of a very old person, he lived a quiet life, devoted only to his literary work and to his wife Leni, whom he glorified in many poems. He started in the ironic and experimental idiom of certain Berlin groups (Porträte des Provinztheaters, 1913; Sie und die Stadt, 1914), but soon found his own melody in carefully rhymed verses, far removed from the eccentricities of his expressionistic friends. There is almost no development in his work from the early books (Empörung, Andacht, Ewigkeit, 1917; Verbannung, 1919; Die Preisgabe, 1919; Im Stern des Schmerzes, 1924; Einsame Stimme, 1928; Abschied, 1928; Musik der Nacht, 1932) to his last two collections of poems, written in exile (Um uns die Fremde, 1936; Letzte Gedichte, 1941). He also wrote several novels (Cajetan Schaltermann, 1920; Der Flüchtling, 1921; Der Todeskandidat, 1927) and a number of farcelike comedies. But his true literary achievement lies in his poetry, so full of melancholy, accompanied by a little irony and much admiration for the beauties of this world.

K. P.

Hermant, Abel (1862–, French novelist and playwright), was born in Paris. He entered the Ecole Normale Supérieure in 1880 and left it after a year. In 1883 a volume of his verse, Les Mépris, was published. He became an outstanding figure in the field of fiction in 1887 with the publication of his third novel, Le Cavalier Miserey, a realistic picture of military life. He was elected to the French Academy in 1927—from which he was ejected in 1945 for his allegiance to the political regime of Marshal Pétain.

One of the most prolific writers of our time, Hermant has made important contributions in every genre. His first novels, Monsieur Rabosson (1884), La Mission de Cruchod (1885), Le Cavalier Miserey (1887), Nathalie Madoré (1888), were strongly influenced by his masters, the naturalists. After Les Confidences d'une aïeule (1893), he developed a style of his own in the manner of the 18th-century satirical novelists. In 1901 Souvenirs du vicomte de Courpière, par un témoin marked the beginning of the Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la société, which ended in 1937 with La Dernière Incarnation de Monsieur de Courpière. The whole series (20 volumes) shows Hermant at his best, always witty, at times bitterly sarcastic (see the five volumes on M. de Courpière; the three volumes on the cadet de Coutras; Les Grands Bourgeois, 1906; Les Renards, 1912), but also serious and discreetly subjective (the four volumes of confessions; the trilogy D'une guerre à l'autre guerre, consisting of L'Aube ardente, 1919, La Journée brève, 1920, Le Crépuscule tragique, 1921). Hermant has also written short stories and novelettes (Eddy et Paddy, 1895), 20 comedies of manners, two volumes of memoirs (Souvenirs de la vie frivole, 1933; Souvenirs de la vie mondaine, 1935), several essays and critical studies, and, in the last 20 years, important contributions to the campaign for the preservation of the French language (Xavier, ou les Entretiens sur la grammaire française, 1923; Lettres à Xavier sur l'art d'écrire, 1925; Remarques and Nouvelles Remarques de M. Lancelot pour la défense de la langue française, both 1929; Les Samedis de M. Lancelot, 1931; Ainsi parla M. Lancelot, 1932).

A strict observer of the classical disciplines, Abel Hermant ranks as an admirable stylist, a keen psychologist, the wittiest and most cruel observer of the society of his time.

See: R. Peltier, Abel Hermant; son œuvre (1924); A. Thérive, Essai sur Abel Hermant (1926); "Hommage à Abel Hermant," Divan, XIX (No. 126, February, 1927), 1–108.

M. E. C.

Hérolde, André Ferdinand (1865–, French poet and dramatist), grandson of the composer Louis Joseph Ferdinand Hérolde, was born in Paris. There, after completing his classical studies, he received a scholarly training at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes and the Ecole des Chartes, with special emphasis on Sanskrit language and literature. From this erudite culture came the main source of inspiration for his dramatic and poetic writings. With remarkable skill he adapted to the French stage several examples of ancient Hindu drama, among them L'Anneau de Çakuntala (1895), from the well-known heroic pastoral of the poet Kalidasa. His translations of the masterpieces of Greek tragedy, presented to the public at the Odéon in Paris, include Les Perses (1896), Electre (1908), Les Sept contre Thèbes (1909), and Andromaque (1909).

Steeped in the symbolist movement, Hérolde utilized the legends of ancient civilizations to illustrate his philosophical and humanitarian ideas, in such poems as Les Images tendres et merveilleuses (1897). However, in other collections, restraining his penchant for erudition and his fondness for the past, he expresses with tenderness his own personal emotions, as in Au hasard des chemins (1900). He can also render with delicate feeling his impressions of man and nature seen through his temperament. In this mood were conceived Les Pœans et les thrènes (1890), Chevaleries sentimentales (1893), and Intermède pastoral (1896). In all these poems Hérolde combines a wealth of images with a learned and rare vocabulary, which only a trained philologist can fully appreciate and understand. In the matter of technique his verse is more or less emancipated in the manner of Verlaine (q.v.), but it never reaches the complete freedom of vers libre, which he considers as an inferior medium, at most an interesting experiment. On the other hand, an ardent champion of the new school of poetry, he is perhaps the best theorician of symbolism, which he defined and illustrated in numerous literary reviews and in a course of lectures at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes.

See: Rémy de Gourmont, Le Livre des masques (1896); André Barre, Le Symbolisme (1912); Adolphe van Bever and Paul Léautaud, Poètes d'aujourd'hui (1929).

M. D.

Hervieu, Paul (1857–1915, French novelist and playwright), born at Neuilly-sur-Seine, had a career as lawyer and diplomat. His first literary contributions were signed Eliacin. He became known first as a short-story writer and a novelist with Diogène le chien (1882), L'Alpe homicide (1886), L'Inconnu (1887), Flirt (1890); these early works already showed remarkable qualities of analysis.

In 1890 Hervieu wrote his first play, Point de lendemain, and two years later Les Paroles restent. Then came his two best novels, Peints par eux-mêmes (1893), a bitter satire of French society, and L'Armature (1895), a study of the importance of money in the modern world. After 1895 he used the theatre as a constant vehicle to expose social evils and suggest their possible cure—Les Tenailles (1893), La Loi de l'homme (1897), L'Enigme (1901), La Course du flambeau (1901), Le Dédale (1903), Le Réveil (1905), Modestie (1909), Connais-toi (1909), Bagatelle (1912), Le Destin est maître (1914). A historical drama, Théroigne de Méricourt (1902), was the only interruption to this series of problem plays.

Hervieu treats the eternal themes of divorce, family honor, the relationship between parents and children. He writes with an extreme concision and a strict adherence to rules. He continues the tradition of the classic playwright, but his dramas, impeccably put together, suffer from a sort of mathematical logic, from an oversimplification which results in artificiality. His style has often been criticized for its lack of spontaneity and its unnatural pomposity.

See: Charles Malherbe, Paul Hervieu (1912); T. D. Barker, "Reading List on Paul Hervieu," Bulletin of Bibliography, VIII (1914), 40; Edmond Estève, Paul Hervieu, conteur, moraliste et dramaturge (1917); Claude Ferval, Paul Hervieu (1917).

M. E. C.

Herzog, Emile, see Maurois, André.

Hesse, Hermann (1877–, German novelist and poet), son and grandson of missionaries in India, was born in the Swabian city of Calw, idyllic background of many of his earlier stories. When 13 years old, he decided to become a poet, lost interest in his schoolwork, and was forced to leave the theological preparatory school at Maulbronn; later, in a similar mood, he left the Gymnasium at Cannstatt. While employed as a mechanic in Calw and as a bookseller in Tübingen and Basel, he relentlessly pursued his education through reading.

Hesse became famous through his novel Peter Camenzind (1904), the story of the dreamer from the uplands who, after plunging into the decadent artist's life in Paris, finally discovers in the spirit of St. Francis of Assisi the intimate life with nature for which he longs. Hesse's musical prose and delicate portrayal of natural scenery are the outstanding features of his earlier narratives, e.g., Unterm Rad (1905), in which a young boy breaking down under the strain of study drowns himself, and Nachbarn (1908), where small-town life is pictured with the sympathetic and humorous touch of a Gottfried Keller (q.v.). Hesse's qualities are especially apparent in the touching stories of Knulp (1915), the beloved vagabond, who brings to everyone happiness and a little longing for freedom and who dies in the blizzard arguing humbly with the Lord over the "futility" of his life. Here and in other stories young Hesse glorifies childhood as the only period when man can abandon himself to his innocent senses and live a full life. After we have crossed the threshold of puberty, life can never be the same for us. Hence the gentle retrospective melancholy pervading these early stories. In 1911 Hesse left his wife and three sons and the beautiful home on Lake Constance and decided upon an extended trip to India. Hesse's marital difficulties are projected into the figure of the famous painter Veraguth in the novel Rosshalde (1914).

The First World War threw Hesse into the severest crisis. When he publicly regretted the terrible bloodshed and hatred, he was treated as a traitor and forsaken by his friends. He began to probe ever deeper into his own soul and assumed his full share of personal responsibility for the savagery rampant in Europe. Before he moved to southern Switzerland in 1919, Hesse lived in Bern, a center of psychoanalysis. His psychoanalytical novel Demian (1919; Eng. tr., 1923) made a deep impression on the young people emerging from the war. With subtle and searching insight Hesse traces the mental development of a sensitive individual through childhood and adolescence, through revolt and spiritual loneliness, until occult forces guide him to "Frau Eva," who appears as the symbol of creative and all-embracing life. Hesse's relation to the orthodox world of his father and the poet's absorption in Indian mysticism are reflected in Siddhartha (1923), the story of the son who must move ever further away from paternal wisdom into a worldly life before he can find his spiritual self. Der Steppenwolf (1927; Eng. tr., Steppenwolf, 1929), leading into the pleasure world of large cities, is a severe indictment of our present cultureless age. It lays bare the wolfish, infernal instincts that lurk so closely beside our cultured selves. In its deadly seriousness, in its unremitting introspection and psychoanalytic imagery, it is a bewildering novel that aroused much discussion. Narziss und Goldmund (1930; Eng. tr., Death and the Lover, 1932) is a masterpiece. Narziss, the abbot and ascetic scholar, who lives in a world of lofty abstract thought, is contrasted with Goldmund, his beloved pupil, who leaves the monastery to experience life's pain in mortal danger and guilt and life's rapture as woman after woman offers her love to him. The thinker and the creative artist, each serving God in his own way, are united by bonds of mutual understanding. A novel by Hesse entitled Das Glasperlenspiel was published in 1943. Hesse's poetry (Gedichte, 1922; Trost der Nacht, 1929), alternately sombre, radiant, and idyllic, very melodious, revealing its depth through subtle symbolism, is popular because, steeped in the tradition of German romanticism, it is yet thoroughly modern and personal.

Hesse, "the last of the German romanticists," is a great individualist. The problem of spiritual loneliness occurs again and again in his works. These constitute a continuous effort on his part to find himself, for "man's soul is his fate."

See: Hugo Ball, Hermann Hesse (1927); H. R. Schmid, Hermann Hesse (1928).

E. Hof.

Heym, Georg (1887-1912, German lyric poet), was born at Hirschberg in Silesia, of an old family of clergymen and civil servants. Having completed the Gymnasium in Berlin, he studied law at Würzburg and Berlin. In January, 1912, while skating on the Havel river near Berlin, he and a friend were drowned. Not yet 25, flashing with life, he went to a death which he had earlier described many times with gruesome joy.

Influenced by Baudelaire and Rimbaud (q.v.), Heym's verses precede German expressionism like a tragic prologue. He was the first in modern German literature who strove for a new release of his consciousness and innermost experience and whose attitude towards life was entirely distinct from that of the naturalists. In his two books of poetry, Der ewige Tag (1911) and Umbra vitae (1912), even the somber titles indicate some of the recurrent motifs of his verses, written in an eccentric technique. They were breathtaking visions and unheard-of and gigantic allegories in which he tried to reflect the horror and terrible solitude of the modern large cities. Cruelly and inexorably he spoke in his rhythms of the monster Berlin and its soul-devouring dreadfulness. Envisioning a modern Inferno, he thrust into eternal pain those condemned to the misery and agony of modern cities. All these motifs were presented even more strikingly in the second volume of his poems, published posthumously. The cities, once a goal of yearning for the poets, are now cursed: they are full of evil and hellish demons, and to live in them means endless torture. Combined with such interpretation of the mercilessness of the cities and the resulting melancholy of their inhabitants is an uncanny foreboding of the horrors of modern warfare. In his volume of short stories, Der Dieb (1912), the same outcry of a tormented human heart can be heard. There is more in Heym's verses than mere "glimpses in gloom with the phosphorescence of fine poetry." Many motifs of more recent poetry were anticipated by him.

Sec: A. Ruest, "Ein toter Sänger des Krieges," (Literarische Echo, XVII (1914-1915), pp. 391-396; B. Deutsch and A. Yarmolinsky, Contemporary German Poetry; an Anthology (1923), pp. xxii-xxiv, 191.

H. Sch.

Heyse, Paul (1830-1914, German novelist and dramatist), was born in Berlin, where both his father and his grandfather, the compiler of a standard dictionary, had been well-known linguists. Paul's mother came from the family of a well-to-do Jewish court jeweler related to the Mendelssohns. He studied the classics at the University of Berlin for two years, chose Romance languages for his specialty, and took a doctor's degree, with a dissertation on the poetry of the troubadours. In 1852 he made his first journey to Italy, the land of his deepest and most lasting sympathies, in order to do research on Provençal manuscripts and in preparation for his career as university lecturer. He returned to Berlin; at the age of 24 he was called to Munich to the court of the Bavarian king, Maximilian II. Here he became a member of the recently established Round Table of the King, and the guarantee of a generous honorarium freed him for the rest of his life from all financial worries. Although he had at this time published only a few romantic stories and verses, one tragedy, and one short story (his renowned L'Arrabbiata, which, from a technical point of view, he never surpassed), Heyse abandoned Romance philology and settled in the Bavarian capital. Soon he shared the honor of being a leading member of the new "Münchener Dichterkreis" with his friend the poet Emanuel Geibel, to whose recommendation he owed the original royal invitation. Shortly after his arrival in Munich, Heyse married, but his wife died in 1862. Though he found happiness in a second marriage in 1867, he went through many personal sorrows; his amazing literary productiveness, however, was not affected. When King Maximilian II died in 1864, his successor, Ludwig II, known for his enthusiastic patronage of Richard Wagner (q.v.), generously continued the stipend. In the last years of the century Heyse became one of the most bitter enemies of the naturalistic and impressionistic schools of writers, although he was a good friend of Ibsen's (q.v.) during the latter's stay in Munich. He disliked what he considered the naturalistic reveling in the baser aspects of life; he felt that German letters had taken a trend which he was unable to follow. This animosity led to passionate attacks upon him by some of the representatives of other literary schools. After many years of fame Heyse now experienced personal hostility and even oblivion. In 1910, however, the Nobel prize was awarded to him—the first German writer so honored—in recognition of the fact that he was one of the finest craftsmen of the German 19th-century novel. A few months before the outbreak of the First World War, Heyse died in his Munich home.

In the course of his long life Heyse produced about 120 Novellen, six large novels, numerous narrative and lyric poems, some 60 plays, and many translations from Italian, Spanish, and English literature. Much of the translation is masterly, above all the versions of modern Italian poets such as Giusti and Leopardi. Among his Novellen the best are L'Arrabbiata (1855; Eng. tr., 1855), Das Mädchen von Treppi (1858; Eng. trs., The Maiden of Treppi, Love's Victory, both 1874), Andrea Delfin (1859; Eng. tr., 1864), and Der Wein Hüter von Meran (1864). Many of the tales have an Italian background and served to stimulate the imagination of those who, faithful to the old German yearning, drew their inspiration from Italy. Among his long novels is Kinder der Welt (1872; Eng. tr., Children of the World, 1882). None of the 60 plays was a stage success. All in all, Heyse was a brilliant if at times unduly conscious representative of German realism.

See: Heyse, Jugenderinnerungen und Bekennnisse (2 vols.; 5th ed., 1912); A. Farinelli, Paul Heyse (1913).

H. Sch.

Hilbert, Jaroslav (1871-1936, Czech dramatist), is the most important Czech playwright before the First World War. He was born in Louny, but spent most of his life in Prague as a journalist and theatre critic and there he died. Vina (1896; The Guilt) was one of the greatest successes of the Prague National Theatre. It came at a time when Ibsen (q.v.) had begun to penetrate into Bohemia and when the theatre had a group of excellent actors (especially Hana Kvapilová and Edvard Vojan) of this new naturalistic style. Vina is an extremely effective imitation of Ibsen and portrays a sensitive, "fallen" girl who perishes by the consciousness of her guilt and the brutality of the man. O Boha (1898; Of God), later renamed Pěst (The Fist), is a religious drama depicting the revolt of a desperate mother against God and his decrees, while Psaní (1900; The Outlaws) analyzes the problems of decadence in a style which attempts symbolism in a realistic setting reminiscent of the later Ibsen. Hilbert outgrew the Ibsen period and turned to history as a source of material for his plays. Falkenštejn (1903) has a hero whose desire for liberty is crushed by small-minded neighbors and the treachery of his wife; Kolumbus (1915; Columbus) interprets the character of the explorer as that of a great man cheated of his just reward by fate and by his contemporaries. After the war Hilbert turned to plays drawn from the life of the Prague bourgeoisie which he judges with stern, conservative ethical standards and finds corrupt and materialistic. Druhý břeh (1924; The Second Shore) is a well-constructed and extremely effective acting play. Bliženci (1931; The Twins) is drawn from the heroic story of the Czech legions in Siberia, and Michael (1935) turns to the conflict of aristocracy and bourgeoisie. The numerous comedies and some prose are of less importance. Hilbert had a fine sense of the stage; he was a strong moralist with clear conceptions, but the very rationalism of his mind, the hardheaded speculation, make his plays cerebral and, in a curious manner, dated.

See: J. Knap, Hilbert; případ české dramaticky (1926).

R. W.

Hille, Peter (1854–1904, German poet, novelist, and playwright), was born in Erwitzen, Westphalia. He was a schoolmate in Münster of Heinrich and Julius Hart (q.v.), in whose school paper his first poems appeared and who remained his friends and admirers throughout his strange life. A true poet and mystic, this wayward genius, following an insatiable wanderlust, roamed about Europe as a poor, penniless tramp, happy and content with his lot, having neither wants nor ambitions and enjoying the beauty of the world with child-like faith and wonder. According to his biographer Heinrich Hart, he never lacked ideas. He would jot them down on any available scrap of paper and then stuff the paper into his pocket or into a sack in which he carried his few belongings. It is not surprising that most of Peter Hille's writing was fragmentary and not published until after his death, when it was collected and edited by the Harts. Hille failed whenever he attempted more ambitious works, as in his novels (Die Sozialisten, 1887; Die Hassenburg, 1905) or in Des Platonikers Sohn (1896), the only play he completed. They are deficient in structure and lacking in development. His domain was the prose sketch, marked by striking aphorisms, and the short lyrical poem expressing a variety of moods. To quote Julius Hart: "His art explains too little and does not organize its material, does not subject it to any unifying purpose. It is no art of order and composition, of plans and rules, but full of intangible suggestions and strong sense impressions, born from absorbing observation and sincere emotional response."

See: H. Hart, Peter Hille (1904).

O. S. F.

Hippius, Zinaida Nikolayevna (1869–1945, Russian poet, essayist, and critic), born in Belev, Tula Province, came of an old Germanic family of nobles. As a child she traveled much in Russia with her family, to Saratov, Kharkov, St. Petersburg, Moscow. In her youth Hippius was sickly, and the doctors suspected congenital tuberculosis; the family therefore moved to Yalta in 1884. Although she attended no school, Hippius was an avid reader and was particularly fond of Nadson's (q.v.) poetry, but her own poetic experiments little resembled his verses. In 1888, while in Tiflis, Hippius met D. S. Merezhkovski (q.v.), who had recently launched on his literary career. They were married the following year and moved to St. Petersburg, where they began to cultivate literary friends; their home eventually became a salon for modernist writers and philosophers. Hippius was the life of these gatherings, and it was largely due to her efforts that meetings of the Religious-Philosophical Society were organized in 1901–1902. She also was instrumental in establishing the periodical Novy put (1903–1909; The New Path). Her charm, wit, and shrewd analytical ability were greatly esteemed. In 1905–1906 the Merezhkovskis displayed sympathy for the revolutionary movement and were obliged to leave the country for several years. In the course of the next decade, however, their political opinions underwent a definite change, and after the October Revolution they emigrated and joined the anti-Soviet camp of Russians abroad.

Although Hippius wrote some short stories (Zerkala, 1897; The Mirrors), novelettes, and dramas (Chyortova kukla, 1911, The Devil's Doll; Roman-Tsarevich, 1914; Zelyonoye koltso, 1914, The Green Ring), her prose fiction is inferior to her poetry and criticism. Her prose works show the influence of Dostoevski (q.v.) modified by that of modern decadence. Unlike her prose, which at times shows an awareness of social problems, Hippius's poetry is quite detached from reality. Her verse—she did not create in quantity and wrote only when she “felt she could not do otherwise”—presents a curious blend of devout religious mysticism and decadent aestheticism often touched with perversity. Her first two books of verse, entitled Sobraniye stikhov (Vol. I, 1904, Vol. II, 1910; A Collection of Poems), contain her finest poetry. Her critical essays, Literaturnyi dnevnik (1911; A Literary Diary), display a penetrating brilliance rare in journalism. After the Revolution, Hippius wrote two books of essays, Chernaya knizhka (1924; The Black Book) and Sinyaya kniga (1929; The Blue Book), in which she gave vent to her violent antipathy to the Soviet regime. She also produced a series of literary sketches, Zhivyya litsa (1924; Living Faces). Her work of the last two decades has little literary merit.

See: V. Bryusov, “Z. N. Hippius,” in S. A. Vengerov, ed., Russkaya literatura XX veka, I (1914), 178–188.

O. M.

Hlaváček, Karel (1874–1898, Czech poet), was a prominent poet of the Czech “decadence.” He was born in a suburb of Prague, the son of a laborer, and made a precarious living as draftsman and illustrator. He died of tuberculosis at the age of 24. His poetry combines the technique of symbolism and the melancholy fin-de-siècle mood with a proletarian's hatred for the rich and powerful. Pozdě k ránu (1896; Early, towards Morning) contains melodious, dreamy lyrics somewhat in the style of Verlaine (q.v.), while Mstivá kantiléna (1898; The Revengeful Cantilene) uses the masque of the 17th-century gueux to express the poet's desperate struggle against death and his revolt against social oppression. The contrast between the sophisticated and artificial technique and the raw content is frequently remarkable. A collection of prose poems, Žalmy (Psalms), was not published until 1934.

See: F. Soldan, Karel Hlaváček, typ české decadence (1930); J. Mukařovský, introduction to Hlaváček, Žalmy (1934); F. X. Šalda, Mladé zápasy (1934).

R. W.

Hoel, Sigurd (1890–, Norwegian novelist and critic), has two major strings to his bow, the post-war, urban milieu of Oslo and the memories of a rural childhood in Nord-Odal. From a scientific course at the university he turned to teaching, but has mostly worked as a journalist and literary critic. He is noted as a purveyor of European and American literature to his countrymen, having translated such writers as Faulkner, Conrad, and Erskine Caldwell, and having edited a series of translations with introductions, the latter published separately as 50 gule (1939; 50 Yellow-jacketed Books). These brilliant critiques reveal a subtle, ironic mind, averse to sentimentality, inclined to view the world intellectually rather than emotionally. His novels and short stories show in addition a certain awareness of Freudian doctrine, and in technique they are comparable to the stories of Vicki Baum and Ernest Hemingway. Human problems in a post-war world occupied him from the start, in the short stories of Veien vi gaar (1922; The Road We Travel) and the novel Syustjernen (1924; The Pleiades). Hoel's characters are usually rootless figures in earnest search of happiness and are all too often frustrated in their longing. The theme is graciously and amusingly handled in Syndere i sommertid (1927; Eng. tr., Sinners in Summertime, 1930), wherein a group of intellectual youth attempt in vain to take love lightly and cynically. The young man in Ingenting (1929; Nothing) finds exactly what the title states. En dag i oktober (1931; Eng. tr., One Day in October, 1932) is the tragicomic story of how bourgeois society stamps out happiness because it fears its effects. Both in this book and in Fjorten dager før frostnettene (1935; Fourteen Days before the Frost Nights) we meet the intellectual who is unable to assimilate love into his life. Sesam sesam (1938; Open Sesame) is a witty and malicious satire on the literary life of a European capital. In the meanwhile Hoel had created a deeper form in his stories of childhood, Veien til verdens ende (1933; Road to the World's End), and Prinsessen på glassberget (1939; The Princess on the Glass Mountain). Both titles are drawn from well-known Norwegian child's stories, and the books are simply but cleverly told reconstructions of a child's view of the world. Here too there are happinesses and frustrations, the material out of which Hoel's modern world is created.

Hoel wrote critical articles of importance in Samtiden (1924, 1925, 1929) and also a defense of his own writing (1932); there followed a caustic analysis by Eugenia Kielland and a reply by Arnulf Överland (Samtiden, 1934).

See: K. Elster, "Sigurd Hoel," in Norsk biografisk leksikon VI (1934), 171-173.

E. H.

Hofmannsthal, Hugo von (1874-1929, Austrian poet, dramatist, novelist, and essayist), was born in Vienna and died in near-by Rodaun in a charming baroque mansion which he had occupied since his marriage in 1901. Except for summers spent in the Austrian Alps and travels throughout Europe, especially Italy, he did not leave the vicinity of the capital of the old empire whose great literary representative he was. In his own ancestry as in that ancient community of nations were mixed many races and many classes—Austrian peasants, Jewish merchants, and Lombard patricians. In his mind as on the cosmopolitan scene of the Hapsburg Empire lived many regions and many ages—oriental dream, occidental thought, and Mediterranean form. This diversity was to him both a blessing and a burden, but he increasingly realized that it was a part of his Austrian heritage. Such an inheritance, too, was Hofmannsthal's lifelong obsession with the theatre and opera, those great forms of the baroque from which Austrian culture stems. Strengthened by this tradition, Hofmannsthal and his friends of Jungwien, Arthur Schnitzler, Richard Beer-Hofmann, and Hermann Bahr (qq.v.), were but little affected by the Berlin naturalism. Rather they sailed in that European current which is insufficiently defined as "neo-romanticism" or "symbolism." Hofmannsthal's true contemporaries and his only peers in German letters are Stefan George (q.v.), with whom he had a short but significant association (see Briefwechsel zwischen George und Hofmannsthal, 1938), and R. M. Rilke (q.v.).

Hofmannsthal's beginnings as a writer were marked by astonishing precocity. At the age of 16 his first verses were published, at 17 his first play (Gestern) and the first of his illuminating essays on the modern writers of Italy, France, England, and Scandinavia. At 18 he reached maturity as a master of German verse, and a small group of poems and a series of short plays written within the seven following years are of matchless beauty. Among the latter are Der Tod des Tizian (1892; Eng. tr., Death of Titian, 1913), a hymn on the unity of art and life; Der Tor und der Tod (1893; Eng. tr., Death and the Fool, 1913), the condemnation and redemption of an aesthete; Alkestis (1895), a drama of vicarious death; Der Kaiser und die Hexe (1896), an eerie play of enchantment and deliverance; Das kleine Welttheater (1897), a mysterious pageant of life; Der Abenteurer und die Sängerin (1899; Eng. tr., The Adventurer and the Singer, 1917), about the grandeur and the misery of the adventurer; Die Hochzeit der Sobeide (1899; Eng. tr., The Marriage of Sobeide, 1913), about youthful dream and disenchantment; and Das Bergwerk von Falun (1899), an initiation into the mystery of existence. Hardly two of these are alike, but they are all united by their rare blending of grace with wisdom and their intense awareness of the magic of the world.

Hofmannsthal had reached in this early work an apogee; the youthful state of inspiration that had been his could not be prolonged without insincerity. As he emerged from an inner crisis he resumed his work on another plane. Hofmannsthal's middle period is marked by an outward expansion. He strove to master the form of high tragedy reinterpreting old dramatic themes, such as Elektra (1903; Eng. tr., Electra, 1908), Ödipus und die Sphinx (1906), and Das gerettete Venedig (1905; Eng. tr., Venice Preserved, 1915), after Otway. He entered the field of comedy in Cristinas Heimreise (1910; Eng. tr., Christina's Journey Home, 1917), Der Rosenkavalier (1911; Eng. tr., The Rose-Bearer, 1912), and Ariadne auf Naxos (1912; Eng. tr., Ariadne on Naxos, 1913). The last two, as well as Elektra, were set to music by the composer Richard Strauss (see their Briefwechsel, 1926, Eng. tr., 1927), for whom Hofmannsthal subsequently wrote Die Frau ohne Schatten (1919), Die ägyptische Helena (1928), and Arabella (1933), all of them literary creations in their own right. The increased interest in the theatre that is manifested in this association resulted also in collaboration with the producer Max Reinhardt, for whom Hofmannsthal translated and adapted plays by Sophocles, Calderón, and Molière as well as the old Everyman (Jedermann, 1911; Eng. tr., The Play of Everyman, 1917). This was the period of Hofmannsthal's greatest public success.

For some years, however, an inner transformation had been preparing in the poet's mind when the outbreak of the war and subsequently the fall of Austria painfully interrupted the outward expansion of his life and work and turned him to introspection into the roots of his existence. He became now more than ever an ardent interpreter and advocate of his native land and its European mission. In Der Rosenkavalier and in the novel Andreas, begun before the war and published posthumously (1932; Eng. tr., 1936) as a beautiful fragment, he had already returned to the native scene. Now he portrayed the Austrian character in the delightful comedy Der Schwierige (1921). In the Salzburg Festivals which he founded with Max Reinhardt he undertook to carry on Austria's theatrical mission as he saw it. To these festivals he dedicated Das Salzburger Grosse Welttheater (1922), in which he refashioned Calderón's dramatic allegory into an expression of his enlightened conservatism. He proclaimed a "conservative revolution" in his speech Das Schrifttum als geistiger Raum der Nation (1927). His desire to safeguard a European heritage which he saw threatened from below and without now pervades every word of his, written or spoken. Hofmannsthal's production during these years culminates in two works—the symbolic tale Die Frau ohne Schatten (1919), a fuller treatment of the subject of his opera and the key to his personal and poetic being, and the gigantic dramatic composition Der Turm (1923; new version, 1927), an attempt to interpret the spiritual as well as the political revolution of his time and to ban the evil forces whose rampant growth he watched with clairvoyant anxiety. Der Turm is the only one completed of many dramatic plans found in Hofmannsthal's papers (see Semiramis, 1933; Dramatische Entwürfe aus dem Nachlass, 1936; etc.) in which he seemed to strive for a new dramatic form, a symbolic realism, inspired by Calderón and the drama of the baroque, and full development of which was interrupted by his untimely death.

Rarely has a poet commanded such a wealth of different materials, moods, and manners. There is the magic of the Arabian Nights and the severity of the medieval morality, the passionate uproar of Dionysian Greece and the morbid charm of dying Venice, the rustic purity of Carinthian peasants and the mellow abundance of the Renaissance, the naïve grace of Mozartian rococo and the apocalyptic gloom of the baroque. In this pageant of masques, where is the author's own face?

This question is relevant, for his was a sensitivity that in great moments endowed him with a feeling of mystical identity with every life however remote from his own. He proclaimed the glory of this state in the characters of emperors and spirits, of artists and lovers, he revealed it in childhood and wealth, in magic and madness. But he is also aware of its ambiguous nature—its inhumanity and its impotence. The aesthete in his ivory tower, the beautiful but barren woman, the actor who is never himself, the adventurer who is not twice the same, are among the symbols which express the doubtful aspects of that privilege. It may become angels or children, but men must accept life, however ugly and sordid it be and even though they may have to pay for it with guilt and pain. The "way into life" now becomes Hofmannsthal's leading theme. It may be achieved by love or by deed, by marriage or parenthood or by assuming one's position in the order of society and in the continuity of history. Thus the mystical strain in Hofmannsthal's work is complemented by another that may truly be called moral. These two knit his work into one, lending it a profundity beneath the beauty of its surface that was overlooked by many of his earlier critics. Since Hofmannsthal's death his greatness as a poet has been increasingly recognized, but the interpretation of his work is only beginning.

Hofmannsthal's Gesammelte Werke (3 vols., 1934) are supplemented by a number of posthumous publications in addition to those mentioned above, including Nachlese der Gedichte (1934); two volumes of prose, Loris (1930) and Berührung der Sphären (1931); two volumes of letters, Briefe 1890-1901 (1935) and Briefe 1900-1909 (1937); and many miscellaneous papers in the journal Corona (1930-1943). A complete edition in 12 volumes, edited by H. Steiner, has begun to appear (1946-).

See: G. Schaefer, Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1933); K. J. Krüger, Hugo von Hofmannsthal und Richard Strauss (1935); C. J. Naef, Hugo von Hofmannsthal's Wesen und Werk (1938), with bibliography by Herbert Steiner; Jethro Bithell, Modern German Literature, 1880-1938 (1939).

R. A.

Högborg, Olof (1855-1932, Swedish novelist and amateur ethnologist), is notable in Swedish literature for one monumental novel, Den stora vreden (The Great Wrath), portions of which first appeared as a prize novel in 1906 in the Swedish women's magazine Idun, where Selma Lagerlöf's (q.v.) famous Gösta Berlings saga had first appeared 15 years earlier. Högborg has written other novels, such as Baggbölingar (1911), Utbölingar (1912), and Storfursten av Lappland (1915; The Grand Duke of Lapland); but these are of no importance as compared with the strange, many-faceted Den stora vreden, in part a stirring provincial chronicle from pagan times down to the early 18th century, in part a magnificent fragment of natural history, in part a treasure trove of Arctic mythology and folklore. Högborg was born into an old peasant family from the semi-Arctic province of Ångermanland. After completing his education at the University of Uppsala, he returned to his native province as a teacher and journalist, driven by a never flagging interest in the folk life and folk superstitions of his native province and a consuming desire to give this material adequate literary form. Den stora vreden was the result of 20 years of struggle with this strange and diversified material. Though the work lacks literary finish in the usual sense of the term, it is powerfully conceived and written in a bold, harsh, crudely intense prose style that seems the only fitting medium for the fantastic miscellany of material which is poured with such rich and primitive abandon into the book. Important as the book is in itself, it is unquestionably more important as the work which "discovered" the far north of Sweden as a vast, seemingly inexhaustible source of inspiration and of subject matter for imaginative literary treatment. Since Olof Högborg many Swedish writers of prose fiction have employed these materials with success (Ludvig Nordström, Ernst Didring, qq.v., Gustaf Hedenvind-Eriksson, Hildur Dixelius-Brettner, Astrid Värning, and others), and in each case Högborg's Den stora vreden has left its imprint upon these authors. Högborg did for this section of the country what Selma Lagerlöf and Gustaf Fröding (qq.v.) did for the province of Värmland, what Karlfeldt (q.v.) did for Dalecarlia, what A. U. Bååth and Ola Hansson (qq.v.) did for Skåne.

Högborg's work is perhaps to be compared most directly with that of Selma Lagerlöf, though Den stora vreden differs in certain essential respects from Gösta Berlings saga. Högborg's novel, like Selma Lagerlöf's, is primarily a folk epic, in which the author serves simply as the modern literary intermediary in grouping and retelling old tales of the folk. In this retelling both authors are deeply gripped by their materials and treat them with an imaginative intensity and a lyrical fervor seldom found in Swedish prose fiction. But Högborg's work is stylistically far more primitive, more directly the property of "the folk"; and in general structure it is somewhat less unified than is Gösta Berlings saga, chiefly because its materials are more diversified and inclusive, going back much farther in time for their origins and including a much more massive and complicated body of folk traditions. As a literary phenomenon it may well be said, indeed, that Den stora vreden is all but unique in the annals of Swedish literature. In modern literature in general it finds perhaps its closest counterpart in Alexis Kivi's Finnish folk epic Seitsemän veljestä (1870; Eng. tr., Seven Brothers, 1929).

See: Ludvig Nordström, "Olof Högborg," Ord och bild, XXX (1921), 319-330.

A. G.

Holeček, Josef (1853-1929, Czech novelist and poet), is the author of an enormous 10-volume cycle of novels depicting Czech peasant life. Holeček was born in Stožice near Vodňany (southern Bohemia) and became a journalist. He was a war correspondent and frequent traveler in the Balkans and also visited Russia. He died in Prague. In his early years he wrote much about Yugoslavia, especially Montenegro, an interest which led to his translation of the Yugoslav heroic folk poetry (Srbská národní epika, 4 vols., 1909-1926; Serbian National Epics) and to imitation of its style in original poetry about Yugoslav heroes (e.g., Sokolovič, 1922). Holeček also translated the Finnish national epic, Kalevala (5 vols., 1894-1896). But the cycle of novels, Naši (10 vols., 1898-1930; Our People), is his most important work. It attempts to present a complete study of the Czech peasant in southern Bohemia as he was before the advent of industrialization. The action covers the years 1840-1866 and centers around an ideal peasant, a "strong Christian," Kojan. The plot is poorly organized and of little interest compared to Holeček's penetrating analysis of the Czech peasant, of his religious and social problems, and a wonderfully vivid and detailed picture is presented of his customs, superstitions, legends, and beliefs. The book is permeated by a conservative agrarian ideology of strong Christian coloring. Holeček was influenced by the Russian Slavophiles, though his religious thought is primitive general Christianity rather than that of any particular denomination. Holeček preaches love for the soil, for family, community, and nation, with a strong accent on Pan-Slavism. He depicts the struggle of the peasant with the landlord and the usurer and succeeds in creating sharply individualized types. The books—especially the first three volumes—can be compared with Remont's (q.v.) The Peasants, not merely as a documentary novel with folkloristic information, but also as a searching analysis of the peasant's soul which to Holeček was identical with the soul of the nation.

See: J. Voborník, Josef Holeček (1913); E. Chalupný, Dílo Josefa Holečka (1926).

R. W.

Holstein, Ludvig, Greve (1864–1943, Danish lyrical poet), was born in fertile southern Zealand. He studied in Copenhagen and was for years connected with the publishing firm Gyldendal. His outwardly uneventful life is reflected in his poetry. In his best poems Holstein is one of the finest representatives of Danish neo-romanticism and symbolism, to which Helge Rode (q.v.) also belongs. Throughout his whole life Holstein remained close to nature. His themes are preeminently Danish: the beechtree with its "tin-grey" trunk, the apple in bloom in the spring and fragrant with fruit in the fall, the bewitching summer nights, the Northerner's longing for and exultation over "the good sun," "the gentle sun." Holstein's meter is varied, but always musical; alliteration occurs frequently. An aristocratic restraint characterizes his love poems. In one, the poet even warns us that "the heart's happiness" must be cared for like a costly garden, weeded, and protected against scorching rays.

In Holstein's production a lull of almost two decades occurs. During the first period, which brings Digte (1895, Poems; included is the haunting "Far, hvor flyver Svanerne hen?" Father, Where Do the Wild Swans Go?) and the lyrical love drama Tove (1898), an undercurrent of sadness runs, at times half-hidden below the fresh gayety. In the second period—ushered in by the poet's marriage—from 1915 on, optimism prevails in the poem collections Løv (1915; Leaves), Mos og Muld (1917; Moss and Mould), Aebletid (1920; Appletime), Hymner og Viser (1922; Hymns and Songs), and Jehi (1929; Become). Sadness, when it does occur, is deepened into sorrow. Decidedly earthy, realistic traits crop up. The poet's conscious feeling of his deep-rootedness in Denmark brings abiding happiness. Nature is now clearly pantheistic. One spirit rules behind myriad manifestations (see "Vaaren"; Spring). The feeling of continuity, everlastingness, stands out. The poet meets everywhere the miracles of nature (the only miracles). Holstein's credo is reiterated in the religious-philosophical essay Den grønne Mark (1925; The Green Field)—"Root, know your crown; crown, know your root," the poet exhorts. In Jehi Holstein's poetry becomes cosmic.

See: C. Ludwigs, "Ludvig Holstein," in Ejnar Skovrup, ed., Hovedtraek af nordisk Digtning i Nytiden, I (1920), 129–134; Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871–1933) (1934).

C. K. B.

Holz, Arno (1863–1929, German poet, literary theorist, and dramatist), was born in the East Prussian city of Rastenburg. In 1875 his family moved to Berlin, and the boy was brought into contact with the modern urban life that he was to make the subject of his first important volume of verse, Das Buch der Zeit (1886). His lyric apprenticeship was served in the school of Emmanuel Geibel and Julius Wolff and showed none of his later radicalism (e.g., Deutsche Weisen, 1884, with Otto Jerschke).

Holz's real career, typical of the radical and experimental nature of German literature in the last decades of the nineteenth century, started with the naturalistic revolution, of which Das Buch der Zeit is an important document with its interest in social problems and the modern city and its enthusiasm for Zola and Ibsen (qq.v.). In 1885 Holz was one of the contributors to the naturalistic anthology Moderne Dichter-Charaktere. His major contribution to German naturalistic theory was Die Kunst, ihr Wesen und ihre Gesetze (1891), an exposition of the theory of so-called konsequenter Naturalismus. In this essay Holz attempted to formulate an aesthetic theory which should exclude the subjective element from artistic creation and give naturalism a logical, objective theoretic basis. In reality, its extreme ideas undermined the naturalistic position. More important than his theory was his collaboration with Johannes Schlaf (q.v.) in writing, under the joint pseudonym Bjarne P. Holmsen, Papa Hamlet (1889), a phonetic and photographic reproduction of reality. This with the drama Die Familie Selicke (1890), produced by the Freie Bühne in the same year, and Neue Gleise (1892) was of great influence in the development of Gerhart Hauptmann (q.v.) and the naturalistic drama in general. With the decline of German naturalism, Holz turned back to the lyric with a volume of modernistic poetry, Phantasus (1898–1899). In 1899 was published Die Revolution der Lyrik, a theoretic defense of his new poetic technique in which he championed a poetic form that should be a direct expression of the subject matter, avoiding rhyme and strophe, a form that is not "free" but "natural" verse. Typographically the lines are centered on the page and not aligned with the left-hand margin, the so-called Mittelachse verse. His later career produced further volumes of lyrics, such as Dafnis; lyrisches Porträt aus dem 17. Jahrhundert (1904), and several dramas, among them Traumulus (1904), written with Otto Jerschke, and Sonnenfinsternis (1908), a tragedy. His works appeared in 10 volumes in 1924 under the title Das Werk von Arno Holz.

See: O. E. Lessing, Die neue Form (1910); R. Ress, Arno Holz und seine künstlerische Bedeutung (1913); K. Turley, Arno Holz (1935).

W. H. R.

Hora, Josef (1891–1945, Czech poet), was, next to Wolker (q.v.), the most outstanding member of the group who composed "proletarian" verse, and he later developed into a writer of metaphysical reflection and meditation of considerable power. He was born in Dobřín near Roudnice (north of Prague) and became a journalist, first with the Communist and then with the Socialist press. He began as a follower of S. K. Neumann (q.v.). Two collections, Strom v květu (1920; The Tree in Bloom) and Pracující den (1920; The Working Day), established him in the group of proletarian poets. But his enthusiasm for the revolution was even then tempered by a desire for individual integrity and by a frankly contradictory longing for escape from the masses and from towns. Srdce a vřava světa (1922; The Heart and the Tumult of the World) constitutes the break with the rhetoric of the proletarians and his return to the forms of folk poetry as well as to themes of nature, home, quiet, and even an unproletarian loneliness. The change is complete in Italie (1925; Italy), which is ostensibly a travel diary. In this the poet achieved a style of almost classical serenity and severity. The later collections, among which Struny ve větru (1927; Strings in the Wind) is perhaps the best, offer a new metaphysical quality. Meditations on time and the universe, nourished by the reading of William James, Bergson (q.v.), and modern physics, acute realizations of the dreamlike character of existence, testify to a degree of spiritualization rare in recent Czech verse. Máchovské variace (1936; Variations on a Theme of Mácha) celebrates the great Czech romantic poet on the hundredth anniversary of his death and demonstrates the author's own affinity with romantic themes and forms. This is also obvious in the more recent volume, Jan houslista (1940; John the Violinist), a slight, sentimental story with an early-19th-century flavor about the return of a great violinist from America to his down-trodden native country. The convention disguises the author's profound and very personal despair over life and the fate of his nation. Besides these main collections Hora wrote a book of ballads, Tonoucí stíny (1933; Drowning Shadows), some verse satires, and some less impressive novelistic prose. In his later years he was extremely successful as a translator of verse; his paraphrase (1937) of Pushkin's Onegin is a masterpiece comparable to the finest achievements of Otokar Fischer (q.v.). Hora, apparently an out and out modernist and prophet of the coming revolution, found his way back to the sources of poetry in Slavic romanticism, in Mácha and Pushkin and their melancholy. Hora died in July, 1945, and was honored by a state funeral and the newly created title of "national poet."

See: F. X. Šalda, O nejmladší poesii české (1928); A. M. Piša, Proletářská poesie (1936).

R. W.

Houville, Gérard d' (pseud. of Marie Louise Antoinette de Heredia, 1875–, French poet and prose writer), was born in Paris. Most of the 89 poems that comprise her one volume of poetry were originally published in the Revue des deux mondes from 1894 to 1919; others appeared in the Renaissance latine and the Revue hebdomadaire. The first poems were signed with a triple X, but later she adopted the pseudonym Gérard d'Houville. Her collected verse, entitled Les Poésies de Gérard d'Houville, was published in an édition de luxe in 1930, in regular edition in 1931. Daughter of the well-known Parnassian poet, José Maria de Heredia, and wife of the symbolist poet, Henri de Régnier (qq.v.), Gérard d'Houville shows certain characteristics of both, though she is not directly influenced by either. Like her famous father she was attracted by classical subjects; many of her poems revive the atmosphere and legends of Greek and Roman antiquity with new imagery and interpretations. Like Heredia also she sometimes paints objective, colorful scenes. Strangely enough the daughter of Heredia has written only one sonnet. In the symbolist vein she often demonstrates a love of abstractions and analogies, a preoccupation with musical effects, but, unlike Mallarmé

(q.v.) and many of his disciples, she is never obscure. Allusions to romantic love are frequent, but her treatment of this passion differs from that of a typically romantic poet such as the comtesse de Noailles (q.v.); whereas the latter is inclined to be exalted and tragic, Gérard d'Houville is more often tender and melancholy. Favorite themes are death and the passing of youth, both of which Gérard d'Houville dreads with a very feminine and pagan fervor. Besides elegies in the antique manner and reminiscences of childhood, including nostalgic reveries about her creole ancestors and their land which she never saw, there are impressions of Paris and of travels in foreign lands; three poems inspired by maternal love, and many meditations on the spiritual aspect of human experience. All her poems are modeled on conventional verse forms, and classic clarity of thought and expression is a distinctive quality of her graceful and harmonious style.

As a prose writer Gérard d'Houville has won much admiration and acclaim. In the early part of the century she wrote regular chroniques for the Gaulois; later she contributed to other Paris periodicals, notably the Revue des deux mondes and Figaro, where she replaced Robert de Flers (q.v.) as dramatic critic after his death in 1927. In 1918 she was the first woman to be awarded the Grand Prix de Littérature by the French Academy. Her prose works include several novels, one of which (Le Roman des quatre, 1923) was in collaboration with Paul Bourget, Pierre Benoit (qq.v.), and Henri Duvernois, short stories, essays, plays, travel sketches, stories for children, prefaces, and a book of prose poems about flowers (Le Diadème des flores, 1925, édition de luxe with woodcuts by A. E. Marty).

See: Charles Maurras, "Le Romantisme féminin," in L'Avenir de l'intelligence (1905); Jean de Gourmont, Les Muses d'aujourd'hui (1910); Y. G. Le Dantec, "Gérard d'Houville, poète," Muse française, January 10, 1931.

C. B. C.

Huch, Friedrich (1873–1913, German novelist), born in Braunschweig, was one of the few writers of his time who were able to continue in a classical vein without giving the impression of a weak imitator or of a merely deft virtuoso. To label him a neoclassicist—as is often done—tends to obscure the interesting problem his creative work raises: what is the philosophical attitude which may compel a genuine revival of the older tradition? Can the novel, usually considered to be the most favorable medium for a realistic presentation of life, be made responsive to classical stylization? Huch's first novel, Peter Michel (1901), answers these questions once and for all. The hero of this story who starts out as a simple country boy and ends by fitting perfectly into boring bourgeois life is yet, for a number of years between, lifted above his ordinary self by a strong yearning for a more dignified form of existence; to this extent he transcends his particular character and partakes of a more universal if not to say classical impulse which remains the same throughout the ages. To enshrine such transcendence in a novel necessitates a blending of realistic detail and idealistic substance and a resolutely condensed diction, a task which Huch in all his works achieves with supreme skill. The setting of his novels is always contemporary and captivating, while the content touches on general issues of human nature, as when he presents a modern version of "elective affinities" in Die Geschwister (1903) or when the essence of human emotions, true love, is gradually evolved out of a welter of lower impulses in Pitt und Fox (1909). Even in Mao (1907) and in Enzio (1911), where a seemingly preponderant psychological interest results in an excellent dissection of decadent characters, closer inspection reveals that Huch again reduces the complexity of modern life to the simplicity of those plots which, to use the terminology of classical criticism, have their roots in the timeless attributes of men.

See: Th. Roffler, Bildnisse aus der neueren deutschen Literatur (1933), pp. 208–228; R. Denecke, Friedrich Huch und die Problematik der bürgerlichen Welt (1938).

H. B.

Huch, Ricarda (1864–, German novelist and historian), born in Braunschweig, is a sister of the novelist Rudolf Huch (1862–) and a cousin of Friedrich Huch (q.v.). Inherited literary talents, the background of a highly cultured home, the opportunity of a university education—a rare privilege then for women—together with an astounding zest for work have enabled Ricarda Huch to become the undisputed leading woman writer in present-day Germany. It is understandable that her work should provide an irresistible challenge to critics of literature, awakening a desire to analyze it from a psychological viewpoint and to throw into high relief its typically feminine qualities. Her creative work, it has been pointed out, shows none of the paralyzing influences which learning and scholarly inclinations quite often have.

Her style, though refined and deliberate in choice of words and structures, remains vigorous and natural; not even the abundance of accurate historical detail displayed in her later novels obstructs the epic flow of tales that are usually gripping. Moreover, while Ricarda Huch is conversant with all current European ideas, nevertheless emotions and strong instincts govern the lives of her characters. The best known among her earlier works, Erinnerungen von Ludolf Ursleu dem Jüngeren 1893; Eng. tr., Recollections of Ludolf Ursleu the Younger, 1913-1915), at first evokes reminiscences of that long series of European novels portraying the disintegration of a well-to-do family, brought about by an overdose of introspection and intellectual refinement, with an accompanying loss of vitality. With Ricarda Huch, however, disaster results much less from intellectualism than from the onrush of irrational passion.

Much has been made of the fact that after her 50th year she all but ceased to produce creative literature and instead turned to history and philosophy, the inference being that such a shift corresponds to certain biological changes in women. However this may be, it seems that the truly feminine aspects of Ricarda Huch's work still await a more subtle discussion. Ever since she began to write she has made periodic attempts to form a definite philosophy of life and to clarify her social, moral, and political concepts. "Like drops of rain falling from the sky upon the ground we pass through our allotted span of time, tossed about by the winds of fate"—this statement in her first novel was less an abiding conviction than an attitude which Ricarda Huch in all her subsequent works tried to repudiate in favor of a more masculine set of beliefs, possessing ample scope for the exercise of will power. She failed time and again in the attempt. But this failure became her greatest asset and the most intriguing feature of her work—the combining of a truly epic style with the ability to discern, in a welter of conflicts and opposites, the lasting values of beauty and love. No matter to what aspects of life she turns, she always transcends ephemeral phenomena and reconciles the conflicts in a vision of final harmony and beatitude, even when she delves into such a sordid milieu of broken lives as in Aus der Triumphgasse (1902). It was only natural that her predestined epic understanding tended to radiate through ever wider spheres of reality and to turn to vast historic panoramas, as in Die Geschichten von Garibaldi (1906-1907; Eng. tr., Defeat, 1928; Victory, 1929), Das Leben des Grafen Federigo Confalonieri (1910), and the monumental account of the Thirty Years' War, Der grosse Krieg in Deutschland (1912-1914). With the last-mentioned work the end of her creative period is reached. Thereafter she devoted all her energies to historical, critical, and philosophical studies, a field in which she was already well accredited by virtue of her two volumes on the romantic movement, Die Blütezeit der Romantik (1899) and Ausbreitung und Verfall der Romantik (1902). The crisis affecting this change was fundamentally intellectual. It is as if once more Ricarda Huch had wanted to cast off her womanly, harmonizing role and to fling herself into the man-made world of ideas and polemical issues. But it was in vain; whether she sided with Christianity against neopaganism (Der Sinn der Heiligen Schrift, 1919) or with Bakunin's socialism against the bourgeois mentality (Michael Bakunin und die Anarchie, 1923), the balance is soon restored as she reveals deep appreciation of personality (Entpersönlichung, 1921) or extols the sturdiness of German Bürgertum (Im alten Reich, 1927). A more recent book, Das Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung (1937), dealing with the age of Reformation and its gigantic inner tensions, shows her power at its best; she experiences life as a bitter struggle and yet she inspires us to release our fondest hopes and warmest sympathies into the world and towards man, notwithstanding his apparent shortcomings. The same maternal instinct with which other woman writers of her time, notably Agnes Sapper (1852-1929) and Helena Christaller (1872-), have sanctified life within the precincts of the family or the small community has in the work of Ricarda Huch extended its beneficial function into far wider spheres of time and place.

See: E. Gottlieb, Ricarda Huch; ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der deutschen Epik (1914); O. Walzel, Ricarda Huch (1916); E. Hoppe, Ricarda Huch (1936).

H. B

Hungarian literature. In portraying the salient traits of Hungarian literature from 1870 to the present, one must be especially careful not to succumb to comfortable generalizations. The complexities of Hungarian culture cannot be simplified by a few attractive labels. One may at least affirm that in this period Hungarian literature has shown an organic relationship to the main tendencies of Western European literature. It is the tradition of Hungary to be associated culturally with the West. But it should be stressed also that literary schools, like naturalism, realism, impressionism, symbolism, expressionism, futurism, dadaism, surrealism, current for a considerable time in Western Europe, had their exponents in Hungary at considerably later dates. There are two reasons for this delayed action. One is Hungary's geographical and historical position in the Danubian Valley which made her political existence for centuries precarious, so that literature necessarily became above all a weapon of essentially national interests; the other reason is that much of modern literature in Western Europe seemed eccentric, therefore incongruous with the Hungarian spirit. The traumatic effects of Western European writers and poets, the neurotic tendencies of their art, their symbols as a whole, seemed forced and alien; even the anchorites of beauty in Hungarian literature, who withdrew to the seclusion of personal taste, admitting pronounced individualism, found much of exaggerated Western individualism obnoxious or simply undesirable.

While these two reasons appear valid as expressions of a nation's defense mechanism and cultural indigeneness, they contain only half-truth; in fact they also indicate an evasion of responsibility as to an imaginative conception of progress. To be sure, not only the Parnassian adherence to form, as emphasized by Western European creators, but ideological innovations with a sociological perspective implying a need of change in social structure, were considered tenets incompatible with those of Hungarian literature. Consequently writers had too many hurdles to surmount, as too much stress was laid upon conservatism, despite the bargaining technique of a liberal political era. But some change in literary taste was inevitable. The industrial and commercial expansion of Budapest, the conflict that emerged from the contrast of pastoral illusions and urbane sophistication, affected of course the taste and views of writers and readers. On the other hand, the grand style of patriotic pride manifested by the festivities of 1896, when a symbolic expression was given to the fact that the Hungarians had lived in Europe for one thousand years, seems in some respects anachronistic in its enthusiastic tone and color if one considers the social and economic ailments which were causing peasants and proletarians to migrate to America. The dispossessed were symptoms of a chaos that indeed evoked the sympathy of some writers and poets. The analogous social symptoms of Western Europe finally induced some Hungarian writers (e.g., Sándor Bródy, q.v.) to devote their attention to the portrayal of the exploited in the manner of Emile Zola (q.v.), but it was only in the 20th century that this devotion to the "underdog" achieved real literary significance, though too often it meant subordination of art to didacticism.

Hungary's foremost poet in the 70's, János Arany (q.v.), a classicist par excellence (see his Toldi, a genuine epic poem) and at the same time close to the people, objected to cosmopolitanism. It would be unfair to accuse Arany of intolerance; he was too powerful a genius for pettiness, and his criticism was directed mainly against journalistic tricks in the name of literature. Nevertheless he stigmatized cosmopolitanism in his own fashion. The leading literary critic of that time, Pál Gyulai (q.v.), author of Petőfi Sándor és lírai költészetünk (Sándor Petőfi and Our Lyric Poetry), though an ardent nationalist possessed sufficient intellectual flexibility and curiosity to notice the importance of Thackeray, Taine (q.v.), and Sainte-Beuve (cf. especially his Bírálatok és kritikai dolgozatok, 1854, Criticisms and Critical Essays). It is also pertinent to recall the exuberant imagination of Móricz Jókai (q.v.), whose narrative genius (see A fekete gyémántok, 1870, Eng. tr., Black Diamonds, 1896) was recognized by Gyulai, yet whose historical ambiguity and romantic formlessness were severely criticized by the latter. These writers were Hungarians (Magyars) to the very core of their being; they were not insensible to the values of the West but they were inclined to relegate modern aesthetic and sociological theories of literature to a pattern of life which, in their estimation, in its fundamental meaning could not be transferred to Hungary. In truth, they should not be numbered among those who determined the literary character of the last three decades of the 19th century; their literary position was secure when the younger writers were still more or less inarticulate. Arany died in 1882, Gyulai in 1909, Jókai in 1904. They were accepted as literary spokesmen of their country before 1870. Ferenc Toldy, the literary historian, and Ágost Greguss, the critic of aesthetic problems, belong to this generation.

Just as it was immensely difficult for the American South, conditioned by the picturesque and sentimental associations of colonels, juleps, magnolias, plantations, and mammies, to discharge its prejudices in exchange for a democratic concept and a problematical commercial affluence promised by the North, so it was confusing for the Hungarian aristocracy and gentry to associate itself with the idea of progress that meant a refusal of inherited prejudices. The rapid rise of a plutocracy, only too willing to promote its own interests by co-operating with the traditional class distinctions, and rejoicing in nationalism with the eagerness of neophytes, helped to maintain a system which involved pressure upon those now unwilling to accept the new ideology of vested interests and collaboration with the others. Most writers and poets either shared the ethical implication of nationalism without ascertaining its economic unfairness or actually agreed, sometimes in a sheepish way, with the widespread belief that change would be detrimental to the general welfare of the country. The criteria of success resembled those of the American "gilded age"; unfortunately even gifted writers, to whom careerism should have been abhorrent, were compelled to show preference for social and literary norms harmful to the total expression of their creative urge. Only in the 20th century, with the appearance of Endre Ady (q.v.) on the horizon of Hungarian literature (see especially his Vér és arany, 1907, Blood and Gold), did dissension with petrifying traditions and prejudices reach expression so forceful that the cleavage between the 20th-century Hungarian literary mentality and that of the late 19th century became obvious even to those who as a rule paid little attention to literature.

Hungarian literature also gave frequent evidence, however, of a spiritual mobility akin to that of Western Europe. The romantic pessimism (Magány, 1889; Solitude) of Gyula Reviczky (q.v.); the philosophical naturalism of János Vajda (q.v.); the superman complex of Jenő Komjáthy; the oriental sadness (Költemények, 1876; Poems) of József Kiss (q.v.); the satirical power of László Arany; the mellow sorrow of Gyula Vargha—all implied participation in an utterly modern sensitiveness. These poets grappled as Hungarians and as creators with a fate which expected them to be fugitives from traditions. They were not great poets; they were not carried away by the demoniac power of superhuman restlessness; but they faced life with epical and lyrical courage, and in some of their works they revealed greatness. In the sphere of the novel the style and wit of Zoltán Ambrus (q.v.) must be mentioned (Midas király, 1906; King Midas), also the naturalistically suggested romantic intensity (A nap lovagja; The Knight of the Day) of Sándor Bródy, the erratic and satirical intelligence of Lajos Tolnai, the psychological realism of Zsigmond Justh, and the humor and irony (Szent Péter esernyője, 1895; Eng. tr., St. Peter's Umbrella, 1900) of Kálmán Mikszáth (q.v.). The professional competence of literary historians, philologists, and critics, like Jenő Péterfy (q.v.), Lajos Dézsi, Frigyes Riedl, Bernát Alexander, László Négyesy, Zoltán Ferenczi, Pál Hunfalvy, showed an engaging and refreshing mentality, simultaneously studious and human.

